It appears that the Royal College of Surgeons lately extended the course of education required for students, while the University of Glasgow took a course exactly opposite. A meeting of the medical students at the latter university took place, early in January, at which it was resolved to petition the senate against the measure, as one "having a direct tendency to lower the eminence and respectability of the profession." The chief point in question seems to refer less to the actual medical education, than to the literary and philosophical education which has generally preceded it. The universities of St. Andrews and Glasgow are for shortening and comparatively overlooking this part of the education of medical men. A Medical Reform Association has been established in London, for the purpose of obtaining some legislative enactment for an uniform and efficient system of medical study in Britain; and as a preliminary step, the society has issued circulars for procuring information respecting the actual state of such education over the civilised world, and announced prizes for the three best essays "on the present state of the medical science and practice in the United Kingdom, and the most advisable and efficient mode of promoting the advancement and the improvement of both in all their branches."

EXPENSE OF EXECUTIONS.

By a Report drawn up by Councillor Chambers, on the subject of the expenditure incurred by the city of Edinburgh in alighting criminal prisoners, and of supporting the national jail, which was laid before the Town Council last month, it appears that the citizens of Edinburgh are burdened with an expense of nearly L.500 a-year upon an average, in supporting criminals no way connected with the city jurisdiction. This statement has attracted considerable notice, and will most likely lead to a reform in the present highly injurious system of alighting county and crown prisoners in the jails of the royal burghs, solely at the expense of the inhabitants of these towns. The most curious part of Councillor Chambers's report is that relative to public executions. "In the period of three years (says he), from October 4, 1830, to September 14, 1833, there have been five executions in Edinburgh, the total expense of which amounts to L.215, 8s. 6d., which sum has been paid by the city. Three of the executions were of persons whose crimes had been committed without the city, and the expense incurred for their executions amounted to L.131, 6s. 3d. The expense incurred for the remaining two executions of persons whose crimes had been committed within the city, was L.84, 2s. 3d. Average expense of each of the five executions, L.43, 1s. 8½d."

ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENT OF EDINBURGH.

THE death of Dr. Inglis, leaving a vacancy in one of the collegiate churches of Edinburgh, and one of the least-frequented of that class, has urged the Town Council to take measures for a legalised reduction of the numbers of the city clergy. On the 15th January, a deputation of the Council had a conference with a deputation of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, with a view to obtain the consent of the church to the uncollegiating of the double charges. The clergy expressed no objection to the uncollegiating, but opposed the reduction of the numbers of the clergy. They think it rather necessary that more clergymen should be appointed. In consequence of the result of this conference, a motion has been announced in the Council, "That every effort having been made to induce the Presbytery to consent to a diminution of the clergy, by the uncollegiating of the Edinburgh churches which have still two ministers, and the Presbytery having intimated their decided dissent to such a measure, the Town Council ought to lose no time in going to Parliament for this object, either separately or by introducing the purport of the above motion into any other bill, as may be considered most expedient."

It appears from an inquiry instituted by the Town Council, that the demand of the Edinburgh Presbytery for new churches, on the ground that the poor are excluded by high seat rents from those already in existence, is not tenable. Of the 15,000 sittings in the present churches, there are 3032 under 6s., of which 903 are let, and 2129 unlet; 3032 between 6s. and 9s. 6d., of which 1429 are let, and 1603 unlet; 3050 between 10s. and 15s., of which 2148 are let, and 902 unlet; 3012 between 15s. 6d. and 20s., of which 2063 are let, and 949 unlet; 3015 between 20s. and 42s., of which 2663 are let, and 352 unlet. It thus appears, that, in the established churches, only the dearer sittings (those which serve for the ostentation of the wealthier orders) are generally let; that the poor, though offered sittings in these churches at rates far beneath the prices of seats in dissenting chapels, do not attend; and that, so far from additional accommodation being required for the poor, there are already unlet sittings for that class of people, equal to at least three entire churches. Since the publication of this document, which has made a great impression in the city, a member of the Presbytery has endeavoured to show that many of the cheaper unlet sittings are in places where neither seeing nor hearing is possible. This may be the case with a few hundreds at the utmost; but making every allowance for these, there must still be good church accommodation for two congregations, if it were only possible to collect them. Perhaps no blame is due to the city clergy, as individuals, for their failure to attract the humbler classes: the truth is, wherever there is a choice of places of worship, the upper orders in general prefer those connected with the establishment, which for some reason, certainly not a spiritual one, they deem the most respectable; while the mechanical and inferior portion of the trading classes, generally actuated by spiritual motives only, prefer the tabernacles of dissent. This is so conspicuously the case all over Scotland, that the members of the Presbytery of Edinburgh cannot fail to be aware of it. Actuated, nevertheless, by a desire—no doubt sincere—of sustaining the establishment in all points, essential and unessential, they are pressing the impoverished and bankrupt city to erect two new churches, which a former magistracy agreed to do, and are thus adding much to an embarrassment already sufficiently great. The friends and enemies of the church appear in many instances alike anxious that they should succeed in this and similar measures—the former from an idea that the establishment is to be by such means supported, and the latter from an expectation that its ruin will only thereby be hastened.

FEBRUARY, 1834.

The following view of the cost of the establishment in Edinburgh has been drawn up from the official statement, and may appropriately conclude this notice. It appears that after deducting the seat rents paid by the hearers in the establishment, the religious instruction of each of them costs the public annually the following sums:—In St Stephen's, 10d.; New North Church, 9s. 5d.; St George's, 10s. 1d.; St Mary's, 10s. 2d.; Tolbooth, 16s. 8d.; New Greyfriars, L.1, 5s. 5d.; High Church, L.1, 6s. 11d.; Lady Yester's, L.2, 9s. 3d.; St Andrew's, L.3, 1s. 10d.; Old Greyfriars, L.5, 10s. 2d.; Tron, L.5, 15s. 6d.; College, L.5, 19s. 6d.; High School Hall, supposing 80 sitters, L.17, 0s. 9d. General average, L.1, 6s. 6d. If the 9298 sitters in the established churches live, on an average, for 35 years under the pastoral care of the city clergy, their religious instruction, according to the table, will cost the inhabitants of Edinburgh L.430,514, 14s. 7d., after deducting the sums received for seat rents.

NEW BANKRUPT LAW.

At present, the subject of a proposed new bankrupt law for Scotland is engaging some degree of attention among the mercantile classes. Two different bills, one by the Lord Advocate, and another by the Chamber of Commerce of Glasgow, have been offered for consideration, against which many serious objections have been urged. It may be satisfactory to our readers to be informed, that a number of years ago a bankrupt bill was prepared by the Chamber of Commerce of Edinburgh, containing many salutary regulations, and arranged according to the natural order of the proceedings in sequestrations, some of the most important of which provisions have been latterly taken into the Lord Advocate's bill, and from thence again into that of the Glasgow Chamber, though apparently without any regard to order or arrangement in either of those bills. The gentleman who prepared the bill for the Edinburgh Chamber is Mr Alexander Campbell of Glasgow, to whom solely the public are indebted for the principal provisions both in the Lord Advocate's and the Glasgow Chamber's bill. Before proceeding to the legislature with either of the proposed bills, it behoves every man connected with the trade of the country to consider deeply their various provisions. It is, for instance, projected to appoint official trustees—men who will on all occasions step into the management of bankrupt estates—a scheme which practically will be so fruitful in jobbing or in furnishing places, and so much calculated to injure both debtors and creditors, that it should by all means be resisted. The grand desiderata in all cases of insolvency are a rapid winding up of the affairs, and cheapness and simplicity of movement; both of which are wanting in the two proposed bills. To assist in insuring these requisites, the sheriffs of counties, at least of certain districts, should have the power of expediting sequestrations, instead of the Court of Session exclusively; and it is to be hoped that this will form a clause in the bill which passes through Parliament. The trading classes in all parts of the country cannot too soon make rigid investigations into this exceedingly important subject, otherwise they expose themselves to the risk of all the evils which selfish and interested parties may with great ease entail upon them for years.

Dec. 13. The sum of L.200 was distributed by Lady Ramsay of Balmain, among the needy on the estate of Chisholm, in Inverness-shire. The poor assembled at Erenless Castle, and received the benefactions, according to their wants, some families obtaining L.4 and L.5 each.

—23. A public meeting was held in the Tron Church, Edinburgh, to consider the best means of obtaining the removal of all restrictive privileges which prevent the free exercise of any craft or calling within the city, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder in the chair. The meeting, which was quite crowded, was addressed by Mr Aytoun, advocate, Mr Mackenzie, jeweller, Mr Adam Black, bookseller, Mr Gourlay, tailor, Mr R. W. Jameson, advocate, Mr Blackie, spirit dealer, Mr Matthew Wingrave, and others, who all deprecated the monopolies enjoyed by the several incorporated trades, as injurious alike to the unprivileged craftsman and to the community, and resolutions to petition Parliament for the removal of these restrictions were carried amid loud acclamation, as also to memorialise the Town Council to use their endeavours to promote that object. The speech of Mr Jameson was chiefly an appeal in favour of his client, Mr J. Hogg, shoemaker, who was at the time incarcerated in the Canongate jail, by the Incorporation of Shoemakers, for non-payment of tribute money, and for whose benefit a collection was made at the door.

—28. At six in the evening, William Ritchie, a labourer, returning from his work near Elgin to his house at the village of Longbridge, about two miles from that town, was barbarously murdered on the high road from Elgin to Fochabers. A man of the name of Noble, a deserter, and who had been working as a labourer at Brodie, was apprehended on the ensuing Saturday, Jan. 4, at Port George, on suspicion of having committed the deed. He stoutly denied his guilt, but prevailed in his answers.

Jan. 3. There was a strong muster of Whigs, with a mixture of Liberals, and followers of the noble house of B. eadlaba, at Perth to celebrate, by a public dinner, the return of Lord Ormelie for the county. Mr Graham of Redgorton was in the chair; among the company were Mr Jeffrey, Mr Halyburton, Admiral Adams, Mr J. A. Murray, Mr Fox Maule, Colonel Abercromby, Mr W. C. Aytoun, and Major Ferguson. Lord Ormelie, on his health being drunk, in a speech of some length defended the measures of Ministers, and his own conduct in supporting them generally, though some questions he had felt it to be his duty to vote against. Mr Fox Maule gave the health of Earl Grey; and the cheering, proposed that of the Lord Advocate. Mr Jeffrey, in his having entered into public life at too late a period. In reference to the strong ground which the Tories formerly held in Perthshire, he considered the return of Lord Ormelie the most signal triumph of reform which had been gained in the whole kingdom.

—5. A lad named Morrison stabbed a companion named William Farquhar in the Seagate of Dundee, in consequence of a quarrel after drinking. The wounded youth died in a few minutes. The other surrendered himself to justice, and has confessed his crime. Both lads were only about seventeen years of age.

—8. The Presbytery of Glasgow agreed, by a majority of 16 against 10, to petition Parliament for the repeal of the act of patronage of 1712, and restore the act of 1690, by which the appointment of ministers to vacant churches in Scotland was placed in the heritors and elders—with the following amendments:—"That the electing heritors shall be communicants, above twenty-one years of age, and should vote according to the rights which, as heritors, they enjoyed before the vacancy took place: That the electing elders should have held their office at least one year within the parish, previous to the vacancy; and that, if it should happen that there is not a sufficient number of elders, to constitute a session, the Presbytery shall be empowered to supply the deficiency, by electing the necessary number from the other bodies of electors: That to these two bodies of heritors and elders should be joined a third body, consisting of those male heads of families, above twenty-one years of age, who, previous to the vacancy, had resided at least four years in the parish or burgh to which the vacant church belongs, and who were before the vacancy communicants and sitters in the church, and continue to be so: That these three bodies of electors shall not vote en bloc, but that each separately shall choose delegates, to whom, forming one committee, the election of the minister shall be entrusted: That, for this purpose, the Presbytery shall appoint a day, on which, and having verified the qualification of the voters, shall elect, either from their own body or the other bodies of electors, each of them an equal number of delegates, which shall form together a committee, the majority of whom shall have the power to elect and present the minister."—The electors of the Kirkcaldy district of burghs publicly entertained their representative, Mr Ferguson of Raith. In returning thanks for the toast of his own health, Mr Ferguson entered into a defence of the Ministers and their good intentions, against the clamours of the Conservatives and Radicals, and reflected in severe terms upon the latter. Captain Wemyss, M.P. for the county, stated that when he represented Fife under the old system, he had received more applications for favours from his constituency in one month, than he had done during the whole of the last session, from the much more numerous voters whom he now represented.

—10. A splendid evening entertainment was given in the Assembly Rooms, Glasgow, to Mr Thompson, an individual who has lately attracted some notice in Scotland, as a lecturer against slavery. The admission was by tickets issued by the stewards, to the number of 450, which were soon eagerly purchased, and for some time before the meeting the applications for admission were numerous and urgent, but necessarily refused. The entertainment consisted of tea, coffee, and fruits; and the evening's proceedings were rendered useful and enlivening, by the eloquent speeches of the gentlemen who had been invited to address the assembly, and the excellent music of Mr Thompson's band. At seven o'clock, the Assembly Room was completely filled by a highly respectable audience, one half of whom were ladies in full dress. The chair was taken by James Johnston, Esq. supported on his right by Mr Thompson, Dr Wardlaw, the Rev. Mr Duncan, William Collins, and Patrick Thomson, Esqs.; and on the left by the Rev. Dr Hough, Patrick Lethem, George Watson, and Donald McIntyre, Esqs. Besides these, we noticed James McCune Smith, Esq., a young gentleman of colour from America, and Stanislaus Iwanowski, a Polish lieutenant.

—13. Sir Hugh P. H. Campbell of Marchmont, Bart. was elected M.P. for Berwickshire, without opposition. Sir Hugh, who has just attained his majority, and recently succeeded to his estates, is understood to be a moderate Tory.

—15. The town of Bathgate, in Linlithgowshire, resolved to petition Parliament for the repeal of the house and window duties, and the removal of the bishops from the House of Lords.

—18. At a public meeting held in Kilmarnock, which was attended by about 1000 persons, petitions were resolved upon against the corn-laws.

—20. At Glasgow, Hugh Kennedy, who was convicted and condemned at the last Circuit Court, under Lord Ellenborough's act, for throwing vitriol on the person of a fellow-servant in Buck's Head inn, was executed in terms of his sentence. Though the crime for which this young man suffered was followed by no fatal result, it was perpetrated in the most wanton and cowardly manner—from no apparent motive—and accompanied by circumstances of great atrocity, his victim being at the time asleep, in the dead of night, and awakened by the agony caused by the vitriol thrown upon his face, which literally burned out one of his eyes, and for a considerable time placed his life in great jeopardy. Kennedy made a full confession of his guilt, and at the same time stated that he had not stood alone in the planning and commission of the crime, but to the last he steadily refused to give the name of any person associated with him in the act, assigning as a reason, that if he was punished for the offence, it could be productive of no good end to bring others into the same melancholy situation with himself. He uniformly denied being actuated by malice in the cruel assault upon his victim.—This crime, lamentable to state, has of late years, been of frequent occurrence; so that this example of the severity of the law had become highly necessary.

The Duke of Buccleugh is stated by the Dumfries Courier to have resolved to rebuild Drumlanrig Castle in the most splendid style, so that it may henceforth be the chief seat of the family. Drumlanrig Castle is a large quadrangular edifice, of very imposing appearance, and situated very happily on a bank rising gently from the south brink of the Nith. It was erected immediately before the Revolution by the first Duke of Queensberry.

The Dundee Courier states that the factory bill, just come into operation, is occasioning considerable discontent among the workmen, as it takes six hours a week from their labour, and a proportionate sum from their wages. No expression of discontent from any other part of the country has been mentioned by the newspapers: indeed, the present prosperous state of manufactures in every quarter of the country seems to have opportunely occurred, to reconcile the operatives to this alteration in their lot.

The deanery of the Chapel Royal, vacated by the death of Dr Inglis, has been bestowed upon Dr McGill, professor of divinity in the university of Glasgow.

A subscription has been entered into at Kilmarnock, and has proceeded to the amount of L.1700, for building an additional church in connection with the establishment, to be called St Mark-nock's Church.

On a vacancy lately occurring in the parish church of Borrowstowness, the parishioners were permitted by the patron, the Duke of Hamilton, to make choice of one of three individuals whom he nominated; and their choice settled, by the votes of three-fourths of the congregation, upon the Rev. Mr K. Mackenzie, minister of the old chapel of ease, Gorbals, Glasgow, who has accordingly been presented by his grace, to the great satisfaction of the people.

Intelligence has been received of the success so far of the expedition of Mr Ferguson of Woodhill, with a number of emigrants, to Upper Canada. Mr Ferguson has made a purchase of 7000 acres, being the north-west half of the township of Nichel, situated about ten miles from the city of Guelph, and forty-five from Lake Ontario. It is intersected in one part by the Great River, on which there are abundant falls of machinery. The situation is healthy, and the trees of those kinds which denote soil of the highest fertility. The party are in the highest state of health, activity, and spirits, and have already been joined by some of their countrymen, who went out before, and unconnected with them.

Mr Kennedy, M.P. for the Ayr district of burghs, has resigned his seat in Parliament, and also in the Treasury, in consequence of ill health. Mr Crawford of Auchinames, cousin to Mr Kennedy, and lately Treasurer of the Ionian Islands, is spoken of as his probable successor in the former honour.

A contract has been entered into, to run the mail between Glasgow and Carlisle (ninety-five miles) in nine hours, to commence on the 6th of April next. The London mail will then arrive in Glasgow at two o'clock p. m.

A resolution has been formed to protect, by a railing, the Bore-Stane, in which Robert Bruce planted his standard at the battle of Bannockburn, and to erect a statue of Bruce, by Mr A. Ritchie, the young Scottish sculptor, in the neighbourhood.

Cholera appeared at the end of December in the village of Ormiston, East Lothian, where it had not been before, though it severely scourged Tranent, a village only two miles distant.

The improvements of the old Town of Edinburgh, after a long cessation of all work, are now proceeding towards a conclusion.

A poor ill clad little boy was lately placed at the police bar, on a charge of stealing a mat from a door in St Andrew Square. He replied, "How many times did you steal the mat?" He had stolen it from one person and sold it to another; stolen it from the person to whom he sold it to another; stolen it from the second person to a third; and stolen it again, and detected. This is doing a business with a very small stock.—Glasgow Journal.

Attack on vested interests.—Donald Ross, the commissioner of Inverness, has been thrown off, not by some bicker in the trade, but by the ordinary operation of law and equity, in cases of the last importance, Donald in his own person for upwards of twenty years. Retrenchment being the order of the day, the council conceived they could dispense with the services of the executioner, which are seldom required, but have hitherto been paid for, like the services of other law functionaries, at rather an extravagant rate. Donald has appointed executioner in 1812, with a salary of L.16 per annum. As most public appointments of a rare and difficult nature, accompanied with fees and perquisites, independent of salary, had various bites and nibbles at the public purse: Donald provided with a house, bed, and bedding; 2d, he was to supply thirty-six peats weekly from the tacksman of the petty baron; 3d, he had a bushel of coals out of every cargo of English coal imported into the town; 4th, he was allowed a piece of large ash he could carry, out of every cargo of Scotch coal; 5th, he had a peck of oatmeal out of every hundred bolls in the shore; 6th, he had a fish from every creel or basket brought to the market; 7th, he had a penny for every sack of meal sold at the market; 8th, he had a peck of salt out of every cargo; 9th, he was allowed every year a suit of clothes, two pairs of stockings, a hat, and two pairs of shoes. As these fixed and regular sources of income, Donald levied mail on the lieges in the shape of Christmas boxes, and sides a sum of L.5 at every execution at which he presided, all these items must have amounted to fifty or sixty pounds annum, and as there have been just three executions since Donald acceded to office, they must have cost the town near hundred pounds each execution! It is very true that male servants are paid more for doing less; but we think that it will effect a considerable saving, to say nothing of the constant nuisance among our fish and meal, by displacing a regular executioner, and trusting to the services of a from Edinburgh or Glasgow.—Inverness Courier.

NOTES ON CANADA.

WE have just had put into our hands the following statements regarding prices of land, transport, place to place, &c., in Upper Canada, by a gentleman who left the colony in the month of November, and who took pains to ensure accuracy in his useful details. As the season for emigration is approaching, the information here afforded will do less prove acceptable to many of our readers.

"The writer, after nearly two years' residence, on a former occasion, upwards of twelve months' experience, would advise none to proceed to Upper Canada, under the erroneous idea of eating the bread of idleness; but those who possess a small capital—lies, particularly those with grown-up sons—men, or women of sober and industrious habits—do not do better than proceed to that country, where they would receive a full remuneration for their labour."

WAGES AND PROFITS.

cannot agree with those who believe that the of the masters is the cause of the lowness of or that the profits of the masters are at all the ordinary rate. Our reason for not believs assertion is simple, and yet conclusive. The s throughout the empire have not, and could ter into any efficient combination. There is at them, and between them and foreigners, a t competition. This leads them to put the ossible prices upon their articles. Prices, ine reduced to that point at which the capital

If the master do not come down to this, he is is capital, and is ruined. What, then, would be the consequence, supposing the strikes to succeed —that is, supposing the masters compelled to give the increased wages demanded, and to require only the diminished quantum of offered labour? One effect of two is certain—either prices must be raised, or capital trenched upon. Let us see the result of either of these effects. The result, if prices were raised, is evident:

there would necessarily be a decreased consumption;
and consumption being decreased, the quantity of labour needed would be less. The number of labourers needed being less, a portion would be unemployed.
If they were allowed to bid against those employed, they would bring wages down—if they were not permitted, they must either starve or compel the masters to employ them. If they did so compel the masters, the masters' capital would soon be destroyed; and thus the very fund out of which labour is paid would disappear entirely. But it may be said that consumption would not decrease. Let us learn whether it would not. If one strike succeeds—and strikes are to be the instrument to be employed—the various trades will all necessarily have their wages raised.
Say, for example, that the builders want higher wages, so do also the tailors, the shoemakers, the smiths, and so on; and since we are supposing the unions to be efficient, we are justified in supposing that wages generally are raised. This necessarily raises prices—all prices; but if a man has a given income, say of L.100, and you raise the price of all commodities, or of any one commodity, he must consume less—the more efficient the unions, the more certain then would be the result of diminished consumption. The tailors, the shoemakers, the hatters, the builders, the smiths, would all have less work to perform, consequently they must lower their wages, starve, or destroy capital. But let us try the other alternative: suppose prices not to rise, but the profits of the master to be taken as the fund out of which to pay the increased quantum given to the labourer. It is well known, to all who know any thing about the matter, that owing to the immense masses of capital now used, the ordinary rate of profit is remarkably low. A capitalist of many thousands of pounds, although he get a small profit, has yet a large sum upon the whole; the profit, in fact, is reduced so low, that if any reduction worth a thought by the labourers takes place, capital must be used, and not returned; that is, capital would every year grow less; and the fund out of which wages are paid would ultimately disappear entirely. The consequence of this would be unmixed misery to all classes, and on none would the mischief fall more heavily than on the labourers. However, some may argue that the profits of the masters might sensibly be diminished, and yet capital not be touched. Allow this for a moment. Are the labourers to remain the same in numbers, or are they to increase? If they are to remain the same in number, we at once allow that, under the supposition, the evil we anticipate would not happen. But then the same good effect might be obtained, without any other means than by simply keeping the numbers at this point now. Keeping the number of labourers the same as it now is, and allowing capital to continue increasing at the rate at which it now increases, a very few years would so enlarge the fund out of which wages are paid, that the wages would necessarily rise, and that improvement of the condition of the people take place for which we are all so desirous. But if the people act on their present opinions, we know full well that their numbers would increase. They increase now, they would increase then; and the consequence would soon be, that the profits of the capitalist would quickly be reduced to nothing, since each day would bring upon him an increased demand; and then again the result would be a defalcation from capital, till it would entirely disappear. These are not chimerical evils. We defy any one to prove that the same invariable result would not always follow. Let any one of the people themselves reason this matter over —let him come into the field of friendly disputation with us; and we will pledge ourselves to make out this conclusion as the necessary result in every case of a successful strike, conducted upon the principles above explained. We yield to none in the deep interest we take in the people's welfare; but our interest does not extend to supporting their errors, or blinding and misleading their understandings.—*Tait's

POWER OF RIDICULE.

It is with ridicule as with compassion—we do not like to be the solitary objects of either; and whether we are laughed at or pitied, we have no objection to sharers, and fancy we can lessen the weight by dividing the load. A gentleman who was present at the battle of Leipsic told me a humorous anecdote, which may serve to illustrate the above position:—
It will be remembered that the British government had dispatched a rocket brigade to that action, and that Captain Boker, a deserving young officer, lost his life in the command of it. After the signal defeat of the French at this memorable action, Leipsic became full of a mixed medley of soldiers, of all arms, and of all nations; of course, a great variety of coin was in circulation there. A British private, who was attached to the rocket brigade, and who had picked up a little broken French and German, went to the largest hotel in Leipsic, and displaying an English shilling to the landlord, inquired if that coin was current there. "O yes," replied he, "you may have whatever the house affords for that money; it passes current here at present." Our fortunate Bardolph, finding himself in such compliant quarters, called about him most lustily; and the most sumptuous dinner the house could afford, washed down by sundry bottles of the most expensive wines, was dispatched without ceremony. On going away, he tendered at the bar the identical shilling which the landlord had inadvertently led him to expect was to perform such wonders. The stare, the shrug, and the exclamation, elicited from "mine host of the garter" by such a tender, can be more easily conceived than expressed.

An explanation, very much to the dissatisfaction of the landlord, took place, who quickly found, not only that nothing more was likely to be got, but also that the laugh would be tremendously heavy against him.
This part of the profits he had a most charitable wish to divide with his neighbour. Taking, therefore, his guest to the street door of his hotel, he requested him to look over the way. "Do you see," said he, "that large hotel opposite? That fellow, the landlord of it, is my sworn rival, and nothing can keep this story from his ears, in which case I shall never hear the last of it. Now, my good fellow, you are not only welcome to your entertainment, but I will instantly give you a five franc piece into the bargain, if you will promise, on the word of a soldier, to attempt the very same trick with him to-morrow, that succeeded so well with me to-day." Our veteran took the money, and accepted the conditions; but having buttoned up the silver very securely in his pocket, he took his leave of the landlord with the following speech, and a bow that did no discredit to Leipsic:—"Sir, I deem myself bound to use my utmost endeavours to put your wishes in execution; I shall certainly do all I can, but must candidly inform you that I fear I shall not succeed, since I played the very same trick with that gentleman yesterday; and it is to his particular advice alone that you are indebted for the honour of my company to-day."

ITALIAN NEWSPAPERS.

That portion of the English public who feel an interest in foreign politics are daily presented with news chiefly derived from French and German, and occasionally from Portuguese and Spanish, papers. Even Greek and Turkish gazettes are now and then brought to light, but seldom, if ever, have we met with any communication derived from the Italian press. The reason lies in the fact, that no information worth relying upon can be obtained from Italian newspapers. They are either a monopoly of the various governments into which that country is divided, or else they are subjected to such a severe censorship, that they never venture upon any topic of importance. Although Italy contains upwards of twenty millions of inhabitants, it would be difficult to enumerate more than a dozen newspapers published throughout the peninsula, and of these there is not one the contents of which might not be inserted in a couple of columns of any of our morning journals.
As for their circulation, we can confidently assert that the sum total of the copies issued by the whole of the Italian gazettes does not amount to what is struck off by one of our leading papers. With respect to the quality, we shall select a few specimens. The Diario di Roma, the only newspaper appearing in the ancient metropolis of the world, is a great source of entertainment to our numerous countrymen residing there. It is not larger than a sheet of common letter paper, and its broad margin and large type show that the editor is at a loss how to fill up even so contracted a space. The leading article is generally consecrated to the account of some procession, or other religious ceremony, especially when the pope or any of the cardinals happen to have a conspicuous part in them; nor is the notice ever omitted of any exhibition of relics which is to take place for the edification of the faithful, or for the propitiation of some patron saint.
We often hear of some Jew or Negro receiving baptism, or of some English young lady returning to the bosom of the church. From the same source, we may learn that our English Cardinal Weld is giving splendid musical entertainments, being himself a distinguished performer on the French horn, or that our English Count Hogs le Gricie (a title, by the bye, which we do not recollect to have seen either in Burke or Debrett) is establishing an English-Catholic library, in order to assist in the meritorious work of proselytism. This is all we can gather of Roman news; and as to foreign intelligence, we need not state that they are all either imported or home-manufactured, constantly favourable to the cause of absolutism. In this case religious considerations are totally thrown aside. When the Catholic Belgian resisted the Protestant Dutchman, and when the Catholic Pole rose against the schismatic Russian, they found no mercy in the eyes of the head of the Catholic church;
nay, when the Greek cross was hoisted in battle against the Ottoman crescent, the sympathies of the vicar of Christ were all with the vicar of Mahomet!
In Florence there is one newspaper, and we never saw a meaner publication. First of all, it is printed on paper of such a description, that the lowest of our penny sheets of trash, the vilest of our dirty handbills, would, when put near it, shine like superfine Bath; and as for its contents, it is as bad as the Diario. Never is there a word to be found in it relative to domestic news, if we except some occasional theatrical intelligence. In this respect the grand duke shows the most ridiculous jealousy. He never suffers any domestic subject to be even alluded to; and whilst he would not object to an encomium of all the public improvements in England, he would not hear of a hint for the better lighting or cleaning of the streets of Florence. And yet this paper must serve as the sole political food, not only to the Florentines, but also to the whole population of the Grand Duchy. Leghorn, although a town with seventy thousand inhabitants, is not allowed to have a newspaper. Nor is Pisa, although the seat of an university; nor Siena, nor any other place in the grand duke's dominions. The prince makes it his own monopoly to retail political humbug, as he makes it one to retail lottery-tickets and playing-cards for the moral improvement of his subjects, or to poison them with his snuff and tobacco, or to force upon them his salt at his own price. The same characteristics of the Roman and Florence Gazette, may, with a few exceptions, apply to the Gazzetta di Milano, the Gazzetta Piemontese, and the Giornale delle due Sicilie. We say with a few exceptions, because we occasionally find in these papers some articles relative to the internal policy of their respective governments. We recollect reading in the Giornale delle due Sicilie many panegyrics on the perfect tranquillity and happiness of the people, at the very moment when political persecutions were in full progress. We sometimes meet in the Gazzetta di Milano with articles translated from the Frankfort Journal on some political principle in support of despotism; and the Piedmontese Gazette has not been backward in registering the long series of bloody sentences against the Giovane Italia, which have stamped with new infamy the name of Charles Albert of Carignan. The Genoa Gazette was for a time the best newspaper in Italy, not on account of its internal merits, but for its well regulated correspondence, by which it always conveyed the first intelligence from abroad; but since the death of its chief editor, it has sunk to the common level. The Gazzetta Ticinese, although written in Italian, belongs to Switzerland; and the papers of Bologna, Lucca, &c., though not quite so bad as the rest, are yet too limited in their sphere to be taken into a general consideration. In short, of all the Italian newspapers, we know only of one which we could recommend to our readers, and this is the Voce della Verità. This "Voice of Truth" comes out prompted by the Duke of Modena, and this is enough to indicate what kind of oracles it proclaims. Yet we recommend it for two reasons: first, because it is the only Italian paper which regularly gives Italian news; and, secondly, because it abounds in political discussions. In this last respect it is truly remarkable, as it develops without disguise the system which condemns Italy to groan under the double scourge of civil despotism and priestcraft. It is written in a style, compared to which the most violent paragraphs in our party journals would sound like gentle courtly speech, and the measures it urges all the governments to adopt against the liberals, would lead to belief of an incarnation of the infernal spirits in the bodies of its editors. We need hardly state that the effect produced by this paper is diametrically opposed to that intended; and that, whilst it disgraces the cause it advocates, it constantly holds up to the eyes of the Italians the fate which threatens the total ruin of their country, should they not succeed in averting it by united and redoubled efforts. Of course there is no part of Italy in which an opposition newspaper could be started. But, on the other hand, it is curious to observe that many pamphlets are secretly printed and circulated throughout the peninsula with a view to enlighten the people on the condition of their country. A collection of these pamphlets, at the head of which is the Giovane Italia, would contribute to show the constant efforts of Italian patriotism under a very different light from that in which it is generally considered, and would tend to excite in favour of that injured nation a far greater degree of sympathy than is generally felt on this side of the Channel. But it is extremely difficult for foreigners, even in Italy, to procure these clandestine productions of a mysterious power, as they form an object of the most inquisitorial research on the part of the Austrian and Italian governments, who often order domiciliary visits to be made in order to seize them, and condemn to most severe punishment any person in whose possession they are found.—Examiner, Jan. 5.

EXTENT OF THE RUSSIAN EMPIRE.

In no age, nor in any record of bygone nations, is a parallel to be found for the almost boundless extent of the Russian dominions, as they exist in the present day. This colossus of power forms a connected whole, which is dislocated by no seas, and intersected by the possession of no intervening sovereignty. There is not any part of it which lies at all disjointed from this congruous mass, save that which lies in America, and it is severed from it by a narrow strait. This portion, after all, does not amount to a fifteenth part of the Muscovite territory, which of itself is larger than Europe and Australia put together. It stretches over three quarters of the world ; occupying the larger portion of the north of Europe, the whole of the north of Asia, and part of the north-west of America. The connexion of the latter with Russia in Asia is maintained by a chain of islands which runs from the peninsula of Kamschatka in Asia to the peninsula of Alaska, in America. The Russian empire comprehends nearly two hundred and fifty degrees of longitude—consequently nearly two-thirds of the circumference of the whole globe; and about forty degrees of latitude—for it extends from Pyzdry, the last station on its Polish frontier, to Queen Charlotte's Sound in America. When it is twelve o'clock at midnight at its westernmost point, it is sixteen minutes past two o'clock at midnight at its easternmost. It comprises a seventh part of the habitable earth, and a five-and-twentieth part of its superficial extent, land and water. It is seventy-five times larger than Prussia; seventy times larger than Great Britain and Ireland; sixty-eight times larger than Italy; sixty-four times larger than Sweden; thirty-seven times larger than France; and thirty-one times larger than Austria. The climate of this immense sovereignty is as varied as its component parts. Here we have the heats which ripen the grape, the almond, the fig, and olive, the pomegranate, and orange, in the open air; and there the excessive frigidity which reduces mercury to the state of hardness in which it may be hammered. At one extremity the bear housed amid eternal ice, and at the other, the camel passing over a hotbed of arid sand; spring blooming along the Caucasus, whilst life and vegetation are entombed along the frozen strand of the Vistula and Neva. Yet, in all his greatness, the autocrat scarcely counts twice as many lieges as the King of England, and is lord of scarcely as many cities and market-towns as the single Emperor of Austria.

Postscript.

The juste milieu system which the Queen-Regent of Spain attempted to establish under the patronage of France, and, it is supposed, of England also, has already fallen. In consequence of the extreme unpopularity of her ministry, and of the representations of Captain-General Llander and others, she has been obliged to supersede M. Zea Bermudez, and several other obnoxious members of her cabinet, and to substitute decided liberals. M. Martinez de la Rosa is appointed prime minister and minister for foreign affairs; M. Gazeli has been appointed minister of justice; M. Vasquez Figueroa minister of marine, and M. Arnald minister of finance. The three first of these gentlemen held distinguished offices under the Constitutional regime twelve years ago. The rest of the ministry remains unchanged,

The differences between Don Pedro and his Peers are stated to have been made up.

The measures recently taken respecting the United States' Bank are occasioning great commercial embarrassment in America, which the bank itself probably endeavours to aggravate, in order that a clamour may be got up for its protection. The local legislature of South Carolina has passed a measure which amounts to a virtual declaration of separation—namely, a bill for the military organization of the state, and for causing the oath of allegiance, hitherto given to the general government, to be superseded by an oath of fidelity to this particular state. It has passed the Representatives by 90 to 21, and the Senate by 30 to 13.

Mr Barrett was, on Tuesday the 21st ult., sentenced to six months' imprisonment in Kilmainham jail, to pay a fine of L.100 to the King, and to give security to keep the peace for seven years, himself in L.500, and two sureties in L.250 each.

New Harbour at Trinity.—The most remarkable local event of the last month has been the publication of a scheme for erecting a new harbour and range of docks at Trinity, the nearest point of the Frith of Forth to Edinburgh, which is about to be undertaken by a company of London capitalists, in conjunction with others in Scotland. The heavy dues charged at Leith, and the want of deep water there at all states of the tide, are the circumstances which have led to this scheme. It is proposed to construct three wet docks immediately to the west of Newhaven harbour, with a low-water pier running out from the centre to the distance of 600 yards. At the proposed entrance to the docks, the depth of water at the lowest state of any tide is 6 feet 8 inches; at the extremity of the pier it is 9 feet; and the ground is perfectly clear of sand, so that no obstruction can ever arise. The capital of the company is to be L.200,000, in 4000 shares of L.50 each; one half of which will be required for the necessary works, while the annual income is calculated at L.19,250. Should this project be carried into effect, the L.260,000 advanced by government upon the docks at Leith will, to all appearance, become a mere bad debt, and the prosperity of that new burgh cannot fail to be greatly affected.

ECLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

In the earlier ages of the reformed faith, though great differences existed respecting forms of church-government, there was hardly any class of Christians who held that the church, or whatever they were pleased to call the church, should have some species of government, and that that should have a decided support in temporal power. The Catholics adhered to a hierarchy, at the head of which was a priest, bearing the character of a secular prince. The reformed church of England consisted also of a hierarchy, with this difference, that its acknowledged head was a moral sovereign only. The Presbyterians, again, abjuring a hierarchy, and professing to have no head but the Divine Founder of their faith, claimed temporal powers as a body, which they expected the state on all occasions to enforce. The religious struggle, indeed, of the two centuries before the last, all tended to one object—the exclusive support of the state to one church. It did not then enter into the mind of man to suppose that religion could be kept pure by any body of clergy, which had not some uniform constitution, fixed and sanctioned by civil authority.

The reason of this was the absence of dissent in the earlier ages of the Reformation. Catholics, Episcopalians, Presbyterians—all deemed an authorised body necessary; and nothing could exceed their attachment, when, in the progress of the civil war, the crownists and Independents began to hint the possibility of having religion without a church. From that time, dissent has been gradually extending, till at length a large majority of the professing Christians in both England and Scotland—and those by far the most zealous, externally, in their faith—are said to be included in it.

But, when the larger part of the community are said to live religiously without a church, the propriety of sustaining a church should be called in question. It is certainly by no means surprising. It is now thirty years since this idea was started, but rather as a speculative question, than with any hope of being speedily carried into effect. Since the commencement, however, of the present innovatory era, the question has been more boldly brought forward; and it is at the present time agitated with a degree of eagerness and energy almost unexampled even in religious controversy.

The general wish of the English dissenters and Scotch seceders, appears to be the entire separation of church and state, and a complete levelling of the rights of all denominations. Holding that endowment, so far from supporting religion, betray its service, they desire that the preaching of the gospel be maintained only by the voluntary contributions of those who are to profit by it. They do not even admit of the American system of endowments, by which a body of Christians of a certain amount can claim a certain portion of the church-allotments for the support of a minister chosen and removable by themselves. The mass of the church property in both countries, which is to be appropriated by the state, to which they hold that it belongs—only the present incumbent being allowed to enjoy their salaries for life. A concise view of the principal dogmas of the party is presented in the subjoined resolutions, which were adopted by a large meeting recently held in Edinburgh.

That this meeting object to civil establishments of religion, because, to employ the national authority in maintaining a religious creed, is to overstep the just limits of civil legislation, and to violate the rights of conscience;—because, to elevate one religious sect to a civil superiority over others, conferring upon it exclusive political privileges, and the enjoyment of national funds, is an act of gross injustice;—because the close alliance between the sect thus unduly favoured, and the general government, hinders the adoption of equal and impartial laws; and, by engendering disaffection in those to whom justice is denied, produces divisions among the people, which impede the movements of government, and lessen the national happiness;—because the incorporation of the church with the state is at once unnatural and unchristian; is subversive of its independence, and of the rights of the Christian people, injurious to the reputation of Christianity, and obstructive to its progress, by substituting a hateful and enfeebling compulsory support for that dependence on the power of its author, and the affection of its genuine disciples, through which alone it has hitherto prospered.

That of the practical oppression and inexpediency of these institutions, the dissenters of Scotland have ample proof, in their exclusion from every office connected with the system of national education; in their being liable to assessments for erecting and upholding the churches and manse of the establishments, and to be involved in the frequent disputes and litigations of which these are the source; and in many other grievances which might be enumerated. But this meeting cannot pass, without special notice, the example of this city, where the establishment is upheld at an extravagant expense, and for the use chiefly of the wealthy classes, by a system of direct taxation, offensive to the conscience of dissenters, and, in its effects, most hurtful to religion—irritating the minds of the community, exhibiting the gospel of peace in odious conjunction with an apparatus of force, and the ministers of the church as the incarcerators of their fellow-citizens.

That in the exclusion of their dissenting brethren of England from the national universities, and in their being compelled, by civil penalties, to conform to the rites of the established church in baptisms, marriages, and burials—this meeting see another striking example of the oppressive nature of ecclesiastical establishments—and take this opportunity of expressing their indignation that such unjustifiable wrongs should have been inflicted upon a body of men eminent for their services to the religion, morality, and freedom of the country, and for nothing more admirable than the patience with which they have borne the injustice of the laws.

That understanding that measures affecting our ecclesiastical institutions are to be submitted to Parliament by his Majesty's government, this meeting deem it their duty, in the exercise of their undoubted privileges as British subjects, to make a declaration of their principles to the government and legislature, and to represent that the total abolition of the ecclesiastical establishments of these realms is demanded at once by justice to dissenters, whom they so grievously oppress, and by the circumstances of society; it being absurd to maintain expensive religious institutions for a daily lessening minority of the people, and after the triumphant demonstration afforded by the progress of dissent of the far higher expediency of leaving religion to its native energies, and the providence of its divine Author."

Opinions exactly similar to these are now very generally expressed throughout England; nor does the resolution expressed by the government to stand by the church, appear to have in the least daunted the leaders of the movement. Meetings against tithes have of late called together very large masses of the agricultural population; and though no violent resistance to their collection has yet taken place, as in Ireland, the unpopularity of the impost (if it can be so called) seems to be little less than in that country. The most remarkable symptom, however, of the progress of anti-ecclesiastical feeling, is to be found in the way that church-rates are now treated. The church-rate, it is necessary to explain to the Scottish reader, is an assessment imposed by vestries upon churchmen and dissenters alike, for keeping places of worship in order. The liberal newspapers assure us that it is now found almost impossible any where to procure a vote for this tax, so necessary to the very existence of public worship in the established churches. At one recent vestry meeting, the church was voted a nuisance, and a contractor was advertised for, to remove the old materials! The demand for a rate is every where met by a vote for adjournment; and the general feeling is now so well known, that in many places the churchwardens do not venture to propose a rate at all. Probably a mere desire of saving money animates many of the opponents of church-rates; but a very different sentiment is put forward, as the prevailing one. "I believe, sir," said Mr Pengilly, a dissenting clergyman, at a vestry-meeting in Newcastle last year, "the time has happily arrived when we are prepared to recognise this principle, 'that no one man is amenable to another for his religious views; that God alone is the Being to whom alone every man, and every man alike, is accountable in spiritual things.' If any one in this parish were to attempt to interfere in the rights of conscience, I conceive we all should be ready to address him in the firm, powerful, and beautiful language of the Apostle Paul, 'Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth.' We have on earth one Bible, one revelation of the will of our great Creator and Saviour; and, by the Divine Author of that revelation, we are commanded to search the Scriptures, and are taught that all religious error arises from ignorance or a departure from that only standard of divine truth. Upon this principle, it is, sir, that thousands and tens of thousands of persons in this country have felt it their duty to dissent from the religious establishment; and they do it not from any captious or cavilling disposition; God forbid! but because, if they should continue in union with that establishment, they should do violence to the dictates of their consciences, and be unfaithful to him who hereafter is to sit in judgment upon their conduct. I would inquire, therefore, whether, in a case of this kind, it is right or just, or is it according to the spirit of Christianity, to compel a man, thus conscientiously dissenting, to pay his money to support what he conscientiously disapproves? Upon this point I appeal to the enlightened mind and to the liberal and Christian heart of every man in this meeting. Now, church-cess being imposed for the express purpose of supporting the worship and service of the established church, and demanded and insisted upon from dissenters, is a violation of the principle of religious liberty, and of the dictates of conscience; and if this parish be aware of this circumstance, I do not believe that they would be disposed to enforce the demand."

It may be remarked, that one very striking feature in the agitation is the appearance of so many dissenting clergymen at public meetings and in other conspicuous situations, from which, not long since, they would have shrunk, as not being compatible with the decorum of their professional character. Public feeling in this country points out that clergymen are apt to be most generally estimated, and therefore to accomplish most certainly the ends of their mission, when they reserve themselves from public affairs, and especially from all matters on which a division of opinion may exist among their flocks. So general a departure from this obvious principle would seem to argue that the anti-establishment feeling is universal, at least in those communities with which the clergymen in question are connected, and that the agitation derives respectability in their own eyes, and in those of their flocks, from a conviction of the purity and elevation of its object.

The question now arises—how far or how soon is this movement likely to prevail against the church in either country? Before discussing it, we must acknowledge that, even although impartiality were not required by the character of this paper, we could not consider ourselves sufficiently enlightened on the subject to form a decided opinion on either side. We describe the movement as a piece of current history, and, in our speculations on its probable issue, consider only the power which seems to exist in the respective parties to defend and to assail.

The church of England, consisting of a vast body of highly educated and generally most respectable men—backed by the temporal aristocracy, and supported, as it now appears, by the existing Ministry—must certainly be considered as an institution of great strength. Their wealth and rank, however acquired, give them that kind of dignity which, even in the dissolute senators of the declining empire, awed the Gothic troops who were assailing their capitol. When we consider, moreover, how inextricably connected the clergy are with the gentry and nobility of the country, and what influence they exert, if not through pulpit efficiency, at least through their learning, their position in society, and their magisterial power, it will seem almost vain to suppose that they can ever be shaken from their high place.

Unfortunately, however, this very body of clergy was once overthrown by a movement not greatly different from that which is now threatening it. The Puritans of England and Presbyterians of Scotland, in the early part of the seventeenth century, stood pretty nearly in the same position regarding the Episcopal church, which is now occupied by the dissenters at large. On the one side was wealth, the countenance of government, and perhaps a more efficient ministration of the gospel than what can now be claimed for the established clergy. On the other was religious fervour almost alone;—yet religious fervour in three years laid the church in ruins. The great misfortune of the Episcopal system, as remarked by Mr Laing in his History of Scotland, is its want of enthusiasm for its basis. This is amply possessed by the opposite party, or, if it now exists in a less degree than formerly, it is made up by other favourable circumstances. The established clergy, while they are now as obnoxious from their political character as in the reign of Charles the First, are assailed with infinitely more bitterness on account of the modes by which their benefices are realised. The very wealth, indeed, which in one respect fortifies the church against its assailants, also weakens it. Within the last year, many thousands of persons have been legally prosecuted in England for tithes; in the single county of Lancaster, no fewer than thirteen hundred. The money is no doubt due, and is exigible by law; but is it to be hoped, that, where a clergyman is obliged, even in common justice to himself, to stand in such a relation to his flock, his ministrations can be of any service, or that the church he belongs to can prosper? All this system of prosecution is over and above what rendered the church unpopular in the reign of Charles the First, and it is an addition of the greatest importance. It is a part of the ecclesiastical cause, which, just the more successfully it is defended, must sink the church lower and lower in the estimation of the people.

The inevitable conclusion, then, is, that religious establishments are in real and imminent danger from the spirit which has been raised against them. Many ingenious, and some highly eloquent arguments, have been brought forward in their favour; but it is easy to see that they are not of the kind which avail with the understandings of the many, especially in an age when direct utility is almost the only principle to which any respect is paid, and when the mass of the lower orders have been led to believe that there is nothing which they earnestly will but what they may readily accomplish. It matters little that the Ministry should attempt to shield the church: religious zeal has, before now, whelmed more solid and towering things than a modern British cabinet. On the same calculation of the force of this sentiment, we believe the established church of Scotland, comparatively popular as it is in construction, and modest and efficient in practice, to be in more immediate danger than the church of England. The movement seems to partake far more of the character of a crusade in Scotland than in England. The church is there so slenderly endowed, that the agitators can be suspected of no motive whatever but a devotion to the abstract dogmas, that the state should give no preference to any religious party, and that the support of all alike should be voluntary. The change, moreover, would there be much less than in the sister country, and, accordingly, could be more easily effected.

To those who can abstract themselves so far as to draw philosophy from passing events, there must be something exceedingly interesting in certain circumstances which have been brought about by this attack upon ecclesiastical establishments. The church of Scotland is only an English dissent established by law. It was formerly hostile in the extreme to the prelatic constitution of the church of England, and, if its own chronicles are to be believed, 18,000 of its members suffered death between the years 1662 and 1688, rather than submit to that ecclesiastical form. The common danger, however, which now hangs over their common existence as establishments, has apparently obliterated all religious differences between the two churches. Many circumstances testify this, but none so strongly as a declaration by Dr Chalmers, in a late sermon in London, that the difference between the churches of England and Scotland was “only complexional.” In the opinion of this person, the 18,000 Scottish martyrs of the reigns of the latter Stuarts shed their blood on account of a difference only complexional. On the other hand, the Scottish episcopal clergy, the successors of those who persecuted these very 18,000 men, and who have since been persecuted in turn with only a little less severity, are giving friendly aid to the Scottish established church, held by them to be unapostolical, and heretofore their most bitter enemy and oppressor. Such circumstances display, in a highly striking light, the self-deception which must exist in all excited moods of public feeling. Open the history of the country two centuries back, and you find armies raised and brought into deadly conflict—three ages, indeed, filled with bloodshed—for differences which a succeeding generation pronounces not worthy of a thought. The most ardent patriot, the purest devotee to religious truth, might pause, after such a declaration, before giving himself the least trouble, or encountering the slightest risk, for the sake of his kind. Well may human nature be styled imperfect, when what appears at one time as the most noble and self-renouncing conduct—martyrdom itself—is at another thought to refer to things “only complexional.”

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

THE remonstrances of Commander Llander and others proved effectual, about Jan. 20, in producing a change in the Spanish Ministry. M. Zea Bermudez was superseded by M. Martinez de la Rosa, as Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs; M. Gazeli was appointed Minister of Justice; M. Vasquez Figueroa, Minister of Marine; and M. Arnald, Minister of Finance ad interim; the other members of the late Cabinet remaining as before. The effect of the change is to substitute a Movement system for one of the Juste Milieu; and the new men are said to be as popular as their predecessors were the reverse. M. Martinez distinguished himself as a constitutionalist in 1822, and is a man of high talent.—The immediate assembling of the Cortes has been determined on, to consist of a chamber of peers, 100 in number, and one of commoners, the election of whom will be vested in individuals paying a certain amount of taxes.

The Carlists still remain in some force in the north of Spain, but do not now give much trouble. An attempt is making by diplomacy to get Don Carlos extruded from Portugal.

PORTUGAL.

THE important post of Leiria, containing 1500 men, was taken (Jan. 15) by General Saldanha, who seems to have put all the garrison to the sword except a few. On the 25th, the same commander entered Torres Novas, where he also massacred all he met. These events have given a cheering appearance to the prospects of Don Pedro. Coimbra is expected to fall into his hands immediately, which would open up communications with Oporto. The cholera is ravaging Don Miguel's force at Santarem, and it is not expected that this prince can maintain his cause much longer. He is himself stated to be very ill. Don Pedro is again on good terms with his peers.

WEST INDIES.

THE Legislative Assembly of Jamaica was prorogued on the 18th of December to the 7th January; having, in the course of their ten weeks' sitting, adopted, with some alterations, the bill for negro emancipation. Lord Mulgrave's prorogation-speech proves that the proceedings had been satisfactory. It would appear that the Jamaica slave-owners, following the example of the Antigua planters, have some idea of petitioning the British legislature for leave to dispense with the apprenticeship part of the scheme, and to emancipate their slaves without delay.

FRANCE.

IN the last week of January, Marshal Soult was compelled to give way to a committee of the Chamber of Deputies, and fix the army for the ensuing year at 310,000 men, instead of 370,000, by which a million and a half would be saved.

Jan. 25. In the Chamber of Deputies, M. Dulong, the deputy for Eure, and illegitimate son of M. Dupont l'Eure, taunted General Bugeaud, the member for Perigord, who was commandant of the citadel of Blaye during the incarceration of the Duc de Berri, with the ignominy of having acted as a jailor. The parties afterwards met, and, taking their stations at the distance of forty paces, M. Dulong fired first, according to decision, but missed his adversary. General Bugeaud then fired, and shot Dulong through the head. He died next day. This tragical affair caused a great sensation at Paris, not only on account of the death of a promising and popular young man, but because of some concern the king was alleged to have had in bringing the catastrophe. M. Dulong had written a l'apology which M. Bugeaud had considered story, and the quarrel was believed to have terminated but a paragraph appeared next day in a gavel paper, giving to the act of retraction a co dishonourable to M. Dulong, that he felt obliged to recall it; and when, immediately, the fatal meeting, he demanded back his letter. M. de Rumigny, one of his opponent's second, is aid-de-camp to the king, it was not forthwith. This M. de Rumigny (the same who acted as a police spy in getting up the charge of co against M.M. Cavaignac, Guinand, and others years since) has subsequently admitted that th was at the Tuilleries, and that he destroyed it presence of the king. Louis-Philippe is thus and undeniably implicated in the affair, and seems to doubt that it was he who caused the tion of the offensive newspaper paragraph in o produce a renewal of the quarrel.

no doubt that the whole of them would in a few days be provided for.

The march of intellect has penetrated into Serbia, and a newspaper in the Servian language has been established, devoted to politics and literature. The first number gives an account of the visit of Prince Milosch to Belgrade.

IRELAND.

Monday, January 20, judgment was pronounced on Richard Barrett, Esq., of the Pilot newspaper, for a libel, purporting to be a letter from Daniel O'Connell. The sentence was, that he be imprisoned for six months in the jail of Kilmainham, pay a fine of £100 to the king, and give security to keep the peace for seven years, himself in £500, and two sureties in £250 each. After his committal, Mr Barrett published an article in his paper, explaining why it was judged proper that he, rather than Mr O'Connell, should bear the brunt of the government prosecution. "The question," said he, "really to be decided, is, which would Ireland be served most by, O'Connell standing now in our place, or as he is? If the answer could be, that Ireland would be served by Daniel O'Connell occupying the dungeon we now inhabit, the answer would be, O'Connell, you ought to be there. Nay, he might be here; for at the very outset of the prosecution, the author of the publication, however he be, offered to stand in our place. But as it were O'Connell and he imprisoned) the rights of Irish liberty would be manacled; and as we are equally, nay, more effective here than if our persons were free, the answer of Ireland, the answer of our own conscience, is, Richard Barrett, you should have surrendered Daniel O'Connell."

Mr Steele has withdrawn from Irish politics, in consequence of a quarrel with Mr O'Connell.

PARLIAMENT.

1. THE OPENING—THE KING'S SPEECH.

Tu. Feb. 4. Soon after two o'clock, the King entered the House of Lords, and, the Commons being summoned, as usual, he delivered the following speech:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,
In calling you again together for the discharge of your high duties, I rely with entire confidence on your diligence, on your sincere devotion to the public interest, and on your firmness in supporting on its foundations, and in the just distribution of its powers, the established constitution of the state.
These qualities eminently distinguished your labours during the last session, in which more numerous and more important questions were brought under the consideration of Parliament than during any former period of similar duration.

Of the measures which have in consequence received the sanction of the legislature, one of the most difficult and important was the bill for the abolition of slavery. The manner in which that beneficent measure has been carried throughout the British colonies, and the progress already made in carrying it into execution by the settlement of the island of Jamaica, afford just grounds for anticipating the happiest results.

Many other important subjects will call for your attentive consideration.

The reports which I will order to be laid before you, on the commissions appointed to inquire into the state of the municipal corporations, into the administration and effect of the poor's laws, and into ecclesiastical revenues and patronage in England and Wales, cannot fail to afford you much useful information, by which you will be enabled to judge of the nature and extent of any existing defects and abuses, and in what manner the necessary reforms may, in due season, be safely and beneficially effected.

It has been the constant aim of my policy to secure to my people the uninterrupted enjoyment of the blessings of peace. In this I have been much assisted by the good understanding which has been so happily established between my government and that of France; and assurances which I receive of the friendly disposition of the other powers of the Continent, give me confidence in the continued success of my endeavours.

I have, however, to regret that a final settlement between Holland and Belgium has not yet been effected, and that the civil war in Portugal still continues.

You may be assured that I will be careful and anxious to avail myself of any opportunity which may afford me the means of assisting the establishment of a state of security and peace in countries, the interests of which are intimately connected with those of my dominions.

Upon the death of the late King of Spain, I did not hesitate to recognise the succession of his infant daughter; and I shall watch with the greatest solicitude the progress of events which may affect a government, the peaceful settlement of which is of the first importance to this country, as well as to the general tranquillity of Europe.

The peace of Turkey, since the settlement that was made with Mehemet Ali, has not been interrupted; and I trust, be threatened with any new changes.

It will be my object to prevent any change in the relations of that empire with other powers which might affect its future stability and independence.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,
I have directed the estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you. They have been framed with the view to the strictest economy, and to such reductions as may not be injurious to the public service.

I am confident I may rely on your enlightened patriotism, and on the cheerful acquiescence of my people, in supplying the means which may be required to uphold the honour of my crown and the interest of my dominions.

"The accounts which will be laid before you of the state of the revenue, as compared with the expenditure, will be found most satisfactory.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have to lament the continuance of distress amongst the proprietors and occupiers of land; though, in other respects, the state of the country, both as regards its internal tranquillity and its commerce and manufactures, affords the most encouraging prospects of progressive improvement.

"The acts passed in the last session, for carrying into effect various salutary and remedial measures in Ireland, are now in operation, and farther improvements may be expected to result from the commissions which have been issued for other important objects of inquiry.

"I recommend to you the early consideration of such a final adjustment of the tithes in that part of the United Kingdom, as may extinguish all just causes of complaint, without injury to the rights and property of any class of my subjects, or to any institutions in church or state.

"The public tranquillity has been generally preserved, and the state of all the provinces of Ireland presents, upon the whole, a much more favourable appearance than at any period during the last year.

"But I have seen, with feelings of deep regret and just indignation, the continuance of attempts to excite the people of that country to demand a repeal of the legislative union.

"This bond of our national strength and safety, I have already declared my fixed and unalterable resolution, under the blessing of Divine Providence, to maintain inviolate by all the means in my power.

"In support of this determination, I cannot doubt the zealous and effectual co-operation of my Parliament, and my people.

"To the practices which have been used to produce disaffection to the state, and mutual distrust and animosity between the people of the two countries, is chiefly to be attributed the spirit of insubordination which, though for the present in a great degree controlled by the power of the law, has been but too perceptible in many instances.

"To none more than to the deluded instruments of the agitation, thus perniciously excited, is the continuance of such a spirit productive of the most ruinous consequences; and the united and vigorous exertions of the loyal and well-affected in aid of the government, are imperiously required, to put an end to a system of excitement and violence, which, while it continues, is destructive of the peace of society, and, if successful, must inevitably prove fatal to the power and safety of the United Kingdom."

After the conclusion of the speech, his Majesty retired, and the house adjourned till five o'clock.

2. THE ADDRESS.

Tu. Feb. 4. At the re-assembling of the House of Lords at five o'clock, the Duke of SUTHERLAND moved the address, which was, as usual, an echo of the speech, and was seconded by Lord HOWARD of Effingham.—The Duke of WELLINGTON said he did not intend to oppose the address, though the speech appeared to contain as little as any ever addressed to them from the throne, and it was impossible to infer whether it was the intention of government to bring forward any measure on the topics touched upon. As to the success of the slavery emancipation bill, he thought the boast premature. He adverted to the unsettled disputes between Holland and Belgium, and strongly censured the Ministerial policy with respect to Portugal, contending, that if Don Miguel had been recognised, there would now have been peace both in Spain and Portugal, as we could have influenced him (Miguel) not to succour Don Carlos. He blamed Ministers for not having told Mehemet Ali that he should not carry war into Asia Minor, nor attack the Porte so as to make it necessary for the Emperor of Russia to send a fleet and army to protect it. He reproached the Ministry for not having proposed any measure on the subject of the poor-laws, which had been under consideration for three years. As to the municipal inquiry, he thought the house should pause before they proceeded upon reports, when the legality of the commission which procured them was in doubt. He thought a new municipal constitution could not be based on the £10 franchise. He thought the speeches of some of the Ministers and their friends should not pass unnoticed by the house. He praised the Irish coercion bill, and asked whether it was intended to re-enact it on its expiration at the end of the session. He represented the Irish clergy as starving, and called for succour.—Earl GREY, in reply, said, that, as to the success of the slave emancipation bill, the colonies had received the measure with satisfaction, which was not expected, and its adoption was a subject for congratulation. As for the disputes of Holland and Belgium, the policy of Ministers was in the track of the duke's measures; and how could he then complain? All except the duke must agree that the union of those two nations was impossible. With respect to the affairs of Portugal, the duke, when leaving office, had stipulated that certain things should be done by Don Miguel before he could be acknowledged; and those things never had been done. His reign was marked by every atrocity; neutrality had been observed; both parties had been allowed to take their measures by their own means. The question was one of disputed succession; and were we called upon to acknowledge the usurper? As to the noble duke's remarks respecting the alleged omissions in the Ministerial policy as regards Turkey, did he know, that, in April 1833, a declaration was made by this country, which had as much effect in stopping the march of Ibrahim as the Russian armies and fleets he spoke of? He (Lord Grey) thought it not the policy of a commercial country to make an enemy of Mehemet Ali. The influence of Russia in Turkey was not owing to the present Ministry. They did not sanction the crossing of the Balkan. He could not say that Turkey was independent, but she ought to be preserved in her integrity so long as circumstances would permit. As to the municipal corporations and the poor-laws, they were subjects requiring the most careful examination; but it was not to be supposed that Ministers would not be prepared to indicate their intentions upon these subjects, proceeding upon well-digested information: it was a matter in which they could not proceed too cautiously. He trusted the report would ere long be presented to the house. He declared, that, at the proper time, he should be fully prepared to meet any argument that might be raised on the legality of the powers exercised by the corporation commission. With respect to the situation of the established church, he agreed with the noble duke, that extreme caution was necessary in introducing any measure on the subject. He deprecated any attempt at rash innovation; nor did he wish any thing like a general change in the establishment of the church. Upon these views he had acted. He did not consider himself bound by, or answerable for, any thing said by the friends of the government at public dinners. Perhaps he did not so often look after these speeches as his noble friend did, and therefore he did not clearly know what was alluded to; but his measures would certainly not be influenced by any thing that had fallen or might fall from such speakers. He had no objection, however, to make confession to the noble duke of his own opinions. He was a sincere adherent—a devoted friend to the church of England. He had never lent himself, and never would lend himself, to those theories, under whatever specious name of separating church and state they might be designated, which, wild and extravagant in themselves, could not be otherwise than dangerous in their results. To such schemes he would always offer his most uncompromising opposition. But he thought that, for the sake of the church itself, there were many which might be beneficially altered, in measures truly conservative—not in the abused sense of the word, but conservative of the useful and good. As to the re-enactment of the Irish coercion bill, he thought the question premature: it did not expire before August, and there was time enough to consider it. It would be one of the happiest days of his life when he could announce that the necessity for it had ceased. Ireland, he was happy to say, was in a state of improvement greater than any country in the world; her trade was reviving, her agriculture improving, and she promised to go on rapidly in the course of amelioration, and would, he was satisfied, go on more rapidly still, if undisturbed by the malignant spirit of a man who—no, he was not present, and therefore he would not speak what he felt—but she was emerging from evils greater perhaps than any country had ever been trammelled with.—The address was then carried without opposition.—

Thur. Feb. 6. His Majesty's reply to the address was communicated to the house.

In the House of Commons, same evening (Feb. 4), the address was moved by Mr SHAW LEFEBVRE, who intimated his expectation, that, when the question of church reform came before the house, the abolition of sinecures would take place, and that a reform would speedily be effected in the poor-laws, the burden of which was so materially increased by bad management, as also in the tithe system—by which means the distresses of the agricultural interest, which he described as extreme, might be in some measure relieved. Mr Lefevre said, that the labouring classes in the agricultural districts were in a state of "frightful demoralisation;" that, deprived as they were of education, they lived in total ignorance of their social position, became envious of all around them, and were therefore easily led to the commission of acts of outrage and incendiarism.—Mr MORRISON seconded the address in an able speech, entering into ingenious and elaborate calculations to show the mischievous effects of restrictions on commerce, and the benefits resulting from the application of the principles of free trade; and showed the improvement in the cotton, linen, and iron trades. He showed that the quantity of cotton wool entered for consumption last year (amounting to upwards of 296 millions of pounds) exceeded the quantity in 1825 by 46 per cent.; and that it was more than double the average yearly amount in the years from 1813 to 1824. The wool entered for home consumption advanced more than 42 per cent. in quantity on the preceding year; the exports of woollens increased 18½ per cent., estimated by the actual or declared (not the official) value. The raw silk entered for consumption increased upwards of 8 per cent., the declared value of the exports of silk manufactures, 40 per cent.; the imports of flax increased 13½ per cent.; the declared value of exports of linens, 23½ per cent.; the exports of iron increased nearly 20 per cent. He could not hope to see the welfare of agriculture permanently secured until the question of corn-laws as well as poor-laws had been finally settled.—Colonel EVANS complained of the indistinctness of the speech on several points.—Mr HUME complained that the subjects of national education and reduction of taxes were not alluded to, and, after censuring several points contained in it, moved an amendment—"That the house would take into its immediate and serious consideration the state of the established church, as regarded its temporalities and the maintenance of the clergy; and also with a view to the removal of those complaints which arose out of the mode in which tithes and church rates were levied, in order to accomplishing such changes in them as might give effectual relief, not only to the members of the established church themselves, but to those conscientious dissenters who suffered under the present state of the law, thus carrying into effect the recommendations which proceeded from the throne at the commencement of the last session."

Lord ALTHORP explained, that the government had thought it best to say little as to what they meant to do, because in the last session some inconvenience had been experienced from their saying too much. He had a measure to introduce for the redemption of tithes, which he thought would be satisfactory. Lord John Russell also would introduce a bill for regulating dissenters' marriages; and the other demands of this class of religious professors were receiving the best attention of government.—Mr Hume's amendment was lost by 191 to 39; and another amendment by the same gentleman, pledging the house to economy, was negatived without a division.—The passages in the speech relating to Ireland were animadverted upon, in a very vehement manner, by Mr H. GRATTAN and Mr O'CONNELL. The former dwelt upon the misery of the people, the beggary of the gentry, and the absenteeism of the great landed proprietors; and asked if it was decent, or politic, or humane, to talk of visiting any body of his Majesty's subjects with the "just indignation" of the king. Mr Grattan rung the changes upon this phrase with great perseverance. With equal ardour he denounced the passage which stated the King's "unalterable determination" to resist the repeal of the Union.—Mr O'CONNELL moved to expunge the three last clauses in the address, which echoed the sentiments in the speech; and which Mr Grattan, Mr Hume, and Colonel Evans, all joined with him in thinking impolitic, uncalled for, and pitiful in the extreme. Mr O'Connell commenced his oration with some bitter sarcasms on the "no meaning" of the speech, and the failure of the government measures for the commutation of tithes, delivered with great force and effect. As he proceeded, he fell off; especially towards the conclusion, which referred to the evils that free trade and the Union had inflicted upon the commerce of Ireland. Mr O'Connell's tone was full of defiance, and his was the only bitter attack made upon Ministers during the night.—Mr LITTLETON replied to Mr O'Connell, with perfect self-possession and good-humour: his manner was firm, but conciliatory and dignified. He admitted that the repeal question had been making progress in Ireland, and agreed with Mr O'Connell that it was a fair subject for debate in the House of Commons. He exposed some of Mr O'Connell's inaccuracies relative to the tithe question. He said that he had given notice of a motion for bringing forward a measure for the final adjustment of tithes, on the 20th instant; and expressed his conviction, that unless this matter was satisfactorily and finally arranged, the state of Ireland next winter "would be desperate indeed."—Mr CORBETT delivered a speech of encouragement to Mr O'Connell to proceed in his repeal project.—Sir ROBERT PEEL described it as being got up on the old Tory plan, and therefore he could not but approve of it in general. He condemned the foreign policy of Ministers, and particularly disapproved of their refusal to recognise Don Miguel. In the East, and in Belgium also, he thought that Ministers had mismanaged matters; he ridiculed the idea of preserving the "integrity of Turkey."—Lord PALMERSTON defended Ministers from this attack, which had been so frequently made almost in the same words.—The house then divided on Mr O'Connell's amendment, which was rejected by 189 to 23.—The motion for the address was agreed to, and the house adjourned.

3. FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

Fri. Feb. 14. Lord ALTHORP, having moved that the house resolve itself into a committee of ways and means, gave a view of his financial plans for the ensuing year. Reviewing the financial operations since 1830, his lordship reminded the house that a considerable deficiency was produced in 1831 and 1832, by large reductions of taxes; but that Ministers, not being alarmed by that temporary effect, relied on the relief afforded to the country for an increase of revenue. And they were not deceived in that reliance. The revenue rapidly recovered; and although a further relief of taxes took place in 1833, to the amount of £1,500,000 (making £3,335,000 repealed in three years), yet, instead of a deficiency, there was, on the 5th Jan. 1834, a surplus of revenue over expenditure of £1,513,000. Ministers had effected reductions in the present year's estimates, as compared with the last, to the extent of about half a million. This would raise the surplus to two millions. The alteration in the tea duty, and the opening of the China trade, would give probably a further sum of £600,000. The East India Company had limited their quarterly sales of tea to 8,000,000 lbs., or 32,000,000 lbs. a-year; the ad valorem duty upon which yielded to the revenue £3,300,000 sterling. Now, the Board of Control intended to increase the sales of tea to 9,000,000 lbs. a quarter, or 36,000,000 lbs. a-year; and a fixed rate of duty on each kind of tea being adopted (regulated by an average which would not increase the burden on the consumer), the produce to the revenue might be estimated at £3,900,000 sterling. In the spring of 1835, the private trades would come into the market, and doubtless would at least maintain the increased supply of the present year. Taking them at £2,600,000, the total surplus of revenue, there must be deducted £1,800,000 for interest of the twenty millions to be raised to pay the compensation voted to the West India proprietors. This would leave a clear sum of £1,800,000 at the disposal of Parliament. He hoped the house would not, by making too large a reduction in one year, reproduce a deficiency of revenue. By proceeding more cautiously, with an increasing revenue, they might afford important relief to the people year after year, without affecting the public credit. He proposed therefore to repeal entirely the house tax, which now yielded about £1,200,000; but he did not advise any further reduction at present. He would confess that in his own opinion there were other taxes the repeal of which was more desirable. (Cheers.) But he felt very strongly, that the excessive unpopularity of a tax was in itself a powerful reason for its abolition. (Cheers.) He could not, however, introduce immediately a bill to repeal the house tax; he must wait until he saw how certain motions regarding other taxes were disposed of. (Laughter.) The house and window taxes had been very much coupled together; but the same objects did not apply to both. The window tax had been reduced since 1822 to the extent of £1,466,000, and the lower classes were generally exempt from its operation. In comparing the present time with the golden era of economical reformers, 1792, he might remark that the taxes on houses and windows in that year yielded £1,129,000; this year they would amount to only £2,000,000. It might be objected that Ministers, after admitting the serious distress of the landed interest, afforded that interest no relief by the proposed reduction of taxes. He would say, however, that the pressure on the landed interest arose less from public taxation than from local burdens. (Cheers.) With reference to such, Ministers did not neglect the landed interest: they were about to introduce a measure to relieve it from tithes. (Loud cheers.) It is not my intention to abolish tithes, to get rid of the clergy altogether: but what I meant was this, that we propose to relieve the occupiers of the soil, by the commutation of tithes. Ministers also intend to propose measures with regard to the poor rates. They had, too, a plan for giving relief to Ireland without loss to the revenue. Lord Althorp concluded by moving that the sum of £14,000,000 be raised by exchequer bills for the year 1834.—After some remarks from Mr Cobbett, Sir Robert Peel, Mr O'Connell (who complained that nothing was done for Ireland), and others, the motion was agreed to.

4. CHARGES AGAINST THE IRISH MEMBERS.

Wed. Feb. 5. Mr Hill's statement to his constituents at Hull, in October last, to the effect that an Irish member who spoke and voted against the coercion bill, had in secret entreated Ministers to pass it, as necessary for the peace of Ireland, was brought before the house by Mr O'CONNELL, who called upon Lord Althorp to state distinctly, first, whether he or any other member of the cabinet had ever stated that an Irish member had acted in the manner described? and, secondly, whether any Irish member ever went to him, or any other Minister, and made the statement which had been imputed to him?—In reply to the first question, Lord ALTHORP for himself positively, and to the best of his belief for his colleagues, denied that any such statement had been made. With regard to the second question, he was not aware that any Irish member had ever made such a statement to a Cabinet Minister; but he added, that he had good reason to believe that some Irish members (certainly more than one), who voted and spoke against the bill, did in private conversation use very different language.—Great excitement was caused among the Irish members by this declaration, and Mr O'CONNELL started up and said, "The noble lord is shrinking! State the names of those members."—Lord ALTHORP said, "Does the hon. member accuse me of shrinking?"—Mr O'CONNELL retracted that expression.—Lord ALTHORP then said, that he was answerable for what he had uttered: that he would not shift that responsibility upon others; and that, if called upon, he would name the Irish members alluded to.—Mr O'CONNELL and Mr FINN asked if they were among the number, and both received an answer in the negative. Several other members were rising; when the SPEAKER interfered, and stated, that an expression used out of the house, or in private, ought not to be made the subject of discussion in the house.—Mr SHEIL argued, from the expressions made use of by Lord Althorp, that the story itself was a fabrication, as it appeared that no communication in favour of the coercion bill had been sent to a Cabinet Minister by any Irish member who had voted against it. The charge was distinctly negatived by the noble lord. (A member on the Ministerial benches expressed his dissent.) Mr Sheil then said, that as Lord Althorp had expressed his belief that some Irish members had used different language out of doors in regard to the coercion bill from what they had used in that house, he would ask him whether he was one of the members alluded to?—Lord ALTHORP replied, "Yes, the hon. and learned gentleman of them."—The house was hushed in profound silence. Mr SHEIL kept his seat for some moments; length he rose and said, "Having heard the statement which the noble lord has just made to the house, beg, on the other hand, to declare, in the face of my country, and, if I may do so without profanity, in the presence of my God, that if any individual has addressed the noble lord, or to others, that I gave any application of the coercion bill in private, he has believed by a gross and scandalous calumny. As the noble lord has put the statement on his own responsibility, I shall say no more."—Mr O'CONNELL apologized to Mr Hill for the language he had used respecting him. He now considered him as "perfectly satisfied."—The latter gentleman gave an explanation of his conduct, ascribing it to inadvertency, but stating that, if a committee of inquiry were moved to, he was ready to prove every word he had said.—Discussion took place with regard to Lord Althorp's responsibility for the charge against Mr Sheil, which ended by his lordship explicitly declaring that he did not vouch for the truth of the statement, but considered himself responsible for the fact that such a statement had been made.—As it was now evident that a personal meeting between Lord Althorp and Mr Sheil was inevitable, and as the former would not pledge himself "not to respond to a call" from the latter gentleman, both were put into the custody of the sergeant-at-arms. Soon after their committal, the required promises were given by the two gentlemen, and they were immediately liberated.

A conversation took place next evening (Thursday) between Mr O'Connell and Mr Stanley, regarding the most advisable method of instituting an inquiry into this affair; and on Monday (Feb. 10), Mr O'Connell moved for a committee of privileges for that purpose, which was carried against an amendment of Sir F. Burdett for the previous question, by 192 to 54. The report of the committee being brought up on Friday (Feb. 14), stated, that, having proceeded to inquire into the substance of Mr Hill's allegation, as reported by the Examiner newspaper, and slightly corroborated by himself—

"Two witnesses were called before them at the suggestion of Mr Hill, and others were about to be examined, when Mr Hill himself, finding the testimony already heard very different from what he had expected, freely and spontaneously made the following communication to the committee:—

"That he had come to the conviction that his charge against Mr Sheil, of having directly or indirectly communicated, or intended to communicate to the government, any private opinions in opposition to those which he expressed in the House of Commons, had no foundation in fact; that such charge was not merely incapable of formal proof, but was, in his present sincere belief, totally and absolutely unfounded; that he had originally been induced to make mention of it in a hasty unpremeditated speech, under a firm persuasion that he had received it on undeniable evidence; but that, being unsatisfied of the mistake into which he had fallen, and convinced that the charge was wholly untrue, he came forward to express his deep and unfeigned sorrow for having ever contributed to give it circulation." Mr Hill added, "that, if there were any way consistent with honour by which he could make reparation to Mr Sheil, he should deem no sacrifice too great to heal the wound which his erroneous statement had inflicted."

The committee continued—"It is with the highest gratification that the committee found themselves enabled thus to exonerate an accused member of Parliament from imputations alike painful and undeserved. The voluntary avowal of an erroneous statement on the part of Mr Hill, puts it now in their power to pronounce a decided opinion, and to close the present inquiry. Neither of the witnesses who appeared before the committee deposed to any facts calculated to bear out the allegation against Mr Sheil, nor did their testimony go to impeach his character and honour in any way, or as to any matter whatever. The committee had no hesitation in declaring their deliberate conviction, that the innocence of Mr Sheil, in respect to the whole matter of complaint referred to in their investigation, was entire and unquestionable.

"The committee felt bound, at the same time, to express their full confidence in Mr Hill's declaration, and the statement impeaching Mr Sheil's character was rejected by him at Hull, under a sincere, though mistaken, impression of its accuracy. They derived this confidence as well from the tone of generous regret which characterized his communication at the close of their proceeding, as from the candid admissions and the evident anxiety to avoid all exaggeration and misstatements which they observed throughout his testimony as delivered in their presence."

After the report had been read, Lord ALTHORP admitted, that, after having conversed with his informant on the subject, he found, that, although the words of that gentleman were literally true, the impression produced on his (Lord A.'s) mind, and which he conveyed to the house, was not borne out.—Mr SHEIL, who described himself as snatched from the verge of a precipice, admitted he had said that measures must be adopted to repress the excesses in the south of Ireland; but that was not giving approbation to the coercion bill.—It turned out that Mr John Wood had been Lord Althorp's informant, though not the only one, and that this gentleman had excused Mr Sheil in the most frank and generous manner, stating that he had heard Mr Sheil speak against the coercion bill. Thus terminated a matter which produced more interest.

nt, perhaps, than what has attended many of the most important public transactions.

5. CHURCH PATRONAGE IN SCOTLAND.

Wed. Feb. 5.—Mr R. WALLACE, member for Greenock, brought this subject under the notice of the house, presenting at the same time a petition from 35 persons in Greenock, for the abolition of patronage. Mr Wallace expressed his disappointment that the King's speech did not contain a syllable in reference to this subject, which the Scotch people considered as one of such high importance. He referred to a statement which he made last session respecting the abuse of patronage, in which a member of the house was implicated. His account of the affair was flatly denied; but upon inquiry it turned out to be correct. It appeared that the patronage of the church [the hon. member, we believe, alluded to Hobbes in Roxburghshire] had been made use of as a means of returning a member to Parliament—had been perverted to purposes of political corruption.
A member for Caithness had been induced to postpone a motion on the subject of the abuses of the church of Scotland, by an assurance from the Lord Advocate that measures were in contemplation for remedying those abuses. But the session passed away, and nothing was done. Since then, another case had occurred, in the parish of Muiravons-ie, in the county of Stirling. A fortnight after the incumbent died, the living was in the possession of another gentleman, whom the parishioners had never seen—a Whig from Edinburgh, appointed by government on the old Tory principle of paying reward to political connexions, not to the fitness of the person so appointed. And this was done after the Lord Advocate's declaration that in future the wishes of the parishioners should be consulted. Mr Wallace concluded by declaring, that if the government proceeded as they had begun in the dispensation of church patronage in Scotland, a general alienation of the affections of that country would take place; and no other confidence would be placed in them by a people from whom they had so often and so grossly disappointed.
—Col. LEITH HAY thought Mr Wallace's remarks imature. He trusted that Mr Sinclair would renew the motion of last session in the present. The result of inquiry into the subject would be very beneficial.
He should deem it a dereliction of his duty if he did not stand up and say, that the government patronage of the church of Scotland was honestly and fairly discounted, without reference to political or private feelings. —Mr SINCLAIR differed with those who wished for a separation of church and state. Their union was absolutely necessary to the welfare of each. He thought, however, that abuses should be corrected as speedily as possible. He should again bring forward the motion, which he had relinquished last session for motives that had never yet been made public.
He trusted, that, in the present session, discussion would be provoked, attention directed to abuses, and remedies suggested for their removal. —Here
the conversation was discontinued. —On Thursday, the subject was resumed by Mr A. JOHNSTONE, who presented a petition from St Andrews, for the remedy of abuses in the Scottish church. The petitioners asked for a restoration of the integrity of the church, as before 1711.—Captain ELLIOTT complained of the attack made upon him in his absence, without notice, the day before, by Mr Wallace. He would not enter upon the merits of that question, but thought that the rules of courtesy demanded that notice should have been given him of Mr Wallace's intention. He had duties to perform out of doors, but would have attended if he had received an intimation of what was expected to take place. The person who had been appointed to the living, which it was said had been given him for political purposes, was proved to have been duly qualified; and he gave no credit to the assertion that the church courts in Scotland were engaged in inquiring whether the circumstances attending his induction amounted to a charge of simony.
—Mr WALLACE said, that all the newspapers in Scotland had stated the fact last alluded to by Captain Elliott, without receiving contradiction. He re-asserted what he had stated respecting the other case.
As to bringing forward the subject in Captain Elliott's absence, it would be hard if members were to be muzzled, and not allowed to speak their sentiments in the house, because it was inconvenient for some members of the government to attend in their places.

6. CONDUCT OF BARON SMITH.

Thurs. Feb. 13. Mr O'CONNELL moved for a committee of inquiry into the conduct of Baron Sir William Smith, one of the Irish judges.—First, on the plea of irregularity in his habits of attendance in courts, but chiefly on account of his taking occasion, when addressing the special commission which sat in Dublin last year, to utter a violent political harangue, referring to speeches in this house, and calculated to incite the Catholic population with resentment.
After a very long debate, in which several Conservative members endeavoured to palliate the judge's conduct, and the Ministers took different sides, the motion for a committee was carried, against an amendment of the previous question, by 167 to 74.

7. KING LEOPOLD'S PENSION.

Fri. Feb. 11. A discussion of some interest arose in the House of Commons on the subject of the annuity paid to the King of Belgium. It was urged first by Mr ROBINSON, and subsequently by other members, that some inquiry ought to be made into the mode in which the money was expended. Ministers were reminded that King Leopold received great credit for giving up all that portion of his annuity that was not necessary to keep up Claremont, to pay his debts, and provide for his old servants. Yet it appeared that he had drawn the whole L.50,000 per annum up to the present time. Was part of this money spent in Belgium? It was a matter of doubt whether the pension voted to Prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg, then a British subject, was legally payable to an independent foreign sovereign. For these reasons, Mr Robinson moved for an account of the money, if any, which had been paid into the Exchequer by King Leopold out of his annuity.—Lord ALTHORP and Lord JOHN RUSSELL defended the conduct of King Leopold.

Lord Althorp read two letters from the Baron de Stockmar, his agent in England, from which it appeared that Leopold's debts, when he left this country, amounted to L.83,000; and that the whole of the sums received on account of the annuity had been applied to the liquidation of these debts, and to the keeping up of Claremont and Marlborough House;
the latter of which was held by an unexpired lease.
On the 5th of April next, however, all the incumbrances will be discharged, and the first payment will be made into the Exchequer. The current expenses of Claremont, Marlborough House, &c. amount to about L.20,000 yearly, leaving L.30,000 to be repaid.
—Some severe remarks were made upon the large amount of debts contracted by a personage who was supposed to have lived rather parsimoniously than otherwise when in this country. Several members objected to taxing the people of England for keeping up useless palaces, and thought that King Leopold might have taken his servants away with him. As to taking away the pension, however, Lord Althorp said that the house would scout such a proposition.—
Mr Robinson's motion was finally acceded to.

Feb. 10. A petition from ninety congregations of dissenters (Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists) within twelve miles of London, praying for the abolition of the connection between church and state, was presented in the House of Commons by Lord Morpeth.—11. On the motion of Mr Ward, a committee was appointed to inquire into the best mode of obtaining correct and authentic lists of the divisions.
—On the motion of Mr Warburton, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the laws and regulations regarding the education and practice of various branches of the medical profession in the United Kingdom.—Lord Althorp stated that a bill for the establishment of local courts would be introduced during the present session into the House of Commons.

COURT-MARTIAL.

At a general court-martial, held at Cork on the 23d day of December 1833, and continued, by adjournments, to the 16th of January 1834, Captain Augustus Wathen, of the 15th, or King's Hussars, was arraigned on six charges, brought against him by Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Brudenell—first, for stating in an invidious manner to Major-General Sir F. Arbuthnot, at the half-yearly inspection of the regiment, that an unusual supply of new stable jackets had been issued to the men of his troop, without his knowledge, thereby imputing improper conduct to his commanding officer: second, that the serjeants of his troop had informed him "that the men were discontented at having the jackets delivered to them," which was not true: third, "that he had said he had reported this discontent to Lord Brudenell," which was also not true: fourth, for not having conveyed to his troop the approbation of the major-general of their appearance, as he was directed to do by Lord Brudenell: fifth, for,
on the following day, in conveying that approbation, remarking, that, if they had gone on service, "they would have done their duty, notwithstanding any unpleasant circumstances had occurred in the troop," thereby throwing an imputation on Lord Brudenell:
sixth, for refusing to repeal the words he had addressed to his troop—"such conduct being insubordinate, unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, and in breach of the articles of war."

Upon which charges the court came to the following decisions:—

"The court having taken into its serious consideration the evidence produced in support of the charges against the prisoner, Captain Augustus Wathen, of the 15th, or King's Hussars, his defence, and the evidence he has adduced, is of opinion that he is not guilty of any of the charges preferred against him. The court, therefore, honourably acquits him of each and of all the charges."

"Bearing in mind the whole process and tendency of this trial, the court cannot refrain from animadverting on the peculiar and extraordinary measures which have been resorted to by the prosecutor."

"Whatever may have been his motives for instituting charges of so serious a nature against Captain Wathen (and they cannot ascribe them solely to a wish to uphold the honour and interests of the army), his conduct has been reprehensible in advancing such various and weighty assertions to be submitted before a public tribunal, without some sure grounds of establishing the facts."

"It appears in the recorded minutes of these proceedings, that a junior officer was listened to, and non-commissioned officers and soldiers examined, with the view of finding out from them how, in particular instances, the officers had executed their respective duties—a practice in every respect most dangerous to the discipline and the subordination of the corps, and highly detrimental to that harmony and good feeling which ought to exist between officers."

"Another practice has been introduced into the 15th Hussars, which calls imperatively for the notice and ani-madversion of the court—the system of having the conversation of officers taken down in the orderly-room without their knowledge, a practice which cannot be considered otherwise than revolting to every proper and honourable feeling of a gentleman, and as being certain to create disunion, and to be most injurious to his Majesty's service."

His Majesty has been pleased to approve and confirm the finding of the court.

Although it would appear, upon an attentive perusal of the whole of the proceedings, that some parts of the evidence might reasonably bear a construction less unfavourable to the prosecutor than that which the court have thought it their duty to place upon them, yet, upon a full consideration of all the circumstances of the case, his Majesty has been pleased to order that Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Brudenell shall be removed from the command of the 15th Hussars.

(Signed) JOHN MACDONALD, Adjutant-General.

"Lord Brudenell," says the Courier, "is an officer of no experience, who has obtained his present high rank by dint of purchasing his commissions.
His lordship, we have heard, gave as much as twenty thousand pounds for his different commissions; and now that he will be obliged to retire, he will not obtain above four thousand pounds: so that the decision which compels him to retire from the service will in fact impose a pecuniary mulct upon him to the extent of sixteen thousand pounds, which may serve as a warning to those young men who are ambitious of purchasing a post they cannot adequately fill. The whole army will be pleased with the decision, and will do justice to the court-martial and the high authority which has sanctioned its views."

ENGLAND.

Jan. 16. A meeting of the gentry and yeomanry of the eastern division of Cornwall took place, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament to pass a measure for the commutation of tithes. The petition at first proposed, simply prayed, that, whereas the agricultural interest is arrived at an alarming condition, partly on account of the severe and unequal exaction of tithes, it would please the house to impose a fair commutation in money, to be redeemable at the option of the payer. An amended petition, praying the legislature to fix the rate of commutation at one-tenth of the rent [that is, about a thirtieth of the produce], was carried by a majority of twenty. A letter from Mr Charles Buller, M. P. was afterwards read, in which, after asserting that tithes is national property, he recommended that the agriculturists should compound for their entire abolition, by agreeing to give up the restrictions on corn.

19. James Davies, assistant-gamekeeper to E. B. Clive, Esq. M. P. near Hereford, was murdered by poachers.

23. At a special meeting of the Masters of the Bench, to take into consideration the renewed application of Daniel Whittle Harvey, Esq., to be called to the bar, accompanied by a copy of his petition to the judges, it was unanimously resolved, "That the bench do not see any sufficient reason to alter the resolution of the bench communicated to Mr Harvey by the treasurer of the society, on the 13th of November 1821, against his application to be called to the bar."—A smart shock of an earthquake was felt at Chichester, by which chimney-pots were overthrown and bells set a-ringing.

29. At a meeting of Convocation, held at Oxford, and very numerously attended, the Duke of Wellington was unanimously elected Chancellor of the University, in the room of Lord Grenville. The installation of his Grace took place at Apsley House, Feb. 14, with all due ceremony.

30. A meeting was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, attended by Colonel Stanhope, Sir J. S. Lillie, Messrs Crawford and Detrois, and Dr Wade; Colonel Thompson in the chair. After speeches by Mr Crawford and the chairman, a petition to Parliament was agreed to, in which it is observed, "That if the owners of land bear any undue proportion of the burthens of the country, your petitioners would be among the first to pray that,
after equitable retribution to the people for past sufferings, the taxes that press on the owners of land should be reduced; but that to attempt to compensate them by a tax which amounts to the prohibition of industry and commerce by act of Parliament, your petitioners practically feel to be an impolicy to which no parallel can be found in the history of barbarous nations." It concluded with a prayer, "that a law may be passed, directing the total removal of the existing duties on foreign corn, by such assigned gradations as to the wisdom of the legislature shall seem meet."—Baron Bayley took his leave of the bar, finding it necessary to abandon his duties on account of his health.

Feb. 6. John Ager, Patrick Grant, and John Bell, of the True Sun newspaper, were, in the Court of King's Bench, found guilty of publishing in that paper in May last, two seditious libels, tending to excite the people to resist payment of the assessed taxes. The prosecution was at the instance of the government.—The first gentleman, as printer, has recently been sentenced to one month, and the two latter, as registered proprietors, to six months' imprisonment, for a libel on Alderman Winchester.

7. An individual named Penny had a verdict against him in the Court of Exchequer, for penalties amounting to L.120, for selling an unstamped newspaper, called The People's Police Gazette.

13. An address, signed by 6530 clergymen of the church of England, was presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury at the Palace, Lambeth. The Archdeacon of Canterbury, Dr Croft, read the address to the archbishop. It expressed the devoted adherence of the clergy to the doctrines and discipline of the establishment, and their willingness to co-operate in carrying into effect any measures which their spiritual rulers may deem necessary for preserving its purity, and augmenting its usefulness.

Meetings to express attachment to the established church have lately been held in various parts of England. Jan. 21, a numerous meeting took place at the National Schoolroom in Cheltenham, where resolutions expressive of cordial approbation of the doctrines of the church of England, of indignation at the attempts of dissenters and schismatics to overthrow the establishment, and of determination to resist them by the formation of associations and other means, were passed with much cheering. A numerous meeting was held, Jan. 28, at Bristol, and another, Jan. 30, at Liverpool, for the same purpose. A lay declaration of adherence to the established religion is also sent about, inclosed in a circular, of which the following is a copy:—"Sir, have the goodness to send the inclosed declaration round your parish, that it may receive the signatures of all male adults who are so disposed, not confining the application to householders. Those who are absent or are unable to write may authorise others to sign for them. When completed, I have to request you will return it under cover to the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, (signed) JOHN OKES.—Cambridge, Feb. 7, 1834."

The Earl of Durham has abandoned his prosecution of the Durham Advertiser for originating, and of the John Bull and Standard for copying, the paragraph in which he was truly represented as ordering a village to be removed, and by which his lordship had conceived that he was placed in an odious light before the eyes of his tenantry and workmen.—Jan. 30, his prosecution of the Newcastle Journal for another paragraph, in which he was represented as flying the tri-color flag above that of Great Britain on his yacht in the Tyne, was stopped in the Court of King's Bench, by the discharge of the rule previously obtained against the proprietor of that paper. The case for a criminal information was not made out.

Literary and scientific institutions, for the cultivation of the mental faculties, are every where advancing—even in London, where the extreme application of the industrious classes appears least favourable for the purpose. One for the city of London has been flourishing for a considerable time, and now includes a great number of the young shopmen of that part of the metropolis. Its funds are in so prosperous a state, that it has been able to erect a theatre for scientific lectures, and to engage men of considerable eminence as lecturers. The members publish a little monthly miscellany, which shows some literary talent. Another called the Marylebone Literary and Scientific Institution, though of more recent formation, is also going on well. Classes for natural philosophy, languages, and music, have already been formed; and a theatre, with library, laboratory, and museum, is fitting up. The mechanics of this great district have also an institute, under the name of the Marylebone Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. The drapers of the city have still more recently (Jan. 23) formed an association called the Drapers' Institution, to provide, by voluntary contributions from the drapers themselves and the public, reading-rooms, scientific lectures, libraries, and temporary assistance to such of the members as may, by unavoidable circumstances, be brought into a state of distress. In all these societies, one grand saving principle is observed—the exclusion of all political and theological controversy.

The London and Westminster Bank is to commence business during the present month.

The establishment of the South Sea House is to be broken up, by which a considerable saving will be effected.

Dispatches have been received from the African expedition under Mr Lander, announcing his having arrived at Fernando Po on the 2d of November, in the iron steam-boat Alburkah. Lieutenant Allan accompanied him, and it is understood that they have penetrated a considerable way into the interior.

Certain eminent manufacturers of figures in St Paul's Churchyard lately shipped off for India and the Ganges no less than £00 newly-manufactured idols (false gods) for sale. The profits expected from this pious fraud are supposed to be sufficient to make the Christian merchants happy for the remainder of their days. Two missionaries go out in the ship which is to convey the idols to the place of destination. Thus the miserable natives of India will receive their "bane and antidote."

The whole of the 10,000 shares of the Bristol railway have now been bought, and it is designed to make immediate application to Parliament.

The Leeds election terminated, Feb. 15, in favour of Mr Baines, the Whig candidate, who had 1951 votes, while Sir John Beckett, the Tory candidate, had 1911.

It appears that flour is 72 s-5ths per cent. dearer in London than at Paris; and that with the sum of £2, 10s. a man may buy 483lb. of fine flour at Paris, whereas with the same sum he can only buy 280lb. in London. The price of wheaten bread of the first quality at Paris is 11 sous per 4lb. French weight; which is less than 4½d. for the loaf of 4lb. English weight. The price of bread of the second quality is 8 sous per 4lb. English weight; which is less than 3½d. the loaf of 4lb. English weight. The flour at Paris is greatly superior in quality to the London flour; and, indeed, there is not a capital city in Europe in which both flour and bread are of so indifferent a quality as in London.—Times.

The ancient mode of tracing criminals by blood-hounds has lately been revived with striking success in Oxfordshire. The Duke of Marlborough has, in addition to the famous Blenheim spaniel, retained unimpaired the breed of the old English blood-hound. The duke's steward, who has the care of these noble animals, had recourse to this plan at the fire of Mr Raingley's, of Woodstock, one of the duke's tenants. The steward was one of the first on the spot, and observed some fresh footsteps; he therefore marked their direction, and summoned his conductor. The hound was no sooner put on the footsteps than he opened his deep-toned note, and traced, with wonderful exactness, every winding attempt to delude his eager pursuit, until he reached a previously notorious cottage. The door was opened, but no man was found; however, the insatiable pursuer was not to be thus deluded, for, rushing out in the direction of the fire, he became more anxious at every step, until he seized one of a group going to assist (and, as afterwards proved, the one most lavish in abuse of the incendiary), to his small astonishment. The man was thunderstruck at his discovery, and soon confessed that he was the perpetrator of the diabolical act.

The new trustees to Lady Hewley's charity are already appointed; they are all Independents, with the exception of one Baptist.—No fewer than six thousand persons have been put on board transports, as convicts to Botany Bay, during last year. A vast number who have been sentenced are still in prison or the hulks.—Incendiary conflagrations continue in several districts of England.—The political unions, which not long since exercised so much influence, are generally described as in a declining state.

The article wool has now attained an extravagant price, and is little short of what it was at the highest period of the war. Coarse moor wool, such as is generally produced in the higher districts of this county, and in Galway, especially in the Glenkens, and in the parish of Minnigaff, is now selling in the Liverpool market at 16s. to 17s. per stone of 24 lbs., which, three years ago, would have scarcely brought 5s.; while the finer qualities of Scotch and English wools are equally high in proportion. White Cheviot is now worth 40s. to 42s., which, at the same period, could have been bought for 14s. to 15s. A rise so great, and in some degree unexpected, will have the effect of checking the manufacture of woollen goods, as the manufacturers will not work on speculation in times so critical, but merely endeavour to keep pace with the present demand.—Dumfries Courier.

SCOTLAND.

Jan. 20. A complaint was made by the Dean of Guild of Aberdeen, in the Town Council of that burgh, respecting the freedom with which a remark of his, lately made in that place, had been treated by the editor of the Aberdeen Herald. It seemed to be the general feeling of the council that the editor had abused the liberty granted to the press of having reporters present in the Council; but it did not seem to be thought necessary that any measure should be taken for abridging that liberty. The editor subsequently expressed his resolution to continue making what remarks he pleased upon the conduct of the council, and the sentiments there expressed by its members.

—21. Mr Wallace, M.P. for Greenock, received a public dinner from his constituents.

—23. At a meeting of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, answers were determined on to ten queries which had been given in to the reverend court, respecting the churches of the city. The queries and answers may be summed as follows:—Query 1. Are the clergy willing to renounce all right to the annuity and merk per ton, and accept in lieu of them a fixed stipend to be paid out of the town's revenue? Answer, No.—2. Would the clergy accept a fixed stipend of £550 during the life of the present incumbents? Answer, They would accept £600.—3. Would they agree to their successors being paid £500? No; nothing less than £600.—4. Would they agree to make the Old Greyfriars a single charge, on the death of Dr Anderson, and to the appointment of a clergyman there on that footing? No.—5. Would they agree to a new division of parishes, to lessen the inequality of the clergymen's duties? Yes.—6. Would they agree to uncollegiate the city churches on the death of the present incumbents? No.—7. Would they agree to uncollegiate all or any of the churches, on these conditions, 1. Either that a new church should be built, and a parish formed for the clergyman set free, or, 2. That the stipend of a certain number of the uncollegiate clergy should be reserved as a fund for erecting the additional churches required? They agree to uncollegiate churches on the first condition, but not on the second.—8. Would they agree to erect an additional parish in the New Town, and suppress one in the old? They agree to the erection, but not to the suppression.

—9. If the city should be unable to build five new churches for the uncollegiate ministers, besides the two they are already under obligation to build, would the clergy agree to allot parishes of double population to the collegiate charges? No.—10. Would they agree that future appointments should be made to collegiate charges on condition that the incumbent shall do the whole duty, or accept a single charge if new arrangements require it? Yes.—Dr Chalmers occupied four hours in reading and commenting on the queries and answers, and was so much exhausted by the exertion, as to be taken dangerously ill on his way home. The learned professor has since recovered.

—24. A numerous and most respectable meeting of Roxburghshire proprietors was held at Kelso, to form an association for the protection of agriculture.—The Duke of Buccleuch in the chair. The resolutions were in substance as follow:—That the extent of the power and prosperity of every country in a great measure depends upon the prosperity and advanced state of its agriculture. That agriculture is one of the principal sources of the power of a nation, as the capital employed in this branch of industry, while it puts in motion a greater quantity of productive labour than an equal amount otherwise expended, adds also much more to the real wealth and revenue of a nation, and is, therefore, of all the ways in which capital can be employed, by far the most advantageous to a country. That this meeting, being convinced that the power of Great Britain, and the permanency and improvement of its resources, in every other branch of industry, depend upon the unimpaired efficiency of its agricultural exertions, resolves to form itself into an association for the purpose of fostering and promoting, by every means in its power, this great staple of the nation's wealth. That his Grace the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry be elected president of the association for the ensuing year.

—27. Thomas and Mary Braid (persons in humble life, and in the relation of brother and sister) were tried before the High Court of Justiciary for a crime of very uncommon occurrence, joined to that of the murder of their child. The former offence was proved against both prisoners, and the latter against the female only. The man was therefore sentenced to transportation for life, and the female to be executed on the 17th of February. Some circumstances favourable to the latter having since transpired, her sentence has been commuted by the royal favour for transportation.

—31. At a meeting of the Town Council of Edinburgh, it was voted, in direct opposition to the recent resolutions of the Presbytery, that the number of clergymen should be reduced to 13; that a sum of £650 should be set apart annually out of the ecclesiastical fund for the support of additional schools; and that clergymen when infirm should be allowed to retire on two-thirds of their salary, with the consent of the Presbytery and two-thirds of the Town Council. At the same meeting, Mr Aytoun entered into an exhibition of documents, to show that the city-church tax, of annuity, had been surreptitiously extended in 1809, from 19,000 merks, which was the original sum, to its present large amount. On this account, Mr Aytoun argued that the tax is at present on an illegal footing, the Court of Session having decided, in the case of Donald v. the Magistrates of Anderston, "that it will not enforce a clause in a private act, in regard to which no notice was given in applying therefor, in conformity to the law of Parliament." At the meeting of Council, Feb. 4, it was unanimously voted, that "it is the opinion of this Council that the annuity ought to be abolished, and the clergy provided for in some other way than at present." About a fortnight after the above resolution, a declaration was prepared by several persons connected with the church in Edinburgh, and circulated for signature among the inhabitants, besides being placed in various shops—to the effect, that the undersigned, being deeply sensible of the benefits conferred on the country by the established church, and of the utility of the Edinburgh ministers in communicating religious instruction to the poorer classes, regard with serious alarm any attempt to reduce the number of the clergy; at the same time that they are anxious to encourage any plan calculated to extend and increase the usefulness of the church establishment in the city, by uncollegiating double charges—making a new arrangement of parishes, providing additional church accommodation—adjusting, on the most proper footing, the provision for the clergy—and by other means that may appear practicable and desirable."

Feb. 3. The town council of Cupar resolved, by a majority of 10 to 5, to petition Parliament for a dissolution of the connection between church and state, and the application of the church property to the death of the present incumbents, to the civil purposes of the government.—A series of disturbances of an alarming character commenced throughout the west of Scotland, in consequence of the introduction, by the master calico-printers, of new workmen into their establishments, in lieu of the former, who had turned out for an increase of wages. Combinations for increase of wages have been sanctioned by law for several years; but, unfortunately, the workmen are unable, in prosecuting this just mode of improving their interests, to abstain in every case from outrages, which always have been, and always will be, unlawful. Disturbances of this kind, at Thornliebank in Renfrewshire, at Glasgow, in Stirlingshire, Milngavie and Anderston in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, and other places; and the aspect of the tumults so alarming, that parties of military were sent for from Edinburgh to assist in quelling them. Two attempts were made by an infuriated mob to break into the printfield at Anderston, and seize new workmen, who were chiefly hand-loom weavers; an act of dreadful violence is stated to have taken place. It was the latter part of the week that peace was restored in all the disturbed districts. A number of the rioters have been seized, a two from Thornliebank were sentenced to two months' confinement in bridewell. Eight have been lodged by the sheriff of Stirlingshire in the jail of that county. It was lately computed that Glasgow, that, in consequence of these combinations, no less than 20,000 artisans were unemployed, including the entire staff of masons, engineers, machine-makers, and calico-printers. It is most now returned to their employment, where it will open to them, at the same or slightly elevated wages.

The late Dr Bell of Madras left £10,000 in trust of the trustees of Edinburgh, for the purpose of endowing three schools in his plan. The money, which was at first placed in the funds, drawn out in summer 1832, by the then magistrates, for the purpose of discharging a clamorous creditor. Three months after, the bank became insolvent, and the money, which would have educated a thousand children, is almost the same as lost. It is not improbable that the late town council may be prosecuted, and made personally responsible for the fund thus abused.

The Edinburgh Advertiser states that the celebrated Sociologist St Cecilia, by which the city was regaled with amateur and dramatic music during the greater part of the last century, is about to be revived.

The Courier states, that it has "some reason to believe that Majesty's government means to make some concessions on one question of church patronage in Scotland."

A company has been formed in Edinburgh and Glasgow for the introduction of steam-conveyance along ordinary roads. Carriages of this kind are now building in Edinburgh, and that experiment is to be made on the road between these two cities.

Dr P. Macfarlan, one of the ministers of Greenock, is expected to be the next Moderator of the General Assembly.

Mr G. J. Bell, of Edinburgh, who is entrusted by government with the preparation of the new Scottish Bankrupt Bill, has met a committee of the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce, in order to adjust clauses and introduce improvements. From the spirit in which Mr Bell has met the suggestions of the Chamber, and we may add of the country generally, there is every reason to believe that Scotland will enjoy a bankrupt law which will sit once cheaply and expeditiously administered, and which will afford new facilities for protecting the honest as well as punishing the dishonest debtor.

A case of abstracting money from letters has just been decided at the General Post Office, Edinburgh, which is likely to lead to the criminal trial of one if not two young men (brothers), who have been for some time employed as clerks in that establishment.

Remarkable instances of the adaptation of water to coast sound occur at some of the lighthouses on the coast. At Inchliskilg, about four miles from Leith, the town-clocks, the bawling of dogs, and even the beating of carpets, are heard by the keepers while on their watch at night. And the great drum of a military band at Ayr barracks has been occasionally heard at 11 o'clock at a lighthouse, on the opposite side of the Frith of Clyde, distant about sixteen miles.

Improvement in Glass Manufacture.—A discovery of a most important nature for the prosperity of Australia has recently been made by a Mr J. King of Sydney. It is, that the common silicious sand, which is found in an inexhaustible tract between Sydney and Botany Bay, is of unrivalled excellence in the manufacture of the best kinds of plate glass. Specimens of the sand have been sent to England, and been found by makers to be much superior to the sand of Lyme Regis, or any other place in this country. The glass produced, it seems, is, from its purity, especially fit for forming lenses. This discovery will most likely prove of great advantage, in a commercial point of view, to our Australasian possessions. Mr King is an enterprising and ingenious young man, and was some years ago employed in a glass-manufacture in Edinburgh.

A new mode of blasting rocks, for road-metal, has been suggested by Mr D. Millar, road-contractor, Pennycook. Mr Millar proposes that, instead of bores on the present small scale, a vast mass of rock should be penetrated by a bore of several inches in diameter, for which a great quantity of powder might be used; and, as he shows, the cost of quarrying, and also the risk of life and limb, would be much diminished.

There is at present in the course of exhibition, throughout Scotland, an orrery, framed by an individual named John Fulton, which, for several reasons, is highly worthy of notice. It is a complicated piece of machinery, fabricated in the most elegant manner, of brass, and containing a considerable number of ingenious and useful improvements upon the former instrument of this kind. Yet this wonderful piece of mechanism was made entirely by the hands of a working shoemaker, residing in a village in Ayrshire, and who never in his life had seen any such thing except as represented in Ferguson's Astronomy, and a stray volume of Brewster's Encyclopædia. According to a Glasgow newspaper, "for four and a half years he continued to labour, interrupting intervals from the expense that was necessary, and not seeing ahead the forebodings of the many, that his labour would be much better bestowed on his daily handicraft. But the dour of his genius was not to be repressed until he had fully realised the beautiful conception of his mind, which he now offers to the notice of his countrymen. We have seen several orreries of those, too, that had been constructed by adepts in the science of astronomy, and hesitate not to affirm, that this one is far superior not only in its construction and finish, but in the economy of the machinery, and the completeness of the different movements given to the various planets. It would lead into too lengthened a detail for the pages of a newspaper, to enter fully into its varied excellencies."

At a late meeting of the feuars in Strathmiglo, it was unanimously resolved that the town bell shall in future be rung on Sundays at the usual hours, for the accommodation of the dissenting congregations, though there be no sermon in the established church.

Lord James Stuart, the Whig candidate for the Ayr burgh, is stated to have every prospect of success, as Sir George Murray, whom a most respectable requisition was signed, has declined to come forward.

Donald Macdiarmid, a native of Skye, who some years ago resided to South Carolina, where he died lately, has bequeathed to endow two schools for the education of poor children, in the principal town in that island.

Very few, if any, of the Scottish ports, has the increase of shipping been so rapid and extensive as at Dundee during the last year. According to a statement, made up at the end of the year, it is estimated, there then belonged to the town 285 vessels, of which 26,331 tons. This exceeds the shipping of Aberdeen by 1,000 tons; and that port having only 176 vessels, which tonnage 26,433 tons. At no very distant period, Aberdeen had the superiority, both with respect to the number of vessels and the amount of tonnage. Besides, we now employ more of the shipping of that port than it employs of ours. During the past year, though several losses occurred, the increase here amounted to 1,000 vessels, or 3321 tons. The addition in the course of the year already promises to be considerable.—Dundee Advertiser.

During the past month, two newspapers have been started in the county of Scotland—at Kilmarnock, the Kilmarnock Journal and hire Advertiser, and at Paisley, the Western Independent.

The Glasgow Argus has published a tabular account of the amount expended by the city of Glasgow for entertainments, from January 1801, till 30th September 1833, as moved for in the bill by Mr. McGavin. The sums are classed under the three heads of ecclesiastical, civil, and criminal expenses. In the ecclesiastical column, there is charged for deputations to visiting ministers, £25, 5s. 6d.; inductions of ministers, £300, 13s. 11d.; letting church seats, £192, 11s. 9d. In the civil department—for elections, king's birth-days, &c. £7682, 15s. 7d. In the criminal—for jury Court, &c. £2168, 8s. 6d.—Grand total for the thirty years, £16,454, 8s. 6d., or an average of about £500 per annum.

The lordship of Lochaber, for several centuries the property of the Gordon family, and endeared from its association with poetry and history, was sold at the end of January, in three lots—one to Mr. Walker of Crawfordtown, Dumfriesshire, another to Lochiel Sir Duncan Cameron of Fassfern, and the third and most valuable to the Earl of Aboyne, who is heir-presumptive of the Gordons.

The Scots Times, a Glasgow newspaper, we find an interesting account of the fall of rain in the west of Scotland in 1833.

Greenock is nineteen miles of direct distance west from Glasgow; Castle Toward is ten miles south-west from Greenock, under high mountains of Cowal. The fall of rain increases, first, as the distance of the rain-gauge is nearer the west coast; second, as nearer high mountains.—In the year 1815, according to the rain which fell at Glasgow was 22.3; at Bothwell, seven miles eastward, but nearer hills, 24.7; at Greenock, 36.7; at Cardross, eleven miles north-west from Glasgow, farther from the hills than Greenock, but near the Campsie Hills, 41.4 inches. The differences are all explicable on the principles above mentioned.—At all the three stations in the table, one-fourth of the annual amount of rain fell in December.

RELIGIOUS STATISTICS.

ANGULAR duiberty seems to hang over the religious situation of New York. A clergyman from the United States has recently reported in this country, that city contains 80,000 persons who avow their belief in the Scriptures, and make no difference between Sunday and Saturday. A native document, entitled an Appeal to the Clergy of New York, published in the New York Observer, goes even beyond this statement. It states that 100,000 of the inhabitants either habitually neglect the ordinances of religion, or delude their souls with "another gospel." It continues—"No tongue can utter, no pencil can paint, no imagination can conceive, the horrid wickedness which the eyes of God daily and nightly see perpetrated in this proud metropolis. Heaven-daring impiety, the open violation of the Sabbath, abominable licentiousness, gambling, vicious amusements, dishonesty, violence, and beastly intemperance, are continually murdering the souls and bodies of thousands." Quite opposite to these statements is that by Mr. Grant Thorburn, a native of Scotland, who has resided for forty years in New York, and is on a visit to his native country. Mr. Thorburn, whose personal memoirs, just published, testify that he himself under the strongest religious impressions, informs the editor of the Edinburgh Courant, that there is more external respect paid to the Sabbath in New York than in London, Liverpool, or Edinburgh; that a recent attempt, by a stranger, to establish an atheistical temple, completely failed; and that, in the 250,000 inhabitants, there are 150 places of worship, which is a considerably higher proportion than in the Scottish capital, where, moreover, places of worship may exist without congregations, which is impossible in America. Mr. Thorburn also mentions a curious circumstance, as illustrative of the sanction given by municipal authority to the ordinances of religion, namely, that every place of worship has a right to have chains drawn across the street opposite to it, to prevent the passage of carriages during service. The following extract from a little volume just published, under the title of a General View of the United States, will afford some additional light upon this controverted point:—"There is no national religion in the United States, but the support of religion is left to the voluntary contributions of individuals. This is a singular contrast to the policy of European states; and yet religion is by no means neglected among us. It is true, the rural population is generally ill supplied with places of worship; but it ought to be recollected, that this population is thinly spread over a new country, and that Europe owes its temples to the religious zeal, not to the religious enlightenment of age, but to the superstition and bigotry of an age of ignorance. It will be found, however, that, in the great cities of Europe, where the religion has outgrown the original church funds, the places of worship do not bear a greater proportion to the population than in those of the United States. The number of clergymen at present is estimated at about 13,000. Many of these, however, among the Methodists, are continually travelling about, and preaching in different places; and there are, besides, many persons who officiate as clergymen, although engaged in some other occupation. In 1830, Boston, with a population of 61,392, had forty-three churches; New York, with 203,000 inhabitants, upwards of one hundred; Philadelphia, with a population of 167,811, had one hundred churches; and Cincinnati, with 24,331 inhabitants, twenty-three. It is only between the large towns of America and Europe that a comparison can be fairly instituted. And if the supply of churches is considered as a criterion of religious zeal, we should take into account, that new churches in Europe are built by compulsory assessments, whereas in America they are built by voluntary contributions. Even in country districts ill provided with churches, no impartial observer will say that the moral duties are less attended to than in Europe." It thus appears, that, in the American cities, there is not much short of one place of worship for every thousand inhabitants; which, if the numbers of the clergy are to be considered as a criterion of the prosperity of religion, is certainly an agreeable state of things. In our own country, the proportion is very different. In Edinburgh, for instance, there is not more than one place of worship for every three thousand of the inhabitants.

A map has been published by the Reformation Society, exhibiting the situations of Roman Catholic chapels, colleges, and seminaries, in the several counties of England, Scotland, and Wales, and also the present stations of the Reformation Society, up to January 1833. From this it appears that the total number of Catholic chapels in England and Wales, in 1833, was 423, and in Scotland, 74; being an increase in England and Wales since 1824, of 65, and in Scotland, since 1829, of 23 Roman Catholic places of worship. The counties in England possessing the greatest number of Catholic chapels are—Lancashire, 87; Yorkshire, 52; Staffordshire, 25; Northumberland and Middlesex, each 19; Warwickshire and Durham, each 14; Hampshire, 12; and Lincolnshire, 11. There is no Catholic chapel in the counties of Rutland or Huntingdon. In Wales, Catholicism seems to have made but little progress—6 out of the 11 counties into which it is divided not having a Catholic chapel in them, and there being only eight chapels in the entire principality. Inverness-shire and Banffshire appear to be the most Catholic counties in Scotland, there being 17 chapels in the former, and 12 in the latter county. The Reformation Society has been enabled to establish only 46 stations throughout the whole of England, Wales, and Scotland, to counteract the rapid strides which Popery seems to be making.—Times.—[One great cause of the recent increase of Catholic chapels, at least in Scotland, is obviously the vast influx of Irish into the population. So far as we are aware, the return of a Scottish Presbyterian to the bosom of the Church of Rome is an event of very rare occurrence.]

In the Glasgow established churches, out of 10,838 sittings, 2581 are unlet; in Edinburgh, out of about 15,000 sittings, 4800 are unlet; and in the dissenting chapels of Paisley, out of an aggregate of course much less, 4700 are vacant.

In the present House of Peers, there are two hundred members possessed of church-patronage, some to the amount of about thirty livings each. The Lord Chancellor has 807 pieces of preferment in his gift. Altogether, 4050 livings, nearly a third of the whole, are in the gift of the House of Peers.

MISCELLANEOUS.

STRANGE STORY OF GASPAR HAUSER.

The newspapers recently gave an account of the assassination of this mysterious individual, but without sufficiently explaining who or what he was. To remedy this defect, the Ghent Messenger has published a very minute account of his extraordinary history, from which the following is taken:—

He was found about five years ago, at Nuremberg, in a state of nature; unable to tell whence he had come, or how he had been brought there—in fact, he seemed like a person dropped from the clouds. His age then appeared to be about thirty years; his stature was four feet nine inches; a short and very delicate beard covered his chin and upper lip. His complexion was very pale, his limbs were slender, and his feet bore no mark that indicated they had been confined in a shoe. The sole expression of his countenance was gross stupidity. He scarcely knew how to use his fingers or his hands; and when he walked, one would have said it was a child who, for the first time, attempted to make some steps. For his food he would allow nothing but bread and water, to which he was accustomed, and his repugnance to every other was such, that even the smell of meats affected him disagreeably; and if he swallowed a few drops of wine or coffee, he was instantly seized with violent vomiting.

More lately, he stated that he knew nothing of himself or of his family; that it was at Nuremberg he learned for the first time, that besides himself and the man with whom he had always been, there were any other living creatures. As far back as he could remember, he had always inhabited a small low chamber, which he sometimes called a cage, continually seated on the ground, his feet naked, and having only a shirt and trousers for his whole clothing. He had never seen the sky, and remained the greater part of his time deprived of the light of day. When he awoke, he found near him some bread and a pitcher of water. Sometimes this water had a bad taste; and when that happened, he felt his eyes grow heavy in spite of him, and he was forced to yield to sleep; afterwards, when he awoke from his sleep, he perceived that another shirt had been put upon him, and that his nails had been cut. He had never seen the face of the person who brought him his food. How long he had lived thus, he could not tell. It was understood, from an imperfect recital which he made, that his keeper came one day into his chamber, and, keeping behind him, so as not to be seen, had guided his hand as if to make it write something; that shortly after he placed him on his feet, and attempted to teach him to walk; that, finally, this man took him on his shoulders and walked away with him. Hauser was not able to tell much respecting the journey that followed, except that he fainted several times during its continuance.

In the first period of his arrival at Nuremberg, the whole right side of his body was subject to strong convulsive contractions, particularly when the sight of some new object struck him. When he slept, noise did not appear to have any effect upon him, and even violent treatment could not awake him. He could not bear the rays of the sun, which inflamed his eyes. Prints and pictures appeared to him to be cut in wood.

The multiplicity of impressions which his mind received quickly excited his nervous system to an extraordinary degree, so that in a little time the muscles of his face were agitated with nervous contraction; his hands trembled so violently that they could hold nothing; his hearing was become so sensitive, that not only the sound of a drum threw him into convulsions, but he felt violent pain when any one spoke near him in an elevated voice. Shortly he lost his appetite, and his health required that he should be removed to a quiet house where nobody would see him. It was then that he lay upon a bed for the first time, and that he began to dream, which had never happened to him before.

One of the things which he found most difficult was to accustom himself to our sort of food. It cost him months before he could succeed. Hot meats caused him a parching thirst, which he could not quench by drinking ten or twelve measures of water a-day; but when he became a little accustomed to our sort of victuals, the convulsions ceased, the excitement of the brain diminished, his eyes lost their feverish brightness; in fine, his health gradually revived. A fact worthy of notice is, that the change of living caused him to grow two inches in a few weeks.

The sort of life which Gaspar Hauser had led for so many years, separated from the rest of the world, had furnished him with so little opportunity of exercising his mind, that it was that of an infant, and it was a long time before he could comprehend the difference between animated beings and the objects which have not life. He imagined that the movement produced, no matter what the object might be, was spontaneous; so that, if the wind should carry away a sheet of paper, he thought that it had by a voluntary impulse flown away. He supposed that a tree manifested the life within by the movement of its branches and of its leaves, and that the rustling of the latter, when agitated by the wind, was the language in which it communicated its thoughts.

His sight was very remarkable; he saw as well in darkness as in the broad day (this was proved by many experiments.) In the darkest night he could distinguish blue from green. His sense of hearing was also excessively developed; but his sense of smelling, above all, was a source of torment. All the odours, with the exception of that of bread, of fennel, aniseed, and cummin, were to him more or less disagreeable. At a great distance he could distinguish fruit-trees from all others by the smell alone of their foliage. When he passed near a cemetery, the odour exhaled from it, and which was perceptible to none but himself, gave him an access of fever. The smell of a rose caused him to faint.

But that which appeared, perhaps, the most extraordinary in the organisation of Gaspar Hauser, was his facility in feeling magnetic and metallic effects. One day they gave him a loadstone; he took it, held it some moments, then threw it away, observing, that it made him feel disagreeable sensations. Professor Daumer, having learned this circumstance, made some experiments upon him with the magnetic needle; and when it was directed at his side, he complained of a violent pain in his stomach, and said that he felt, besides, a sensation like that which a current of air would cause escaping from his body, and precipitating itself towards the needle. Metals acted also violently upon Gaspar Hauser, and caused him to feel, by their contact, a sort of attraction, and a cold that penetrated, according to the size of the object, more or less into his arms. This incredible faculty disappeared afterwards gradually.

The following was latterly his mode of living:—He ate every kind of meat, except pork, but he required that they should be slightly seasoned, and the seasoning which he preferred was still that of fennel and cummin. He continued to drink water, for which he often substituted in the morning a cup of chocolate: he had a great aversion to all fermented liquors,

PRICE THREE HALFPENCE.

THE DEGENERACY OF THE AGE.

The old cry of increasing vice, crime, and drunkenness has recently been raised in various quarters; a very strong effort has been made in a popular press, to connect the universal profligacy with the loss of general knowledge among the people. The criminal committals in England and Wales have increased, it seems, from 6576 in 1812, and 12,201 in 1818, to 20,829 in 1832: in other words, they have increased more than tripled in twenty years; while in Scotland, though the same accurate data do not exist, calculation extending over the same period, it is not that the committals are now not much fewer in proportion to the population than in the southern part of the island. The population is now as 3 to 2 to what it was in 1812; but the committals are as more than 11 to 10.

No doubt, there is now more crime in the country than formerly: the evidence of parliamentary returns, on a question of this kind, is not to be disputed. It is a surprise every one, however, to learn that such is the case, for we are much mistaken if it be not the general impression that less of crime and its consequences comes before the eyes of the community now than formerly. What we mean is, that the various classes of the people formerly remarked more frequent instances of crime occurring among persons whom they considered as of their own class, in short—than they do now. We will be puzzled for a little to know whence all this crime arises, for they saw more of it when there were less, than when there were twenty thousand committals.

The mystery, we are persuaded, is to be thus explained. Crime has decreased in all classes of society, except among a low and hopeless rabble, who congregate in large towns, and are alike beyond the reach of the schoolmaster and the preacher. In the eyes of the more elevated classes, all below master tradesmen, artificers, labourers, and paupers alike—are the same. But there cannot be a greater mistake. The distinctions of this country, and we might almost say the distinctions of all countries, are now as distinct from the vicious and vulgar mass as "the gentlemen" are. It is in a class who neither work nor want work, a miserable, neglected, abandoned crew—the lees of all the other classes, subsided to the bottom—that vice and crime flourish so luxuriantly. They dwell in the obscure corners of large cities, and live, as it is emphatically said, no one knows how. One thing, however, is evident every day at the police bars and the courts of criminal justice, that they are perpetually employed in petty larcenies and burglaries, that they appear again and again even in the course of a few months, and are now almost the only part of society who give any annoyance to the rest.

In the proof of these statements, we shall adduce a series of facts.

In the large manufacturing towns are confessedly the chief scenes of crime and vice. That there should have been an increase, then, of crime and vice, is not to be wondered at; for within the twenty years the density and numbers of the population in those places have been vastly increased. In 1811, the manufacturing part of the whole population of England was to the agricultural as 6 to 5; in 1832, as 8 to 5; and in 1830, as 2 to 1. In Scotland, during the same period, it increased from 5 to 6, to 2 to 1; that is, from being as less than one half to fully double. During the same thirty years, the population of the three largest manufacturing towns of the empire has been exactly doubled!

Could any thing be more natural than that vice and crime should have increased in a proportion to the increase of circumstances which confessedly are favourable to their production?

II. That, while vice and crime increase in large manufacturing cities, they do not increase expressly among the artificers and mechanics who form so large a proportion of their population, is now to be proved. This, we are glad to say, has been done completely to our satisfaction by Mr J. F. Macfarlane, one of the present magistrates of Edinburgh, who, while others satisfied themselves with a superficial view of supposed social evils, has been at pains to acquire exact knowledge on this particular point. Mr Macfarlane lately addressed a series of queries to fourteen individuals and copartners in Edinburgh, who are in the habit of employing a considerable number of operatives—as follow: 1. Present state and ordinary behaviour [of the men], especially in regard to steadiness and sobriety, compared to former times in your recollection. 2. Whether there is now a greater or less difficulty in obtaining sober and steady workmen than formerly. 3. Whether they are more or less regular in returning to their work on the Mondays after pay-day, or after any other day when they may fall to be paid. 4. Whether there is less or more drinking in the workshops, and, if any such practice, whether they use ardent spirits or malt liquors most. 5. Since 1825, the wages of mechanics have fallen considerably; on the other hand, living and house-rents have been moderated: are tradesmen as well off at present, when employed, as they were at and previous to 1825? To the first question, four answered "As steady and sober," and ten "Improved" or "Much improved." To the second, four answered "As well," and ten "Less difficulty." To the third, five answered "Regular" or "As regular," and nine "More regular." In answer to the fourth query, all except one answered that they allow of no drinking; the excepted individual remarking that the men preferred malt liquors to ardent spirits. In answer to the fifth, all with one exception declared the men to be as well or better off than formerly, several pointing out that the combinations kept up the wages notwithstanding the fall of price of living, and also of masters' profits. The excepted individual in this case was a builder; a trade, which, for obvious reasons, has declined in Edinburgh since 1825.

A valuable attestation has been given to the same general effect by the superintendent of public works in Edinburgh, who, in reply to Mr Macfarlane's inquiries, says—"From actual experience, and much intercourse with various bodies of working men, I consider that they have been gradually improving during my recollection, more especially within the last ten years; in proof of which I could mention many instances, but, for brevity's sake, shall confine myself to one or two, under my own direction. Ten years ago, I had frequently to dismiss paviours and labourers for being unsteady; of late years, however, I have seen nothing but sobriety and steadiness amongst them, and my belief is that they are morally better. In inspecting the various public works about the city, I have the very same impressions of the different workmen employed. Every man seems steady and attentive to his work. In former times, however, public buildings and great works used to be infested with idlers, or unsteady men pretending to seek work, but who more frequently led away simple ones to drink, and corrupted them."

III. Few, we think, will deny that to prove an increase of sobriety, is to prove an increase of morality. This, then, we can prove very incontestibly. For several years past, the number of persons belonging to temperance societies in Scotland alone has not been less than 50,000; and the leading men in those institutions assure us in their reports, as a fact taken from actual observation, that drunkenness is on the decrease. In England, there are 72,116 adherents to this rule of life. Nay, what is perhaps the strongest fact of all, twenty-five vessels now sail from Scottish ports, many of them on long voyages, without spirits on board. The statements of temperance societies are confirmed by the diminution in the consumption of spirits and of public-houses. The quantity of British and Irish spirits, used throughout the United Kingdom, in 1830, was 22,744,271 gallons; in 1831, 21,845,408 gallons; in 1832, only 20,778,558: a diminution of nearly two millions of gallons, or one-eleventh, in the short space of two years. The diminution in Scotland alone has been from 6,007,631 in 1830, and 5,700,689 in 1831, to 4,861,515 in 1832; or about one-fifth! Within the liberties or royalty of Edinburgh, the licences for the sale of spirits have sunk from 1046 in 1829, and 965 in 1831, to 853 in 1833: a decrease of 193, or nearly one-fifth; while within the wider range of the city police, the number has fallen from 1868 in 1830, to 1586 in 1832: a decrease of 282 in the whole city within two years. We are further informed, by the report of the Scottish Temperance Society for 1833, that the reduction of the number of public-houses within the last year has been, in Aberdeen 16, in Ayr 10, in Leith 20, in Linlithgow 9, in Saltcoats 10, and proportionate numbers in various smaller places, while, every where, many of those who still take out licences are losing the ability to do so, on account of the decline of their trade.

Among minor and less precisely authenticated evidences of the increase of sobriety, may be mentioned the following:—The captain of the Edinburgh police thus writes to Mr Macfarlane—"I am perfectly satisfied that the number of persons brought to this office and the police watchhouses, in a state of intoxication, for protection, is now very considerably less than about twelve years ago, when I joined the police establishment; and I am of opinion that drunkenness is much decreased in every department of the lower orders, since that period." Eight or ten years ago, about five hundred people were found every Sunday morning fighting in a state of intoxication in the Cowgate, a low street in Edinburgh; and the King's birthday and New Year's morning were occasions when no one could appear abroad upon the street with safety: there is now no such thing to be complained of. A few years ago, people used to be brought in large numbers into the police offices daily, in the last degree of inebriation; whereas, the whole average daily number of drunken people now taken care of, is about six, more than the half of whom are females of a class with whom drunkenness is an essential contingency of their usual mode of life; while out of 181 brought in during the month of February last, only four were remarked to be in the extreme state, which was formerly the most customary.

Further proofs of the improved condition and morality of the working-classes might be found in the fourteen millions which they have deposited in Savings Banks, in the prevalence of friendly societies, in the increase of the literature addressed to and bought by them, and, what to us is as convincing a fact as any, the number of marriages in proportion to the whole population, which has sunk from 1 in 122 in 1810, to 1 in 129 in 1830—showing the great increase of provident habits during that period.

Having thus established the fact that crime has not increased in what may be called the cognisable classes of society, it follows of course, since crime has increased, that it must have done so in the low and hopeless crew whom we have already described. The theory entertained upon the subject by a large body of thinkers may be held to be expressed in the following passage from Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine for February:—"The most depraved class of society, beyond all question, at least in the great towns, is the lowest; the corruptions of rank and opulence have been fairly outdone by those of penury and discontent; entering by the gates opened by the schoolmaster, degeneracy has entrenched himself in the dense population of the great towns, from whence, as to many centres, the leprosy is rapidly overspreading the land. How is this deplorable fact to be accounted for? Simply in the multitude of inlets which the power of reading and the press have opened into the human mind, when totally unprepared for the trial, and the instantaneous rush which every species of corrupting and disorganising composition has made, to occupy the space thus for the first time laid open, to the general exclusion of the more distasteful habits of real utility. In the general deluge, every thing calculated to elevate, purify, or improve human nature, has, among the lower orders in our large cities at least, been overwhelmed; knowledge has given place to fiction; information to abuse; religion to infidelity; Newton to the Republican; Bacon to the Satirist; the Bible to the Black Dwarf." A newspaper very truly remarked upon this passage, that it has all the effect of burlesque. Not only was the class alluded to never acquainted with either Newton, Bacon, or the Bible, but they never learn even to read. They have outgrown the provisions made by our ecclesiastical and scholastic institutions, and been left entirely destitute of culture of every kind. The gratis religion supplied by endowments goes only to the instruction of the upper classes: the lower provide it for themselves, if they have the ability and inclination, and, if not, they go without. On the other hand, the gratis teaching supplied by endowments is on far too narrow a scale to admit any considerable portion of the masses in question being instructed. There is but one school for one parish in Scotland, let the population advance as it will; while in England, there is not even that. In Edinburgh, where there is a population of 130,000, there are no parish or free schools, unless we reckon two or three on a small scale supported by charitable endowments or philanthropic individuals. In this city, therefore, as in the other large towns, the mass of the children of the poor are not taught to read, and are totally unacquainted with the decencies of civilised society. They spend their time in hordes upon the thoroughfares in the lower part of the town, acquiring a knowledge of every thing that is bad, and nothing that is beneficial, disregarded alike by the clergy, the magistracy, and the respectable classes of their fellow-citizens, and only falling under the supervision of the police officer. One of the conductors of this paper has indeed proved, by personal official inquiry, that it is from this neglected mass of juvenile delinquents that the jails of Edinburgh receive a large portion of their inmates; and that it is by the numerous committals of these unfortunate creatures that the calendar of crime seems to be so much increased. Those who now affect to be so much alarmed at knowledge escaping from private channels, and through the press, to the lower orders, without the accompaniment of religion, must at least allow that they have made no effort to the contrary. If individuals, of their own benevolence, or from their own spirit of enterprise, contrive to give general knowledge where a splendidly endowed body cannot give religion, is it not a confession that that body has misused its opportunities, or that it should have ere now been extended or adjusted in such a way as to have accomplished that object? In fact, the case is simply this: A strong effort is now making to provide the mass of the middle and lower orders with the means of improving their understandings: it is successful with all above a certain point, beneath which lies a region of sin and misery nearly hopeless. Crime, however, having increased during thirty years in that lowest deep, a set of persons who have never made the least effort either to communicate divine or human knowledge, and who conceive it to be their interest to withhold at least the latter, charge the result as arising from the instruction of an entirely different class, in order to throw odium upon that class and their instructors, while it is principally chargeable, perhaps, on their own supineness, in reference to the mass altogether benighted. Supposing there were any danger in human, unaccompanied by divine knowledge, it must surely be a very extraordinary case, if a well-endowed and numerous body of clergy cannot overtake the efforts of a few scattered and unaided individuals, and for every seed of science plant two of religion.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

THE political state of France is such as to excite serious apprehensions of another revolution. The city of Lyons was convulsed for a week in the latter part of February, by combinations of workmen, who were only overawed by large bodies of troops, and who animated, it is said, by a republican spirit. Serious disturbances also took place at St Etienne; and at Marseilles the king was burnt in effigy. In Paris, on Sunday, Feb. 23, a scene of dreadful violence took place at the Bourse, in consequence of the suppression of the cheap political prints; one man was killed by the police. Carlist disturbances are also attracting painful attention in the south of France. The tendency, however, of the public mind is towards republicanism. The king appears to triumph through all these disturbances, by the complete control which he has acquired over the Chambers; and his measures are among the most arbitrary which have been adopted in Europe for a long time. For instance, a law to suppress associations of above three persons is in progress, and a journalist has been sentenced, for a libel on the king, to two years' imprisonment, two years' further deprivation of political rights, and a fine of 2000 francs. It is needless to estimate the probable effect of the re-establishment of a French republic upon the institutions of Great Britain and other countries.

A new feature in the condition of the public mind in France is an agitation for free trade and reciprocity with Britain. It is stated as the opinion of many mercantile persons in France, that, if French corn and wines were admitted into Britain, the ports of that country would be instantly thrown open to British manufactures.

SPAIN.

THE new Spanish ministry is much weakened by divisions; and the Queen is losing favour on account of a connection of an odious nature which she has formed with a young subaltern. Hence the Carlist cause is said to be improving in the north; and, on 2d March, that party occasioned a disturbance of a serious nature in Madrid.

PORTUGAL.

THE Miguelite garrison of Santarem made a desperate attack on Saldanha's troops, Feb. 13, and were repulsed with the loss of 1400 men, but not without a great slaughter having also taken place on the other side. A scandal of an odious character has also arisen respecting Donna Maria.

TURKEY.

A new treaty has been concluded between Russia and Turkey, upon terms apparently more favourable to the latter. It is agreed that Moldavia and Wallachia are to be immediately evacuated, and the remainder of the possessed territory very soon. The Turkish frontier on the side of Persia is also to be extended. The English ambassador has again remonstrated against the treaty of 8th July.

Mehemet Ali is said to be preparing an expedition against Arabia Felix. An army of 20,000 men was nearly ready to march on this service, when the last accounts left Cairo.

The finance committee of the senate of the United States have reported strongly against the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank; which they pronounce to have been "unnecessarily early, and unnecessarily sudden." The effects of this measure are declared to be disastrous in the extreme. There is quite a commercial panic in the country. Numerous heavy failures have occurred, and money is worth two per cent. a-month. President Jackson, however, continues firm to his purpose.

IRELAND.

Mr Barrett, now under imprisonment in Kilmainham jail, for Mr O'Connell's libel on government, was (Feb. 18) served with a notice, that, in terms of an act passed in 1815, no more stamps could be served to him for his newspaper. The Pilot, nevertheless, has been continued under another name. This apparent act of persecution attracted much notice in Parliament, but was found to be an unavoidable consequence of the statute, which forbids stamps to be served to persons convicted of a seditious libel. Lord Althorp has brought in a bill for the repeal of as much of the act in question as relates to the refusal of stamps.

The Dungarvon election closed with the return of Mr Ebenezer Jacob, a Repealer, in opposition to Mr Barron, a Whig. The voters in the interest of the Tory Marquis of Waterford voted for Mr Jacob. The numbers at the close of the poll were—for Jacob, 307; Barron, 260.

Immediately after hearing of the attack upon Baron Smith in Parliament, a considerable number of barristers in Dublin presented an address to him, highly laudatory of his talents, patriotism, and judicial conduct.

During the last three years, there have been thirteen prosecutions of the press in Ireland at the instance of the government, while, during the preceding sixty-eight years, there had been only forty. The prosecution of Mr Barrett has cost the country £702.

Mr O'Connell's collectors have made up their account of parishes that have already paid the rent, and the proceeds amount to £12,800. This is £300 above last year's amount. It is said, that, when all the parishes have paid up, about £2000 more may be expected.

Some of the payments for tithe in Ireland are ludicrously minute. From papers lately read by Mr. Littleton in Parliament, it appears that in the county of Armagh, there are 470 persons paying 1s. 3d. each on an average; in Cork, 336 persons paying 10d. in Londonderry, 1223 persons paying only 6d., in a parish of Carlow, where the total number of taxpayers is 446, the number who pay under 9d. is 1. In another parish in Carlow, the total amount due by 221 defaulters, out of 481, is only 10s. 3d. about one farthing each. In some instances the charge amounts to only seven parts of a farthing.

PARLIAMENT.

1. INQUIRY INTO THE PENSION LIST.

Tu. Feb. 18. A very animated discussion took place in the House of Commons, respecting the pension list. Mr HARVEY moved for a select committee to inquire into the consideration of each grant on that list, and was supported by Messrs Hume, Roebuck, O'Connell, and others. It was urged that an inquiry was highly necessary, not only for the purpose of purging the pension list from the names of persons who have just claim to the national bounty, and who had probably in many instances earned their pensions by disgraceful conduct, but in strict justice to those themselves, or whose relations, had done the country real service, entitling them to recompense. The strong popular feeling on the subject, the general expectation throughout the country that the pension list would undergo revision, and the unworthy names be dislodged from it, rendered it highly expedient that a resolution for a committee of inquiry should be granted. —The motion was opposed by Lord ALTHORP, who moved, as an amendment, several resolutions, embodying the spirit of the defence, and which were chiefly to the following effect: That, upon the accession of his present Majesty, an arrangement was entered into with Parliament, whereby, in consideration of the resignation by his Majesty of his interest in the military revenues, and the droits of the Crown and admiralty, two acts were passed, fixing the amount of pensions payable out of the civil list at L.75,000, and providing for the remaining amount of L.105,940 out of the consolidated fund, till such time as pension to that amount should fall in, when the L.75,000, payable out of the civil list, would be the whole charge of this kind existing:—That under the provision of these acts the charge on the public has already been reduced since the accession of his present most gracious Majesty by the sum of L.12,149; and that the further reduction of the expenditure to the sum limited by the civil list acts is progressive, and has been fixed by law: That it is the bounden duty of the responsible advisers of the crown to recommend to his Majesty for grants of pensions on the civil list such persons only as have just claims on the royal beneficence, and who, by their personal services to the crown, by the performance of duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science, and attainments in literature and the arts, have merited the gracious consideration of their sovereign, and the gratitude of their country. —The amendment was carried, on a division, by 161 to 182. The announcement of the numbers was received with loud cheers; and Mr Harvey gave notice, that, at a convenient time, he should renew his motion, and move a call of the house for its discussion. —Fri. Feb. 28. Lord ALTHORP moved the appointment of a select committee “to examine the papers respecting sinecure offices, and to report their observations thereupon to the house.” He should recommend that persons granted by Parliament by way of compensation should not be included in the examination of the committee. —The motion was agreed to. —Mr Harvey is to introduce a new motion respecting the pension list, Monday next, when the house to be called.

2. COMMUTATION OF TITHES IN IRELAND.

Thur. Feb. 20. The house having gone into committee on that part of his Majesty's speech which referred to the adjustment of Irish tithes, the honourable Secretary for Ireland proposed the following scheme of commutation:—"Tithe composition is to be abolished from and after November next, and a land-tax of equal amount, and payable by the persons, substituted, to be managed and collected by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.—The tax to be redeemable at the end of five years, and the sum of money equal to four-fifths of the value of the land in each county, as determined by a commission for that purpose appointed, together with such further sum as, reckoning the interest of money at 2½ per cent. per diem, may be required to make up twelve years an annual income equal to four-fifths of the land-tax; or the land-tax is to be redeemable for so much land as shall yield annual rents and profits equal to four-fifths of the land-tax; so as to give to the tithe-owner L.80 in land for every £100 of tithe to which he had a claim.—So much of the land-tax as shall remain unredeemed on the 1st of November 1839, to be converted into a rent charge equal to four-fifths of the land-tax, and payable by the owner of the first estate of inheritance in the land, who shall be entitled to recover the whole ment over against his tenantry.—Such rent charges are redeemable or saleable for the best price to be obtained, not being less than the consideration for redemption of land-tax.—The tithe-owners to be paid by warrants issued by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland, and addressed to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.—These payments to be made out of the fund raised by the land-tax, or the money paid for its redemption, by the annual amount of the rent charges, or their produce when sold. When, however, the money shall be invested in land sufficient to give the tithe-owner a full equivalent for his tithe, land is to be transferred to the party, and the government to be relieved from all further connection with it. Such payments are to be of the amount of compositions to which the tithe-owners may be legally entitled, subject to a deduction for the tithe, loss, and expense of collection. Such rate of deduction to be variable for each county, and to be fixed by a commission, with reference to the average expenses and outgoings attendant on the collection of tithes in each county during the ten years from 1820 to 1830. When redemption of land-tax or sale of rent charges shall take place, the payments by warrant as aforesaid are to cease; the redemption or purchase money to be paid over to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and yield an interest of 2½ per cent. per diem. The money to be from time to time drawn out, and invested in land for the benefit of the tithe-owner entitled to the principal money.—A resolution, founded on this plan, was carried against vehement opposition from Mr O'Connell and other Irish members, by 219 to 42.

3. BARON SMITH.

Fri. Feb. 21. Upon the motion of Sir E. KNATCHBULL, the order for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the conduct of Baron Smith, was discharged, by a majority against Ministers of 161 to 155.

4. AGRICULTURAL QUESTIONS.

Fri. Feb. 21. The Marquis of CHANDOS brought forward a resolution, "That, in any reduction of the burdens of the country which it might be practicable to effect by the remission of taxes, a due regard be paid to the distressed condition of the agricultural interest, as adverted to in his Majesty's speech." It was contended by the marquis and his supporters, that the duties on malt, windows, horses, and agricultural servants, pressed with undue severity on the landed interest. The question as to the application of the surplus revenue was an open one; for although Lord Althorp had announced his intention to take off the house-tax, the House of Commons had not sanctioned that resolution. It was denied that the landed interest had any monopoly of corn, or other articles of general consumption; and the extremely low prices of all agricultural produce would soon involve the whole body of landlords and farmers in ruin, unless something was done to relieve them. Even the high price of wool was of little avail, as it was occasioned by a great measure by a deficient supply.—In reply, the Ministers and their supporters maintained, that the relief which would be given to the landed interest by the repeal of taxes would by no means be equal to exaction. Local imposts, tithes, and poor-rates, and most especially the last, were the great burdens which ought to be alleviated. In this way, effectual relief might be administered; and the government had applied itself diligently to the subject.—The motion was lost, on a division, by 206 against 202; ministerial majority, 4.—On Tu. Feb. 27, numerous petitions were presented at the morning sitting, praying for relief of agricultural distress, and especially for a repeal of the malt-tax. In the evening, Sir W. INGILBY brought on his expected motion, "That the house resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, with a view to take into consideration the propriety of partially or totally repealing the duty on malt." This motion he supported in a speech full of jests and frolic, which cast an air of burlesque on the whole subject. He contended that the repeal of the malt-tax was necessary for the relief of the agriculturists, and also for the morals of the common people, which were degraded by the multiplication of beer-shops, and would be improved by a return to the old system of every man his own brewer." Sir William then proposed a new budget, in which the five millions of the malt-tax were to be supplied from a tax on beer, wines, gin, gaming-houses, leather, and tithes.—The Marquis of CHANDOS seconded the motion, but disclaimed all previous knowledge of, or concurrence in, Sir William's extraordinary budget. The ensuing debate occupied several hours. The great relief which the repeal of the tax would afford to the depressed landed interest, the policy of encouraging the consumption of beer, in preference to that of gin, and the tendency which the permission to brew at home would have to bring about the old practice, so conducive to morality, of farmers doing their own labours, were all insisted upon. The members who supported the motion for inquiry were, Mr Benett, Colonel Davies, Mr Cobbett, Mr Bagg, Colonel Wood, Mr Hume, and Mr O'Connell. Mr Hume especially, on the ground that inquiry would certainly do good.—Lord Althorp, Mr Warburton, Sir R. Peel, and others, opposed the motion; Lord ALTHORP saying, that if the committee were appointed, it would be a palpable usurpation of the administrative functions of the government. He also expressed his disbelief that the labourers would ever again brew their own beer, as the article could be produced cheaper in breweries. He had plans in forwardness—plans which he pledged himself to produce—which he really thought would relieve the agricultural interest.—On a division, the motion was lost by 272 against 170; ministerial majority, 102.

Thur. March 6. Mr HUME brought forward the subject of the corn-laws. In the morning he presented various petitions against the continuance of those acts, amongst which the most remarkable was one from Glasgow, with 59,000 signatures; another from the metropolis, presented in the evening, had 31,000. In a long speech, the honourable member for Middlesex endeavoured to show the detriment occasioned by these laws to the great body of the people. He traced the history of the enactments for regulating the trade in corn, from 1660 downwards; and pointed out their constant inefficacy to produce the result desired by those who framed them; till the year 1815, when the commencement of the present excessively restrictive system began. The bill of 1815 had the effect of raising the price of bread in this country, but not to the extent which the landholders desired. Mr Hume next referred to the vast increase in the population of our great manufacturing towns, and dwelt upon the necessity of furnishing an increased supply of food for their maintenance. When so large a portion of the population were dependent upon manufactures for support—when that class of the population was so rapidly increasing—would it be possible to prevent the importation of foreign corn? The agricultural produce of the country could not increase in any thing like the same proportion. The great disadvantage with which our manufacturers had to contend, was the low rate of wages, the consequence of the low price of food, for which labour could be had on the Continent. We had cheap cotton, and wool, and cheaper fuel, but food was dear. While the corn-laws had failed to benefit the landed interest, the rest of the community were starved by the artificial want which they created. A reduction in the price of corn would be followed by a reduction in the price of wages. It might be asked, how, then, would the manufacturer gain? He would answer, that food would be proportionably cheaper; that England, being the principal corn-market, would strike the average of Europe, and at the same time, by her cheaper production, secure a market against the competition of foreign manufacturers. The carrying-trade would become our own, were there a regular trade in corn established under a fixed duty. At present, corn was imported into this country in foreign vessels, because our shipowners, many of whom were merchants, could not calculate upon so uncertain a trade. The landed interest founded their claim for a duty on corn on the ground that land was subject in this country to peculiar burdens. There were tithes, poor-rates, county cess, local and parochial taxation, and church-rates. But they had purchased their land subject to tithes: the impost had existed from time immemorial, and from the year 1700 to the year 1815, no claim for relief had been set up on this ground. With regard to the others, let the house look at the burdens which they laid upon towns. There were the poor-rates; the expenses of paving, lighting, and watching; and the church-rates, from which the landed interest was peculiarly free. The county rates, as he could prove, pressed more heavily on the manufacturing than the agricultural counties. He was reminded of the malt-tax: that fell heavily upon the land, but it also fell heavily on the consumers of beer. Mr Hume then adverted to the baneful influence of our corn-laws upon our foreign trade, and mentioned the steps now taking in Germany in retaliation of them. On the other hand, the proceedings of the people of South Carolina, and more recently of the vine-growers in the south of France, showed a determination not to submit to injurious restrictions on commerce. England should take the lead in removing these restrictions. It was most peculiarly her interest to do so. He was for removing prohibitory duties also on foreign manufactures: he would get rid of the restrictive system. It was admitted by all except some ultra landed gentlemen, that the present corn-laws could not be kept up much longer. Unless trade was relieved from the pressure upon it, it would be impossible to find employment for the millions engaged in manufactures, and bringing up to those occupations. Yet, as the land was not able to maintain them, they must be maintained by manufactures, if at all. The farmers could not be worse off than they now are: any change would benefit them—the few entangled in long leases only excepted. He had formerly advocated a duty of 15s. a-quarter, to be reduced by one shilling a-year, till it came to the point at which the agriculturists had a claim to protection in consequence of any exclusive taxation beyond what other classes were liable to. He now, however, thought that 10s. should be the point at which they should begin to reduce. Mr Hume concluded by moving, "That this house do resolve itself into a committee, to consider of the corn-laws, and of substituting, instead of the present graduated scale of duties, a fixed and moderate duty on the import at all times of foreign corn into the United Kingdom, and for granting a fixed and equivalent bounty on the export of corn from the United Kingdom."—The motion was seconded by Colonel Torrens, and supported by Lord Morpeth, Mr Clay, Mr P. Thomson, and others.—Sir James Graham took the lead in opposing it. He said, that, to give up the corn-laws, was inconsistent with the preservation of a landed aristocracy. Were the present motion to be carried, two-thirds of the land would be brought into the market.—The debate was continued next evening, and closed by a division, negating it by 312 against 155; landlords' majority, 157.

5. ARMY ESTIMATES.

Fri. Feb. 28. The army estimates were brought forward, in a committee of supply, by Mr Ellice. The vote he proposed was for 88,952 men, being 8000 under the former amount, while the saving in expenditure was £299,000. He mentioned the labours of the commission which had been appointed for the purpose of consolidating the civil departments of the army. In compliance with the recommendation of the commissioners, it was proposed to abolish the board of control of army accounts; to take to the War-Office the charge of the Ordnance half-pay; and to transfer the whole of the Commissariat to the War-Office. It was also proposed not to grant the present allowance of half-pay to the officers who might hereafter enter the army. The recommendations of the committee on military expenditure which sat last session, had been attended to in every instance but one, which related to the staff at head-quarters. Altogether, the estimates were the lowest which had been presented to the house since the union with Ireland.—Mr HUME moved, as an amendment, that the number of men should be 9000 less, which was negated by 282 to 46. The house was in committee on these estimates during the greater part of the evening of March 3, when £3,056,873 for the land forces at home and abroad (exclusive of those in India), and various other votes, were passed with more or less opposition.—March 10. On the army estimates being again under the consideration of a committee, several of the independent members opposed the grant of £82,179 for the volunteer and yeomanry corps; which passed, however, on a division, by 135 to 52.

6. DISSENTERS' MARRIAGES.

Tu. Feb. 25. Leave to bring in a bill for the relief of dissenters, in regard to the celebration of marriages, was moved for by Lord JOHN RUSSELL, and obtained. The chief provisions of the proposed bill were as follow:—Dissenters must either be married by banns or by special licence. If they choose to be married by banns, they will have to give a regular notice to the clergyman of the parish in which they reside, to publish the banns. After the banns have been published, if the parties wish the marriage to be celebrated by a dissenting minister, they must ask for a certificate of the due publication of the banns; and the clergyman of the parish, upon granting it, will enter in the book, in which the banns are recorded, that a certificate has been granted on the application of such parties. The dissenting minister will then give notice in his chapel that he will proceed on a certain day of the week to celebrate the marriage; and, after the ceremony, he will be required to record the marriage in a registry kept by him for that purpose, and to make a return every three months of all the marriages he has performed, to the register of the diocese, accompanied by a fee to insure their accurate entry. The mode of procuring a licence to be the same as at present; and the licence having been granted, notice of that fact will be sent to the clergyman of the parish, and the dissenting minister, on marrying the parties, will record the marriage in his registry. The proposed bill to be applicable to Roman Catholics as well as Protestant dissenters.—The plan was opposed by Mr HUME, who thought that marriage ought to be a civil contract only.—Mon. Mar. 3. In the House of Lords, Lord DURHAM lamented the inadequacy of this bill to satisfy the hopes of the dissenters; when Earl GREY said that the measure embraced but one object, and that other measures of relief were intended.—The 28th of April has been fixed for the second reading of the dissenters' marriage bill, in order to allow time to the dissenters to urge objections to it. Should these be found insuperable, Lord John said he would not press the bill, though he did not see how he could make any alterations in it.

7. IMPRESSMENT.

Tu. March 4. Mr BUCKINGHAM moved for a select committee to take into consideration the practicability of devising some plan by which a regular and voluntary supply of seamen might be procured for his Majesty's navy, without recourse to the practice of forcible impressment. He supported his views in an able and temperate speech, in which he endeavoured to show the inexpediency of impressment in various lights.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM opposed the motion, and announced that he had a measure in preparation, by which the end would be better served than by the appointment of a select committee, namely, a plan for registering merchant seamen, and supplying the navy from them by ballot. He moved, as an amendment, for leave to bring in a bill for that purpose, which was carried by 218 against 130.

8. NAVY ESTIMATES.

Mon. Feb. 17. The navy estimates were brought forward in a committee of supply, by Sir JAMES GRAHAM, who stated that, in addition to the million which he had already taken off this branch of the public expenditure, he was now to take off £181,000. The men required for the service of the year were 27,500, including 9000 marines and 1000 boys.—An amendment by Mr HUME, for 2500 fewer men, was negated.

tived by 196 to 20. Various detail votes were also passed.—In the course of this debate, Lord Althorp occasioned great surprise, on Mr Hume taunting him with having said he would carry on the government without patronage, by replying that he had never said any such thing.

9. CHURCH PATRONAGE (SCOTLAND).

Thur. Feb. 27. The house, on the motion of Mr GEORGE SINCLAIR, appointed a select committee to "inquire into the state of the right of patronage in the Church of Scotland." The motion was acceded to by Mr JEFFREY, who, however, expressly guarded himself from being supposed to coincide in the views of Mr Sinclair. The excitement on this subject in Scotland had become so great, that the settlement of it was absolutely necessary.—A debate then ensued, in which Captain Gordon, Mr Cumming Bruce, and Sir Robert Peel, opposed, and Colonel Leith Hay, Mr Cutlar Fergusson, Mr Colquhoun, Mr Gillon, and Mr Sinclair, supported, the motion.—Captain GORDON said, that the present government had misused its patronage for political purposes; an instance of such misconduct had occurred in his own county. If an inquiry, limited in its objects to such proceedings as these, were sought for, he should not object to it; but he would not support a measure for overturning the whole system of patronage, as it had existed, with two slight interruptions, since the time of John Knox. Besides, the settlement of this business belonged more especially to the General Assembly of the Church.—The line of argument adopted by Captain Gordon was followed with little deviation by the other speakers on the same side.—Sir ROBERT PEEL considered the attempt to interfere with the right of patronage, which had now existed for one hundred and twenty years without interruption, in the same light as an attempt to deprive the patrons of livings in the English Church of their advowsons. He enlarged also upon the evils arising from popular election of ministers, and of the great advantage of the union of church and state.—On the part of the supporters of the motion, it was urged, that the right of patronage had always been considered an usurpation; that after it had been abolished, it was restored by the Jacobites in the reign of Anne; that the General Assembly, in 1736, had earnestly protested against it; and that it was directly at variance with the canons of the Presbyterian Church. It was the opinion of Dr McCrie, and other men of eminence, that the increase of dissenting congregations, now amounting to five hundred and fifty-three, or a hundred more in number than half the parish churches, was mainly owing to this abuse. The people of Scotland had resolved upon seeing the church reformed in this respect. As to leaving the matter to be settled by the General Assembly, that was out of the question, as the time of the Assembly was already sufficiently occupied for the short period of its sittings; and the people expected the subject to be fairly discussed and settled in Parliament.

10. REMOVAL OF THE BISHOPS.

Thur. March 13. Mr C. RIPPON moved for leave to bring in a bill "to relieve the archbishops and bishops from their legislative and judicial duties in the House of Peers." He remarked, that the Episcopal bench, however useful when lay lords were unlearned, was now unnecessary. The duties of the bishops in Parliament caused their absence from their dioceses, and brought them into scenes of gaiety unsuitable to their character. The interests of the church were also hurt by its bishops being mixed up in political matters.—Mr GILLON seconded the motion, and it was supported by many other members, one of whom, Mr HARVEY, vindicated the dissenters from the imputation of a desire to share the revenues of the church. The non-conformists, he said, wished to have no connection with the state, either as regarded the church or as regarded its revenues. They were of opinion—an opinion sanctioned by the experience of eighteen hundred years—that Christianity required no aid from the civil power, and that it was impeding in its progress whenever such aid was tendered to it. During the three first centuries, it was able to stand and triumph over powers far more formidable than any of those which sprung out of the refinements of the present age. It overcame the power of Paganism, and humbled the pride of the Cæsars. There was nothing in the pomp of Rome or the pride of courts which could resist its divine but simple dignity. However powerful the fashion of the present times might be, however profitable the subserviency of courts, however brilliant the regalia of monarchy, whatever strength there might be in sceptres or whatever reverence in crosiers, Christianity rested on imperishable principles; and all the non-conformists asked, was to let Christianity stand on its own inherent and imperishable principles.—Mr HUME was decidedly of opinion that the removal of the bishops was necessary to render them agreeable to their flocks.—Mr TENNYSON offered a few remarks in opposition to the motion, on the ground that it interfered with the ministerial plan of church-reform; and Lord ALTHORP said he should not trouble the house with any reply, but would meet the motion with a direct negative. The division gave 58 for the motion, and 125 against it; ministerial and conservative majority, 67.—The minority received the announcement in such a manner as to show that even this degree of strength was beyond their expectation.

11. CORRUPT CONSTITUENCIES.

Bills for the disfranchisement of the boroughs of Carrickfergus and Stafford—of those voters in the borough of Hertford who are qualified by paying rates and taxes, of those in the borough of Liverpool who are qualified as freemen—and for the extension of the bounds of Warwick so as to include Leamington—have, during the session, passed through the most of their stages; as also a bill, introduced by Lord J. Russell, for the prevention of bribery at elections, and the more ready punishment of such conduct by disfranchisement.

12. OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.

Tu. March 11. Sir A. AGNEW obtained leave to bring in two bills for the better observance of the Sabbath in England and Scotland respectively, which were read a first time, and are announced for a second reading on April 16.—A third bill for preventing fairs on Mondays and Saturdays, was thrown out by 181 to 137, on the ground of tending to create confusion in commercial affairs.

13. FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.

Fri. March 14. A motion was made by Major FANCOURT for abolishing the punishment of flogging in the army, which he supported by the usual arguments. It was opposed by Mr R. Grant, and the Ministers in general seemed to make cause against it. The men, it was represented, were only flogged for disgraceful offences, and no other kind of punishment was practicable, or could be expected to have the same effect.—On a division, the motion was lost by 227 against 94 [a larger relative majority than what voted for the continuance of this mode of punishment, in 1826, under a Tory government.]

14. CAPTAIN ROSS.

Mon. March 17. Mr C. FERGUSON moved that a grant of £5000 be made to Captain Ross, for his public services, and Mr J. F. YOUNG moved as an amendment, that the amount of the grant be £7000 instead of £5000. Mr C. FERGUSON, on the suggestion of several members, withdrew his motion, and agreed to move next day for the appointment of a select committee to consider the claims of Captain Ross, and to report thereon to the house. It was apparently the opinion of the house that the grant proposed was inadequate.

15. MINOR SUBJECTS.

Mon. Feb. 17. Mr O'CONNELL moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the improvement of the law of libel. Its provisions are—to assimilate the definition of libel to that of slander; to separate public from private libels, and principals from accessories; to abolish ex-officio informations; to deprive the Crown of the right of reply unless the defender calls evidence; to admit the truth of the alleged libel to be given in evidence; and to regulate the costs in civil actions by the amount of damages given.

Thur. March 6. Lord ALTHORP brought in his promised bill for the repeal of the house-tax.

Petitions from the dissenters respecting their grievances, and calling in many instances for the separation of church and state, continue to be presented in great numbers.

Fri. March 14. Sir JAMES GRAHAM explained the new regulations he proposed to be adopted in the Exchequer. He proposed to abolish the offices of auditor, teller, and clerk of the pells; and to establish in their place a comptroller, and various assistants. It was also proposed to establish paymasters, similar to those in the army, navy, and ordnance departments. The office of comptroller-general would be held for life; and as, in case of sickness, an assistant-comptroller might be wanted, such an officer, removable only on the address of one of the houses of Parliament, would be appointed. The Exchequer office is to be open daily. All the money hitherto payable into the Exchequer is to be paid into the bank, to form one fund to the credit of the Exchequer in the bank books. The Treasury is to direct the form of keeping the accounts; and the present absurd modes of keeping them are to be entirely abolished. The Audit Board to have a quarterly account, and the Parliament an annual account, of all the money paid in and paid out, and of the actual balance of cash in hand at the end of each sessional year. The expense of the present system is £41,900 a-year; the number of individuals employed is sixty-five. It is proposed to reduce the cost to £11,000, and the number of persons employed to twenty-nine.

The house agreed, March 14, to adjourn on the 26th, till the 14th of April.

An attempt was made without success to interest the House of Commons in favour of Mr Cohen, editor of the Brighton Guardian, who was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for a libel on the magistracy of the neighbourhood.

ENGLAND.

THE DISSENTERS.

THE greatest dissatisfaction has been expressed by the dissenters throughout the country, in reference to Lord John Russell's bill for the performance of their marriages by their own clergymen. A pamphlet has been published under the title of the "Case of the Dissenters," from which it would appear that the practical grievances respecting the marriage and funeral ceremonies, &c. are the least of what these religious professors complain of. The author declares the "predominant evil" springing from the establishment church, is that of "uniform, expressed, implied gradation." We have ourselves been long convinced that this is chiefly what animates the dissenters in both parts of the island, and more especially the clergy. A sectarian minister feels that he is not so respectable a man as the parish clergyman, and, under the fretful feeling thus engendered, he means for the reduction of his brother to his own level. "Partiality," says the Case of the Dissenters, "as ever been denounced as of the essence of bad government; it is bad in civil affairs, it is intolerable in that of religion. Yet to this evil an establishment opposes us. The professor of the state religion is the mere ground of his profession, placed near to majesty; he is one of a privileged fraternity; he is pointed out to the community as the more correct, safer, and every way the better man; and even, in some form or other, is at hand to uphold his pretensions. As he is exalted, the seceder is necessarily degraded. A cloud stands between him and the throne of royalty; he does not belong to the king's church, and he is hardly thought to be true to the king's party; and he is treated as though he held a 'divided allegiance,' and was not to be fully trusted—certainly not to be trusted equally with a conformist. It is impossible to say what he has not suffered from this cause, in estate, in reputation, and in good fellowship. Among any thing exceed this in exasperation? If it be some one definite evil, to be endured at some one point of one's life, for worshipping according to one's conscience, however great, it might be bravely borne; but when it is an evil pursuing one, in its subtle malignant influence, through every path and every hour of life—when it gives one a lover place in the settled opinion of one's fellow citizens—when it honours us at the Exchange, at the College, in the Senate, in the Pulpit—when it worms itself to the paradise at home, and breeds discord or interference between parent and child, brother and sister—who can bear it? It is the continual dropping that wears the stone. The storm might fall on it—the lightning might strike it—it is unhurt; but this continual vexation chafes and corrodes even a stone. In London, and in the principal towns in the country, more especially in Manchester, Birmingham, Bristol, and Glasgow, meetings have been held, almost simultaneously, by the dissenters, to reprobate the conduct of Ministers, and to petition Parliament, in language of unusual earnestness, for the redress of their grievances. They are also preparing the means of making a still more formidable demonstration. They are taking a census of the dissenting population of the country, and making lists of the number of voters, with the names of the candidates for whom they voted, in order to show Ministers by whom the refractory majority of the House of Commons was returned. The Leicester census has been completed; and it appears, that out of 32,755 persons, there are 11,555 churchmen to 21,200 dissenters; that out of 2260 electors, who polled at the last election, 110 are dissenters, 936 churchmen, and 167 who belong to no religious sect; that out of the 1107 dissenting electors, 1024 voted for the reformers, while out of the 936 churchmen, 811 voted for the anti-ministerial candidate. In Liverpool, the children of dissenters at school are to those of churchmen as 92 to 50. In London, according to the Congregational Magazine, there are 459 churches and chapels of all denominations, of which 194 belong to the establishment, and 265 to the dissenters.

CHANGES AMONG LAW OFFICERS.

MR JUSTICE BAYLEY retired from the bench, Feb. 10, and was created a baronet. Sir William Horne immediately resigned his office of Attorney-General, on the understanding that he was to take the vacant seat upon the bench; and Sir John Campbell, Solicitor-General, was appointed to succeed him. A canvass was then commenced by Sir J. C. Hobhouse and Mr J. Crawford for the representation of Marylebone, expected to be vacated by Sir W. Horne; while Sir J. Campbell went down to Dudley, to meet his constituents. A strange series of disappointments, and some remarkable expressions of public opinion, have been the consequence. Sir W. Horne, owing to some misunderstanding, was not appointed to the judgeship, which was given to Mr John Williams. Hence there was no election for Marylebone. On the other hand, Sir John Campbell was thrown out at Dudley, by a Tory, Mr Hawkes, who polled 314 against his opponent; it is said, to the popular dissatisfaction with the Ministry, especially on account of the alleged insufficiency of the dissenters' marriage bill. The Sir W. Horne has lost his office, and Sir John Campbell his seat in the House of Commons. Several other London newspapers, formerly independent and liberal, but which have lately gone much into the material interest, have thought it necessary, on this occasion, to resume their former tone. The Morning Chronicle, for instance, has the following remark:—"The truth must be told, however unpalatable. Sir John Campbell found favour at Dudley in December 1832, as a 'ministerial candidate.' His connection with Ministers in 1834 was detrimental to his prospects. It is impossible to conceal our regret at the palpable state of public opinion. An impression, almost universal, prevails among the liberal party, that the form of the representation has not been allowed to effect. Many practical questions of vital importance to the social condition of the people, have been wholly neglected. The just political claims of many classes of society have been overlooked and abandoned. In fact, the reformers have been disgusted with some of the temporising and juste milieu acts of Ministers."

Feb. 15. About sixty gentlemen, principally artists, met at the Freemasons' Tavern, and resolved to found an asylum for decayed artists, to be called the Artists' College. It is proposed that the cost of the building shall not exceed £5000, and that it shall contain twenty distinct tenements.

6. A person of the name of James Whitehead, who had been married in the morning at Croydon, had passed the day at his wife's uncle's, at West-ster, was riding home to Bromley, Kent, with his wife, in a gig; they had just reached the Surrey side of Westminster Bridge, when their horse took fright at the lights and horn of the Dover coach, at the time driving down, and becoming unmanageable, overturned the vehicle, and threw them out opposite Marlborough Street. Mr W.'s head came in contact with the lamp-post with such violence as to cause immediate concussion of the brain, of which he died within an hour in the house of surgeon Brookes, at the Marsh. Mrs Whitehead, who received many severe lacerations and bruises in the fall, was conveyed back to her uncle's, the unfortunate wife and widow of a day. Mr W. was only twenty-five years of age, and was a son of Mr Walton of Plastow Lodge, near Bromley.

7. Admiral Durham was elected M.P. for Devizes, in the room of Mr Gore, who lately resigned. The Admiral was the unsuccessful Tory candidate at the general election.

4. The family of Viscount Barrington having gone off in the carriage to witness the illuminations in celebration of the Queen's birth-day, his lordship's eldest daughter, a child of six years of age, fell out of the vehicle (the door of which from some unaccountable cause burst open), and was killed on the spot, by a wheel passing over her head.—Mr John Durham was elected without opposition for the borough of Kendal, in the room of the late Mr Brougham.

16. The proprietors of the London University held their annual meeting, Mr Abercromby in the chair, supported by Lord Ebrington and the Duke of Somerset. From a report which was read to the meeting, it appears that a decided improvement has taken place in the concerns of the university. The amount expended since its foundation is £162,997, 12s.; the amount received in various ways £165,557; the balance is in the hands of the bankers and in government securities. There is a mortgage debt, however, of £4000 on the property. The number of students has increased during the year from 667 to 753; and the amount received from the students for fees has been raised from £6158 to £7343, 15s. Three new professorships have been established—of geology, arts of design, and mineralogy. Captain Machonochie, R.N., Secretary to the Royal Geographical Society, is appointed to the first. Considerable progress has been made in building a new hospital connected with the university, which is estimated to cost £7556; of this sum, £5158 has been received; and it is hoped that the balance will be furnished by public subscription. It was also stated, that, for the first time, the annual ordinary expenses of the university had been defrayed out of its proportion of the fees. In the course of the proceedings, Dr Fellows addressed the meeting in the following speech:—"Mr Chairman, when this university was first established, it was in advance of its age. It was indeed at the time a grand experiment on the liberal principles of the community; but time has not taken the encouragement which it has received as a measure of that liberality, we must, I fear, graduate it at a very low scale. It has not, indeed, got quite down to the freezing point; but it has never yet risen to that degree of generous heat which should have warmed the heart and opened the hand in favour of this noble institution. Sir, a great deal has been said about the light of the age in which we are living; but as far as respects the intellectual nature of man, there are several kinds of light, and with very different properties. Sir, there is a light that enlightens the mind and hardens the heart; and I fear that the light of which we are boasting partakes a good deal of this character. For has it not blinded the minds of thousands to the benefits of this institution? Has it not hardened the heart that should have sympathised with its necessities? Has it not paralysed the hand that should have contributed to its support? But, sir, whatever may be the quantity or quality of this light of the age—be it little or be it much—be it cloudy or be it clear—this is certain, that the prejudices of by-gone years, prejudices coming out of the deep night of ignorance and superstition, still throw their long shadows across our path, often bewildering our way, and always impeding the onward march of civilisation and improvement. Hence, sir, more particularly owing to this circumstance, we have not yet reached that region of serenity in the political state of man, that happy combination of the social elements, when truth, only truth, and nothing but the truth—when truth, simple unsophisticated truth—will have the bold unhesitating profession of every man's heart, as well as the inward homage of every man's heart, of all the forms in which vice can walk the earth, and which is so loathsome as that of hypocrisy; and yet this very vice is either so nurtured among us by the very nature of some of our institutions, or a free declaration of opinions on particular topics, exposes the individual to so much odium, so much obloquy, and such a multiplicity of vexations, that hypocrisy becomes early and almost necessarily intertwined in our actions and incorporated in our habits. Sir, if the principles of this institution had not had to contend with the inveterate hostility of so much puritanical cant, and so much pharisaical hypocrisy, is it probable that so little encouragement would have been given to an institution that opens its doors to the members of all religious communions, that excludes none, but invites all sects and creeds to partake of its literary benefits, and to drink without stint at its intellectual springs? And yet, Sir, I fear that it is this very comprehensiveness in the nature and principles of this institution, that has operated to its prejudice, that has retarded its progress and obstructed its success. Our finances would, I think, otherwise have been in a more flourishing condition. Instead of our expenditure exceeding our income, as it has up to the present year, our income would more probably have exceeded our expenditure. Contributions from all quarters, from individuals of all parties, from sectarians of all denominations, would have poured into the treasury of this institute of wisdom, this sanctuary of science. Sir, I call this building the sanctuary of science; and I beg to know what better purpose it can serve, or what higher destiny it can have? For does not all science elucidate the Divine agency, develop the Divine laws and manifest the Divine attributes? Sir, a great luminary of the seventeenth century, Isaac Barrow, took these words for a motto to one of his mathematical works, 'God is a Geometrician.' And let me ask you, is there any art or science of which he is not the original source, the primary spring? Take Paley's favourite instance, Look at that perfection of mechanism, the human eye, and tell me what is the just, the legitimate inference? Is it not this? HE who made the eye shall HE not see? And, let me ask you, can you have a more edifying monitor, a more animating guide to all that is great and good and elevating, than the consciousness of this omnipresent vision, this all-seeing eye? Can any church in Christendom? Can the church of Rome, with the pope and all the cardinals, or the church of Scotland, with all its presbyters, or the church of England, with all its bishops, furnish stronger inducement to purity of thought, to rectitude of intention, and to integrity of conduct? When, then, we are reviled as anti-religionists, when we are taunted with the objection that we give no theological instruction, I tell the slanderer that we hardly give any thing else. For do not all our scientific classes partake, more or less, of a theological character? Do they not all refer, more or less, to the acts, the volitions, the laws and ordinances of Deity in the moral, the intellectual, and the material universe? Nor can any student well attend any one lecture in any one of those classes, without knowing more of the Divine agency than he did before. And let me ask you, Is not every science a manifestation of the Divine agency, with a constantly increasing evidence? And remember that it is not an evidence that is apt to be dimmed with the obscurations of age or weakened by length of years; but that it is an evidence, of which every year will increase the light, and augment the strength. What I have said will, I think, suffice to show that the principles of this university, instead of having an anti-religious tendency, have a tendency quite the contrary. Sir, their tendency is to give more purity and simplicity to the religious systems of the civilised world. Their tendency is to substitute edifying facts for unmeaning dogmatism; their tendency is to replace metaphysical obscurities by luminous truths; and thus to confer a great, a lasting, an inestimable benefit upon mankind. Sir, knowing that such are the tendencies of this institution, and believing that such will be the results, I invoke the spirit within its walls, as if it were the Alma Mater to which I was indebted for the best lessons in wisdom and in virtue, and I say, 'Esto perpetua.' Mayest thou flourish for everlasting! Mayest thou go on increasing and improving till the perceptions of time shall vanish in the consciousness of eternity! Mayest thou, hereafter, send forth tens and hundreds, ay, and tens of thousands, who shall explore new regions of knowledge, and open new paths of science, who shall be at once the use and the ornament, the stay, the help, the solace, the friends, and the benefactors of their country, and of their kind!"

—Mr Richardson, steward to Mr John Perkins of Bletchingley, Surrey, was murdered in going home in his gig from Epsom market, being shot in the lungs. It is supposed that he must have been attacked by two men, for the purpose of robbery, and that having fired his own pistol without effect, one of theirs took fatal effect upon him. Two men, named Cottevill and Woodhill, are in custody on suspicion of having committed this murder.

March 4. The East India Company's sale of teas commenced under unusual circumstances. The metropolitan dealers maintained that the quantity offered by the company—namely, nine millions of pounds, being half a million of pounds more than was offered at the last December sale—is more than they were given to understand would be brought forward; and that their purchases in the former case had been made on that understanding. They therefore made a demand upon the company to take back at the selling prices all the tea not cleared out of the warehouses, purchased at the last sale, and amounting to upwards of two millions of pounds. The company refused to do this; and consequently the opposition to the sale was so great that no tea could be sold for several days. An arrangement is said to have been at length made among the dealers to permit one person to buy at a low price, and an immense quantity was accordingly disposed of at 1s. 4½d. The sale proceeded slowly during that and the succeeding week, when at length the quantity purchased in this illegal manner was agreed to be given back. The dealers now found additional cause of indignation against the company, from a rumour that they were intending to send teas to Newcastle and other outports—which, however, was formally contradicted. An immense loss must have been sustained by the company on what they have sold on this occasion, and many thousand chests of their teas have been refused.

5. A public meeting was held by the dissenters at Manchester, and continued next evening. It is described as having been "most numerous and respectfully attended." The spirit which actuated the meeting may be judged of by the following resolutions, selected from those, thirteen in number, which were passed in the course of the two days' discussion:—"That in the deliberate opinion of this meeting, all civil establishments of religion are an infringement of the rights of conscience, at variance with the spirit and opposed to the progress of Christianity: That although such establishments are indebted for their power to a union with the state, and might therefore be expected to co-operate uniformly with it, yet they too frequently employ the influence derived from this union in thwarting the government, when its measures are really calculated to promote general education, to extend the liberties, and to augment the happiness of the people: That the law which authorises bishops to sit in the Upper House of Parliament to represent the interests and wishes of their own denominations on all occasions, both ecclesiastical and political, compromises the character of the Christian ministry, is a partial and unjust preference to one class of his Majesty's subjects over all others, and a special grievance to the Dissenters, Presbyterians, and Catholics, of England, Scotland, and Ireland, who compose a large majority of the people of the United Kingdom: That since dissenters in all parts of the United Kingdom, by their voluntary efforts, erect and keep in repair their own places of worship, support their own ministers, maintain, to a great extent, their own poor, educate in Sunday schools and otherwise vast numbers of the population, extend their exertions into the British colonies, and thus contribute largely to the welfare of their fellow-subjects, this meeting considers it a heavy grievance that dissenters are compelled to support any civil establishment of religion by tithes, church-rates, or any other mode." A petition founded on the resolutions was agreed to.

Rowland Stephenson, the once wealthy London banker—whose society was sought for by nobles; whose parties were every thing that was stylish; whose dinners were to be rivalled only by Sir William Curtis in the east, or Sir George Warrender and Lord Sefton in the west; whose influence and character in the world stood high, and apparently immovable, impervious, and unimpeachable—is now the mere creature of passing charity, the object of common bounty, of mere eleemosynary aid and support. For years he has been the inmate of a debtors' jail in New York, which is described as one of the most loathsome prisons in the world, and has been fed and clothed by the hand of the stranger.

The Trades' Unions have been supporting 2000 men, women, and children, in Derby, for the last fifteen weeks, and they are now purchasing machinery for their own use, so as to set them at work on their own account. The same has been done also to some extent in Manchester, and one or two other towns.

Prince Hohenlohe has ceased to work miracles, in consequence of a singular accident. He received one day a letter entreating him to say four masses for a young lady who had her left leg four inches shorter than her right. The number four had been written in cipher; the writing was indistinct; the prince read eight in place of four, and said eight masses. His success was complete—it was even more than complete, for the left leg having grown an inch at every mass, was now four inches longer than the right. The prince was so deeply afflicted with this successful result of his prayers, that he has renounced all future attempts, and transferred his remaining stock of miraculous power to the Frau Schumann, an old woman living at Somdorf, in Saxony.—Athenaeum.

The legislative body of Frankfurt have repealed the law which limited the number of marriages between Jews at Frankfurt to thirteen a-year.

Bourrienne, author of the Memoirs of Bonaparte, died (Feb. 9) of apoplexy, in a lunatic asylum at Caen in Normandy, where he had been confined some time.

Sennefelder, the inventor of the art of lithography, died on the 26th February, at Munich, in the sixty-third year of his age.

The Manchester Guardian mentions the discovery of a murder near that town, committed by a weaver on his own infant, aged six weeks, by pouring oil of vitriol down its throat whilst lying in the cradle. The murder was discovered on the 1st of February, and the story given out was, that the child had been burned to death in the cradle during the temporary absence of the mother. Mr Ferrand, the coroner, sent a young man as his deputy, to hold the inquest, at which, it is said, the father was the only witness examined, and a verdict of "Accidentally burned to death" was returned. An old woman who had seen the body of the child hinted her suspicions, and in consequence of the rumours circulated, the body was exhumed, and examined by a medical man, who said that there was no mark of burning externally, and that the child had died in consequence of having had oil of vitriol poured down its throat. The coroner, however, refused to hold a second inquest, and the Manchester Guardian intimates that the conduct of that functionary will form a subject of investigation, and be noticed in a manner he little expects. The father of the child, when he found that a further examination was to take place, absconded.

The number of corporal punishments inflicted in the army in 1830 was 665; in 1831, 646; in 1832, 485; and in 1833, 370.

Lord John Russell has excited much indignation in the Liberal party, by his appointing the Rev. Mr Gleig, a Tory, and who has occasionally made public appearances against the Ministry, to the chaplaincy of Chelsea Hospital, worth L.300 a-year. Mr Gleig is the son of the venerable Bishop Gleig, of Stirling, and has distinguished himself by several highly popular works, both in narrative and fiction.—At the former Leeds election, the Conservatives polled about 320 fewer votes than on this, and the Whigs about 61 more.—In consequence of the change in the East India Company's affairs, the tonnage of the vessels employed in that trade has fallen from L.25 to about L.10.—The Brighton pier is now completely repaired.—It is intended to build a Catholic cathedral on a grand scale at Bath.

At an annual trade sale dinner, Feb. 21, given by Mr Murray of Albemarle Street, and attended by nearly one hundred persons, there were sold, of Lewis's West India Journal, 1000 copies; the Bubbles from the Brunnens of Nassau, 1200; complete edition of Lord Byron's Life and Works, 14,000 vols.; Domestic Cookery, 4000 copies; Mrs Somerville on the Connexion of the Physical Sciences, 1600 copies; and of various other works, in the whole, upwards of 90,000 volumes.

We have great pleasure in recording an instance of highly honourable conduct, on the part of a gentleman in this town, of a kind which is but too seldom practised. In the year 1826, Mr J. S. Stubbs, now of St Ann's Square, woollen-draper and tailor, but who was then a silk-manufacturer, became unfortunate, and received a discharge from his creditors, on paying them a dividend of 10s. in the pound. Having since happily been successful in business, Mr Stubbs has now paid his creditors the remaining amount of their debts. Yesterday, the highly respectable banking-house of Messrs Jones, Lloyd, & Co., received from Mr Stubbs on his account no less than L.1500.—Manchester Guardian, Feb. 8.

For some time past, a combination has existed amongst the workmen employed in the different gas works, for the purpose of forcing their employers to raise their wages; and a short time since they demanded that their wages should be raised to 35s. per week, with the allowance besides of two pots of porter each per day. It appears the wages they then and at present receive, are 28s. per week for a stoker, a man who attends to the fires, and one guinea per week for the labourers generally, and this they receive all the year round. The respective companies refused to accede to the demand, and the workmen, in consequence, came to the resolution of making a simultaneous strike; the whole of London would, therefore, have been thrown into a state of darkness, and the most serious results might have occurred. The workmen resolved that the strike should be made at such a time that it would be impossible for the companies to engage other men; and, in fact, some days would probably have elapsed ere men, competent to perform the duty, could be procured. In the interim, the Imperial Gas and Coke Company gained information of the plan in contemplation, and took measures to prevent the project being carried into effect. They, at considerable expense, obtained men from different parts of the country who were acquainted with the business, and, March 13, the whole of the workmen, thirty-five in number, belonging to the Imperial Gas-light and Coke Company, who had joined the union, were discharged from the company's gas-works in Maiden-lane, Battle-bridge, and the new workmen put on in their places. The unionists seemed much astonished at this decisive mode of proceeding, and quietly left the premises. It is expected that the other gas-light companies will adopt similar measures. A strong body of police were assembled at the station-house, Somers-town, to repress any tumult that might occur.

There are no fewer than 70 peers, all holding seats in the Upper House, who are between 70 and 80 years of age. Among the most aged are Lord Wodehouse, 93; Lord Lynedoch, 84; Lord Scarsdale, 83; Lord Stowell, 89; Lord St Helen's, 81; Earl of Eldon, 83; Earl Fortesque, 81; Earl of Ranfurly, 80; Lord Carrington, 82; Earl Powis, 80; Lord Middleton, 80.

Deanery of Raphoe.—The distribution of patronage by the present Ministers has always been a stumbling-block to their adherents, and, when contrasted with their professions before taking office, and the general bearing of their political lives, can only be accounted for by supposing it one of those extraordinary inconsistencies and imprudences to which the best characters are sometimes found liable. Their conduct on a recent occasion has called forth, from an able and upright Tory newspaper, the following poignant remarks, the more general circulation of which may perhaps have a salutary effect:—"The grasping spirit of the Whigs in monopolising church preferment has become so callous to shame, as to set public exposure and remonstrance at defiance. The fatherly care which Lords Grey and Brougham have taken 'to provide for their own,' in the appropriation of their official patronage, is well known. The emoluments that find their way annually into the pockets of the 'Tribe of Fortune,' as the Grey family have been denominated, amount to more money than the stipends of all the parochial clergy of Scotland collectively. The avarice of these monopolists is not limited to civil appointments; their ecclesiastical patronage, ever since their accession to office, has been almost uniformly exercised throughout the three kingdoms with an eye to their own private or party interests, notwithstanding their former professions to the contrary. In Scotland, few presentations, as far as we recollect, have been given by them, that do not bear the character of political jobs; if we look to Ireland, this species of jobbing is carried to a still more scandalous and culpable extent. As an example, we need only refer to what occurred in the House of Commons on Tuesday last in the case of Lord Plunkett, the Irish Chancellor. In 1830, a commission was appointed to inquire into the expediency of dissolving certain parish unions in Ireland. Lord Plunkett was one of the commissioners; and in 1831 they presented a report, in which they recommended that the deanery of Raphoe, at the demise of the incumbent for the time being, should be divided into six different parishes, giving a competent living to six efficient and resident clergymen. Very soon after this recommendation was issued, the deanery in question became vacant; and Lord Plunkett obtained Mr Stanley's sanction to confer it upon one of his sons; taking care not to inform the right hon. Secretary, who was then ignorant of the circumstance, that such a recommendation had been made. By this shameful manœuvre, and in the teeth of the very recommendation signed by himself, did Lord Plunkett smuggle his son into a rich benefice. Nine months have elapsed since the transaction occurred, but in spite of complaints and 'humble addresses,' the young gentleman keeps his deanery, and pockets the income of six efficient and resident clergymen! Looking at this job in contrast with that of Sir John Key, we are almost disposed to pity the civic Baronet as an ill-used and innocent man. The worthy stationer only wished to provide for one son by passing him off as two; and after, all the lad lost his salary. But the Irish Chancellor, the keeper of the King's Irish conscience, has the unconscionable appetite for place to multiply a single youth into six, who clings to his tithes and his deanery in spite of the clause introduced last year into the Irish church bill, to carry into effect these proposed divisions. It is true his son was installed before there was any law to enforce the contemplated disunion; but the very circumstance of his having recommended it, and of his being conscious that he was acting contrary to his own recommendation, ought to have made Lord Plunkett pause before consummating an appointment which must be numbered among the rankest of Whig jobs.—Edinburgh Advertiser, March 18.

THE RETREAT FROM RUSSIA.

IN the Adventures of a Member of the French Imperial Guard, just published, the author furnishes his readers with accounts of some of the terrific sufferings endured by the French army in retreating from Moscow, which cannot be perused without exciting feelings of the deepest interest. As an example of what was endured by these wretched soldiers, the following deplorable picture may be quoted:—"Daylight brought with it the same eternal sight—pine-trees, vast white plains, and extinguished fires. Twenty times, in the course of the day, we beheld swarms of prisoners wandering about in all directions, without guards. We overtook several of these bands, who allowed us to pass them without even looking at us. The heads of all were invariably either sunk on their bosoms, or so surrounded with rags and strips of uniforms, that they preserved not the least shape of human heads. I questioned many of these prisoners, but not one replied. When I turned back to look at them, I saw nothing but grim faces, hollow cheeks, features begrimed with smoke, and beards bristling with hoarfrost and icicles. Fastenings of every kind either kept on fragments of shoes, or served in their stead. The covering of these poor fellows were halves, thirds, and quarters of great-coats, trousers burnt up to the knees, and a hideous variety of white and black sheep skins, torn from the backs of the cavalry horses. There were also bits of fur, the last remnants of the plunder at Moscow; and strips of handkerchiefs of all colours, fragments of petticoats, and shreds of tarred canvass taken from the baggage trains, upon which were crowns, and eagles, and grenades, and great N's. All these spectres wandered without order through immense forests of pines, the branches of which seemed breaking under the weight of the snow. And these were the soldiers of the grand army!"

Speaking of another occasion, he proceeds:—"I again we saw fires; they were Russian bivouacs. Round the first were about a score of men thawing their frozen bodies. From the rags that covered them, we perceived that they were French. Certain of being driven away, if we approached without a load of wood, we searched the neighbourhood, and took with us the fragments of the nearest fire, which, which was uselessly lending its warmth to four corpses. A fifth individual was yet alive; he asked him to join us, but he chose to remain where he was, and die.

With our burning wood in our hands, we joined the other party. The ranks opened at our approach, but it was only to receive our fuel. Each then resumed his place, and shut us out. We protested against this breach of faith and humanity; but he might as well have talked to the winds.

"At least, give us back our firebrands," said my friend the Swiss.

Our just claims were, however, unattended to. Every man warmed himself, and made us no room. At length our expostulations became so vehement, that two soldiers told us to sit down upon the body of one of their companions, who, as they assured us, had been dead half an hour.

"Sit upon him, if you like," said his neighbour, "but he is still alive."

"Well!" exclaimed one of the two men who had first spoken to us; "let them stand, if they do choose to sit upon him. For my own part, I shall stir."

"Nor I," said every other.

In our uncertainty whether the man was alive or dead, we sat down with the greatest precaution. The body slightly moved; and whilst we were gone to fetch some water, the poor fellow expired. We then seated ourselves upon his body without scruple."

The appearance of nature in these vast solitudes is thus described:—"The cold was dry and intense. The sun appeared; but what a sun! Despoiled of his rays, he resembled a pewter dish, and threw but a light only just sufficient to make the reflection of his dim beams in the snow most trying to the sight. My eyes, already weak and bloodshot from the bivouac fires, did not cease twinkling. Notwithstanding this inconvenience, which was the least of the ills I endured, I continued to advance, and had been walking for the two last hours towards Wilna, in constant dread of meeting the Russians, when suddenly, without any perceptible transition, or being able to account for what I felt, this dread was changed into stupor at seeing nobody near me. My heart became oppressed, and I stopped. I measured these immense solitudes with my eye, and seeing them covered with dead bodies, thought myself the only living being in the world. This idea struck me with affright!"

Those Russians whom I had seen depart—the howlings I had received—the barbarity of the Jem—and the existence of my Swiss lad—all appeared to me as the dream of a distempered mind. I felt my limbs; for I doubted of every thing, even of myself. My senses were leaving me. To change the course of my thoughts, I leaned against a tree, and persevered in keeping my eyes shut for two or three minutes, fully persuaded, that, when I again opened them, I should return to reality. This precaution rested me to myself, but without dissipating my fears. I was pusillanimous as a child. I was under an implacable spell, to break which it would have been necessary for me to hear the rolling of the drum, and the cry of 'Forward!' or the report of artillery. But the din of war had ceased—all was silent as a grave, and I was alone in these vast plains of snow. What a field of mourning! I had never seen so many dead together; and yet the Russian armies had taken no share in this slaughter—the climate alone had been the destroyer.

Each trunk of a tree supported a victim. In some places four or five bodies were grouped in the most whimsical attitudes: one on all fours—another squatted upon his haunches—a third with his knees touching his chin, and his arms folded outside his legs, which were drawn close to his chest—a fourth with his arms resting upon his thighs, his head reclining, and seeming to be asleep.

But that which excited my surprise the most, was to see a gunner standing behind his piece, with his hand upon the breech of the gun, and facing Russia. The Russian army had defiled before him, and he respected him. He was in the midst of this ocean of snow, like a monument raised in commemoration of our disaster. I could not help going up to this dead soldier. I walked twice round him, looked at him with stupid astonishment, and was surprised that he did not speak to me. His looks were turned to heaven; and from the contraction of his lips, he seemed as if deprecating its vengeance."

Nothing in America is perhaps more striking than the rapid and general diffusion of information through the community by means of newspapers, the daily circulation of which is immense, and very far exceeding that of Great Britain. A daily paper only costs about 42s. per annum. I saw them every where, from the counting-rooms, as the merchants' offices are called, to the smallest stalls of the sons of Crispin; and often ved the carters reading their papers whilst waiting for a job, either in the streets, or in small newspapers purposely opened for that class opposite their stands. Advertising is proportionably cheap, as there is no duty on either materials, publication, or agents; and the facilities given to trade by this liberal policy are very great. The newspapers of the great cities are issued twice a-day; namely, at six o'clock in the morning, and three or four in the afternoon. The delivery is accomplished with great rapidity, by numbers of active messengers. At private residences, the papers are either thrust under the doors, thrown into the areas, or even left upon the step, and the newsman's knock not be immediately attended to; and during the absence of a servant, or of a family, they sometimes remain untouched for hours, in a crowded street or thoroughfare. None are so anxious not to have their own newspaper. The diurnal is, generally speaking, respectably conducted, the leading articles well written. European news is promptly reported, and is as eagerly read; but no by-pamph trash of fashionable movements, routs, dinners, finds its way into the columns of American papers, such absurdities being justly held up to ridicule.—America and the Americans.

John Nash.—There are few names connected with the history of the city (Bath) better known to fame than that of this celebrated master of fashion; and his figures are well calculated to point a moral for the people of which he was the hero. He was born in 1744, at Swansea, in Glamorganshire, and was intended for the law, but entered the army; which, taking disgust at the discipline and his subordinate rank, he forsook, and took chambers in the temple. Here he devoted himself entirely to pleasure and fashion; when King William visited the inn, he was chosen master of the pageant with which it was customary to welcome the monarch. So pleased was William with the entertainment, that he offered him the honour of knighthood; but Nash refused it, saying, "Please your Majesty, if you intend to make me a knight, I wish it may be one of your poor knights of Windsor, and then I shall have a fortune at least equal to support my title." In 1704, he was appointed master of the ceremonies at Bath, and immediately instituted a set of regulations, as remarkable for their strictness as for their judicious adaptation to the wants and society of the place. While in the plenitude of power and popularity, Nash lived in the most indolent style of elegance, supporting his expenses by a running of success at the gaming table. His dress was covered with expensive lace, and he wore a large white cocked hat. The chariot in which he rode was drawn by six grey horses, and attended by a long cascade of servants, some on horses, others on foot; while his progress through the streets was made known by a band of French horns and other instruments. His common title was the King of Bath; and his reign continued, with undiminished splendour, for more than fifteen years. His health then began to decline, and his resources grew less plentiful. As the change in his spirits and circumstances became more evident, his former acquaintances gradually forsook him, and he died at the age of eighty-eight, in comparative indigence and solitude. His character, however, was so estimated by the corporation of the city, that he was buried with great magnificence at its expense; and his epitaph, a neat tribute to his memory, was written by Dr Harrington.—Lardner's Cyclopæd.

Who, I would ask, has converted Scotland—at the expense of the institution of her parish schools, a desert of a vast hunting-field—into something like a great agricultural country, and raised up in her large and populous societies, and whitened the seas with the sails of her merchant vessels? Who, but the schoolmaster, by the infusion into her population of that vigour and energy of character, necessary for the accomplishment of these splendid results? Who can give life to the "Modern Athens," the city of palaces and of palaces, or that splendid depot of manufactures in Glasgow and its suburbs, or that vast outlay of agricultural capital which characterises every part of our country? Who can view Scotland's present evidences of wealth, and say, it may be said, have been literally hewn out of barrenness, to have been dug out of her cold and rocky soil under the malignant influences of her foggy and cheerless sky, without admiring the triumphs of the schoolmaster in the creation of that spirit which he created them all, and has thus demonstrated his mighty power in moulding a nation's destinies, in overcoming every physical opposition to the promotion of the people's greatness and a people's happiness? Who, but the schoolmaster, has preserved the arm of cotton industry from feeling the paralyzing influences of that dead-weight of pauperism, which has strangled the sinews of England's prosperity, and retarded her onward progress in improvement, and who has enabled the "Land of Cakes" to climb up to the dignity of a land of wheat.—Speech of the Rev. William Hunter, at a meeting of Schoolmasters in Dundee, February 28.

When passing," says Professor Lichtenstein, near the Riet rivergate, and while our oxen were grazing, Van Wyk, the colonist, related to us the following interesting circumstance:—"It is now (he said) more than two years since, in the very place where we stand, I ventured to take one of the most dangerous shots that ever was hazarded. My wife was sitting within the house, near the door, the children were playing about her, and I was without, near the house, busied in doing something to a waggon, when suddenly, though it was mid-day, an enormous lion appeared, came up and laid himself quietly down in the shade, upon the very threshold of the door. My wife, either frozen with fear, or aware of the danger attending any attempt to fly, remained motionless in her place, while the children took refuge in her lap. The cry they uttered attracted my attention, and I hastened towards the door; but my astonishment may well be conceived, when I found the entrance to it barred in such a way. Although the animal had not seen me, unarmed as I was, escape seemed impossible; yet I glided gently, scarcely knowing what I meant to do, to the side of the house, up to the window of my chamber, where I knew my loaded gun was standing. By a most happy chance, I had set it into the corner close by the window, so that I could reach it with my hand; for, as you may perceive, the opening is too small to admit of my having got in; and, still more fortunately, the door of the room was open, so that I could see the whole danger of the scene. The lion was beginning to move, perhaps with the intention of making a spring. There was no longer any time to think; I called softly to the mother not to be alarmed, and, invoking the name of the Lord, fired my piece. The ball passed directly over the hair of my boy's head, and lodged in the forehead of the lion, immediately above his eyes, which shot forth, as it were, sparks of fire, and stretched him on the ground, so that he never stirred more.' Indeed, we all shuddered as we listened to this relation. Never, as he himself observed, was a more daring attempt hazarded. Had he failed in his aim, mother and children were all inevitably lost; if the boy had moved, he had been struck; the least turn in the lion, and the shot had not been mortal to him. To have taken an aim at him without, was impossible; while the shadow of any one advancing in the bright sun would have betrayed him; to consummate the whole, the head of the creature was in some sort protected by the door-post."—Sir W. Jardine's Naturalist's Library, Vol. II.

Points of Law necessary to be known by the People.—There are a number of points of law, which often inflict great evil on individuals, yet against which they might easily have guarded themselves, if they had known of their existence and effects. The following are examples:—If the wife die first, and leave no children, her relations carry off one half of the surviving husband's moveable property, which the law assumes to have belonged equally to the spouses. A trader who has realised L.10,000 which is all invested in stock, finds his funds reduced to L.5000 by the death of his wife; and this law takes effect, although she had not a shilling of portion. The remedy is, to have a contract of marriage discharging the claims of the wife's relatives duly executed, or to get her to make a settlement, leaving all her property to her husband, except what she chooses to give to her relations.—Suppose that a son or daughter dies before their parents, leaving a family. The parents die afterwards without executing a settlement, and are survived by other children. The family of the predeceasing child gets no share of the moveable funds of their grandfather and grandmother, which the law bestows exclusively on the sons and daughters alive at their death. The remedy for this wrong is a settlement executed by the grandfather and grandmother.—A person buys a house, say of a builder, obtains a disposition, and pays the price, but does not take infirmity. The builder, many years afterwards, becomes bankrupt; the trustee for his creditors, finding no infirmity of the house on record, includes it in his adjudication of the bankrupt's property, and gets infirmity. He then recovers it from the purchaser, who must rank as a simple creditor on the estate, for the price. The remedy is, for the purchaser to take infirmity on the disposition when he makes the purchase, and to put it on record.—Scotsman.

Tu. March 18. Mr Divett moved in the House of Commons a resolution for the abolition of church-rates; but, on its being shown that the government had a measure to the same purpose in view, he consented to withdraw his motion.

On the motion of Sir R. Inglis, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the origin and nature of the Glasgow lottery.

On the motion of the Solicitor-General, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the present state of the law of libel.

SCOTLAND.

ECCLIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENT OF EDINBURGH. It will be recollected that two innovatory schemes were lately proposed respecting the ecclesiastical establishment of Edinburgh—one by the Town Council, to reduce the numbers of the clergy to thirteen, one for each church, in order that a new means of supporting them might be the more easily attainable—another by the clergy themselves, for retaining the full number of ministers (18), but dividing the town at the same time into as many parishes, and giving one clergyman to each. By the latter scheme, of course, five new churches would be required, while the town is unable even to provide the two which are at present deficient in the usual list of thirteen.—March 4. A paper from Dr Chalmers was presented to the Council, stating the desire of a number of gentlemen to erect a new church in the Cowgate, by subscribing L.100 each, upon which they were at no time to have more than 4 per cent., with the management and patronage for ten years; the seat-rents to be low, so as to attract persons in that mean part of the city, who have not hitherto been in the habit of going to church; and the church to be a parish-church, with 2500 of population, in the event of a new distribution of parishes. The proposal was met in Council by the following resolutions from Mr Maclaren, exhibiting the declining state of the ecclesiastical establishment of Edinburgh, and the non-necessity of new churches on such a footing:—"1. That it appears from the official returns furnished by the collector of seat-rents, that at the 20th February last, the number of unlet seats in the four churches in the New Town was 1420, and in the eight churches in the Old Town, 3364—forming a total of 4794 unlet seats, exclusive of 1000 free seats. 2. That at the 4th October 1830, the number of unlet seats in the four churches in the New Town was only 996, and in the eight churches in the Old Town 2114; being an increase of 434 unlet seats in the New Town, and of 1250 unlet seats in the Old Town, as at the 20th February last. 3. That while the number of let seats has been reduced from 10,566, exclusive of the hospital seats, as at October 1830, to 8882, as at 20th February 1834, being a reduction of nearly one-sixth part, the revenue derived from seat-rents has only been reduced from L.7512 to L.7281, or about one thirty-second part—thus demonstrating that there has been a greatly diminished demand for low-priced seats, and an increased demand for those at higher prices. 4. That since October 1824, the valued rental of the unlet seats, which was at that period L.1099, has been gradually increasing, and at 20th February last the rental of unlet seats was L.2753. 5. That of the twelve highest classes of seats, ranging from 21s. to 42s. there are 2092 let, and only 226 unlet; while of the twelve lowest classes, ranging from 1s. 6d. to 7s., there are only 1197 let, and 1517 unlet; the great majority of the low priced unlet seats being in the neighbourhood of the situation where the new church is proposed to be built. 6. That a former Town Council having come under obligations to build two new churches in the ancient royalty, while the population was decreasing, and the demands for seats rapidly diminishing, the present Town Council are of opinion, they will best discharge their duty to the public, by adhering to their resolutions of the 31st January, and, under present circumstances, declining to enter into any arrangement for increasing the number of churches." Mr Maclaren further showed, that, in the church of the parish out of which the new one was proposed to be cut, there were no more than 25 heads of families, only 9 of whom were liable to pay annuity tax, while the support of the church cost L.1603 per annum. On the question coming forward for decision, March 18, it was argued that the unlet seats were owing to the appointments of former Councils, although it appears that the decline stated by Mr Maclaren has taken place during a period when the appointments were highly popular. It was finally resolved, by the casting vote of the Lord Provost, to appoint a committee to confer with Dr Chalmers on the subject of the proposed new church.—[It is distressing to observe the blindness of public men to the facts which come before them. To suppose that a reformation of the low and abandoned class described in the first article of this paper, is to be brought about by throwing a church open to them, is the veriest infatuation. Unless their children can be trained in a different way from the present, vain will be every effort to redeem this mass of "practical heathenism." The clergy and others should have been making these exertions thirty years ago.]

Feb. 25. A farm-stead near Linlithgow, named Syke, and belonging to two industrious men named Walker, who chiefly cultivate the land with their own hands, was set fire to, and three out-houses burnt.

28. The election for the Ayr district of burghs closed, with the return of Lord James Stuart, the Whig candidate. His lordship was opposed by a young gentleman named Taylor, of independent principles, who opposed Mr Kennedy at the general election; on which occasion he came off with a very small minority. On the present occasion, he had 76 votes in Ayr to 111 of the Whig candidate; 74 in Irvine to 85; 52 in Campbelltown to 65; and 11 in Oban to 15; Lord James having all the 29 votes in Inverary, and carrying the election by a majority of 92 in all. Few of the Tories voted this election. The proceedings were unfortunately attended by some rioting, and the military was called in to protect the houses of the Whig voters.—A numerous meeting of Perthshire land-lords and tenants took place at Perth (the Earl of Kinnoul in the chair) for the purpose of forming an Agricultural Association. With the exception of two gentlemen, Mr Kinloch of Kinloch, and Mr Graham of Easthaugh, they were unanimous for the support of the advantages now enjoyed by the landed interest, but at the same time expressed their anxiety to favour the interests of other classes of the community.

March 1. Alexander Bannerman, Esq. M.P. was elected Lord Rector of the Marischal College of Aberdeen.

3. Thomas Stoddart, calico-printer, and David Morrison, apprentice calico-printer, appeared at the bar of the High Court of Justiciary, and pleaded guilty to an indictment charging them, along with a mob of disorderly and evil disposed persons, with riotously and tumultuously assembling, on the 4th February last, to the terror of the lieges and disturbance of the public peace, at the premises of Lillyburn, in the parish of Campsie, and county of Stirling, occupied by George Macfarlan and Company, calico-printers, and wickedly, violently, and feloniously forcing a passage through the outer gate, into a shop where a number of new hands were at work, and assaulting two of them, turning them out of the shop, and threatening their lives if they should return to their lawful employment as servants of the said George Macfarlan and Company. In consequence of their confession, the court took a lenient view of the case, and sentenced them to nine months' imprisonment in the jail of Stirling. Stoddart then rose, and said, "My lord, I humbly thank your lordship for this lenient sentence;" to which the Lord Justice-Clerk answered, that he found, from this, he had not put an improper interpretation on his character.

6. Dr Wardlaw's chapel, in West George Street, Glasgow, was completely filled by a meeting of the inhabitants favourable to a complete separation of church and state. Numbers were obliged to go away, being unable to obtain admittance. Seven Glasgow clergymen were on the platform. Mr James Johnstone was in the chair, and opened the business of the meeting. Dr Wardlaw spoke at length, and with much energy, on the subject of the evils which religion endured from the union of church and state, which he denounced as entirely unscriptural. Several other gentlemen then spoke in a similar sentiment, and a large number of resolutions were passed in which they were embodied. A petition, to be presented by Lord Brougham to the Lords, and by Mr Gillon to the Commons, was agreed to, and a committee formed to procure signatures to it.

—9. On the afternoon of this day (Sunday), a riot of an extraordinary nature was raised by the Irish population in the lower part of the city of Glasgow. It seems to have been premeditated, as one of the rioters, who was afterwards apprehended, had his shoes heavily loaded with iron, in order that they might serve him as weapons during the fray. A local feeling of contention, between the natives of Donegal and Monaghan, appears to have been the chief motive of the contending parties. The conflict for some time raged wide and fierce, notwithstanding the efforts of the police to put a stop to it. It was calculated that 5000 persons must have been at one time collected at the scene of the disturbance; hence either party of the combatants sustained considerable loss. Hence either party of the combatants sustained considerable loss. Hence either party of the combatants sustained considerable loss. Hence either party of the combatants sustained considerable loss. Hence either party of the combatants sustained considerable loss.

—10. A man asked about giving them all the benefit of the iron shoeing already mentioned. The words "Donegal," "Religion," and "Holy Water," were at intervals heard above the noise of the strife. After a scene of outrage, such as is rarely witnessed in this peaceful country, eleven of the rioters were secured, and were next day sentenced to various fines and terms of imprisonment, by the sitting magistrate, who expressed his great regret that they had not been brought before the Court of Justiciary.

— 15. James W. Nicol appeared before the High Court of Justiciary, and pleaded guilty to the charge of stealing a letter containing a fifty pound note from the Edinburgh Post-office, in which he had an appointment. He was sentenced to transportation for life.

A committee of the Town Council of Edinburgh, which has for some time been sitting in deliberation on the duties and salaries of officials belonging to the civic establishment, has at length brought forward its report, by which a saving of about £3,000 on the salaries will be made annually, and a simplification of the duties effected. If sanctioned by the Council, this will be the most important practical reform which has taken place among the Scottish burghs since their renovation in November last, and cannot fail to meet with the satisfaction of the constituency of Edinburgh.

At the close of February, Sir John Maxwell, M.P. for Paisley, resigned his seat, in accordance with a pledge he had given to his constituents to do so, in the event of their being dissatisfied with his parliamentary conduct. Sir John had supported the Ministers in various points, where a contrary course was desired, and hence the dissatisfaction of the constituency. An eager canvass for the burgh was immediately commenced by Mr Douglas of Barloch, an old Whig, with a strong tinge of modern Radicalism, Sir Daniel Sandford, professor of Greek in the University of Glasgow, an ultra liberal in every thing but the question of ecclesiastical establishments, and Captain Gordon, on the religious Conservative interest. To these afterwards added Mr Craufurd, a thorough-paced Radical, formerly a candidate for Glasgow. In order to prevent a common defeat, Messrs Douglas and Craufurd agreed to support each other, and to divide the whole inhabitant householders, with the understanding that he who had fewest votes should retire. The result was that Mr Craufurd had 2675 votes, being forty-five above Mr Douglas, who consequently withdrew. The nomination of the remaining candidates took place, March 19, and the poll closed on the 22d, when it was found that the votes stood as follow :—Sandford 542; Craufurd 509; Gordon 29. Sir Daniel Sandford was accordingly declared duly elected. This was considered as one of the keenest contests that have taken place since the passing of the reform bill; no fewer than 1080, out of the 1100 voters, appeared at the poll.

The schoolmasters in various presbyteries have resolved to petition Parliament for an improvement in their situations, and to have certain parts of the schoolmasters' act, passed in 1803, revised and amended. Though the passing of that act materially increased the livings of schoolmasters, yet it has been well ascertained, that considering the relative value of all the staple commodities of life, the schoolmasters in and since 1803 are not in the receipt of as much as the schoolmasters of 1696, the period of the next preceding legislative enactment in their favour. The accommodation, too, for schoolmasters, under the act 1803, is agreed on all hands to be too scanty; and, in divided parishes, their situations are most anomalous. In large or populous parishes, where two or more schools are deemed necessary, all the schoolmasters in them should be provided with school-rooms, dwelling-houses, and gardens. It is not reasonable that they should be required to teach, and yet be unprovided with a place to teach in—(this is the case with the provident school); and this, in consideration of the hard labour assuming themselves in one chaldor of oatmeal more than is done in many small parishes, is such an obvious absurdity, that we believe all intelligent and liberal-minded men are agreed that it ought to be altered, and the teachers of such parishes (the principal, or properly, the parochial schoolmasters at least) placed on a level with the teachers of parishes where only one school is thought necessary. These are the chief grounds on which the schoolmasters have resolved to petition Parliament; and from the liberal spirit of the government, the known sentiments and views of enlightened men, as well as from the reasonableness of the thing itself, it is hoped that their application will be attended with success.

Public meetings condemnatory of the corn laws were held at Glasgow on the 19th February, and at Edinburgh on the 11th March. The Glasgow petition had 59,000 signatures.

At Braehead, in the parish of Carnwath, there are two persons still living, a man and his wife; the one is 101 years of age, and the other 102; and they have been eighty years in the married state.

The bodies of advocates and writers to the signet at Edinburgh were severally applied to last year, to waive their privileges, and submit to be taxed in common with the rest of the citizens, for the support of the clergy and the poor. The former body agreed to do so, but the latter refused. The support of the clergy being now looked for elsewhere, they have lately been applied to to waive their privileges in regard to the support of the poor alone, which both bodies have refused, unless the support of the clergy be also seen to. Thus the writers to the signet this year refuse submission to the smaller of two local taxes, both of which they last year rejected, because they are not now asked to submit to both.

A petition against church patronage has been transmitted from Aberdeen, signed by eleven out of fourteen of the established clergy, a majority of the Town Council, and nearly 4000 of the inhabitants.

A petition to Parliament has been prepared in Glasgow, against goods imported through the harbour of Leith, for consumption in Glasgow, being subjected to duties higher than is necessary for the purposes of the port, and which are appropriated to the support of the municipal and ecclesiastical establishments of Edinburgh.

Some weeks ago, an old woman, residing in a house on the Castle Hill, was unspeakably surprised, on awakening from her night's rest, to find a strange animal lying at her back, with one of its paws laid over her shoulder. Screaming with fright, she left her bed, and, seizing a towel, beat the intruder with all her might, when, with one bound, it sprang to the farthest corner of the room, and at length took refuge in another bed which stood in the same apartment. When the poor woman had a little recovered from her alarm, and had dissipated the idea that it was a visitor from the melting ragas, she remembered that a collection of old boasts were at present circulating in the neighbourhood, and began to suspect that her lodger belonged to the number. She immediately went and called upon Mr Wombwell, when she discovered that one of the kangaroos had made its escape during the night, and, going up to the Castle Hill, had found this poor woman's door open, and, upon examination, finding that it might be as completely accommodated beside her as in its own den in the menagerie, betook itself to rest, which, however, was broken in upon in the morning in the manner we have mentioned. The kangaroo was returned to Mr Wombwell, who handsomely remunerated the woman for its night's lodgings.—Scotsman.

Since the commencement of the subscription, about three months since, for a house of refuge, in Glasgow, the splendid sum of £10,000 has been put down. In the meantime, the large building adjoining the police-office, formerly used as a cholera hospital, after being thoroughly cleaned out and ventilated, has been set apart for the reception of the more necessitous and interesting cases that may be brought before the magistrate in the police-office.

The Glasgow Free Press states, that an association has been formed in that city, "for the purpose of conducting funerals upon more moderate rates of charges, but with respectability in appearance, and general efficiency, equal, if not superior, to the manner in which they have been hitherto conducted. Such an association has been long and loudly called for by the great majority of our citizens, many of whom have experienced some of the evils which the present society has been instituted to remove. The most important circumstance which deserves the attention of the community, is the fact of their rate of charges being one-third less than those hitherto exacted. We have authority to state that the rules and rates of charges have received the unqualified approbation of the magistrates, and of other influential individuals."

The Town Councils of Aberdeen and Inverness have agreed to petition Parliament conjointly for some legislative enactment which may prevent clandestine and fraudulent emigration. In Aberdeen alone, clandestine emigrants have within a short time left engagements to the amount of £100,000.

It is contemplated to start a steam-coach between Perth and Aberdeen, by the mail route.

The Edinburgh petition for the separation of church and state was sent off, March 8, with 12,900 signatures. It was presented, March 17, by Mr Abercromby, who said, that, although he disapproved of its prayer, he hoped that the wishes of this and other bodies of people, petitioning for so important an object, would be taken into due consideration.

Within the last few days, two very extensive sales of land have taken place, which will probably have the effect of bringing other property immediately into the market. The estate of Durris, in Kincardineshire, which has been for several years exposed to sale, was set up at L.100,000, and brought L.110,000, and the estate or island of Harris has been also disposed of at the upset, L.60,000.

Smearing Sheep.—Mr Robert Ogilvie, who occupies extensive sheep farms in Peebleshire and in the Highlands, has laid before us the subjoined account of a lotion for salving sheep, which he has compounded as a substitute for tar and butter:—"Take," says he, "of whale oil 3 gallons, of butter or cocoa oil, half a stone or a stone, black soap 4 pounds, arsenic 1 pound, water 60 quarts. To mix these ingredients, take a large pot, and put the black soap with 3 quarts of water into it; likewise put in the arsenic; set it upon the fire, and make it boil; then add the butter and the oil; fill up the pot with water, measuring it in; then let it come to a boil; put it into a tub; then put in more water, cold, to make up the rest of the quarts. In the composition thus: take a sheep, and lay it upon its back; pour a little betwixt its legs and its breast; then set it upon its feet; next, beginning at its head, you make a shed down its back to two inches from the tail-head; likewise two sheds on each side, four inches separate. A boy serves two men; pouring it in as they make the sheds with a tin quart, and a stroup in its side: two men can salve 12 or 15 score in the day. Qualifications: 1. It is cheap and efficacious; 2. It destroys all vermin, such as ticks, cedees, &c.; 3. It prevents the scab; 4. The wool can be sold as dear as white wool, as I sold my black-faced this year at 18s. 6d. per stone. I have used this salve for four or five years, and this year have used it upon twelve or fifteen thousand sheep upon my Highland farms. The above quantity will salve about four score of sheep."

On the 1st January 1812, there was no steam-boat in Europe. In the latter end of that month (after numerous experiments in my presence), Mr Henry Bell launched the Comet on the Clyde, at Glasgow. This was the first vessel successfully propelled by steam on any river in Europe. There are now 59 steam-boats plying from Glasgow, several of them above 300 tons burthen. The Manchester, one of the packets belonging to Messrs James Martin and James and George Burns and Company, in the Liverpool trade, is the largest that has ever been at Glasgow; she is 387 tons burthen, propelled by two engines, each 110 horse power. This magnificent vessel frequently performs the voyage, a distance of 240 miles, in 22 hours.

Death of John Biddles.—This individual has long been known as the rich money-lending shoemaker of Bishopsgate Street. He died on the 4th March, leaving property considerably above a million in value. It is said, that, independently of some property which he received with his wife (whose face has seldom been in front of the house), it was by extreme frugality and attention to business, and by availing himself of the advantages of the marls, that he realised this immense sum. His person was mean in appearance, extreme, his dress that of a labouring mechanic; his small cloths, stockings, and shoes, bore the appearance of those of a charity-boy. He was a very heavy proprietor in the East India Company, and a large shareholder in the Chartered Gaslight Company, as well as in other companies. His evenings he spent at a public-house in Bishopsgate Street, where he regaled himself with a glass of rum and water, or half a pint of ale and bread and cheese, by which means the expense of both fire and candle was saved. At home, his annual expenses scarcely amounted to £50, whilst he advanced very considerable sums by way of loans to others.

ly considerable sums by way of loans to others. Her husband, John B. Jones, the oldest man in the parish, the advanced age one hundred years. She retained all her faculties to the last, and was able the day before her death to perform the duties of her own house in the usual manner. For a great many years she was wholly supported by her son, but to her feelings there was nothing more repulsive than the idea of having the last offices performed by the sexton, or any other individual; accordingly, out of her weekly allowance she contrived from time to time to scrape as much together as would pay the expenses of taking her to the "narrow house appointed all living." The way she contrived to do this, and at the same time run no risk of losing her cash, was, on having saved a penny or shilling, to take it to the wright who was to perform the duties of the service; and well do we recollect the surprise it occasioned to the worthy man on her appearing with the first installment, and telling him that it was part payment for her coffin, and she wished a respectable one. Of course it was all paid long before her death.—Fife Herald.

PARTY SPIRIT—NATIONAL EDUCATION.

ALTHOUGH the violence of parties in this country is generally regarded as an evil, it is one to which we have so long been accustomed, and which seems so essential to our condition as a nation, that very few persons, perhaps, ever seriously deplore it, or permit themselves to suppose that it may be, at any time, more or remote, diminished. It is, nevertheless, at once an absurdity and a vice of the most odious kind, inconsistent alike with the spirit of the Christian and the views of the moralist and the philosopher. "Nothing," says a late writer, "more exposes the low state of our present moral attainments, than the endless disputes and hatreds, which are the sum and substance of what we call our politics. If the time shall ever arrive when legislation shall be brief and practical, founded in benevolence and justice, purified of all personal display, freed from selfishness, party spirit, pride of caste, and sacrifice to particular interests—when it shall become an easier task, because all parties will be already removed, and laws will come to be less retrospective remedies than onward meliorations, moving abreast with human improvement—what will be thought of the political dissensions which at present degrade and retard public affairs—of the game of parties, with all its frauds and hypocrisies—the irreconcilable variety of opinion—the diversity of views—the fierceness of divisions!"

When we are to inquire into the causes of this incessant warfare, which descends with us for centuries, in which no combatant ever conquers or convinces his antagonist, we could trace it to nothing else than the want of proper training among men. Almost the whole race are still in a state of gross ignorance; the difference between the (so-called) educated and the (confessedly) uneducated, being, that the light of former glimmers through a dense horn of prejudice, while the latter have no light at all. Those amongst us who act under the habitual sway of an enlightened understanding and a benevolent heart, are a mere faction—the smallest, alas, of all! An ignorant and self-injuring selfishness is the leading motive of the most of us. In fact, the human race is as yet imperfectly moralised, and very imperfectly instructed: not one in a hundred of even the best instructed could give an intelligible account of the various powers, sentiments, and affections of the human mind; and less is one in a hundred found to form his opinions, or guide his conduct in life, by a reference to any such knowledge. Mankind are in one point of view a mere herd, from whom it is hardly fair to expect either the noble performance of good actions, or an expiation of those of a contrary character.

The only kind of government that has hitherto been found to answer in a state where the people are ignorant, is one in which the power resides in a single individual or a small class, and for which obedience is chiefly obtained either by fear or by the relation with which it is natural to contemplate the ascended privileges. In proportion as a nation becomes enlightened and moralised—for the one will never outgrow the other—power may be dispersed over larger numbers, and made much lighter in its nature. The misfortune with both Britain and France is, that the people are in a transition between darkness and light. There is enough of sense, and of the independent feeling which it engenders, to repudiate the dictum of a narrow power; but yet the masses are not sufficiently enlightened to make it certain that their will should be supreme in all things.

Hence, at the same time that the rights of men in communities are fully agreed upon, no two men, among the instructed classes, go the same length in advocating the expediency of their being put in force. Every comparatively enlightened man has a different idea of the capacity of the great mass for managing their own concerns; and from the dissensions on this point arises party spirit in all its various forms. It is also found that as one or another set of ideas happens to gain an ascendancy, a particular order of evils is experienced. Occasionally the popular spirit vainly breaks its wings on the bars of a cage, formed for it by the party disposed to take the lower view of human capabilities. At other times, power is abandoned to the multitude, and, though all looks well at first, it is soon found that the recipients were so ill-prepared for what was given to them, and so utterly abuse the gift, that a military despotism—the primitive state of things—is the only refuge. Such would unquestionably be the case, if Spain at this moment were to be placed under the control of a representative body of almost any degree of liberality. Both situations are equally to be deplored: the tyranny represses the national spirit, and abstracts, in an infinite number of ways, from the happiness of the people; the premature democracy puts back the march of real liberty for an age.

It is clear to us that nothing but the general illumination of the understandings, and correction of the dispositions of men, will ever set this point at rest. As long as any large portion of the community are ignorant and vicious, so long will tyranny in some shape exist, and so long must we be torn to pieces by party spirit. Let the majority, however, be enlightened—let the majority be just and benevolent—and freedom takes her place among us, upon an irrefragable basis. Till this shall be accomplished, all our endless squabbles about liberal and illiberal rule are simply mischievous: the spirit of the demanding class is one of mingled fret and ferocity; that of the holding class is one of contempt, anger, and fear; neither of which moods can ever tend to the improvement of our moral natures. The question of course arises—Is it possible to bring a majority of the community upon any thing like a par in respect of intelligence and morality?

There is unfortunately a disposition to raise a sneer at the very first hint of any proposal for an extensive improvement of the human race. Yet no man could deny specifically that, if any one had predicted forty years ago to what an extent the cultivation of the national mind would have proceeded before the year 1834, he would have been treated with exactly the same sneer. The deficiency, we allow, is still immense; yet it must be recollected that the early steps are the most difficult, and that all after a certain point is easy. Already there are symptoms of a self-advancement in the community—as if the machine were rolling on by its own weight. There are obvious enough difficulties in the way of a national system of education; but perhaps they might be overcome, if the effort were fairly made. The chief obstacle is unquestionably the apathy of the people to the subject. We are occupied in discussing every public proceeding of every kind; we scrutinise and cavil about every shilling that is spent by the government; we declaim for the repression or the encouragement of popular demands, and, as our prejudices (the emanations of our ignorance) incline, praise or condemn whatever is done. Thousands upon thousands are spent in purchasing the sheets which relate those events and give expression to those prejudices; and yet the whole is vain, or, worse than vain, it only prevents us from taking the measures which really could cure the evil. A sound system of education, embracing knowledge, morality, and religion, is the only remedy. And to discuss the actions of rulers and the claims of the ruled, before such a system is established, can be likened to nothing else but the error pointed out in homely phrase—the placing of the wain before the animal by which it is to be drawn.

PAROCHIAL EMIGRATION.

ENGLAND pays annually for the support of its poor upwards of six millions of pounds sterling. The rates raised to make up this sum fall so very heavily on the working community, that in most of the inland rural counties, each member of the industrious population pays from fifteen to nearly twenty shillings on an average every year as his proportion of this great public exaction. Why there are such a vast number of poor in England, and why they require such an enormous public contribution for their support, we need not inquire. The fact is as we state it—that is enough; it is sufficient for us to know that nothing, absolutely nothing, can be done to remedy the grievance, so long as the poor will do nothing for themselves. But, besides the absolute paupers, there is an enormous number of day-labourers and working people in town and country, who have very little regular employment, and are sadly off. From November till February, the labouring classes are in a state little removed from starvation. Yet the English peasantry are a noble breed of men: they have generally stout athletic forms, and possess those elements of moral dignity which are the pride of England. What a pity is it, then, such a people should require to be pitied! How melancholy is it that there is here no scope for their industry, and that, from the general want of knowledge, and the general apathy that prevails regarding their condition, they are left to flounder on in their desperate circumstances, rearing a race of healthy children only for the workhouse!

The class of persons who are so circumstanced, are apt to imagine that those who do or can give employment are alone to blame; which is a very fallacious idea. The profits of the employers are so cut down, and their chance of losses so great, that they are tortured with cankering anxieties, and cannot be said to be generally prosperous. The root of the evil lies in the immensely overcrowded state of the country; and in the large annual increase which takes place, to baffle all the ordinary means that have been devised to improve the prospects of the population. The population of this island increases at the rate of 1000 a-day; while the means of acquiring food do not increase in the same ratio. It is allowed, that, by the prevalence of cultivated moral feelings, fewer premature marriages take place than formerly; but it is now impossible to bring this check to the national aid, for the evil of ignorance is grown so monstrous by the little pains taken to disseminate the blessings of education, that it would be worse than idle to sit down with the expectation of seeing the people all at once, or even very soon, enter into deliberate plans for the subsistence of a family before they entered the state of matrimony. Here, then, the nation is in a scrape; and if it wish to uphold its character, it ought to devote itself to consider the proper means of restoring a better state of things.

In the dilemma in which the country is thus seen to be placed, we feel most anxious to render our advice, with the humble view of strengthening what much more profound writers have already advanced on the subject. It appears to us, as it has appeared to many others, that the mass of the people have no outlet for their labour, no chance whatever of bettering their condition by remaining in this country. If any good is to be done at all, it must be done by the thinning of the population. The superabundance must contrive to remove to a country inviting their arrival within its capacious and fertile territory, and offering the most ample provision to those, who, by their industrious habits, are worthy of settling upon it. We are well aware that the project of sending forth to Canada a large portion of the community, may appear harsh in its design, whereas it is one of the most beneficent plans which could be pursued. The wages of a labourer average from three to four shillings a-day in Canada, while provisions are cheaper than they are here. Canada requires a large number of labourers, as many as we can send to it; and this country possesses that quantity of spare industry and capital which is so much in demand on the other side of the Atlantic. The amount of emigration of the working and farming classes is at present considerable; but how many thousands are there, who are equally anxious to go in the same direction, who have not the means of paying their outfit or passage! The disposition to emigrate seems now to have affected an immensely large proportion of the people, and but for a little difficulty in taking the first step, and the breaking away from old associations, millions instead of thousands would soon be on the move. In the meanwhile, in order that the load of pauperism and misery may be diminished, it is highly expedient that parochial managements should bestir themselves in the great work.

Leaving those who are able to pay their passage and outfit, to find their way to Canada in the way that meets their circumstances and views, that which the parochial authorities have to do, is to direct their attention entirely to the emigration of families of labourers whom they have to support from public funds. Every endeavour ought, in the first place, to be made to remove from the minds of all persons the notion that emigration to Canada is a banishment; the idea should be cherished, that it is only a removal from a part of the British empire, where there are more workmen than work to be performed, to another, a fertile, healthful, and every way agreeable portion of the same empire, where the contrary is the case. Besides, it should be distinctly told that none but the able-bodied and industrious of both classes would be assisted to emigrate; for it is not the intention of any one in this country to transmit a host of idle paupers to America. With regard to the interference of the legislature to promote the measure of parochial emigration, that is exceedingly doubtful policy. The parishes which are embarrassed must assist themselves; and, in doing so, they cannot follow a safer example than that already given by a committee of the inhabitants of the parish of Petworth, in the south of England, who have been exceedingly successful in their humane scheme of emigration, chiefly through the liberal assistance of the Earl of Egremont. This committee, which was formed in 1832, was aware that the plan adopted by some parishes of sending out labouring emigrants to Quebec, putting a few pounds in their pockets, and then casting them adrift, without having made any previous arrangements, either for locating them or for providing work, was liable to great objections. Being anxious that the emigrants should run no risk of falling into miserable circumstances on their arrival in America, the committee engaged a person to take charge of their party, and accompany them to York in Upper Canada; at no great distance from which, work was and is to be procured. They then engaged the vessel Lord Melville, 425 tons register, to take the emigrants on board at Portsmouth; but such was now the number of persons that wished to avail themselves of their arrangements, that they engaged another vessel, the Eveline; and, also, another superintendent. By the favour of Lord Goderich, the then Colonial Secretary, the superintendent of each ship was provided with letters to the governors of the respective provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, strongly recommending those under his charge to their care and protection.

On the arrival of these emigrants at York, very great attention was paid them by the governor. Some were sent through the Welland Canal to Kettle Creek, and from thence conducted to the new settlement of Adelaide, in the London District, and placed under the management of Colonel Mount; others were forwarded to the neighbourhood of Galt, and the township of Waterloo; and some were employed on the government works. Favourable reports having come home from these emigrants, a wish on the part of many others was expressed, to imitate their example; and, accordingly, another vessel, the England, was freighted, and sailed from Portsmouth under similar arrangements as the two former. The number of persons who emigrated under these various arrangements, were as follows:—Above 14 years of age, 329 males and 154 females; under 14 years of age, 172 males, females 135; the England carried 164 passengers not classified, and these, with six infants, made up a total of 730 passages. Among the females above 14 years of age, were one widow, and fourteen single women, not belonging to any of the families on board. The greater part of the males above that age were agricultural labourers, the remainder chiefly artisans of different professions. From the care taken by the committee, the fitting out with provisions was well regulated; but for the details we must refer to the pamphlet which furnishes us with the information on the subject.* The scale of outfit was liberal, yet, with the cost of passage, amounted only to L.10 each adult person; other parishes have paid L.15 for outfit and passage; and we think that L.12 may be reckoned a fair sum for this purpose. Although this be apparently a large sum for a parish to pay out for the emigration of a single individual, it would soon be felt to be an immense saving. A single man in the poor-house costs 3s. 6d. per week, or L.9, 2s. a-year; if employed on the highways, at 5s. per week only, and deducting a month for harvest, he will cost L.12. Several such have emigrated to Upper Canada, and the cost has been for each L.15—a sum only exceeding by one-fourth the cost at home for one year. It is hence obviously the interest of the landholders, and others liable in poor's rates, to come promptly forward to assist the unfortunate individuals who remain a burden upon them. In the case of Petworth, Lord Egremont, who possesses the whole or a very large proportion of the land, paid the whole expense of the passages; and the outfits of clothing, provisions, &c. were supplied in the nature of an advance of relief from the poor's rate. So successful has this philanthropic scheme of parochial emigration been, such have been the benefits to the emigrants themselves, by their removal from a condition of misery to one of comfort and comparative independence, that we earnestly hope the example may be followed in other quarters. Visionary topics often agitate men's minds; here is one brought under their notice, pregnant, as every man must see, with substantial good.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

THE associations suppression bill, by which so valuable a part of the popular rights is taken away, passed the Chamber of Deputies on the 25th of March, by a majority of 246 to 154. While it was in its progress through the Chamber of Peers, the Chamber of Deputies, notwithstanding the eager exertions of the Ministry, refused the grant of twenty-five millions of francs (about a million sterling), which the Ministry had pledged itself to, as an indemnity to the United States for damage inflicted during the last war by the French upon American merchant vessels. The consequence of this refusal was the resignation of the Duke de Broglie, and of the former foreign Minister Sebastiani, who was a member of the cabinet with no especial duties. These resignations led to an almost complete re-organization of the Ministry. The Count de Rigny, the Minister of Marine and Colonies, succeeds the Duke de Broglie at the Foreign Office; Admiral Roussin, at present ambassador at Constantinople, is to supply the place of De Rigny; Barthe, the Chancellor, is made President of the Chamber of Accounts (Barbe Marbois, the late President, having been unceremoniously cashiered); Persil, the Advocate-General, so noted for his prosecutions of the press, takes the seals; Thiers is appointed to the Interior, in the room of Count d'Argout, who succeeds the Duke de Gaete as Governor of the Bank of France; M. Duchatel is the new Minister of Commerce; and, lastly, M. Martin, a mild and equitable person, takes the place of Persil. The Ministers who have not changed places are Soult, the President of the Council and Minister of War; Humann, the Finance Minister; and Guizot, who retains the office of Public Instruction. The composition of the new cabinet showed that the king was determined to hold by the juste milieu policy, if it can be called so, which he has adopted.

The editor of the Gazette de France was tried, March 29, for a seditious libel, contained in an account of the interview between the deputation of the French Legitimists and the Duc de Bordeaux, who was plainly styled Henry V.; there were also some observations respecting the legality of paying taxes to the present dynasty. A defence was made, in which Carlist principles were avowed; and the jury acquitted the defendant, who thus escaped the vengeance of the government. While Carlistism found this degree of popular favour, Republicanism met with a different fate. M. Lionne, the editor of the Tribune, was convicted of publishing a libellous article in his paper, on the subject of associations, and condemned to the extraordinary punishment of five years' imprisonment, and a fine equal to L.1000 sterling in money. Supposing the juries to be fairly chosen, and the libels equal in amount of criminality, these various verdicts afford ample proof of the tendency of public opinion in France at the present moment.

The associations suppression bill passed the Chamber of Peers, on the 9th April, without amendment; and on the same day, an insurrection broke out in Lyons, the second city of France. For some time past, the silk-weavers of Lyons had been at variance with their employers, and a strike had taken place, to which the emissaries of the republican associations of Paris had endeavoured, but with little success, to give a political character. The strike, like most other strikes, lasted for a certain period, and terminated; and the operatives returned to work at the old prices. Several individuals, apprehended for their concern in the disturbances occasioned by this strike, were to be brought forward for sentence on the 9th. To prevent this taking effect, the populace—or at least a certain portion of them—asssembled in masses on the streets, erected barricades. These were attacked by the military, of whom upwards of 30,000 appear to have quartered in Lyons and the neighbourhood, were obstinately defended by the insurgents, and, day, the rioters abandoned the offensive, and took refuge in some of the narrowest streets, which were closed with barricades, lining the windows with shot and shrapnel. The houses in Lyons are built of stone, and are very high; the streets are narrow and crooked, and, of course, they afford very formidable means of defence to armed men. They could not be attacked by infantry without great loss; and to employ artillery against them, would have been to bring destruction upon the innocent as well as the guilty. General Aimé, therefore, adopted the plan of drawing a cordon round the closely-built portion of the town where the insurgents had entrenched themselves. The fighting continued for five days; and at one time Aimé was hard pressed, that it was feared he would be driven out of the city. It was not till Monday, the 11th, that the insurrection was brought to a close, and the city restored to quiet. Owing to the employment of cannon, the city is said to have been left in a state of partial ruin. The number of killed and wounded on both sides is variously estimated; but is probably at least five thousand, of whom a large proportion were government troops. The mode of attack necessarily subjected the military to terrible loss. The insurgents fired from behind barricades, and from churches and houses, upon the soldiers, who advanced without shelter. The whole number of workmen engaged is supposed to have been between seven and eight thousand. They were almost all members of republican associations; and they proclaimed a republic in the squares in their possession. The inhabitants generally took no part with the insurgents, and rendered no assistance to the military. The reason why the struggle was protracted so long, was the unwillingness of the general to incur a great loss of men by venturing into the narrow streets. He contented himself with taking possession of the open squares, and attacking the insurgents only where he could engage them to advantage.

At St Etienne, some disturbances of a serious kind occurred on the 10th and 11th, of the same nature as those at Lyons, but they were suppressed without much difficulty. At Dijon, Chalons, Grenoble, Trévise, and Auxerre, there were also certain demonstrations of the same kind on the part of the insurgents.

While these events were occurring in the provinces, Paris itself was the scene of a rising, petty indeed, but which was not suppressed without much bloodshed. The government had ascertained that a number of desperate men, calling themselves Republicans, had resolved upon an émeute; and on Sunday the 13th, large bodies of troops were seen traversing the streets in all directions. Several regiments were reviewed by the king in the Place of the Tuileries, and a risk of artillery remained there all the day. About the evening, a person in the uniform of the national guard was arrested, and so brutally treated by the police, that the people attempted a rescue. A scuffle ensued, and crowds collected. A barricade was reared in one of the streets; and soon after, attempts were made to erect others in several narrow streets. The military attempted to remove them, and some were fired at the soldiers from behind. The original barricade was left standing, and was soon afterwards abandoned by the rioters, who, to the number of between two and three hundred, withdrew to the cent houses, from which they fired upon the soldiers during a great part of the night. When daylight came, they were dislodged by the troops; at the moment of one division of whom the Dukes of Orleans and Nemours appeared. A shot was fired and a stone thrown from one house at these princes. The house was immediately entered by the military, and all the inmates who had arms were put to death. It is stated that the soldiers of the line very generally, and in some instances the national guard, behaved with extreme cruelty, and that many peaceable persons, into whose houses the rioters had forced themselves, were ruthlessly put to death. On Monday at noon every thing was quiet. During these disturbances, the printing-house of the Tribune newspaper was seized and imprisoned; the printing-house shut up, and the editor driven into hiding; whence, in a letter published in the National, he informed his readers of the suppression of his paper. No one pretends that this proceeding is not utterly illegal. It is said that no fewer than a hundred arrests have taken place in Paris; and probably before this sheet reaches the public, the vengeance of the government will have descended upon some of those taken into custody.

[The events above described make it manifest that the republican and ultra-liberal party in France has no immediate chance of triumph. In Lyons, at least, the whole strength of the party appears to have been put into action, and been signally beaten. The middle ranks seem to look on their attempts either with indifference, or with a more fatal repugnance, disposing them to fly to the opposite extreme. Narrow as is the constitution of the Chamber of Deputies, it is not so narrow as it was four years ago.]

it overthrew the government of Charles X.; and we must suppose that it is a more or less faithful representation of the popular voice. If, then, it states an executive allowed to be much more severe than the sway of the Bourbons, and sanctions measures that confessedly destroy the popular liberties, are inevitably led to the conclusion that it does so use the public are at present under greater apprehensions from the extreme of liberalism than from extreme of despotism. Such strange national contradictions are much to be lamented; but there is no reason to expect them to cease, so long as the same pointed out in the leading article of this paper continue to operate.]

BELGIUM.

It is said that, in anticipation of the dissolution of a friendly amity between the governments of England and France, the King of the Netherlands has been forcing his army on the frontier of Belgium to the amount of 10,000 men, with whose assistance he hopes to gain his lost dominions. How far this may have led in stirring up the anger of the Belgians, is any where stated. It appears, however, that the King of the Orange dynasty has experienced no success in that country. It broke out, on Sunday the 15th April, in a very violent tumult at Brussels. It seems that when the Prince of Orange fled from Brussels in 1830, he left behind four horses, which the present government lately ordered to be sold. They were purchased for the prince by some of his friends, and sent to the Hague. A subscription was opened, in order to indemnify the purchaser, among the supporters of the dethroned family. Every Orangeman was invited to subscribe; and at length L.370 was raised, out of the sum required, which amounted to between L.500 and L.600. The contributions, varying in amount from L.20 to 1s. 8d., were published with the names of the contributors in an Orange journal, the Lynx. All this irritated the multitude beyond measure. Some inflammatory libels were posted about the city; and on the morning of the day above stated, the houses of the principal subscribers were entered by an infuriated mob, and completely gutted. The most costly furniture was utterly demolished; but the few who attempted to steal or appropriate any part of it met with instant chastisement at the hands of the rioters themselves, whose aim was plunder, but the gratification of political hatred. The municipal authorities and the civic guard refused to move one step to preserve the property of the odious Orangemen. No effort was made by the garrison to prevent the destruction of property, though acts of personal violence and thieving were not permitted. Robert Adair, the British ambassador, beheld the demolition of the Prince de Ligne's residence from his balcony, which is opposite to it, and then went to the Minister of War's office, where a council was sitting. He said that he should consider the government responsible for the safety of British property. Positive orders were at length given by this council to put a stop to the riots as soon as possible, without firing on the people, which, considering the weakness of the garrison, would have been little short of madness. The tumult continued till late on Sunday night. Sixteen houses were devastated, but their owners walked about the streets next day in safety. Considerable reinforcements of troops arrived in the course of Sunday night, and occupied the principal squares. The rioters seemed, however, to have been quite satisfied with their performances, and made no attempt to renew them. During the day, there were repeated expressions of attachment to King Leopold on the part of the most of the insurgents. The blame of having permitted the devastation to proceed so far, rests principally upon M. Rouppe, the chief magistrate of the city. Leopold appears not to have had the power of stopping the tumult, of which he was necessarily an almost passive spectator the greater part of the day. The carriage-manufacture of Mr Jones, an Englishman, the printing-office of the Lynx, an Orange club-house, and an inn, were among the buildings attacked; the remainder were private residences of English noblemen and gentry. About a hundred of the rioters were taken into custody; and several others connected with the Lynx and other journals were subsequently ordered to leave the country.—The British found it prudent to dismiss some of his English domestics, who had been the subject of a popular clamour.

SPAIN.

At the beginning of April, a change took place in the Spanish Ministry. Burgos and Zarco del Valle have been removed, to make room for the Count of Toreno, and General Llander, the governor of Catalonia. M. Riera succeeds M. Imaz as Finance Minister. These changes, it is supposed, will strengthen the Liberals materially.—The Spanish government has not yet succeeded in negotiating a loan. The British capitalists have resolved to listen to no proposals till the Cortes shall have been recognised. The queen has issued a decree for suspending the provision for all prebends, canonries, and ecclesiastical benefices which are not immediately connected with the cure of souls; she proceeds to go to the extinction of the public debt. At the same time, by way of obviating as far as possible the opposition of the clergy, the decree reserves the power of disposing of individual benefices for the purpose of rewarding such eminent services as may be rendered either to the church or to the state. There is little authentic intelligence respecting the movements of the Carlists in the north of Spain. The cruelties practised by the queen's troops upon these insurgents in the hour of victory, have been to some extent retaliated by a body of Carlists, who entered Vittoria on the 15th March, and put to death 196 prisoners, in cold blood.

PORTUGAL.

THE new British ambassador, Lord Howard de Walden, has been presented to Queen Donna Maria. An attempt was made by his lordship and Admiral Parker, on the 31st March, to induce Don Miguel to leave Portugal, upon the following terms:—He was to be allowed a safe conduct out of the country, and a liberal income, guaranteed by England (why guaranteed by England does not appear); an amnesty was to be granted to all his followers; and his own right of succession to the throne recognised in default of the issue of the queen. These terms Miguel rejected. Meanwhile, his enemies are encompassing him on every side; one of his principal officers has deserted; his private property has been confiscated; and, to add to his difficulties, a Spanish force of two thousand men has entered Chaves in pursuit of some of the adherents of Don Carlos. Don Pedro, who had been ill, is recovered, and has gone from Lisbon to his army at Santarem.

TURKEY.

THE sultan has replied to Lord Ponsonby's interrogations respecting his famous treaty with Russia, in the most firm and haughty tone. He has made up his mind to keep his engagements with the czar, in spite of the hatred which his subjects bear to the Russian alliance. The Times correspondent at the Porte says—"The Russian fleet, with 25,000 men on board, is waiting at Sebastopol for sailing orders; considerable bodies of troops are advancing in the direction of the Danube; and by a late ukase, the 60,000 men raised in Moldavia and Wallachia have, though Turkish subjects, been incorporated in the Russian army."

UNITED STATES.

THE commercial distresses of the United States, consequent upon the removal of the public money from the bank, have reached a crisis, and seem now chiefly past. It is said that the houses which failed were in general those of an insecure and speculating character; while Allen and Co., almost the only house of a different kind which gave way, proves to have assets much beyond the amount of its engagements. Ninety-six banks in all have failed—namely, in Maine, 7; Massachusetts, 3; Rhode Island, 2; Connecticut, 2; New York, 10; New Jersey, 9; Pennsylvania, 18; Delaware, 2; Maryland, 6; Columbia, 3; Virginia, 2; North Carolina, 2; Ohio, 19; Kentucky, 2; Tennessee, 4; Alabama, 2; Michigan, 3.

To meet in part the want of specie, a million and a half has been shipped off from Britain.

The house of representatives support the President in his determination to suppress the United States' Bank, while the senate almost to a man oppose him. At an interview which a deputation of merchants of the latter way of thinking lately had with the President, he stated, "1. That application for relief must be made to the Bank of the United States, and not to him; that whatever distress existed in the community (and he believed there was some distress) had been caused by the bank, which was hoarding its specie, and curtailing its discounts, in order to crush the state banks, and compel the government to abandon its policy. 2. That the present directors of the bank had violated its charter, by giving to the President the whole power of the bank—a power to use its funds without voucher or receipt; that such a power in the hands of one man was dangerous to the liberties of the country, and had been used to destroy the elective franchise; that for these reasons he regarded the bank as a monster of corruption, which he was determined to put down. 3. That sooner than consent to restore the deposits or re-charter the bank, he would undergo the tortures of ten Spanish inquisitions; that sooner than live in a country where such a power prevailed, he would seek an asylum in the wilds of Arabia."

The President seems resolved to introduce a monetary system as nearly resembling the English as possible, in respect of the prevalence of a metal currency. He wishes to have no notes for sums under between four and five pounds, though he does not propose to make the alteration all at once.

With regard to the removal of the deposits, to which the distress has been traced, a New York paper says—"The truth of the matter is this—that the commercial distress, or rather the distress of the dealers in shares and stocks in the United States, who, after all, have been the principal sufferers, originated in the excessive paper issues of the bank in 1831 and 1832, in the consequent overtrading and speculations in the stocks of the various states, and in the shares of banks, railroads, and canals. The crisis has been brought about by the subsequent contraction of paper issues, and of discount and accommodation, to which the United States' Bank and the other banks have been compelled to resort, in order to right themselves, without regard to the sufferings of the community. The mere act of removing the government balances from the custody of the Bank of the United States to that of the state banks, although productive of inconvenience to the customers of the former, could not occasion any public or general distress. The case was simply this—the power of discounting was taken away to a certain extent from the Bank of the United States, but an increased power to accommodate was thereby given to the same extent to the other banks to which these deposits were transferred."

LOWER CANADA.

THIS state has been thrown into a state of high ferment, in consequence of the unpopularity of the legislative council (a body equivalent to a House of Peers), which the home government has refused to alter according to the wishes of the colonists. On the 15th February, the legislative assembly proposed seventy resolutions, in which the proceedings of Lord Aylmer, the governor, and the dispatches of Mr Stanley, were condemned in the warmest language. The extracts from those dispatches, which had been laid before the house, were termed "insulting and inconsiderate, to such a degree that no legally-constituted body, although its functions were infinitely subordinate to those of legislation, could or ought to tolerate them." Subsequently, nine articles of impeachment against Lord Aylmer were added to the above seventy; and a vote to moderate their fervour was negatived, by 52 to 19. When the last accounts left Quebec, twenty-three of the resolutions had been adopted, in a committee of the whole.—[For further information on this subject, see the Parliamentary intelligence.]

IRELAND.

AT the Limerick assizes, April 3, Mr Robert Cole Maxwell, a gentleman of good family, was sentenced to death for shooting at his cousin, Mr Robert Lowe Holmes, with intent to kill him. The two cousins had quarrelled respecting their right to the possession of a farm, which had been forcibly taken possession of alternately by one and the other. On the 31st of July last, Mr Holmes was in possession of the farm, and the prisoner went with a party to drive him out. He knelt down, took deliberate aim, and fired at his rival, who was wounded, but not mortally. The sentence was subsequently commuted by the royal clemency (on the recommendation of the grand jury) to eighteen months' imprisonment.

Mr O'Connell, in a long and lugubrious letter addressed to the people of Ireland, dated April 3, complains of their apathy in petitioning for the repeal of the Union. He demanded a million of signatures, and has only got 80,000. This, he says, will insure the defeat of his motion by a majority of about 450 to 40. The prevalence of the cholera, which has withdrawn the attention of the Irish from politics, and his own incapacity as a leader to grapple with so vast a question, he reckons among the principal obstacles to success, and describes the phalanx composed of men of all parties, who will certainly vote against him. But he trusts that next year he shall have two millions of signatures, and hopes the repealers will keep up their spirits. He promises immediately to set about the organisation of the electors, which shall be so complete as to insure the return of repealers at next election through all parts of Ireland, except Ulster. It is curious that, while he attributes the paucity of petitions, in part, to the terror of the coercion bill, he mentions Kilkenny, where the bill is in operation, as one of the counties which has been most alive on the subject.

Four baronies in King's County have been placed under the coercion act.

Sir Jonah Barrington has recently died in Paris, at an advanced age.

PARLIAMENT.

1. EDUCATION.

Apr. 16. Lord BROUGHAM moved in the House of Lords for certain returns connected with the progress of education; a subject of considerable interest to the morals of the people. Many persons had urged him to bring in a bill to provide for the general education of the people of this country, upon the principle of the "parish school bill" in Scotland. He had hesitated to do so, because, although it had worked most beneficially for the people of Scotland, such a measure might not be equally applicable to this country. At the time that bill passed, there were no schools in Scotland; and therefore it was a good plan to establish, that, by particular funds, a school with a small garden should be provided in every parish. To plant similar schools in this country, a rate for their maintenance would be necessary. If in England they said, "Let there be a school in every parish," they would thereby put an end to the present means of education derived from voluntary contribution. On principle he refused to adopt the compulsory system, in which he considered that there was very great risk; still it appeared to him that there was a much greater risk in doing nothing at all to remove the lamentable want of education which prevailed. During the ten years between 1818 and 1828, when the test and corporation acts were removed, a great increase had taken place in the amount of education. He had addressed a circular to the clergymen of about 500 parishes, in various parts of the kingdom, with a view to ascertain the amount of that increase, and he found that the number of schools in those parishes had been doubled, and the number of scholars more than doubled. Government MAY, 1834.

might do much good by aiding, by the grant of small sums of money, those who were willing to assist in the formation of schools by voluntary subscription. This plan had been tried, and found eminently successful. Never was L.20,000 better laid out, than when voted by Parliament for that purpose; and the Parliament had voted another L.20,000 still further to promote the same object. There was, however, in the system of education a deficiency greatly to be lamented. There was a serious lack of really useful education. This was especially owing to the deficiency of cheap seminaries, where those who meant to be schoolmasters might themselves be properly instructed. This was a defect for which the Parliament would no doubt take care to provide, and would add to the L.20,000 already voted L.20,000 more, towards the establishment of seminaries, or normal schools, for the education of those who would afterwards be called to preside over inferior schools themselves. He had great hopes that this session would not be suffered to pass by the legislature without some attempt being made to take up these points in an enlightened spirit. His lordship then adverted to the funds already applicable to the purposes of education and to other purposes, but which had, in many instances, been grossly misappropriated. The charitable funds connected with the counties of York, Cumberland, and twelve or thirteen others, whose population exceeded 7,000,000 (half the population of England and Wales), amounted to L.428,000. This would give, for the whole country, between L.800,000 and L.900,000 a year—a magnificent sum to be applied to charitable purposes. But he was convinced that if those bequests were justly and fairly managed, they would amount to L.1,500,000 annually. It was not every one who founded a school or an hospital that ought to be called charitable. There were no greater nuisances in this country than some of those institutions which were mis-called charities. If those at the head of such institutions should persevere in their dogged resistance to all improvement; if they did not apply in a better manner the funds which had come into their hands, he should call on Parliament to look to those estates as placed peculiarly under their care, and to see that the trust was more beneficially executed than it had been.—An alteration then took place between the learned lord and Lord Wynford, respecting the exertions of the dissenters and those of the church in favour of education.—Lord BROUGHAM contended that the former had the credit of first acting upon the Bell and Lancaster plan—of establishing the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and the Penny Magazine—and of contributing largely, in proportion to their funds, towards every scheme for the cultivation of the minds of the people. He allowed, however, much merit to the church for boldly following where the dissenters had led, without any fear of being sneered at as imitators.

2. CHANGE IN THE POOR-LAWS.

Apr. 17. Lord ALTHORP introduced the government plan for the improvement of the poor-laws. The principal change proposed was the abolition of the allowance-system, established in 1796, from which much of the evils now attributed to the poor-laws had flowed. The allowance-system, Lord Althorp said, had been well intended, but it had proved a curse instead of a blessing. His lordship then proceeded to detail the principal features of the plan. He proposed to establish a central board, in which large discretionary powers should be vested. The act would appoint a certain day in the middle of summer 1835, when the people were in full employment, for the cessation of the allowance-system. The only difference to the labourer would be, that his employers would pay him for his labour themselves, instead of out of the parish funds. An immense advantage would be obtained by the establishment of an uniform system throughout the country. He therefore proposed that the commissioners should have power to make general rules as to the mode of relief and the regulation of workhouses. These were great discretionary powers, but he should propose, as a check against abuse, that any regulation so proposed by the commissioners should be submitted to the Secretary of State, and remain forty days before brought into action; and during that period it should be competent for an order in council to prevent it from being carried into effect. The central commissioners would also have power to form unions of parishes in order to make larger districts, to arrange classifications of poor in the same or different workhouses, and also have a general power of control in such unions as might be established without their consent, and to dissolve unions which might now exist. Each parish in the proposed unions must maintain its own poor, or contribute to the general fund the proportion of expense which it had heretofore borne itself. He did not mean that it was not intended to empower individual parishes, if they so thought fit—that was to say, if the vestries in each parish should agree to make a different arrangement; but it was desirable that parishes should have power to unite for the purposes of parochial settlements, and for the poor-rates altogether. The central board would also have authority to suggest to parishes or unions the propriety of building new workhouses, or of making additions to those already erected. He should propose that the owners as well as the occupiers of land should have votes in the parochial vestry, with respect to raising permanent sums of money, for facilitating emigration, building workhouses, or other similar purposes. This was only equitable, because a temporary occupier might have very little interest in such permanent expenditure. He should propose that justices should not in future have the power of ordering parochial relief to persons in their own houses. This would be a restoration of the law to the state in which it was previous to 1796, a period since which its abuses had very considerably increased. There remained two subjects to which he wished to call attention. The first was the existing law of settlement. The present law was most complicated, involving great litigation, and consequent expense. A still worse effect arose from its interference with the free circulation of labour. The worst portion of the law was that which gave a settlement by hiring and servitude; but he was convinced that every mode of acquiring settlement ought to be abolished, except those acquired by birth or marriage. Every person should follow the settlement of his parents till he was 16 years of age, and then he should have recourse to his own, which would be the place of his birth. The other alteration he proposed was with respect to the present law of removal and the appeal therefrom. He would provide that no order of removal should take effect until a copy of that order, and of the examination which had led to it, should have been served upon the authorities of the parish to which the removal was contemplated; and that every notice of appeal should set forth the precise grounds upon which it was to be sustained, and that on the trial of each appeal, before the quarter-sessions, nothing should be discussed, and no points raised beyond those stated in the notice so given. This would prevent, in a considerable degree, the present enormous amount of litigation. The present law relating to bastardy was a direct encouragement to vice and immorality, and the effect of imprisoning the reputed fathers was to demoralise and corrupt them. If a woman chose to swear an illegitimate child, the party whom she charged as the father was ipse facto liable to be committed to prison until he could find security for the support of the child. It was almost impossible for an agricultural labourer to find such security, and the effect was, the committal of the individual to prison for five or six months, there to be associated with the very worst of characters. He would take away such power of imprisonment, and make the mother liable for the support of her child, in the manner and mode of a pauper widow. He was aware that the proposition he had submitted would be opposed by the pretended friends of the labouring poor; but he would fearlessly assert that it was designed principally for the benefit of that portion of the population. He confidently anticipated that it would restore the British labourer to the independence for which he was once proverbial, and would raise him from the condition of a pauperised slave. The labourer should be remunerated for his industry, and not according to the number of his children. At present no difference existed between the good and the bad; both were in the same situation as to remuneration. Poverty ought not to be visited as a crime, but it was impossible to prevent it as a misfortune. Every attempt which had been as yet made to remove that misfortune, had had the effect of extending it to almost every class of the community.—The plan having met with general approval in the house, leave was given to bring in the proposed bill.

3. COMMUTATION OF TITHES (ENGLAND).

Apr. 15. The Ministerial plan for the commutation of tithes was introduced by Lord ALTHORP, and its leading features were as follow:—"That tithes should bear a certain proportion to the rent of the land, and that they should be paid by the owners, and not the occupiers. Valuers to be appointed in each county to ascertain the value as well of arable as of grass land in the different parishes. It would be their duty," said Lord Althorp, "to ascertain the payments made during the last five years on account of tithes. This account would be laid before the court of quarter-sessions, and an average proportion would be struck, which would be the tithe-rate for that county or district, so that in each parish the tithe would bear a proportion to that of the whole county. It was necessary that hops should be looked upon as arable land, and that they should pay ten shillings an acre in addition to the tithe. It was not intended that the question of valuation should be left to the discretion of the valuers, or that their decision should be final. There should be a reference to a barrister in the shape of an appeal, if necessary. Wherever a modus existed, it was to be considered as not existing, as it would be deducted from the valuation of the tithe. He should further propose an easy mode for the redemption of tithes. He would give to the tithe-payer a right to call upon the tithe-receiver to take a number of years' valuation of his tithe as a commutation for the whole. He took twenty-five years' purchase, as it would enable the tithe-receiver to receive just the same amount that he did at present, as the money could be invested in the four per cents., and for this purpose could be paid to clerical commissioners—the bishop in each diocese forming the commission. If the tithe-payer were unable to raise the redemption money, he should be enabled to raise it by a mortgage on the land at four per cent., payable in a corn rent, and only redeemable at the option of the borrower."—After some remarks from various members, Lord Althorp was induced to propose resolutions somewhat different.—A bill founded on these was introduced on the 16th, and read a first time; the second reading to be on May 15.

4. THE CANADAS.

Mar. 15. Mr ROEBUCK, in moving "that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the political condition of the Canadas," said, that his excuse for pressing forward his motion at the present time was the critical and extraordinary position of the colonies to which the motion related. The provinces were at that moment in a state nearly approaching to open revolt; Lower Canada particularly, as far as words could go, was actually in a state of revolution, the house of assembly, their house of commons, having formally seceded from all communication with the executive, and also having expressly declared their intention to impeach their present governor, Lord Aylmer. The present disturbed state of these countries was the result of a long series of continuous bad government, and the actual outbreaking of the people at the present moment sprang immediately from the extremely rash and petulant behaviour of the present Secretary for the Colonies, who, unfortunately for this country, after having successfully fanned Ireland into a flame, had employed the same qualities, to the same end, in our transatlantic possessions. The hon. member explained the constitution and form of government of the Canadas—consisting of the governor, the legislative council, and the house of assembly; which two powers were a faint imitation of the form of government existing in England. The governor, however, was a person sent from England, removable on the will of the king—a sovereign in Canada, but then immediate servant of the government here. The members of the legislative council were appointed by the king for life. They were usually old official persons, appointed as a reward for services. The house of assembly did really represent the people—at least in Lower Canada. The executive of the Canadas consisted of the governor and an executive council. The composition of these two councils was one of the grand causes of the bad government that had so long tormented these provinces. Though two in name, they were, in fact, but one body; the persons composing the executive council forming a majority of the legislature. The governors sent from England were exceedingly ignorant of the business they were about to undertake; and the executive council formed a special society, and surrounded the governor, so that no one, not of their party, could reach him; and in fact, governed the country, disposing of all its peace of profit and distinction, and insulting the people. If at any time the governor, or even the home government, gave them any offence, they rebelled, and treated with scorn and contumely the commands sent from England. When it was considered that the people over whom this petty and vulgar oligarchy governed, were in habits of daily and hourly intercourse with the republicans of the United States, it was not to be wondered that they bore with impatience the intolerance, ignorance, and incapacity of the nest of vetch officials who domineered over them. They were accustomed to behold, across the frontier, a great people self-governed—governed by thoroughly democratic institutions; and what was the result? A state of unexampled prosperity—quiet, rapid, and unceasing improvement; laws and institutions that continued, in their action, regular as a piece of physical machinery. They saw cheap government, and yet perfect protection—they saw the governing body performing the true functions of a government—not contented with protecting, to its uttermost, property, persons, and reputation to all citizens, but assisting in all these great undertakings which were best forwarded by the combined efforts of a whole people. Mr Roebuck described the squabbles which had taken place between the people and their representatives on the one hand, and the official class upon the other, respecting the disposal of the public money. The house of assembly had been so much exasperated by the tone of Mr Stanley's dispatches, as to order them to be ejected from their books. He had treated their efforts to get quit of the oppression of a few old officials as an attempt to overthrow the government; and thereby he had actually endangered what he so needlessly sought to defend.—Mr STANLEY defended the conduct of his Majesty's government, and the language of his various dispatches, as called for by the occasion. He defended the constitution of the legislative council, and complained of the monstrous pretensions of the house of assembly—pretensions which, if admitted, would at once put an end to the constitution of Lower Canada. The conduct of the government was in fact a series of concessions, which had only been met by increased demands. He would not make any reply to the threats about revolt and rebellion alluded to by the hon. member, and conclude by moving, as an amendment to the original motion, for a select committee to inquire into and report how far the grievances complained of in the petition of 1828 had been redressed, and how far the recommendation of the committee appointed by the house on that occasion had been complied with.—After some remarks from Mr Hume and Mr O'Connell, Mr Roebuck withdrew his motion, and the amendment was put and carried.

5. AFFAIRS OF TURKEY.

Mar. 17. Mr SHIEL made an attack upon the government for its supineness in the affair of the treaty between Russia and Turkey, and moved for a petition relative to that subject. After several Tory and Liberal members had spoken on the same side, Mr PALMERSTON entered into a defence of the government. He admitted that application for aid had been made, and that it was not yet decided.

by Turkey to this country; but it could not be granted; if for no other reason, because our disposable vessels were then off the coast of Holland and in the Tagus. Turkey then applied to Russia, and he related that Russia had given the aid required; more especially since she had acted in the whole affair with such good faith, and had actually performed her promises of withdrawing her troops when they were no longer necessary for the protection of the sultan. He admitted that he viewed the treaty of the 8th of July with dissatisfaction. It was still a subject of negotiation; but, after all, it only stipulated that Russia should be put on the same footing as other nations; that her ships of war (for the treaty had no reference to merchant vessels) should possess the same privileges, and the same only, that other nations enjoyed. The treaty of 1809, it was declared to be the custom of the Turkish empire not to permit the vessels of war of any country to pass up or come out through the Dardanelles. In case of a war between Russia and England, the treaty of the 8th of July would not affect us. It had been objected that we had no ambassadors, only a Secretary of Legation, at Constantinople, while Count Orloff was there, and while many events of great importance were in progress. The reason of this was, that Lord Ponsonby, our ambassador, was delayed by bad weather at Naples from May to November. He trusted that peace would be preserved; but this could only be done by placing confidence in Ministers. It would be contrary to all custom, and very detrimental to the public service, to grant the prayers called for in the existing state of the question to which they referred.—The motion was negatived without a division.

ADMISSION OF DISSENTERS TO THE ENGLISH UNIVERSITIES.

Mar. 21. A petition by sixty-three resident members of the University of Cambridge, praying for the abolition of the religious tests which are required to be taken by all candidates for degrees in the university, was presented to the House of Lords by Earl GREY. His lordship entered into a very elaborate account of the constitution of the university; from which it appeared that the petitioners asked for nothing inconsistent with that constitution, but for a removal of obstructions imposed since it had been formed. The authority for the imposition of religious tests rested solely upon a letter written by James I. from Newmarket races, which he was attending. Earl Grey called attention to the practical injury which this exclusion inflicted on the dissenters. Persons who had taken a university degree were admitted as attorneys and barristers two years earlier than those who had not; and as arristers their admission-fee was diminished. No one could be admitted a Fellow of the College of Physicians who had not taken his degree. These were some of the practical grievances which the dissenters suffered from their exclusion from university honours. He remarked, that the petition proceeded from men of learning, piety, and unquestioned attachment to the church; and mentioned particularly the names of Mr. Sedgwick, Lee, Babbage, and Hughes. The petitioners were about one-third in number of the resident members of the senate.—After some opposition from the Tory lords, the petition was laid on the table.—Mr SPRING RICE presented a counterpart of this petition, at the morning sitting of March 24, and supported it in language nearly similar to that of Earl Grey.—Mr GOULBURN, while allowing the respectability of the petitioners, pointed out that others, equally respectable, refused to concur in it. Out of fifteen heads of colleges, only two had signed the petition; out of twenty-five professors, only nine; out of twenty-four tutors, only eleven; out of one hundred and sixteen, only twenty-two had signed it in all, for these classes. Mr Goulburn contended, that, with respect to the claim really made by the dissenters for admission to the honours and emoluments, degrees, fellowships, scholarships, &c., it was quite opposed to the constitution of the university, and could not be granted. The universities were instituted for the education of members of the established church, and for those who came to them in the docilities of that church—not for the education of dissenters. It was unfair to charge upon the universities the practical grievances which the dissenters endured from the want of the certificate required by medical and legal societies. These societies, not the universities, were answerable for those regulations.—The debate on the petition was continued on the 25th and 26th. On the latter day, Sir R. INGLIS contended that the universities were not national or public establishments, and that the only monopoly they enjoyed was a monopoly of character.—Mr O'CONNELL contended that the property of the universities had chiefly been given by Catholics; and having been conveyed by the legislature to Protestants, it must be considered as public property.—Sir R. PEEL strongly condemned the prayer of the petition, as leading to the dissolution of the main link between the church and the state.—Several members of the government supported it, and the debate was adjourned over the recess.

Counter petitions to the above were presented, April 21, in the House of Peers by the Duke of Gloucester, and in the Commons by Mr Goulburn. This petition signed by 258 members of the senate, about 120 of whom were resident, and who professed their belief that compliance with the prayer of the former petition would be destructive of all the discipline of the University, and of the objects for which the petitioners considered it had been supported. In the course of a long debate which ensued in the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor endeavoured to show the groundlessness of all fear as to the admission of a few dissenters into the University, when he himself had 800 patronages in the church, and yet never signed one of its articles—a circumstance also applicable to Lords Loughborough and Erskine.

7. CRIMINAL PROCEDURE IN THE METROPOLIS.

Mar. 26. A bill was introduced into the House of Peers, by Lord BROUGHAM, for improving the administration of the criminal law in the metropolis. The whole metropolis, including Lambeth, Southwark, and parts of Kent and Essex, the population of which is about 1,700,000 souls, is to be placed under one criminal jurisdiction, the Old Bailey. The magistrates of Middlesex, at Clerkenwell, are to try those prisoners only whose crimes are not punishable with more than seven years' transportation; and the persons arraigned for any offence before the magistrates may be removed by certiorari to the Old Bailey. The sessions at the Old Bailey are to be held once a month, instead of eight times a year; but the home winter circuit will become unnecessary under the new arrangement, and will be discontinued. There will be separate grand juries for the Middlesex magistrates, and for the Old Bailey Court, whose separate jurisdiction will be complete within itself. One principal reason assigned by Lord Brougham for this change was, the unfitness of the magistrates, unassisted by professional men, for the discharge of the very important duties which now devolved upon them. The bill has been twice read.

8. CHURCH PATRONAGE IN SCOTLAND.

Apr. 14. Earl GREY presented petitions in the House of Lords, from several places in Scotland, for the abolition of the present system of church patronage, but said, that although he presented the petitions, he did not think himself bound to support their prayer.—The Earl of ROSEBURY presented several petitions of the same tenor. He admitted the strong feeling which existed in Scotland on this subject, but was not prepared to overturn, by a legislative enactment, the present system of patronage. The General Assembly had the power to make a satisfactory arrangement; it would meet next month, and he hoped the public mind in Scotland would be more directed towards that body than to any other medium whatever for bringing this very interesting question to a satisfactory result.—In these remarks of Lord Rosebery, the Earl of Haddington concurred; and the petitions were laid on the table.

9. MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

Apr. 14. The House of Commons resolved itself into a committee of supply, and Mr RICE brought forward the miscellaneous estimates. The amount proposed to be voted was reduced, as compared with that of last year, by L.234,000; as compared with 1832, by L.726,000; with 1831, by L.1,322,000. These reductions had been effected on a gross estimate of L.3,466,000, and amounted to more than one-third of the whole. Amongst the items which came under the attention of the house in committee, was L.11,500, proposed to be voted for the purchase of two pictures by Correggio for the National Gallery, and L.13,000 for the National Gallery itself.—The house divided on the grant of L.8978 for Maynooth College, when 137 voted for, and only 11 against it.

10. APPEALS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

Mar. 17 and 21. An altercation took place in the House of Lords between Lords Ellenborough and Brougham, relative to the hearing of appeal causes. It appeared that Lord Brougham was more anxious to keep down Chancery than appeal business, and hence there were 140 of the latter causes in arrear. Lord Brougham did not treat the remonstrating lord with much forbearance or delicacy, and professed his intention to adhere to the same course as formerly.

11. ABOLITION OF CHURCH-RATES.

Apr. 21. Lord ALTHORP, in a committee of the whole house, introduced his plan for abolishing church-rates. His lordship proposed that, instead of church-rates being levied, there should be a charge of L.250,000 on the land-tax.—Mr HUME condemned the proposed measure, and moved, as an amendment, the abolition of church-rates, without providing any substitute, which was lost on a division by 256 against 140.

12. MINOR SUBJECTS.

The ordinance estimates were moved, March 21, when it was announced that a reduction to the amount of L.82,000 had been effected in this department of the public service.

It appears from the Sixth Report of the Committee on Public Petitions, which extends to the 7th of March, that the greater number of petitions presented to the House of Commons this session have come from Ireland, and from the English dissenters. For the repeal of the Union, 79 petitions, with 58,164 signatures; for the support of the church establishments, 46 petitions, 7235 signatures; for the removal of dissenters' grievances, 192 petitions, 31,900 signatures (of these petitions, 56 refer to the alliance of church and state as an evil); for the abolition of Irish tithes, 113 petitions, 84,349 signatures; for the commutation of English tithes, 14 petitions, 10,337 signatures; for a better observance of the Lord's day, 32 petitions, 9357 signatures; for the repeal of the corn-laws, 13 petitions, 104,180 signatures; against an alteration of the corn-laws, 61 petitions, 15,063 signatures.

Another motion for the repeal of the malt-tax—made, March 17, by Mr Cobbett—was negatived by 142 to 59.

A petition from persons engaged in the tea-trade in London, was presented by Mr Crawford, March 17, and excited a lengthened discussion. It prayed for the establishment of an uniform rate of duty on teas, instead of the graduated scale lately adopted. It was alleged by the supporters of the petition that while there was a difference of 8d. a pound between the respective duties on bohea and congou, it was difficult to distinguish the one from the other.—The petition, after Lord Althorp and Mr P. Thomson had spoken against it, was laid on the table.

A bill was introduced and read a first time (March 25), for abolishing the patent office of Clerk of the Pipe in Scotland. The measure originated with Mr J. A. Murray, M.P. for Leith, the present holder of the office.

ENGLAND.

March 19. The annual meeting of the Labourers' Friend Society was held in Exeter Hall; Lord Sandon in the chair. The report stated that their monthly publication had increased to 1500 in number; that the Queen had become an annual subscriber of L.10; that the Duke of Bedford had on his estates 600 cottages, the Marquis of Lansdowne 700, &c., conducted on the plans of the society, all flourishing to the highest degree of expectation and satisfaction. The funds for the past year were L.985, 2s. 3d., an increase of L.367 over the preceding. The expenses had exceeded that sum by nearly L.70.

26. Mr Joseph Newman Reeve was tried at Norwich, on the well-known charge of stealing some sovereigns from the body of Mrs Pyne, one of the ladies who was drowned on board the Earl of Wemyss smack, off Brancaster. The grand jury ignored the bill against Mr Reeve for stealing money from Miss Roche's reticule; and the evidence against him on the other charge was so slight, that he was not called upon for his defence; and the jury acquitted him in the fullest possible manner, saying that he left the Court with unstained character.

27. At the York assizes, Mr Ridsdale, who is well known on the turf, obtained a verdict and L.500 damages against Mr Gully, M.P. for Pomfret, who had struck the plaintiff over the shoulders with a stick, at Lounsbrough, on the 13th November last. The cause of offence was, that Mr Ridsdale had spread a report that Mr Gully had won L.12,000 at Epsom Races, which sum could only have been gained by unfair means.

April 14. (Monday.) The Trades' Union of Oldham held its customary meeting at the William the Fourth public-house. Heywood and Page, two officers, went to the house, about half-past six, and requested admittance. This being refused, they used no ceremony in effecting a forcible entrance, and captured the books and papers, also two members of the union and officers of the society. The news spread throughout the town, and, on the mills ceasing work, an immense concourse of people assembled. No outrage, or even tumult, occurred during the night; but on the morning of Tuesday a total cessation of work took place in many factories: the operatives assembled by seven o'clock; and, soon after ten, as the captured unionists were being conveyed to Hollenwood, about two miles distant, the residence of the Rev. J. Holmes, magistrate, the populace, on passing a factory, were surprised by the discharge of a musket, apparently from the porter at the lodge of the mill; and this firing was twice or thrice repeated. The reports brought some workmen, who had remained in the mill, to the windows, who were also furnished with arms, and made repeated discharges with blank cartridge. One shot, however, took effect, and an operative spinner, named Bently, was killed; and the body was conveyed to the King William to await the coroner's inquest. The multitude were for a moment paralysed, but the boldest among them led the way, by scaling the palisades. Several muskets were fired at him without effect, and several of his companions demolished in a few minutes not less than 4000 or 5000 panes of glass, a great number of window-frames, and a quantity of machinery. Another party attacked the adjoining dwelling-house of Mr Thompson, the occupier of the mill, and demolished every article it contained. They then rescued the captives, assailed and beat the officers who had them in custody, throwing one of them over a high wall. He escaped, however, without serious injury. Between 11 and 12 o'clock, two troops of lancers and four companies of infantry arrived from Manchester; but the violence of the tumult had by that time abated, and no further violence was perpetrated. One of the most active of the rioters was apprehended, and conveyed by the military to a secure place of confinement. The two men rescued from the police having surrendered, were examined on Tuesday afternoon; their names are Daniel Brierley and James Taylor. It appeared that there was no evidence of the administration of any illegal oaths. They were liberated on giving bail to appear at the quarter-sessions at Salford.—A very numerous meeting assembled on Wednesday morning, on an eminence called Oldham Edge, and were addressed by several speakers, who exhorted them to be strictly peaceable, to molest no man's property or person, but to cease working until it was known whether or not the two prisoners taken on Monday night were liberated or not: the groups then joined, and the whole crowd sang, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow;" after which they separated.—Another very numerous meeting was held on the Moor, on Thursday morning. The operatives simply resolved not to go to work till their grievances were redressed, and then only on the "regenerating principle" of eight hours' work, and pay for twelve; they quietly dispersed.—After examination of the prisoners charged with riot, 12 of them were sent off to Manchester, under the escort of a troop of lancers. Seven of the men are committed to Lancaster Castle, and five to the sessions.

15. At Bow Street office, two booksellers were fined five pounds each, for selling unstamped copies of the People's Police Gazette. The solicitor for the stamp-office appeared as prosecutor, and stated that the commissioners of stamps had determined to prosecute all similar offenders.

The revenue presents a cheering aspect. In the year ending April 5th, there is a rise of L.34,033; in the quarter ending on the same day, the surplus (chiefly on the customs and excise), as compared with the corresponding quarter of 1833, is L.384,107. The subjoined table will show the specialities of the difference:—

The Ministry are understood to have been in considerable difficulty about the disposal of the vacant seat at the Treasury Board. It was offered to Mr Warre, M.P. for Hastings; but on that gentleman testing the affections of his constituency, he found that such was the decline of popularity which the Ministers had experienced, that, out of 600 voters, he would not be able to calculate upon more than 150, in the event of his again submitting his claims to them. He therefore declined the offered place, which was subsequently proposed to others with the same result. It has been eventually given, as elsewhere stated, to Mr R. Græme, candidate for Perthshire.

The Earl of Durham spent a part of the past month in Paris, to which he was supposed to have been sent on a political mission by the government, though that is contradicted by the ministerial papers.

As a relief to the Lord Chancellor, Sir Thomas Denman has been raised to the peerage, as Baron Denman, in order that he may take the principal burden of the Scotch appeal business.

A question of precedence has occurred in the House of Lords between the English Attorney-General and the Scottish Lord Advocate.

A society with a particularly useful object, and which has our best wishes, has been formed in London, under the denomination of the Statistical Society. The constituent meeting, held, March 15, in the Horticultural Society's Rooms, was attended by the Marquis of Lansdowne (who took the chair), the Earl of Kerry, Mr Jeffrey, Mr Abercromby, Mr Goulburn, Mr Spring Rice, Mr Babbage, Mr Hallam, and Sir Francis Palgrave, besides many others. The idea of the society was first suggested by M. Quetelet, a scientific Belgian. It has for its object "the collection and classification of all facts illustrative of the condition and prospects of society, especially as it exists in the British dominions."

The tonnage-duty in the port of London will be reduced on the 1st of June next; it will in future be so apportioned as to yield only L.8000, instead of L.48,000 annually; as the harbour and port of London service, in consequence of the reduction of the debt, will require in future not more than L.8000 per annum.

Above thirty persons have been examined on suspicion of being concerned in the murder of Mr Richardson near Epsom, but all have been discharged for want of evidence. It is supposed that this foul deed had been perpetrated by London thieves in rustic disguise.

It is stated that a meeting of representatives of the dissenting body, from different parts of the kingdom, will take place in the metropolis early in May.

The annual report of the savings bank in Bloomfield Street, Moorfields, made up to November last, states an increase in the receipts of L.12,815, compared with the year preceding; a diminution in the payments of L.24,313; and an increase during the year, including interest, of L.40,740. The total number of the depositors is 18,024, and has increased during the year by 1494. This bank has not availed itself of the new act enabling these institutions to grant annuities, which is generally the case, the sum allowed for management being considered too small.

The newspapers, even in their humblest columns, occasionally present matter for deep reflection. What a tale is told by the following paragraph!—"An inquest was held in the King's Bench prison on Monday (March 31), on the body of Mr John Mytton, who died there on the preceding Saturday. The immediate cause of his death was a disease of the brain, produced by excessive intemperance. The jury returned a verdict of "natural death." Mr Mytton was only thirty-seven years of age. He was originally possessed of landed property worth L.30,000 per annum; and when he came into possession of his estates, had a considerable sum of ready money saved during his minority. He represented Shrewsbury in Parliament for a short time, and had been high sheriff of the counties of Salop and Merioneth. At one period of his life, he possessed a fine stud of racers, and kept up a very hospitable establishment at a fine old family seat, called Halston, near Oswestry, which had descended to him from one of his ancestors, a general in the Parliamentary army during the civil wars. Mr Mytton possessed superior natural abilities, but ruined his constitution by excessive dissipation. He was twice married, and has left children. His eldest son will inherit the settled property—a mere remnant of one of the finest estates in England."

There are now seven deliveries of letters in Paris. The first delivery is made at seven in the morning, and is repeated every two hours until half-past eight in the evening. There are to be also six deliveries in the environs. The number of boxes for letters in Paris now amounts to two hundred.

TRADES' UNIONS.

THE public hears much of trades' unions, but is very imperfectly acquainted with their organisation and proceedings; for these societies are bound together by oaths of secrecy, administered to the members on their admission; and although the oaths are unlawful, very few have broken them. A pamphlet* recently published shows a knowledge of the subject which we have not met with elsewhere; although the author confesses that he may be mistaken on some points, owing to the difficulty of procuring accurate information. From this pamphlet we have selected a few facts, which we presume will be new to many of our readers.

The best organised and most extensive union is that of the working cotton-spinners. It has existed for more than thirty years; and in 1829, the members elected representatives, who met together at Ramsey, in the Isle of Man, and formed a kind of Parliament. Each village and town in the union sent representatives to this assembly, proportionate to the population. These parliaments passed laws, levied taxes, and printed some of their debates. The names of the speakers are generally not given; but each member takes the name of the place he represents, and is distinguished by a number. Thus it is said, Glasgow 1 moved, and Preston 2 seconded, such a resolution, &c. The specimen of the speeches of the orators, given in the pamphlet, is creditable to their debating powers.

Few persons have heard the name of Joseph Shipley. Yet this man is described as being a perfect Massaniello. He was the leader of the most extensive and persevering strike that has ever taken place—that of 1810. More than thirty thousand persons were thrown out of employ by it. All the spinners in all the mills in Manchester, Stockport, Macclesfield, Ashton, Hyde, and Bolton, turned out. Shipley was as implicitly obeyed by this mass of mechanics as the Duke of Wellington at Waterloo. It is mentioned as a remarkable fact, that he gave evidence to the Factory Commissioners against the short time bill, and utterly denied that children became deformed by factory labour. During this great strike in 1810, the money collected weekly from the men, who still remained at work in different parts of the country, amounted to nearly L.1500. The great object of this strike was to compel the country masters to pay as high wages as those in Manchester; but in not one single instance was it attained; and after four months of great suffering, the men all returned to their work, and in many cases at wages reduced 50 per cent. In 1829, more than ten thousand cotton-spinners again turned out. Many masters were shot at; and a Mr Ashton, as many will remember, was murdered; the assassins or assassins have not been discovered to this day. The last great strike of the cotton-spinners was in 1830, when fifty-two mills were stopped, and thirty thousand persons were thrown out of employ. They were, as usual, obliged to yield, after ten weeks' struggle, and obtained no advance of wages.

The committee of the cotton-spinners at Manchester is said to be armed with almost despotic power. They not unfrequently compel men to leave their work contrary to the individuals' inclination, in order to injure some employer to whom they bear ill-will. The wages of the Manchester spinners have for some years averaged 30s. each, all the year round.

It is said that these partially-educated men, the leaders of the Manchester spinners, fancied that, had the ten hours bill passed, one sixth more mills would have been built, to supply the deficient production. This would have created, they thought, a demand for workmen; and thus those out of employ would have no longer drained the pockets of those who had work. If this is correctly stated, the clamour for the ten hours bill is easily accounted for.

The workmen in the building trades have formed one of the most extensive unions in the empire. In 1833, they required their masters in Manchester to desist from taking contracts—that is, from contracting to do the building-work for persons who had engaged to provide the whole of any private or public erection inside and outside complete. Their masters, they said, became middle-men under this system, and thus two profits instead of one were gained out of the labour of the workmen. Some of the masters gave way, and abandoned this mode of doing business. But the workmen continued to encroach, and in a great variety of ways tyrannised over their employers—compelling them to employ bad and drunken members of the union; dictating the rate of wages, and hours of labour. The masters at length determined on resistance, and refused to employ any members of the union. This threw vast numbers out of work, and reduced the consumption of bricks in Liverpool from one million a-week to twenty thousand. The masters had very little success in procuring fresh workmen, as great intimidation was used towards all who presumed to defy the power of the union. In September last, 275 delegates met at Manchester, representing a constituency of 30,000 working builders. The expense of this session of Parliament, as they called it, was about L.3000, and it cooled the zeal of the builders for more displays of this despotism. They determined, however, to erect a Guild hall at Birmingham, the principal room of which was to be seventy-eight feet by thirty: schools were established, committees were to meet, and the unemployed were to be set to work on this building. Many of their designs were in a high degree praiseworthy, and indicate a great improvement in the morals and intellectual capacity of the builders. At last, after six months' contest, the masters triumphed; the men, in penitence, returned to their work, having spent in allowances L.18,000. Their wages would have amounted during the same period to L.72,000. All their grand designs are laid aside for the present. The failure of the strike was complete.

The Leeds and Halifax weavers have met with equally bad success in their strikes. They were as tyrannical in their exactions as their Lancashire brethren in the cotton trade. The Leeds union drew up "a scale of prices to be observed by mill-owners, manufacturers, &c." The object of this was to compel the masters to pay equally high wages to bad as to good workmen. The masters gained the advantage in the strike which followed their resistance to this demand. The most strenuous opponents to the requisition of the men were Messrs Hindes and Derham, of Alphinholme, whose workmen held out from the strike in 1832 to the 2d February 1833. The invention of the wool-combing machine was the consequence of their strike: it wholly superseded the labour of the chief ringleaders, and has dealt a heavy blow at the combination. The oath said to have been imposed upon the members of the Leeds union, is given in the pamphlet: it is of a most peremptory description.

In Spitalfields, Coventry, Macclesfield, and Kilmister, there have also been trades' unions and strikes. The distress of the mechanics and the removal of a great portion of the trade have been its former consequence of them.

The trial of the six members of an agricultural union, at Dorchester, shows that this spirit is not confined to the manufacturing population. Few persons probably were aware that such an organisation existed among that class of the population. It proves how deeply the spirit of resistance to what is ignorantly supposed to be the determination of employers and capitalists to grind down the weak people, has taken root in the land. Almost every class of mechanics, and now, it appears, the labouring peasantry, discern the advantage of acting in concert to obtain a common end. Unfortunately, they are at present too partially informed to understand the difference between impracticable and attainable desires. Their combinations have consequently been productive of only distress to themselves, and loss and inconvenience to their masters. With the progress of education, we may look for an improvement in this respect; and then the spirit which impels men to form trades' unions may be productive of much good. They have proved themselves capable of acting with constancy, and method; and the entire failure of their recent attempts, will surely induce them to seek better information as to the rules which regulate the demand for labour and the rate of profit, and that which they now possess.—Spectator.

THE SIX CONDEMNED UNIONISTS.

At the Dorchester assizes, March 17, six agricultural labourers were convicted of a felony, in being members of an illegal society, and administering illegal oaths. It appears from the evidence that the system of many of the trades' unions had been adopted by these peasants. The object was to compel their employers to give them certain rate of wages, and submit to certain rules of regulation. It would seem also that they were in connexion with other societies of the same description. The oaths were administered with a good deal of mummery the persons taking them being blinded, and then shown the picture of a skeleton, death's head, &c. The offenders were sentenced to seven years' transportation. This sentence has excited much indignation feeling throughout a portion of the community. Meetings, chiefly composed of the working classes, have been held in London, Birmingham, Manchester, Edinburgh, and other great towns, at which resolutions vehemently condemning the sentence were passed. It is nowhere denied that the men were condemned, not for illegal oaths, which are imposed every day with impunity in Orange lodges, and among the societies not obnoxious to government indignation, but as an oblique blow at the trades' unions, which are troubled without infringing any penal statute. A petition of the working classes in the metropolis, sent to the King through Lord Melbourne, praying for a remission of the punishment, was overlooked; and on the subject intimated to in Parliament, March 26, the members of the government justified the punishment of the men (who were stated to have sailed) as necessary in the present state of the country. The working classes being unsatisfied on this point, a petition was prepared, to which no fewer than 260,000 signatures were attached in different parts of the country, and on Monday, April 2, materials of a vast procession were collected on Chesham Fields, for the purpose of carrying it to the Home Office. The procession, chiefly composed of men with their banners, and numbering at the least forty thousand, proceeded without disorder through Guildford Street, Regent Street, and Charing Cross, and ing up a deputation to the Home Office, advanced to the ground opposite New Bethlem. The deputation received by Mr Phillips, who informed the individual composing it (with whom was Mr Robert Owen), Lord Melbourne, though he saw nothing improper in the petition itself, could not receive it, on account of the way in which it had been brought to the office, but was happy to receive any similar petition brought in a becoming manner. The vast assemblage of petitioners dispersed without the least disturbance of public peace—to protect which the government is said to have been fully prepared. It has been stated in the Times, that the Dorchester convicts were not men entitled to their general character to the sympathy of the community. The Spectator, however, makes a remark, the force of which can hardly be denied. "The case," says this paper, "is very characteristic of the hypocritical way in which men speak and act in England. The professed reformer is scarcely ever the real one. A man in office receives a large salary as Master of the Mint, though there are no duties attached to the office. How is this? Well, he receives no salary as President of the Board of Trade, to which important duties are attached. The administration of justice proceeds on the same principle. A man is not punished for the crime of which he is condemned, but for some other crime, which the judge in his wisdom chooses to believe him guilty of, without the intervention of trial by jury."

SCOTLAND.

DEATH OF THE WIDOW OF ROBERT BURNS.

Mrs JEAN ARMOUR, the widow of Robert Burns, died at Dumfries, on the 26th March, of paralysis, of which she had several shocks during the last twelve months. She was in the 70th year of her age, having been born in February 1765; and she had survived her husband nearly thirty-eight years. During all that time, she dwelt in the small house in which her husband had died, and enjoyed general respect on account of her modest and benevolent character. She had borne nine children to the poet, of whom three survive—Robert, a retired officer of the Mountant-General's department, Stamp-Office, and William and James Glencairn, captains in the East India Company's service. She had reared her children in a respectable manner with very slender means, and they were ultimately able to provide her with many comforts. Previously to 1818, she had never enjoyed an income above £60 a-year; but she had had since that time about £200, which was more than sufficient for her wants, and she was accordingly very liberal to her poor. Mrs Burns had never been more than a plain woman, but was remarkably handsome, danced with singular grace, and was an excellent singer of Scotch melodies, her voice rising without effort as high as B natural. Though she had received very flattering attentions from persons of all ranks, she was never in the least degree elevated above her native sense of good sense and modesty. "Her's," says the Dumfries Courier, "was one of those well-balanced minds, which cling instinctively to propriety and a medium in all things; and such as survive the deceased, earliest and latest, were unconscious of any change in her demeanour and habits, expecting, perhaps, greater attention to dress, and more refinement of manner, insensibly acquired by frequent intercourse with families of the first respectability. In her tastes, she was frugal, simple, and pure; and delighted in music, pictures, and flowers. In spring and summer, it was impossible to pass her widows without being struck with the beauty of the old treasures they contained; and if extravagant in any thing, it was in the article of roots and plants of the finest sorts. Fond of the society of young people, she mingled as long as able in their innocent pleasures, and cheerfully filled for them the cup of which cheers but not inebriates." Although neither a sentimentalist nor a 'blue stocking,' she was a clever woman, possessed great shrewdness, discriminated character admirably, and frequently made very pithy remarks. In ballad poetry her taste was good, and her range of reading rather extensive. Her memory, too, was strong, and she could quote when she chose at considerable length, and with great aptitude. Of these powers the bard was so well aware that he read to her almost every piece he composed, and was not ashamed to own that he had profited by her judgment. In fact, none save relations, neighbours, and friends, could form a proper estimate of the character of Mrs Burns. In the presence of strangers she was shy and silent, and required to be drawn out, or as some would say, shown off to advantage, by persons who possessed her confidence, and knew her intimately. The remains of Mrs Burns were interred on the 1st of April, with many marks of public respect, the magistrates attending in their public capacity, besides many gentlemen of considerable local distinction. She was interred in the vault of the museum in St Michael's churchyard, where her husband was re-interred in September 1815. On the night of the 31st March, a number of gentlemen, who were the consent of the principal relative of Mrs Burns, raised the poet's skull from the grave, and took a cast from it in plaster of Paris, after which it was restored to the earth in a new leaden case. Mr Archibald Blacklock, a medical gentleman, who was present, has given the following account of the skull, and of the cast taken from it:—"The cranial bones were perfect in every respect, if we except a slight erosion of their external table, and firmly held together by their sutures; even the delicate bones of the orbits, with the trifling exception of the os unguis in the left, were sound and uninjured by death and the grave. The superior maxillary bones still retained the four most posterior teeth on each side, including the dentes sapientiae, and all without spot or blemish; the incisores, cuspidati, &c., had in all probability recently dropt from the jaw, for the alveoli were but little decayed. The bones of the face and palate were also sound. Some small portions of black hair, with a very few grey hairs intermixed, were observed while detaching some extraneous matter from the occiput. Indeed, nothing could exceed the high state of preservation in which we found the bones of the cranium, or offer a fairer opportunity of supplying what has so long been desiderated by phrenologists—a correct model of our immortal poet's head; and in order to accomplish this in the most accurate and satisfactory manner, every particle of sand, or other foreign body, was carefully washed off, and the plaster of Paris applied with all the tact and accuracy of an experienced artist. The cast is admirably taken, and cannot fail to prove highly interesting to phrenologists and others."

—The effects of Mrs Burns were sold by public auction on the 10th and 11th April, and from the anxiety of the public to possess relics of this interesting household, brought uncommonly high sums. According to the Dumfries Courier, "the auctioneer commenced with small articles, and when he came to a broken copper coffee-pot, there were so many bidders that the price paid exceeded twenty-fold the intrinsic value. A tea-kettle of the same metal succeeded, and reached the high point of £1.2 sterling. Of the linens, a tablecloth, marked 1792, which, speaking commercially, may be worth half-a-crown or five shillings, was knocked down at £5.7s. Many other articles commanded handsome prices, and the older and plainer the furniture, the better it sold. The rusty iron top of a shower-bath, which Mrs Dunlop of Dunlop sent to the poet when afflicted with rheumatism, was bought by a Carlisle gentleman for 28s.; and a low wooden kitchen chair, on which the late Mrs Burns sat when nursing her children, was run up to £3.7s. The crystal and china were much coveted, and brought, in most cases, splendid prices. Even an old fender reached a figure which would go far to buy half a dozen new ones, and every thing towards the close attracted notice, down to grey-beards, bottles, and a half-worn pair of bellows. The poet's eight-day clock, made by a Mauchline artist of the name of Brown, which stood originally in the house at Moss-giel, and accompanied him in his removals to Ellisland and Dumfries, attracted great attention from the circumstance that it had frequently been wound up by his own hand. In a few seconds it was bid up to fifteen pounds or guineas, and was finally disposed of for £35. The purchaser had a hard battle to fight; but his spirit was good, and his purse obviously not a light one, and the story ran that he had instructed Mr Richardson to secure a preference at any sum under £60."—The original portrait of the poet, by the veteran Nasmyth, has been removed to London, as the property of Miss Sarah Burns, a sister of the original. A model for a bust of Burns has been made up by Mr David Dunbar, sculptor, Newcastle, with the assistance of the cast of his head, and of the suggestions of various citizens of Dumfries, who have a personal recollection of the bard. A cast of the skull has arrived in Edinburgh from Dumfries, and has already been beheld with interest by several phrenologists. We are unable to give an accurate phrenological account of this interesting cranium, and would not be understood to anticipate the observations which the partisans of that science will no doubt both make and publish respecting it. But we are informed that it is considered as largely developed in both the intellectual organs and the lower sentiments and propensities. The perceptive faculties are remarkably advanced. Imitation, ideality, and wonder, are large; benevolence, secretiveness, caution, and firmness, are also large; while hope is deficient. Self-esteem and love of approbation, concentrativeness, and philoprogenitiveness, are all very full; but the largest development of the whole, is combativeness, by which, perhaps, the eagerness of the poet in polemics, and some other points in his character, are to be explained. In its general aspect, the head does not strike the beholder as one of remarkable elevation; it has nothing of the turret-like height which was so conspicuous in the head of Sir Walter Scott. Considering its real size, however, and the active temperament of the owner, it will probably be regarded as indicative of extraordinary powers of mind, as well as of many singular peculiarities of character.

DEATH OF THE MARQUIS OF BREADALBANE—PERTHSHIRE ELECTION.

The Marquis of Breadalbane died at Taymouth, on the 29th March, in the 72d year of his age. He succeeded his cousin as Earl of Breadalbane in 1782, and was created marquis in 1831. The estimable character of this nobleman was manifested at his funeral on the 8th April, when upwards of two thousand persons attended, two hundred of whom were tenantry, on horseback, and a great part of the remainder, crofters, or small tenants, a class of persons to whom the earl had set an example of kindness now very rare in the Highlands. Upwards of four thousand in all are supposed to have attended the procession, at different parts of its progress to Finlarig, the family burial-place. The marquis has left the following well-disposed legacies, enumerated in the Perthshire Advertiser:—

To the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge in the Highlands and Western Isles, £1,000
To the Caledonian Asylum, London, 500
To the Charities at Edinburgh, to be selected by the Marchioness of Breadalbane, Sir Alexander Maitland Gibson of Cliftonhall, Bart. and Mr Harry Davidson, W. S., 2000
To the Charities of Perth, to be selected by the same persons, along with the Hon. Mrs Willison, 3000

The noble marquis has also bequeathed to each of the tenants, crofters, and cottars, on the estates of Breadalbane, in the counties of Perth and Argyle, whose yearly rents are £45 and under, a sum equal to one whole year's rent, to be paid out of his lordship's personal property. His lordship has also left to each of his household servants, who had been a year in his service previous to his death, a legacy to the extent of one year's wages.

In consequence of the accession of his lordship's son, the Earl of Ormelie, to the peerage, a vacancy has occurred in the representation of Perthshire. Two candidates have started—Sir George Murray, the well-known able and conservative ex-secretary for the colonies, who was beaten at the last election by 1667 to 1093, and Mr Robert Græme, advocate, a friend of the government, and who has just been appointed to the seat at the Treasury Board, rendered vacant by the retirement of Mr Kennedy, M.P. for Ayr. The contest, which is to take place about the time when this paper will be published, is looked forward to as one which will test the popularity of Ministers, and prove to them either highly beneficial or deeply injurious. It is alleged by the Tory and Liberal journals, that, notwithstanding their frequent abjuration of patronage as a means of carrying on the government, Ministers have felt so much interested in the event of this contest as to offer a Peerage to the second son of an earl who possesses large estates in the lower part of the county, for the purpose of securing the influence of that great house in favour of Mr Græme. The elevation, it seems, was solicited some time since, but refused.

Mar. 21. A public dinner was given to Lord Melville at Dalkeith, by about 180 noblemen and gentlemen. The speeches were of a conservative character.—Ten young men, calico-printers, were sentenced by the High Court of Judiciary to various periods of twelve and fifteen months' imprisonment, for mobbing and assault at the calico printfields of Milngavie, on the 3d of February last. On the succeeding day, five other men were sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment, for the same offence committed at Milton, in the parish of West Kilpatrick. These last thanked the court for the leniency of the sentence.

—24. Aytoun House, near Berwick, the property of Mr Forde, was discovered to be in flames; and the family and domestics had only time to escape, almost naked. A messenger was immediately dispatched to Berwick; but before the engines could arrive, a great part of the roof had fallen in, and the valuable furniture, library, &c., with a chest containing a large quantity of plate, were destroyed.

A new steam-ship, said to be the largest and most elegant ever fitted up, has recently been erected at Port Glasgow for the trade between Dundee and London: it is called the Dundee steam-ship. She measures 180 feet in length on deck, and 51 feet in breadth over the paddles; makes up 107 berths for passengers; and her chief cabin, which is fitted up in a most splendid style, equal to any nobleman's drawing-room, and contains a library of books, is capable of conveniently accommodating 100 passengers at dinner. Her engines are of 300 horse-power. The Dundee made her first passage to London in thirty-eight hours and a half (arriving April 4), with a strong head-wind against her more than two-thirds of the voyage. She had on board 41 passengers, several hundred head of cattle, and a large cargo of miscellaneous goods.

—25. A steam-carriage, constructed on improved principles, under the superintendence of Mr Russell, lecturer on natural philosophy, Edinburgh, was tried on the Glasgow road, with considerable, though it does not appear perfect, success. Experiments with the same machine continue to be made on the road between Glasgow and Paisley.

—26. The declaration in favour of the continuance of the present number of clergy in Edinburgh, and expressing attachment to the church of Scotland, and at the same time a disposition to see it reformed, was presented to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, with 4341 signatures, including a number of annuity-payers, many members of the College of Justice, and a portion of seceders. The Presbytery expressed its gratification at the receipt of a document so respectfully signed.

—27. A numerous and respectable meeting of land-proprietors took place at Cupar-Fife, for the purpose of forming an Agricultural Association, similar to those recently established in Roxburghshire and Perthshire.

April 3. A numerous and respectable meeting took place in Edinburgh, the Lord Provost in the chair, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament for the emancipation of the Jews. The petition has been sent off with 6230 signatures, including those of the whole Town Council, and many of the most respectable persons in the city.

—14. About ten o'clock p.m., a fire commenced in the barn at Corstorphine Bank, the property of Sir Robert Keith Dick. Engines were immediately procured from Edinburgh by means of which the fire was confined to the barn and threshing-mill, both of which were destroyed. The conflagration is supposed to have been the work of incendiaries, for whose apprehension a reward of 200 guineas has been offered.

—19. The Edinburgh petition for the repeal of the corn laws was dispatched with between 17,000 and 18,000 signatures.

The Town Council of Edinburgh have resolved upon effecting certain reductions in the salaries of the officials connected with municipal business, by which a saving of £2510 will be effected. The Council have also, by a majority of 17 against 11, thrown aside Dr Chalmers's proposal for erecting a new church and benefice in Edinburgh, for the especial service of the people in the Cowgate. The Council has obtained an opinion of counsel, favourable to their claims upon the seat-rents of the city churches, as applicable to ecclesiastical purposes alone, inasmuch as being attachable by the city creditors. Should a court of law confirm this award, it will materially brighten the prospects of the Council, and proportionally depress those of the creditors. The Council have agreed upon a bill for the abolition of the annuity-tax, and the Lord Advocate is to be requested to introduce it this session. It is proposed to trust to the seat-rents and other funds for the payment of the clergy, and to give future incumbents only £500 a-year.

Mr Hope Johnstone, of Annandale, has lost his suit for the lordship of Annandale, in consequence of a decision of the House of Peers, which pronounces that they are not satisfied of the failure of the heirs of Lord John Johnstone, a scion of the family who lived about a century ago, and of whom Mr Gooding Johnstone, another claimant, represents himself to be the great-grandson. Even failing this branch, the Earl of Hopetoun is pronounced by the House of Peers to have a preferable title to his kinsman Mr Hope Johnstone.

The Dumfries Educational Society have prepared a petition to Parliament on the improvement of parochial education. "The evils in the present state of national education in Scotland, which your petitioners have thus pointed out, seem to be, in respect to the schoolmaster, the inadequacy of his salary to be, in respect to the body by which he is elected, his appointment for life; the want of a superannuation fund in case of natural decay; the imperfect provision for his censure or removal in case of moral or intellectual incapacity. In respect to the schools: the neglect of

FICTITIOUS AND REAL REPRESENTATION.

When the project of the reform bill was in agitation, one of the main arguments used in its opposition was, that it would soon be found that the machinery of our government would not work under the alterations proposed to be made on the constitution. It was alleged, for instance, that what were called "rotten boroughs"—that is, fictitious constituencies, or places under the dominion of members of the aristocracy and landed gentry—however anomalous in appearance, were in point of fact exceedingly useful; for it was by their means that many excellent men procured a seat in the House of Commons, who would otherwise have been kept out of Parliament. When this argument was examined by the advocates of the bill, it was stated in answer, that the assertion of these fictitious constituencies being necessary, amounted to a confession that the lower house of Parliament was not a representative body, and that the whole management of the country, and the power of enacting laws, were hence centred in a cabinet council; in other words, that the government of the United Kingdom was a despotism under the cloak of free institutions. We are not aware if any decided reply was made to this extraordinary solution of the character of the constitution prior to the passing of the reform bill. The friends of the ancient mode of management seem to have at length felt as if those whom they designated the destroyers of the constitution could not, by any power of reasoning, be brought to see that theoretic defects were practical beauties, and so retired from the moral contest in disgust.

From the period of the re-organisation of the constitution in 1833, some things have occurred to prove that what the Conservatives said regarding the theoretic defects was not without a reason for dread of change, notwithstanding that their deductions were exclusive. If any one has been watching for the earliest symptoms of a practical deficiency in the working of the new state machine, he will have remarked that the first decisive proof of there having been a great alteration effected in affairs, is the difficulty with certain individuals now experience in getting into Parliament—individuals who, in the old state of things, would have procured a seat by means of the fictitious constituencies, either through the direct interest of government, or that of some one attached to the administration. This, we say, is the first demonstration of there having been little else than a revolution accomplished in the constitution. The various dilemmas which have occurred of individuals being denied a seat in Parliament, after having resigned from their acceptance of an office under government, signifies in a remarkable manner the prodigious power which is now lodged in the hands of the people.

It is now argued by those who foresaw the approach of this obstacle to the securing of a seat in the House of Commons, that their prophecies were correct, and that, therefore, the machinery of government will not work. But it is obvious that the deductions here drawn are illogical. The matter stands thus—By the abolition of all fictitious constituencies, persons who wish seats in Parliament must now consult the opinions of the influential part of the community—the people, and, what is more, behave in such a manner, when acting as legislators, as will gain them the approbation of the people when they again seek their suffrages. Should it happen that they cannot secure a seat, after having resigned, the conclusion is, that they are men not worthy of being trusted with power, and that they must leave the field in favour of other and more popular candidates. Occasionally it may appear, that, although certain candidates are rejected by particular constituencies, they would nevertheless be approved of by others were these open to their canvass; yet this only forms an exception to a rule, and it is always dangerous to reason from exceptions. There can therefore be little propriety in the idea that the government cannot be carried on from the want of rotten boroughs; it ought rather to be acknowledged that the government must now be carried on upon the new principle of actual representation. To this point the reform bills of 1833 have already brought the country; and, judging from the cases which have occurred of adherents of the present administration losing their elections, on going back to their constituencies, it might be anticipated, that, in the event of a general election, there would be a very extensive change of members, whether to the benefit or injury of the nation no one can tell.

STATE OF AMERICA.

In the history of the last few months, no movement in the political world has attracted so much painful attention in Britain as the disturbances in the United States of America, arising out of the conduct of the President, Andrew Jackson, in regard to the removal of the cash deposits of the government from the United States' Bank. Of the conduct of the President in this transaction, all sound-thinking men in this country seem to approve; and the manner in which he has stood inflexibly on his prerogative, has even drawn applause from those who differ from him in his opinions; while his obstinacy, or firmness—for it is called by both these terms—has certainly created a good deal of astonishment. The ferment which has been raised by the removal of a few millions of dollars from the national bank, and transferring the amount to half a dozen others, shows in a very striking light the comparative insufficiency of the whole commercial credit of the citizens of the Union. It demonstrates that the Americans are yet immensely behind in regard to the possession of a substantial capital susceptible of circulation. Nearly the whole of their circulating medium is composed of paper notes, from five shillings upwards in nominal value. The unrestricted issue of these notes by banks, has produced a widely ramified system of discounting bills; and it is this exceedingly unhealthy state of things, that, apart from political considerations, has induced the President to endeavour to bring about the more secure circulation of gold and silver. Unfortunately, the commercial world in America had gone so far in their trading on the faith of paper-money, that, when the credit of the banks was shaken by the President's measure—for the local banks seem mostly to have depended on the national bank in some way or other—and when the issue of notes and discounting of bills ceased, the whole nation was taken aback, as if by an instantaneous explosion.

The hollowness of the American banking system is sufficiently evinced by a report published by the Merchants' Committee of New York, by which it appears that there are no less than nineteen banks of issue in that town, whose notes and liabilities amount to 15,500,000 dollars, and the cash in their coffers to meet the present crisis to no more than 1,650,000! The legislature sitting at Albany has authorised a loan of 6,000,000 dollars, which will go but a short way to relieve the forty banks of the state. The mercantile committee declare that they see no salvation for the country, but in the restoration of the government deposits to the national bank, and the continuation of its privileges.

Besides this expression of opinion, the Senate (equivalent to our House of Lords) has decided, by a great majority, that the conduct of the President, in withdrawing the government deposits from the United States' Bank, by which commercial embarrassments were first created, was illegal and unconstitutional, while the House of Representatives (equivalent to our House of Commons) have come to a totally different conclusion. It will be seen, by another part of our paper, that the President's conduct had led to mobbing and rioting in the city of New York, which is a new feature in the character of the American people, and one which we had always understood would never be developed by a population celebrated for their intelligence and political freedom. This, it will be acknowledged, is a most distressing state of affairs in which the United States are placed, and leads to very sober reflections. Hitherto, this great republic, which presents the only correct instance in modern times of a people governing themselves, and that without the aid of an aristocracy and monarchy, has been looked upon by millions of individuals in Europe as an important political experiment in the act of being fairly put to the test of trial. The present collision of the various branches of the government is, therefore, calculated to alarm those who put faith in the capability of a democracy to carry on successfully the national management. And should the collision produce a dismemberment of the confederation of states, or in any other way cause a violation of the constitution, it will at once be argued, without regard to the peculiar circumstances in the present instance, that the republican form of government does not possess the principles of stability; for that here it has had a singularly favourable trial, and has proved as luckless as all similar institutions in the days of Grecian and Roman "freedom."

The tumults, and severe commercial distress of the United States, granting that they lead to no such unpleasant result, may still be considered useful testimony of the want of stability in the nation, and that little serves to disturb the public tranquillity. When we compare the condition of the Union with the fixity of system of Great Britain, this looseness comes prominently into view. Within the last fifty years, Great Britain has withstood shocks, both politically and in pecuniary affairs, which would have ruined all the governments in the world. In 1797, William Pitt had the hardihood to cause the Bank of England to stop payment in gold, and at this period the amount of circulation was about ten millions of pounds sterling. The resumption of cash payments did not take place for upwards of twenty years; and unless the nation had possessed enormous resources, such a measure would most likely have destroyed nearly all the institutions in the country, and produced a state of dismal anarchy and suffering. This and many other occurrences in recent times prove the extraordinary stability of the usages of society in Great Britain, and the difficulty of upsetting the government, whatever be the changes of administration. Perhaps it is unfair to compare an old established country with one set up within the last half century; but it is not in this way that the question will be reasoned. Should the United States of America suffer seriously by their present exigency, the faith put in the experiment of republicanism will be greatly shaken, and many attached friends, in the abstract, to that form of government, will doubtless relapse into the respectable belief, that the mixture of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, in the old country, is still the best possible state arrangement compatible with the infirmity of human nature.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

For several weeks subsequent to the total suppression of the recent disturbances, the French government continued to make arrests of all suspected persons. In the Chamber of Deputies, after a discussion which lasted a whole week, the Ministry suffered a partial defeat on their estimate for the colony of Algiers, which was reduced from 400,000 to 150,000 francs; in other words, L.10,000 have been economised. Marshal Soult, however, has obtained a supplementary vote of credit from the French Chambers, for about a million and a half sterling, to defray the charges of the increase in the army, which the disturbed state of the country renders necessary. This vote was not carried without considerable opposition, the numbers being 196 to 142. Great exertions are making for the approaching elections. The Carlists expect to return thirty members; but from the desire of repose which animates the middle classes, it is anticipated that the government will obtain a great majority.

PORTUGAL.

In the beginning of April, the government of Don Pedro issued a decree, which destroys the exclusive privilege hitherto enjoyed by the English, of having their manufactures admitted into Portugal at duties of fifteen per cent. ad valorem, instead of thirty per cent., which other nations have paid. Now all are to be admitted on equal rates of duty.

The adherents of Donna Maria have been uniformly successful in the north of Portugal. Coimbra and Figueiras are said to have fallen into their hands. But in the south, Sa da Bandeira has experienced a series of defeats. As usual, we have accounts of the desperate condition of Miguel, the desertion of his troops, &c.; but are by no means certain that they are more to be depended upon than heretofore.

SPAIN.

It was officially announced on April 19th, by the Spanish government, that General Rodil had entered Portugal with a considerable body of troops. Don Carlos very narrowly escaped being captured by him, at Almeida, which declared for the Queen of Portugal on the approach of her Spanish allies. General Thomas Zumalacarréguy has defeated Quesada in a serious action in Lower Navarre. The royalists retired to Pampeluna. The quadruple treaty between England, France, Spain, and Portugal, renders these successes of the Carlists of little value. It is said to be in pursuance of the terms of the treaty which was ratified by Spain, that 12,000 stand of arms have been shipped by the British government to Corunna for the use of the queen's troops. At the same time, the Spanish Ministry thus strengthened issued decrees of confiscation against the property of the Carlist clergy, especially in the diocese of Burgos. As if to counterbalance these favourable circumstances, the Spanish finances remain in a very unsettled state. None of the offers for the new loan have been accepted, and the Cortes bondholders are again disappointed in the hopes of even a partial recognition of their claims.

Intelligence has also been received that Quesada has experienced a most disgraceful defeat in the north, owing, it is said, principally to his extreme rashness.

UNITED STATES.

ACCORDING to late news from America, we find that the city of New York, at the time when the packet sailed, and for several previous days, was the scene of most unexampled tumult, occasioned by a contest for the office of mayor between the Jacksonian and opposition parties. The election lasted three days, during the whole of which time the city was in a state of the greatest disturbance and confusion—several thousands of each party parading the streets, armed with bludgeons, dirks, and other weapons, and attacking each other whenever an opportunity offered. On the third day things assumed a very serious appearance; one of the parties having seized upon the arsenal, and armed themselves with muskets, which they loaded with ball cartridges. The troops were then called out, and the arms were got back again. Considerable numbers on both sides were severely wounded, as well as many of the policemen. On the 15th, the city was comparatively quiet. In the meantime, numerous failures are daily taking place, and commercial credit in New York and other large towns seems to have been shaken to its basis. The refusal of General Jackson to re-charter the bank of the United States, by placing his veto on the bill for that purpose, which had received, after long deliberation, the sanction of both Houses of Congress, has gained him the favour of some of the private bankers, and of the extreme democrats; but it appears to have entailed upon him the odium of the high commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests of the nation.

The last arrival from New York brings a protest by President Jackson against the resolutions passed by the Senate, in which his conduct in regard to the bank was declared to be a violation of the constitution. This document covers nine columns of a paper as large as the Times, and is devoted principally to proving that the Senate has exceeded its powers, and invaded the province of the executive. The excitement on the bank question seems to augment from day to day, and "scoundrel," "tyrant," "traitor," are the terms familiarly applied to the hero of New Orleans. At a meeting in Boston, attended by ten thousand persons, very strong resolutions against the President's conduct were passed. Still the old soldier adheres to his first determination, and as long as the House of Representatives supports him, it will be a difficult matter to drive him from it.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

WE learn by an advertisement in the Sydney Monitor of 6th November last, that many females of respectable family and connections, who had arrived in New South Wales, were in distress for want of situations, and such females were informed that for the next two months their advertisements for places would be inserted in the paper gratis. We perceive by other advertisements, that employment is wanted by a number of persons, including bakers, farm servants, painters and glaziers, shoemakers, and nursery maids. All this indicates that neither unmarried females nor working people are now much in demand in New South Wales, and that these classes should not emigrate thither, unless previously engaged. The same papers are filled with accounts of robberies, thefts, and outbreaks of crime and drunkenness, presenting altogether a view of the state of society in the colony at which the heart sickens. While the town of Sydney was tormented with the vices of its unfree population, the country was distracted with the murderous outrages of bushrangers. A Major Mudie on Hunters' river, writes, that his house of Castle Forbes, and that of a Mr Larnach, had been attacked and plundered. "They have taken (he says) all our plate, worth L.50; and our clothes, tea, sugar, flour, pork, and tobacco, with fire-arms, and two horses. Here if you punish a man, he runs in the bush;" that is to say, if you correct your servant, he swears vengeance, and becomes a robber. The editor of the Monitor continues—"Since writing the preceding account of the attack on Mr Larnach, another letter has been received from Major Mudie, stating that the bushrangers attacked Castle Forbes a second time, on Tuesday morning at break of day, when finding the major prepared, they retired, and went to Mr Cobb's farm, distant a mile and a half. A Mr Sparks was in charge; they first threatened his life, but afterwards contented themselves with tying him to a post in the kitchen, stripping him, and flogging him. They took away a horse, saddle and bridle, clothes, watch, and several other articles. They informed Mr Sparks of all the punishments that had been awarded by the bench the day before, which evidences the communication they keep up with people about the court. They said they did not expect to be long in the bush, but they should die satisfied if they had the heads of the major and Mr Larnach. On Tuesday night they attacked Mr Dutton, robbed him of a chest of tea, bag of sugar, a quantity of slops, some spirits, two fowling-pieces, a double-barrelled gun, powder and shot, a horse, saddle and bridle. They told Mr Dutton they should leave a sentry near the house for the space of two hours, who would shoot all who left the premises. Messrs Scott and Larnach, and two of the mounted police, with twenty others armed, and some blacks, are now in pursuit. It is believed the bushrangers have twenty stand of arms with them, and four horses.—Extract from a letter dated Maitland, 10 p. m. the 13th November:—'Major Mudie's men, seven in number, who had taken the bush, have all been captured at Lamb's valley, about ten miles from Maitland, and have just passed my door in custody of the police.' From this it appears that the reign of these men has been unusually short. We are glad to hear Mr Larnach was at the head of the pursuit. There is nothing like fighting hard when fighting times come, and putting on a good courage. It tends to discourage the friends and abettors of the marauders, and to create a reaction in your favour among them." After reading these accounts, which are a small sample of the general contents of Sydney newspapers, who, we ask, would be so foolish as emigrate to New South Wales? What peasant or farmer would leave this peaceful country to proceed to a territory where in many places they would never be sure of their lives for four and twenty hours? Who would prefer such a condition of things to the decency of manners and comfortable state of life to be found in Upper Canada?

PARLIAMENT.

1. REPEAL OF THE UNION WITH IRELAND.

Apr. 21. Mr O'CONNELL having been called on by the Speaker, brought forward his motion for a repeal of the union, and spoke for a very considerable length of time on the necessity for this measure. He mentioned, he was a sincere friend to the British connection, and advocated repeal because he thought it would prevent separation. It was his eventual object to propose that a federal connection should be established between the two countries. In the restoration of the Parliament little difficulty would be found. They had the king, they had the lords; it would only be necessary to fix an Irish House of Commons upon the basis of the reform act, a basis which the universal Irish people would receive and sanction. To sum up in a few words the substance of what he had addressed to the house: he had shown the effect of the union upon trade and manufactures, upon imports and exports, on the labourers and artizans of both countries, on the morals of both, on the spirit of liberty and national independence—he had shown the possible effect of the union on the question of totality—he had shown the facility with which the connection might be formed; and he had shown, with which Ireland could be governed by a Parliament of its own instead of a despotic rule. England, he had shown, had not made Ireland happy or done justice; and now, in the name of Ireland, he called for a restoration of her Parliament. He concluded by moving for a "select committee to inquire and report on the means by which the dissolution of the union of Ireland was effected; on the effects of the measure upon Ireland, and upon the labourers, bandry and operatives in manufactures in England, and on the probable consequences of continuing legislative union between both countries."—When Mr O'Connell concluded his long speech, it was midnight.—Mr SPRING RICE said he was ready to go on, if the house wished it; but it was agreed to adjourn the debate.—On Wednesday, the order of day having been read for resuming it, Mr SPRING RICE commenced his reply to Mr O'Connell, who, in his absence from the house (occasioned by indisposition), he very much regretted, though he would assist Mr O'Connell and his friends that he would do nothing in his absence which he should not be equally ready to say were he in his place. Mr RICE then proceeded to remark upon the substitution of a select committee for a committee of inquiry, instead of which Mr O'Connell had originally given notice of, and in a long and exceedingly clever speech pointed out the advantages which Ireland had derived from its connection with England. After quoting several of the more violent passages from Mr O'Connell's speech, and pointing out their manifest tendency to produce agitation in Ireland, he concluded by stating the substance of the amendment he intended to move.—Other speakers followed on the same side, and after some discussion the debate was adjourned till Monday the 28th.—This day the debate being resumed, Mr D. Callaghan, Mr Finn, O'Connor Don, Dr Ronayne, and Dr Baldwin, supported Mr O'Connell's motion. Sergeant Perrin, Sir R. Bateson, Mr Lefroy, Mr Cutlar Fergusson, Sir H. Vyvyan, and Colonel Torrens, spoke against it. The speech generally were not remarkable for eloquence, but throwing new light on the subject, and furnishing a little matter for extract.—Mr O'CONNELL, in his reply, said he did not know whether he had succeeded in effecting any change in the sentiments of the house towards him, but certainly the house had acted so as to alter his feelings towards it. The manner of the discussion and the topics raised in the course of it could only do good. If the argument of his opponents were true, and good, it would be duly weighed and appreciated by his fellow-countrymen, a shrewd and intelligent people, but the extraordinary and overwhelming majority which might be arrayed against the motion would weigh quite the other way, and produce a feeling of irritation instead of carrying conviction along with it. He had himself been unsparingly censured, because having given twenty-five years to the cause of his country, he was now paid by his countrymen for his services. He gloried in that censure, and was proud of that salary from his country than he could desire of the greatest gift which the highest monarch in the world could bestow. He would not, and did not desire any act which he considered derogatory to himself, was not to be frightened or shamed by what might be said on the subject. The autocrat Nicholas, for instance, would honour the man on whom he conferred his bounty; but the people of Ireland, he supposed, would be taken to degrade the man on whom they bestowed theirs! Mr O'Connell concluded by calling upon Ministers to follow up their victory by means of justice and conciliation towards Ireland.—The motion then divided: for Mr O'Connell's motion, 387; for Mr Spring Rice's amendment, 523; majority, 485.

2. TRADES' UNIONS.

Apr. 28. The Duke of NEWCASTLE, having addressed to the processions of the trades' unions which had lately appeared under the pretence of attending meetings, Lord MELBOURNE said that government was on its guard against such riotous assemblages.—Mr ELDON was decidedly of opinion that all such gatherings were illegal.—Lord BROUGHAM concurred with Lord Eldon in thinking vast and unnecessary assemblies of men illegal; but the Minister was peculiarly in a difficult situation as regarded the means to be taken for preventing them. His lordship trusted the members of the trades' unions would listen to wise advice given by those who had always been the friends of the humbler classes, and that they would no longer be deluded by treacherous and selfish leaders. It was because he was the sincere friend of the working classes of the country that he was an enemy to trades' unions; and he would add, that, of all the worst things and of all the most pernicious devices that could be imagined for the injury of the interests of the working classes, as well as the interests of the country at large, nothing was half so bad as the existence of those trades' unions.—A similar discussion took place in the House of Commons.—Mr HUME presenting a petition, signed by many thousands, from Newcastle, in favour of a mitigation of the punishment of the Dorchester unionists, on the ground that they were ignorant of the law under which they were convicted, complained that the government had shown great weakness in carrying so hastily into execution a sentence, which many lawyers considered illegal.

which was certainly harsh and severe.—The who addressed the house concurred in condemning the conduct of the trades' unions.—Sir HARDINGE strongly reprobated the unions. Mr. Harcourt had requested him not to press for a coat of arms, as his journeymen had struck. Mr. Harcourt told him, that, rather than such abominations should be submitted to, he would go out in his shirt.—Several other petitions in favour of the trades' unions were presented, and the discussion closed.

3. OBSERVANCE OF THE SABBATH.

30. After a great number of petitions had been presented to the House of Commons for and the Sabbath observance bill, Sir ANDREW ADEY moved that it be read a second time. His remarks were quite inaudible in the gallery. The other members who supported the second reading expressed approbation of several parts of the measure, but contending that the vast number of petitions for the better observance of the Sabbath should induce the house to commit the bill. It was also urged that there were numerous classes who deserved protection, and were compelled to work at present against the sense of religious duty, on the Lord's day.—Mr. L. BULWER moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months. He said that so far from creating a reverence for the Sabbath, the bill would tend to bring it into disrepute. "Sir Andrew Agnew said in his first clause (continued Mr. Bulwer) that the comforts and conscientious scruples of the class were not to be sacrificed to the supposed merit and advantage of another; yet all the rest of the bill was ingeniously framed to contradict the term with which he commenced at the outset; and by he asserted that no part of the gloomy passages of his bill extended to menial servants in the employment of their masters." Mr. Bulwer concluded that Sir Andrew Agnew had no authority in Scripture, or in the Fathers, for "the harlequinade which would convert the Christian Sunday into the Sabbath."—Mr. R. POTTER showed, from his personal experience, that the bill would materially curtail the enjoyment and recreation of the industrious classes.—Mr. ROEBUCK, Mr. O'CONNELL, and other members, opposed the bill on the grounds stated by previous speakers on the same side.—The house divided, when the bill was rejected by a majority of 161 for the amendment, and 144 for the original motion.—May 15. Lord WYNDHAM moved in the House of Lords, moved the second reading of his bill for the better observance of the Sabbath. His lordship spoke with considerable vehemence in support of his measure, which provoked several retorts from Lord BROUGHAM.—The Earl of WICKLOW complained of the levity with which the subject had been treated by the Chancellor; and Lord WYNDHAM, in reply, thanked God he was incapable of imitating him.—Lord PLUNKETT, Lord AUCKLAND, and Lord RADNOR, strongly opposed the bill.—The Earl of LONDON and Lord WICKLOW wished it to be withdrawn, especially as a measure from the Commons on the same subject would shortly appear. But Lord WYNDHAM refused to withdraw it, though he was willing to remove objectionable clauses in committee.—Their lordships then divided; and the second reading was carried by 16 to 13.

4. OFFICIAL SEATS IN PARLIAMENT.

1. Sir ROBERT HERON moved, in the House of Commons, for leave to bring in a bill "to prevent the necessity of members accepting certain offices on condition of their seats." He said, that, previous to the passing of the reform act, no member would have conceived the idea of depriving the people of any share in the privilege of checking the prerogative of the Crown in the appointment of its Ministers; but now that the system was reformed, and that it would be utterly impossible for any administration to retain office for any length of time if opposed to the general feeling of the country, it did appear to him that the existing system was necessary, inconvenient, and embarrassing. He proposed that the principal members of the government should not vacate their seats on the acceptance of office, and that the bill should not come into operation till after the next general election.—Mr. J. BULWER said that the remedy proposed by Sir Robert Heron would only meet part of the evils of the present system. The measure he would introduce should be one organ in that house of each of the principal departments of the state; but he would not give members not elected by the people the right of vote possessed by their actual representatives. Mr. Bulwer concluded by moving an amendment, that "for the convenience of the public service, and the promotion of the public interests, it is desirable that one of the most influential departments should have its seat in this house, in virtue of his office, but without the privilege of voting, unless returned to Parliament by the suffrages of a constituency."—Dr. H. J. MORTON said that the principle of both motions was to destroy one of the most valuable privileges of electors.—After some other members addressed the house, Lord ALTHORP said that the inconvenience of the existing system, did not think it at present sufficiently pressing to them to interfere with the important privilege of the people.—Both the original motion and the amendment were withdrawn.

5. COMMUTATION OF TITHES IN IRELAND.

May 2. Mr. LITTLETON moved the second reading of the bill for the commutation of tithes in Ireland.—Mr. M. O'FERRAL moved a series of resolutions by way of amendment, the effect of which was to extinguish tithe, and substitute a certain poundage on rent, &c.—After some discussion, the amendment was lost by a majority of 241 to 74, and the debate adjourned.—May 6. After an altercation between Mr. Stanley and Mr. O'Connell, in which the latter accused the right hon. Secretary of habitually insulting the house by "throwing his heels on the table," the adjourned debate was resumed, when Mr. RONAYNE declared that this bill was intended to extort tithes under another name, and moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months.—Some of the Irish members spoke in support of the amendment.—Mr. O'CONNELL entreated the government to reconsider their measure, and said, "he would willingly give up all his darling pursuits, and retire into private life, if the Ministry would only bring forward some plan to do justice to Ireland, by relieving the people from the obligation of paying the clergy of a different religion from that which they themselves professed." He proposed that, as one-fifth of the tithe was to be given up by the clergy, one-fifth by the landlord, and one-fifth by the government, the remaining two-fifths should be levied on the land as a land-tax, which might be bought by the landlord at twenty years' purchase. This would secure the assent of all parties. After securing to every existing incumbent the full amount of his present tithes for life, he proposed, that, on the death of each incumbent, the tithes should go to a general fund to be applied to the support of charities, and perhaps a small portion for the purchase of glebes for the support of the Catholic clergy. He concluded by apologising for any thing he had said in haste or anger at the commencement of his speech.—Mr. STANLEY opposed Mr. O'Connell's plan, but expressed himself gratified with the conciliatory tone of the learned member's observations.—After some discussion in the same spirit, the vote was taken upon the amendment, which was rejected by 248 to 52; and the bill was read a second time.

6. FOREIGN POLICY.

May 5. The Marquis of LONDONDERRY moved, in the House of Lords, for some papers relative to our connection with Spain and Portugal, and the imprisonment of Sir John Campbell in a dungeon at Lisbon. The tenor of his observations was condemnatory of the foreign policy of Ministers in all parts of the world. He thought that Talleyrand had completely overreached the British Ministers; and he considered that diplomatist as one whom it was unsafe to trust. With regard to Sir John Campbell, the marquis said that his treatment by the Pedroites was infamous; that his capture was illegal, as at the time it occurred he was not in the Miguelite service; and that the place and severity of his imprisonment were highly disgraceful to the Portuguese government. He had suffered eight months' solitary confinement in a dungeon, and Ministers ought to interfere in his behalf. Other British subjects might be seen in chains in Lisbon.—Earl GREY said, that the King's Advocate had been consulted, and had stated that there were no grounds on which to demand the liberation of Sir John Campbell, who had been fairly taken a prisoner of war while bearing dispatches of Viscount Santarem, Don Miguel's Secretary of State. This, however, did not justify the alleged cruel treatment of him. As regarded the other British subjects who were said to be worked in chains in the streets of Lisbon, Earl Grey denied that the statement was correct. He defended the foreign policy pursued by Ministers at some length, and passed a high encomium on the honesty, candour, singleness of purpose, and sincere patriotism of Prince Talleyrand.—After some discussion, it was agreed that such papers as Earl Grey thought could be granted without injury to the public service should be laid on the table.—May 9. In the House of Commons, Mr. ROBINSON, on the motion that the house should go into a committee of the whole, moved as an amendment for papers relative to the late decree of the Portuguese government, equalising the duties on all foreign manufactures.—Lord ALTHORP objected to the amendment being proposed at a time when he was going to call the attention of the house to the reduction of the four per cents.—But Mr. ROBINSON persevered, and made some severe remarks upon the ignorance, incapacity, and bad success of Lord Palmerston in the management of our foreign relations.—Lord PALMERSTON defended himself very briefly, and admitted that he knew nothing of the Portuguese decree until after it had been issued.—After a debate, in which Mr. Baring, Mr. Poulett Thompson, and Dr. Lushington, took part, the motion was withdrawn.—May 16. In reply to some questions by Sir Richard Vyvyan, Lord PALMERSTON stated, that the treaty relative to the affairs of the Peninsula had been signed by the four contracting powers, and ratified by three of them. The ratification of Portugal had been delayed by matters of form, but might be almost immediately expected. He also said that General Rodil had entered Portugal with the full consent of the government of Portugal, and certainly not with the disapprobation of the British cabinet. The general had confined his operations to dislodging Don Carlos and his adherents from the Spanish frontiers; but the presence of the Spanish army had allowed several fortified towns to declare in favour of the queen. As to foreign interference in the Portuguese quarrel, he thought it would appear that there had been about as much on one side as the other. Lord Palmerston refused to state the terms of the quadruple treaty at present.

7. THE PENSION LIST.

May 5. Mr. HARVEY, in the House of Commons, moved "that an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that he might be graciously pleased to give directions that an inquiry might be made into the pension list, as ordered to be printed by his faithful Commons on the 28th of August 1832, with the view that no person be allowed to continue on that list, in the receipt of the public money, but such only as had a real claim on the benevolence of the monarch, or those who, by the discharge of their duties in the public service, or by their attainments in science, had deserved the gracious consideration of their sovereign and of their country." It was contended by Mr. Harvey, and by several members who voted for his motion, that no persons were entitled to places on the pension list except those who had earned the public money by the performance of some public service. This principle had been adopted by Lord Althorp and several of his colleagues, when in opposition, on two recent occasions—in 1828, on a motion by Mr. Hume; and in 1830, when the Wellington cabinet was turned out by the success of Sir Henry Parnell's motion on the civil list. It was then urged that the pension list was subject to revision, and that the civil list ought not to be voted until it had undergone the scrutiny of a committee. When Lord Althorp and his friends succeeded to office, they did indeed appoint a committee; but it was a mere deception as far as the pension list was concerned; for the power to send for and examine papers and persons was not conceded to it. The Ministers proposed to effect a prospective reduction of the pension list to £75,000, charging that amount on the civil list, and the remaining £85,000 on the consolidated fund; which fund was to receive the benefit of all the pensions which fell in by death or resignation. The House of Commons sanctioned this arrangement; and the supporters of Mr. Harvey's motion were willing to abide by it, and by no means desired to reduce the £75,000 granted to his Majesty, by a single shilling. But the right of the house to inquire into the state of the pension list, to ascertain in what manner the Crown—that is to say, the responsible advisers of the Crown—had performed their duty as regarded the placing of proper or improper persons on that list, had never been relinquished. It was the duty of the representatives of the people to see that this portion of the public money was properly laid out, as well as any other, and to address the King to remove from his pension list any individuals whom he had been wrongly advised to place on it. That there were many names on that list which never ought to have been there, no one disputed. In the eyes of the nation, it was a mass of deformity, hideous and disgusting. There were 208 titled ladies and gentlemen out of the 1303 persons of whom the list was made up. Some of these names were read by Mr. Harvey from a paper, one of numerous contributions that had been sent to him on the subject. He added, that he had heard that Ministers were prepared to resign, if they were beaten on the motion before the house. But that was not a point about which the house need give itself much concern; for this was the fourth time that the threat of resignation had been held out, and it was grown stale; besides, there would be no difficulty in finding an administration to succeed Lord Althorp and his colleagues, even if they did go out in defence of that pension list, whose enormities they had for a great many years so warmly denounced.—Lord ALTHORP opposed the motion, on the ground that it could not be acceded to without a gross breach of faith towards individuals. The pensioners had a legal claim to their grants during the life of his present Majesty. With regard to such of them as possessed large property besides, he would say nothing of their continuing to receive the pension. Were he so circumstanced, he would not receive it. He knew that this was a very popular subject; but it was one thing to speak of a man's feelings on this question, and another, and quite a different thing, to take away his legal right.—Mr. STURTT proposed an amendment, "that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the charges on the civil list and on the consolidated fund, in order to ascertain the nature and extent of the grants of pensions and charges, and to inquire into the abuses (if any) arising out of such grants and charges, with a view to give full effect to the resolution of that house of the 18th of February last." He was convinced that the character of the Parliament, and the wishes of the country, required that a full inquiry should be made into the pension list; but it would be most disrespectful to the crown to impose so invidious a task upon his Majesty, and they had within themselves the means of inquiry. It would not be dealing justly with those who had been receiving pensions, under the very natural impression that they were to be continued during their lives, to take them away on the plea of some technical flaw in the legality of their claim to them.—Mr. ROMILLY seconded the amendment.—Lord ALTHORP saw but little to choose between the motion and the amendment, and should feel it his duty to resist both. The prime ministers for the time being were the persons responrible for these pensions, and it could scarcely be worth the trouble to pass votes of censure on ministers who had long been in their graves.—After a lengthened discussion, which presented no new features, the house divided, when there appeared for Mr Harvey's motion, 143; against it, 390; majority against the motion, 242.—The house next divided on Mr Strutt's amendment, when there appeared for the amendment, 230; against it, 311; majority against the amendment, 81.

8. AMENDMENT OF THE POOR-LAWS.

May 9. The second reading of the poor-laws amendment bill having been moved, Sir SAMUEL WHALLEY objected to the proposed measure, particularly to that part of it which threw upon the mother the burden of maintaining her illegitimate offspring. The transfer of the local power into the hands of government was as unconstitutional, too, as it was absurd. In the parish of Marylebone, since the introduction of the representative system, there had been an annual saving of £50,000 out of an expenditure of £180,000. He concluded by proposing, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.—Mr GROTE approved as well of the main ends of the bill, as of the machinery by which those ends were proposed to be accomplished. The genuine object of the poor-laws was to furnish comfortable shelter for the aged and infirm, and to provide work for able-bodied persons who could not procure employment. Now, the aggregate expenditure on the poor-laws, for the year ending March 1832, was £7,036,000. What proportion of this sum had been employed in setting labourers to work? No more than £354,000, less than 1-20th of the whole! But this abusive expenditure was nothing in his estimation to the evil effect of these laws on the character of the labourer. Now, every page of the report teemed with evidence that the poor-laws throughout England are so administered as to corrupt and degrade the labourers to the last degree, to afford a premium on idleness and improvidence, and to place in the worst condition the most deserving characters—those labourers who worked the hardest, and who deferred the period of marriage from an anxious desire to maintain their independence. When I read (continued Mr Grote) such a catalogue of evils as this, I ask myself whether it is possible to escape from them without some comprehensive alteration of the defective system under which they have grown up. It seems to me impossible; and therefore it is that I call upon the house to read this bill a second time, in order that its provisions and details may be carefully considered in committee. I know that I do this at no small risk of popularity; for I understand that a petition was this day presented from my constituents, directed strongly against this bill. It is not without the deepest regret that I find myself opposed to constituents to whom I am attached by every tie, and to whom I owe the honourable station which I now occupy; but so strong is my conviction of the absolute necessity of some large remedial measure as an antidote to the overwhelming evil of pauperism—so firm is my belief of the necessity of some central supervising agency to secure the fulfilment of any salutary provisions which the legislature may prescribe—that if it cost me the certain sacrifice of my seat, I should feel bound to do my best to promote the attainment of this necessary, and, in the main, valuable remedy.—After some farther discussion, the house divided, when the second reading was carried by a majority of 319 to 20.—May 14. Previously to the house going into committee on the bill, Mr ROBINSON moved, 1. That the report of the poor-laws commissioners affords conclusive evidence of the deplorable state of the working classes. 2. That it is the bounden duty of the legislature to look into the causes which have contributed to produce a state of widespread pauperism. And, 3. That the house will endeavour to improve the moral and social condition of the labouring poor, by the encouragement of industry.—Lord ALTHORP opposed the amendment; and after considerable discussion on the first clause of the bill, granting extensive powers to a central board of commissioners, it was agreed to.

9. CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

May 12. The LORD CHANCELLOR presented a petition from 48,690 dissenters and others, inhabitants of Glasgow, praying for the abolition of the unity between church and state. His lordship said, that, with a great deal of the prayer of the petition, he might say in the most important portion of it, he entirely agreed; he alluded to that part of it which prayed the house to take the claims of the dissenters, not of Scotland only, but of the United Kingdom generally, into their early and serious consideration, and to redress the grievances of which they complained. He need not remind their lordships or the petitioners that there was no individual, either in or out of Parliament, who had expressed a more uniform, consistent, and zealous friendliness to the principles of religious toleration, nor any one who had ever exceeded him in advocating them to the utmost of their extent. These views he had always supported, and now he would not depart from them, and he faintly hoped they were principles which were fast spreading, and would soon lead to the perfecting of religious liberty. But holding that opinion—imbued as he was with, and acting on these principles—he went along with the petitioners in the first and important part of their prayer. With the residue of that prayer he had felt it his duty to state to the deputation that had waited on him, what he had never disguised from their lordships, and what he could not coincide in, that their lordships would take measures in order to the dissolution of what they called "the unjust, unscriptural, and injurious connection between church and state." That was a new expression, which had crept in between political and religious controversy; but he took it to mean, although it certainly could not be called a very happy expression—that it was intended to mean a dissolution, not of the connection between church and state, but that there should no longer be any religious establishment at all, and that the principle of a voluntary church should be substituted; and the state should not provide in any way, or any means, for the religious instruction of the people; but that all sects, all individuals, whether ignorant or instructed, whether ill-informed or well-informed, should be left to provide for themselves the means of religious instruction. To that extent he (the Lord Chancellor) did not accompany the prayer of the petitioners. His argument was the necessity there existed for the establishment of a church of one body of clerical men, set apart to instruct the people in their moral and religious duties. Such an establishment had always been found to have excluded the very great injury of an intended licence to fanaticism among the people. It was stated in the petition that religious establishments were unsanctioned by our Saviour and his Apostles, and opposed to their writings and injunctions. He (the Lord Chancellor) saw no ground whatever in the Holy Writ to found such a statement. As to the second statement of the petitioners, that an establishment was prohibited by scriptural injunction; if it were so, the arguments he had urged in its favour cadet questro were at an end. The Lord Chancellor was extremely glad that it was only to this extent that he disagreed with the petitioners; they stated a number of other points upon which he had always thought, and still thought, that the dissenters were greatly aggrieved, and that they had a just right to complain; and his lordship specifically alluded to the marriage act, which it was his desire to have repealed, and allow dissenters to be married in their own chapels.—After some remarks from other members, the petition was laid on the table.

10. DURATION OF PARLIAMENTS.

May 15. Mr TENNYSON moved for leave to bring in a bill to shorten the duration of Parliaments. He referred to his speech on the same subject last year, as a reason for speaking briefly on the present occasion. He reminded the house of Mr Charles Grey's declaration in 1793, of the inexpediency of shortening the duration of Parliaments until after the House of Commons should have been reformed, which he thought furnished an answer to those members of Earl Grey's government who now contended against his motion on the ground that the reform act had rendered it unnecessary. He announced his intention, if the bill were brought in, to move, that, in future, Parliaments should not sit longer than three years.—Lord DALMENY deprecated frequent elections, on the ground that they would enable the people to exercise an undue and dangerous influence over their representatives.—Lord ALTHORP said, it was true that he had several times voted—he did not know that he had spoken, but he had several times voted—for shortening the duration of Parliaments. These were during the unreformed Parliament; and he would state the grounds on which he had so voted. At that period he had not the least hope of seeing a measure of reform carried as had since been. He saw that a large proportion of the members of that house were sent there as the nominees of individuals; and he therefore thought that the power of the people should be brought to bear more frequently on those members of the house who were not so nominated—for he was of opinion that triennial Parliaments would greatly increase the dependence of the house on the people. He did not say it would be desirable that the members of that house should not be dependent on the people, but he did not think it would be desirable to have them dependent on every temporary or passing opinion of the people. He would have them sit for that length of time, that if on one occasion they might be in opposition to the opinion of their constituents, they might in the long-run gain their confidence. It was said that frequent elections would cause great interruptions to the public business, and in that he concurred. In the present session, no one could complain that business had not been done, and there had also been much done in the last; but in general, in the first session of a new Parliament, a great deal of the time of the house was occupied, not so much with the public business, but with a variety of motions, of which gentlemen on their first coming in hastily gave notice, and thus public business was delayed.—A lengthened but unimportant debate ensued.—On a division, there appeared for Mr Tennyson's motion, 185; against it, 235; majority for Ministers, 50.

11. MINOR SUBJECTS.

Apr. 24. On the motion of Mr ROBERT GRANT, the house went into committee to consider the civil disabilities of the Jews.

Apr. 28. The House of Commons refused to go into a committee on the Trinity harbour bill, by a majority of 26 to 10.

May 1. On the motion of the Earl of RADNOR, in the House of Lords, it was agreed that counsel be called in, and witnesses examined at the bar, in support of the bill for the disfranchisement of the Liverpool free-men.—A similar course was adopted with regard to the Warwick borough bill.

May 6. A select committee was appointed to inquire whether it might be expedient to establish one rate of duty on all descriptions of tea imported into the United Kingdom, instead of the graduated duties imposed by the act 3d and 4th William IV.—The same day, a select committee was appointed, on the motion of Mr SINCLAIR, to report how far the salaries of the Scottish judges are commensurate with their duties.—A motion by Mr GILLON, for an instruction to the committee to inquire how far the salaries should be reduced, in consequence of the alteration in the value of money, was rejected by 39 to 12.

May 9. Lord PLUNKETT, in the House of Lords, entered into an explanation of his conduct in regard to the appointment of his son to the deanery of Drogheda. He admitted that he had signed the report of the ecclesiastical commission, without being fully aware of the contents of it; but he had not read or signed the appendix, where the case of the union of parish in the deanery was especially mentioned.

May 13. Two bills for amending the laws relating to Scotch entails were read a second time in the House of Peers, after considerable opposition from Lord MANSFIELD and the Duke of HAMILTON.

May 15. On the motion of Mr CHARLES WILSON, new writs were ordered for Edinburgh, vacant by the removal of Mr Jeffrey to the bench of the Court of Session; for Leith, in the room of Mr J. A. Murray, who had accepted the office of Lord Advocate; and for North Derbyshire, in the room of Lord CAVENDISH, now Earl of Burlington.

ENGLAND.

The signal defeat of O'Connell and the other repeaters has given very general satisfaction all over the country, and in this instance, at least, there is a conviction that Parliament has done its duty. All the English and Scotch members present, and even a majority of the Irish representatives, voted an address to the King, declaratory of their firm resolve to preserve inviolate the legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland. Mr Hume proposed an amendment, which he afterwards withdrew, intended to pledge the house to remove all causes of complaint from Ireland.

The defeat of Sir Andrew Agnew's bill, relative to the keeping of the Sabbath, has likewise given very general pleasure, there being a belief that the law as at present constituted is quite adequate to punish breaches of the sabbath, and to preserve sacred that holy day. We repeatedly stated that the payment of weekly wages on Friday would at once extinguish Sunday trading, and be of great moral as well as physical benefit to the working classes.

FOUR PER CENT. ANNUITIES.

GOVERNMENT finding itself able to pay off a portion of the national debt at present standing at four per cent., by borrowing money at a lower rate of interest, issued the following scheme of reduction on the 7th of May:—"All holders of four per cent., commonly called the £4 per cent. annuities, of 1826, who do not signify their dissent, shall have for every £100 the said four per cent. £100 new three and a half per cent. annuities, the dividends upon which shall be payable 5th of January and 5th of July in each year. The said new three and a half per cent. annuities shall be added to, and consolidated with, the existing three and a half per cent. annuities, and shall be liable to redemption until the 5th of January 1834. The holders of four per cent. annuities, 1826, shall receive the half-year's dividend, which shall be due thereon on the 10th of October 1834, and the first dividend, namely, one quarter of a year's dividend, shall be payable upon the said new three and a half per cent. annuity, on the 5th of January 1835. Books will be opened at the Bank of England on Thursday 10th of May to Wednesday the 28th of May, both days inclusive, for receiving notices, by themselves or their agents, of those persons who may be desirous of signifying their dissent. Persons who shall be out of the United Kingdom during the whole of such period, shall, in such case, be permitted to express their dissent at any time before the 6th of July 1834; and any person who may be in any other part of the world, except Europe, shall be permitted to express their dissent at any time before the 1st of March 1835. Persons not signifying their dissent within the period before-mentioned shall be deemed to have assented. Persons signifying their dissent within these periods will be paid off in such order, at such time, and in such manner, as Parliament may direct."—To this plan there has been no demur upon the Stock Exchange.

THE DISSENTERS.

DURING the past month, the dissenters have been busy in pressing their claims, and their expectations, in all parts of England and Scotland. In the latter country, though there are almost no practical grievances to complain of, the determination of the dissenters is fully more resolute, and their esprit du corps much more conspicuous, than in the case of their brethren in England, where there is less union of purpose. We have in a former paper how parties stood in this remarkable matter of controversy, and our anticipations are daily the course of realisation. Neither the government nor the established churches are apparently aware of the deeply rooted dislike of the connection between church and state, as at present existing, which is gaining ground in the United Kingdom; for if they were, they would have hastened to extinguish complaint ere it reached the point it has attained. The meetings in the metropolis, the deputation which waited on Earl Grey from Glasgow, and that from the English dissenters which waited on Lord Althorp on May 3, are trifling testimonials of the widespread discontent on this subject. With regard to the deputation which waited on Lord Althorp, the committee represented to his lordship the feelings of the dissenters generally on the subject of the measures introduced by government avowedly for their relief. They all concurred in stating that the measures in question were regarded with the utmost dissatisfaction. Lord Althorp expressed his great surprise and disappointment that the measure had not met with the approbation of the body for whose relief it was intended; he never framed a measure since his accession to office which he thought more likely to prove satisfactory; and never had he brought in a measure to Parliament with greater satisfaction to himself. He also intimated his belief that the dissatisfaction was not universal: the dissenters in his own county of Northampton approved of Mr Griffiths, one of the Northampton deputation, and his lordship that he was altogether misinformed at that point. Lord Althorp again expressed his regret that his measures had not given satisfaction, but would not hold out any hopes of bringing forward any of a different description. Lord Brougham has brought two bills to the House of Lords, to relieve the dissenters of many grievances, and to abolish pluralities in the church, as well as enforce the constant residence of clergy on their livings. It is a pity this was not proposed sooner. If effected, it might have staved off the outcry about the church for another century. We may now place on record, that the plea offered by the present administration for their support of a church establishment, is simply to house the poor may thereby have religious instruction given. This also is Dr Chalmers's argument, and though theoretically excellent, it is in reality unavailing, for, in point of fact, the poor have been so much neglected by the endowed church, as to have already become dissatisfied, and the established churches, in towns especially, are attended only by the rich and some of the middle classes. This is an unfortunate statistical fact.

TRADES' UNIONS.

THESE confederacies of workmen seem to have increased to their utmost possible extent during the past month, and at length found a point beyond which they cannot constitutionally proceed. The English metropolitan and provincial papers have for some time been filled with notices of their meetings, as well as their wretched attempts to monopolise the trade of the country. The most noted of their wayward manœuvres was the getting up of an immense meeting at procession in London, for the purpose of petitioning his Majesty, through Lord Melbourne, for a revision of the sentence passed on the six men at Dorchester. This assemblage took place on Monday, April 2, in Copenhagen Fields, and considerable curiosity at some excitement prevailed throughout the city at some suburbs as to the probable number that might assemble on the occasion. A proclamation was issued on Saturday, by Sir F. A. Roe, warning all persons of the danger of attending such a meeting, and recommending them to keep out of the way of the probable consequences that might accrue.

Shortly after seven o'clock, the committee of the unions which was appointed to conduct the proceedings of the day, arrived on the ground on horseback. About twenty poles with flags attached to them were stuck in various parts of the field, to denote where the different trades were to take their stations. The first body, consisting of about 5000 men, marched throughington arm in arm at about eight o'clock, to the great alarm of the inhabitants. They were preceded by flags, and all of them wore a piece of red riband on their coats. They moved on in a very quiet manner. The various trades continued to arrive from different parts of the town in bodies of from five to six thousand each, and on getting into the field proceeded at once to the respective places assigned them, to which they were marshalled by the committee. The number of men on the ground soon after nine o'clock could not be less than 30,000. They were formed by their leaders into a hollow square, and went through a variety of evolutions quite in a military style. Shortly before ten o'clock, the petition was brought on the field in a cart made for the occasion, and ornamented with blue and yellow cloth. It was borne on the shoulders of twelve men. At this moment there was one shout of huzzas, but not the least confusion. The petition itself great bulk, and is said to have been signed by 2,000 persons, 100,000 of whom are unionists in the metropolis; the others are signatures from different unions in the country. About this time, Mr Owen of Lanark, and Dr Wade, in his canonicals, over whom he wore the scarlet badge of a doctor of divinity, arrived at Copenhagen House, and was received with cheers. It was universally remarked that not one single policeman was to be seen in the neighbourhood; and those who had come to the meeting up to the latest hour of its forming in procession, invariably stated that in the streets through which they passed from different parts of the town, not even the usual number of police were observable in their route.

After some arrangements had taken place, the deputation proceeded to Lord Melbourne's office, where they were received by Mr Phillips. This official and if they were a deputation from the meeting held that morning in Copenhagen Fields, and if they brought the petition from the body assembled there, accompanied by a procession through the streets to this point. They answered in the affirmative. Mr Phillips then said Viscount Melbourne was in the office, and he had his directions to say that his lordship could not receive a petition presented under such circumstances and in such a manner—that Viscount Melbourne had seen a copy of the petition—that he did not disapprove of the language of it—and that if that petition should be presented on another day, and in a becoming manner, he would receive and lay it before the King—that Viscount Melbourne directed him to add, he would always be ready to present to the King any petition respectfully worded and delivered in a proper manner. The deputation then retired, taking the petition with them without saying any thing farther; and the result of their visit having been communicated to the meeting, the various trades shortly after quietly dispersed.

One of the most ridiculous actions of these confederacies in London was the publication of a Declaration under the auspices, as it mentioned, of the "Executive Council of the Grand National Consolidated Trades' Union of Great Britain and Ireland." "And what a document this is! (remarks the intelligent editor of the Scotsman.) If the express object of the 'Executive Council' had been to bring ridicule on the whole body of which they are the organ, they could scarcely have accomplished their purpose more effectually. We have not room for the declaration, but shall mention the leading ideas embodied in it. First, they propose to render the working classes themselves the consumers as well as the producers of the conveniences and luxuries of life, and recommend that each trade shall open shops and offices for dealing with each other—the bakers' union to supply all unionists with bread, the butchers' ditto with flesh, the gardeners' with vegetables, the tailors' with clothes, &c. By this means, say they, the producers 'will be able to keep the greater part of the circulating medium in their own hands, and thereby become capitalists, and give what direction they please to industry, instead of being supplicants to the upper classes for leave to toil at what prices those classes may choose to offer.' This is Mr Owen's co-operation scheme, and quite worthy of its author! Nobody can object to the unionists buying of whom they please. Let them try the experiment, by all means. But the system of exclusive dealing is declared to be subordinate to the plan of raising wages by strikes, which otherwise, they observe, would, in the first place, reduce the demand for labour, and in the second, create a rise of prices, which, reacting upon the workman, would take from the one pocket what it put into the other. Strange, that after getting a glimpse of the truth in this way, they should still expect benefit from their plan! Such is their first grand expedient—and the second is even still more extraordinary. They wish to convince the government that 'it can no longer keep them in subjection to its tyrannical legislation by brute force;' and for this purpose every mechanic is charged to refuse to manufacture any article for the use of the army or the police; and masons, in particular, are enjoined not to build or repair barracks, jails, prisons, or workhouses! Thirdly, 'means must be devised for raising the self-respect of the labouring population, by instituting lectures, schools, club-houses, and coffeehouses, under their own control.' This is good as far as it goes; but, as a supplement to it, efforts, it seems, are to be made to expose the errors and gross ignorance of the non-productive classes, by establishing or encouraging journals friendly to the unionists! Such is the substance of this extraordinary document, the deplorable ignorance of which moves our pity too much to permit us to indulge in the censures which its bad spirit is calculated to provoke. We are sure that the working classes of Scotland, even those most devoted to the system of combination, must be ashamed of it. It is indeed so extremely absurd and fantastic, that if it were not for the bitterness of its tone, we should be inclined to regard it as a decoy, published to divert attention from the real objects of the unionists. If penned in sincerity, it almost amounts to a confession that their plans are hopeless; and the Chronicle informs us that the subscriptions to support strikes are every where failing in England, and the unions themselves falling to pieces. We hope yet to see the condition of the working classes greatly improved, and by their own efforts too, but assuredly not through the means they are now resorting to."

Among the various trades which struck in the metropolis, none made themselves so conspicuous as the tailors. This body of workmen, following the example of the other unionists, struck work for an advance of wages, diminished hours of labour at certain seasons, and other demands, which their leaders convinced them would be for the benefit of the trade. The regulations adopted by the journeymen tailors for general guidance are amongst the most ridiculous we have seen emanate from any of the unions, and they ought to be preserved as a commercial curiosity. The decree is as follows:—"No brother shall be allowed to work more than ten hours per day from the third Monday in the month of April to the last Saturday in the month of July; nor more than eight hours per day the remaining eight months of the year; and for such labour the remuneration shall be 6s. per day for the ten hours' labour, which is to be performed between the hours of seven o'clock in the morning and six o'clock in the evening; and 5s. per day for the eight hours' labour, to be performed between the hours of eight o'clock in the morning and five o'clock in the evening, out of which time, in either case, he shall leave his employer's premises one hour for refreshment. Nor shall any brother work for an employer any where but on his (the employer's) premises, which shall be healthy and convenient, or on any other terms than by the day or hour. And no person shall be allowed to solicit employment, or to work for less than the regular wages within four miles of Covent-Garden." The master tailors of the metropolis, however, very properly resisted this proposition of making all the journeymen masters. Immediately after the men left off work, the masters met to the number of 300 or 400, and agreed unanimously to resist the unjust demands of their workmen. The resolutions of this meeting wisely characterise the resolutions proposed to the master tailors as founded on gross injustice to the working man, inasmuch as they fix the maximum which an industrious man may earn, and make no distinction between the industrious and talented, and the incompetent and idle; and state farther, "That in order to encourage those men who are dissatisfied with the imperious mandate of the trades' union, that a committee be empowered to appoint houses of call for the reception of all workmen willing to secede from the unionists, and to be employed at the wages hitherto paid; and that this meeting pledge themselves to give exclusive support and encouragement to such men."

The London journeymen tailors' union, though long one of the strongest associations of the kind in the kingdom, had, on the present occasion, miscalculated their ability of standing out. The allowance first promised was 10s. per man, but it was with difficulty this sum was raised even at the end of the first week. The next week the allowance was reduced to 7s. 6d., and of this pittance only a moiety was paid on the Saturday night, and the remainder in the course of the week. Numbers, in consequence, seceded from the union, and very many more are only restrained from so doing by a cowardly fear of being waylaid and maltreated. In order to quiet the clamour, the ruling tyrants found it necessary so far to relax their rules as to allow of the men working at home for their private connections. This concession opens so wide a door for collusion, as to amount to almost a virtual abandonment of the "strike." On the third Saturday night not a penny of the promised 7s. 6d. was forthcoming, although the men were kept waiting till half-past one o'clock in the morning at their lodges. They were at last dismissed with an assurance that there was plenty of money, but it could not be got in till Monday, and that on Tuesday they should all be paid. The scene at the lodges was truly painful, wives with their children waiting in anxious hope of getting a trifle to market with.

By the latest accounts, it appears that many of the unions have already been abandoned by large bodies of their members, sometimes too late to get into employment again, and that several had entirely broken up. It is quite evident that this monstrous effort at intimidation has overshot the mark. The working classes are powerful, but only within the limits of the law. Their endeavours beyond this are worse than useless in a country such as Great Britain, where the power of public opinion, and the influence of the wealthy middle classes in preserving the constitution and rights of property, are altogether incalculable, and capable of frustrating all attempts like those above detailed. A little examination into the principles of political economy will show the operative classes the egregious error which they have committed.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COMMERCIAL IMPROVEMENTS ABROAD.

It is pleasant to witness the active spirit of improvement which is now at work in all parts of the civilised world, the zeal for the promotion of useful undertakings, and the avidity with which new inventions originating in one country are adopted by its neighbours. The Continent teems at this moment with projects intended to facilitate commercial and general intercourse. We shall enumerate a few: 1. A railroad, about 120 miles long, from Antwerp to Cologne on the Rhine, projected by the Belgian government, and to be executed, at least in part, at the public expense. Its object is to enable the Belgians to maintain commercial intercourse with Germany, by a shorter route than the Waal and Lower Rhine, and without being subject to the tolls of the Dutch. The scheme has been unanimously recommended by a committee of the senate. The last 30 or 40 miles pass through the Prussian states, and will of course be executed by Prussia. 2. A railroad from Amsterdam to Cologne, about the same length as the preceding; it is a rival Dutch scheme, apparently less necessary, but we are not acquainted with its details. 3. The last German papers inform us that the natural obstacles to the navigation of the Danube, existing below Belgrade, have at last been removed, so as to leave a free passage to the Black Sea. The first steam-boat from Vienna to Constantinople is to start in the beginning of July, and is expected to perform the voyage eastward in 10, and westward in 18 days. As the distance must be about 1500 miles, we suspect that the time is underestimated. This route, if fairly opened, would give Austria a strong interest in opposing the encroachments of Russia on Turkey, on the European side. 4. The steam communication with India by the Red Sea, has commenced. The Hugh Lindsay steamer left Bombay, 1st February, and reached Suez on the 4th of March: the distance is 3400 miles, and with good arrangements, the voyage might be performed, according to Captain Head, in 21 days; but 32 days for a first attempt is very well. A steam-packet sails regularly between Falmouth and Malta, making the voyage in 16 days, but no steam communication has yet been established between Malta and Alexandria. The letters by the Hugh Lindsay were therefore put on board a sailing vessel on the 10th day of March. The Hugh Lindsay had twelve passengers and two thousand letters. Dr Burnes, who was a passenger, says, "On the fourth, we cast anchor at Suez, where I am glad to say we found English engineers engaged in preparing plans for a railroad across the Isthmus, which I afterwards heard the Pasha say he intended to persevere in." The gain of time in this first attempt will not be above a month; but were steam navigation extended from Malta to Alexandria, and the periods of arrival and sailing properly adjusted to prevent unnecessary delay, there is little doubt that the passage between Bombay and Falmouth, which is four months by the Cape, might be shortened very speedily to six weeks, and ultimately perhaps to one month.—Scotsman.

REVOLUTIONARY VICTIMS IN FRANCE.

Account of the victims of the first French Revolution, from the statements of the Republican Prudhomme.

Priests shot	300
Priests drowned	460
Nobles drowned	1,400
Artizans drowned	5,300
Victims at Lyons	31,000
Total	1,030,954

It is in an especial manner remarkable in this dismal catalogue, how large a proportion of the victims of the Revolution were persons in the middling and lower ranks of life. The priests and nobles destroyed at Nantes are only 2160, while the infants drowned and shot are 2000, the women 764, and the artisans 5300! So rapidly, in revolutionary convulsions, does the career of cruelty reach the lower orders, and so widespread is the carnage dealt out to them compared with that which they have sought to inflict on their superiors.—Alison's History of the French Revolution.

DEATH OF LANDER, THE AFRICAN TRAVELLER.

Another victim has fallen in Africa—Richard Lander, the enterprising traveller, is dead! He died at Fernando Po, January 31, in consequence of wounds received in a skirmish with the natives on the banks of the New River. Three of his crew shared the fate of their leader, and six others were dangerously wounded. The following particulars of his melancholy end are given in a letter from the agent to Lloyd's at Fernando Po, dated Feb. 6, 1834:—"You will be sorry to be informed of the death of Richard Lander, who left this place some weeks since in the Craven cutter belonging to the company, taking with him a long-boat I let with him for the purpose. On his arrival at the Nunn he left the cutter, and proceeded up the river in the boat with about L.400 worth of goods to join the iron steam-boat, which he had sent up the river a few weeks before; she was to proceed about 300 miles up to a small island which he had purchased from the king, and where he had a factory. They had proceeded about 100 miles up, the current being strong against them. They were in good spirits, tracking the boat along shore, when they were fired on from the bush; three men were killed and four wounded; Mr Lander was one of the latter. They had a canoe of their own, and at the time they were fired on, the boat was aground; and to save themselves, they were obliged to leap into the canoe, and make the best of their way; they were immediately followed by five or six war canoes, full of men, keeping up a continued fire for five hours, until it got dark, when they lost sight of them; they arrived here on the 27th ult. Mr Lander expired this morning. The ball entered near his hip, and worked down to the thick of the thigh. It was a most malicious and treacherous attack. Mr Lander told me that they were Bonny, Brass, and Benin canoes; so that, from these circumstances, I am of opinion that some of the slavers, or other Europeans, have been the promoters of this murderous affair. Colonel Nicolls has forwarded a statement of the transaction to government; and if proper steps are taken, the whole must be brought to light. Mr Lander's clothes and papers are all lost."

THE SOUTH POLE.

The best geographers believe, and recent discoveries confirm the hypothesis, in the existence of a large southern continent forming a circle of ten or twelve degrees radius, the centre of which is the south pole. This land is of course the abode of all those animals selected by Providence in the icy regions. An enterprising mercantile house of this town proposes to send a vessel, well calculated and properly equipped, to make the interesting voyage of circumnavigating the above circle, thereby to determine the above fact of its existence or otherwise. The command of this vessel is to be bestowed upon the Tasmanian Cook, Captain Stein. If any man has a right to assume the mantle of that illustrious seaman, it is the gentleman we have named; if alone in respect to his voyage round the world in a sloop of thirty tons, the whole crew composed of himself and five men, not one of the latter being able to read or write, and without even a dose of medicine on board, and himself only twenty-two years old, his own merits having obtained him the command of a ship at the age of eighteen. We understand Captain Stein proposes to proceed due south from our land's end, in which case he will in all probability reach the icy region in a week or ten days; and then should he not fall in with the supposed continent, by proceeding eastward in short degrees of longitude he will soon be enabled, although of course subject to much peril, and with great deprivations in such a climate, to reach the ascertained land. Were such an expedition as this about to be undertaken at home, all the newspapers, metropolitan and provincial, would ring with it, and with the history of the preparations of double bows, furred coats, seven-fold blankets, preserved meats, concentrated soup, &c. &c. Here Captain Stein proceeds with only the common preparation for an ordinary voyage.—Austral-Asiatic Review, 29th October.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

An exceedingly pleasant book, in two volumes, has just been published by Mr H. D. Inglis, descriptive of these delightful islands, which are now the resort of many families who have retired with small incomes, for whose residence they are said to be well adapted. But to many others besides persons of this class, these islands are full of interest, and we beg to recommend the present work to very general perusal. These islands belong to Great Britain, though lying in the British Channel, within a few hours' sail of the coast of France, and possess a population of 65,000 souls. They are eight in number—Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, Sark, and four of a smaller size. The advantages of the Channel Islands as a place of residence may be thus enumerated:—The climate is genial, especially for consumptive patients; English society, or something very closely approaching it, can be had without English taxation—this is all. The rent of land is fully as high as in England; but tithes is the only deduction after rent. House-rent is very much higher than in secluded towns at home; but then, there are no poor-rates, no house or window duties. Mr Inglis concludes that the prices of the more substantial necessities, such as meat, bread, poultry, eggs, cheese (butter is an exception), are not by any means lower than in many places in England, or even than in London itself. The gain is upon commodities subject to excise or custom duties. All the articles which come under the head of grocery—tea, sugar, coffee, spices, preserves, and fruits for the table or the dessert—are far cheaper; so are wines and spirits; and the same observation applies to furniture, especially of the more ornamental kind, wages being lower, and the materials imported duty-free.—"The general aspect of Jersey is wooded fertility; and the general character of its scenery is beauty. The scenery, even upon the coast, nowhere rises into the sublime; and although some of its vallies and coves exhibit glimpses of the picturesque, beauty and softness are the prevailing features. One would scarcely expect to find, in an island hardly forty miles in circumference, any great diversity of scenery, or variety of surface; upon which, indeed, the former is dependent. But Jersey is every where undulating, broken into hollows and acclivities, and intersected by numerous vallies, generally running north and south; most of them watered by a rivulet, and as rife in beauty as wood, pasturage, orchard, a tinkling stream, and glimpses of the sea, can make them. There is one picturesque feature which enters into every view in Jersey: it is, that the trunks of the trees are, I may say without exception, entirely covered with ivy; which not only adds to the beauty of the scenery when the trees are in leaf, but which greatly softens the sterility of a winter prospect, and gives a certain greenness to the landscape throughout the year. Nor is the luxuriant growth of the ivy in Jersey confined to the trees: it covers the banks by the wayside, creeps over the walls, and even climbs upon the rocks by the sea-shore. About two miles to the east of St Helier's, there are several elevated rocks, the bases of which are washed at high water; and which, higher up, are entirely overgrown with ivy; and from the natural outline of these rocks, and their green covering, they have all the appearance of ruins.—Although the business of life in Alderney is not to heap up wealth, and although profuseness is more common than parsimony, it is impossible to spend much. With the exception of the governor, nobody spends L.300 per annum; and among the most respectable classes, the more usual expenditure is from L.100, L.150 per annum. Even this limited expenditure can command a great deal in Alderney. A tolerable house may be had for L.10, or at the most L.15, year. Meat and poultry are both somewhat under Guernsey prices; and the article of dress costs little, where nobody thinks of dress, and where there are no critics on the cut of a coat, and where the millin has no customers. There is no doubt emulation in Alderney, however, as well as elsewhere: and a smart bonnet, though home-made, will doubtless create sensation in the street, or in the church of St Ann. There are a few English residents in Alderney—of course on half pay—who contrive to vegetate in this remote spot, apart from the din of the world, and on solicitous to get through life on the pittance which they have earned in the service of their country. The chief resource of those who are not wholly occupied with agricultural pursuits, and who belong to the upper class, is the club. There, at most hours of the day, little coteries of the male population of Alderney may be found, smoking, drinking brandy and water, and talking of such topics as island events afford, or if a mail chance to have arrived, of the events that agitate larger communities. Reading is almost unknown. There is not a library or a book society in the island—and but few books." Mr Inglis observes, that those who only live in what is called "life"—who place their happiness in plays and concerts, raffles and promenades, ought not to think of a residence in the Channel Islands.

THE NEW SCHOOL OF NOVEL-WRITING.

Of late, our novel and romance writers seem to have been sadly in want of subjects and plots whereon to engage their pens. "High Life," with its ladies of quality, princes, and knights of the garter, appear to have grown somewhat stale; the middle ranks of society having long since been pronounced vulgar, are useless for hero and heroines; and shepherds, shepherdesses, and holiday peasantry, have appeared so frequently as dramatic personages, that they can no longer furnish a single bit of "character." As for monks, abbots, daggers, corridors, a midnight bells, they were a drug thirty years since. What then, is to be done? Why, search the Newgate Calendar, to be sure. There lies a fund, a perfect mine of character. Rake up from oblivion a Eugene Aram, a Captain James Hind, the Golden Farmer, and Dick Turpin even give sixteen-stringed Jack, and, though last, not least, the infamous Burke, a chance of once more astonishing the world with their exploits. Never mind that these worthy personages finished their interesting career upon the gallows,—the gallows is a capital new idiom to play off upon sentimental readers—a happy termination to a piece variegated with slang, robbery, and murder. To the Newgate Calendar, then, our novelists and romancers have had the good taste to come; and the elegant hot-pressed trash of New Burlington Street promises to be puffd into the place of the once popular nonsense of the Minerva press. With regard to the wretched productions of this new school of novel-writing, we beg, in a particular manner, to put respectful families and others, who have no taste for depravity, their guard against a work, just published, entitled "Rookwood," by a Mr Ainsworth; and, in doing so, cannot expose its character better than in the language of that exceedingly acute weekly paper, the Dispatch. The editor informs his readers that he has abstained from reviewing the work, "because, while he cannot but respect the talents of the author, he does not choose to extend the circulation of a book which certainly of a mischievous tendency, as it invests a ruffianly murderer and robber with a chivalrous character utterly undeserved, and, in fact, entirely false. But we are informed (he continues) that this work is pronounced in the fashionable slang of the day, 'a love of books,' that it is perused with admiration by the high classes, and that some of its scenes are about to be dramatised, we feel called upon to take some notice of a literary prostitution which deforms the pages of one of the cleverest works we have perused for a long time. We are sorry that Mr Ainsworth should have chosen the drunken and even dastardly scoundrel Dick Turpin, a highwayman—a wretch stained with almost every crime that can disgrace humanity—as one of the heroes of his tale. The ride of Turpin from London to York, which Mr Ainsworth has described in such glowing, and, indeed, poetical style, and on which he has wasted powers that should have been devoted to something really worthy of the pen of a man of genius, is a very doubtful even which rests on no authority whatever; and even had it been performed, as described, on a single horse, which is there to admire in the tale of a scoundrel outlaw torturing a noble animal to death, to save his own rascally carcass from the gallows? This Turpin, whom we are now taught by Mr Ainsworth to admire as a knight of chivalry, was a native of Essex, a butcher by trade, who commenced his career of plunder by stealing sheep and oxen, which he slaughtered in his own house. Being detected in this species of roguery by the tracing of some hides which he had sold to some persons in London, he next turned smuggler—then deer-stealer, and soon after became a burglar. Breaking into the house of a decrepit old lady at Loughton, some of the gang were inclined to believe her assertion that she had no money; but Turpin, with his own hands, actually placed the helpless lady on the fire, and held her there till the horrible tortures she was enduring compelled her to disclose where the property was concealed. After several other acts of burglary, accompanied, as is usual among such wretches, by beastly drunkenness, Turpin became a highwayman, and robbed many persons, in connection with another ruffian named King; yet when a resolute gentleman named Bayes seized this King, Turpin, in his trepidation, shot his friend instead of Bayes, and then rode off, suffering his bosom friend and associate to be captured.

a single man. King died about a week afterwards, pronouncing Turpin as a coward. What a thing for the hero of a fashionable novel! Turpin murdered a man in a pine-forest, but was at length happily brought to justice, and hanged at York for horse-stealing, April 7th, 39. Now, is it not degrading to men of learning and genius to debase their talents by enlarging on the apocryphal exploits of a brutal wretch like this, and to write songs too, full of the cant phrases and vulgar slang which thieves have invented for the purpose of concealing their schemes of depredation without being understood by any casual listener? 'Tis a vile pandering to a praved taste."

Church Rates.—List of Scotch members who voted in the minority of 141, on Monday the 21st of April, against granting the sum of £250,000 sterling per annum, out of the general revenues of the country, for maintaining and repairing the buildings of the established Episcopal Church of England.—Lord Dalmeny, J. Ewing, R. C. Fergusson, W. D. Gillon, R. Oswald, Gen. Sharpe, R. Wallace.

Mr Galt.—We are happy to record a circumstance that redounds to the honour of the present government. They have come to the determination of granting a pension to Mr Galt, and have authorised him to draw immediately for £200 on the Treasury. The politics of this distinguished individual have always been in opposition to those of the present administration.—Morning Post.

The government have, it is understood, granted the widow of Richard Lander a pension of £70 a-year. This, also, is a judicious administration of the national funds, and will serve to encourage future attempts at discovery in Africa.

Abduction.—A curious case of abduction took place in London, a few days since. A Mr Gee, a lawyer, was conveyed into a carriage, on pretence of some professional business, and set down at a house in York Street, Commercial-road, where he was forced into a dungeon under ground, chained, and his feet tied with cords to a post. He, however, found means to extricate himself, and make his escape. It appears he had the management of a large sum of money, the property of a lady, and her friends wishing a part of it, took this method of getting at it. They forced him to sign a check on his banker for £800, which, however, he got liberated in time to stop the payment of.

There are about four hundred and fifty different trades carried on in London. The shoemakers are the most numerous class, and the tailors the next; the former, at an average of twenty years of age, amounting to 16,502, and the latter to 14,552. The carpenters amount to 13,208, and if the cabinetmakers are included, to 19,629. The bakers, butchers, bricklayers, and blacksmiths, come next; but they average little more than a third of those trades.

London and Birmingham Railway.—We understand that the purchase of land for this railway is proceeding very favourably, the company in the first instance taking of that land which is immediately required for the works. The promptitude with which the third call is being paid (upwards of £105,000, we are told, having been received since the 15th of April) shows that ample means are at the command of the directors, and is a striking evidence of the stability of the body of proprietors.—Birmingham Journal.

Irish Elections.—Mr Jacob, a repealer, has been returned for Dungarvan; but a petition against his election, on the ground of bribery, corruption, ineligibility, and violence, is to be presented. Mr Western, a reformer and anti-repealer, has been returned for Monaghan.

Whaling.—Captain Kendrew, of the Ann Elizabeth of London, has taken with him, on a whaling voyage to the South Seas, several bottles of highly concentrated prussic acid, with which he intends to charge the balloons for the speedier destruction of whales.

The Medical Gazette mentions a case of hydrophobia at Bordeaux, which was cured by copious bleeding and draughts of strong vinegar, which the patient, a female, swallowed, when the sight of water threw her into convulsions.

Dorlodot, a glass manufacturer at Anzin, in France, has invented a species of glass tile, of great solidity and transparency, which, it is thought, may be substituted, with much advantage, in all cases where skylights are now employed.

Deaf, but not Dumb.—The Abbe Jamet, director of the hospital of Bon Sauveur, lately exhibited at the academy of sciences, a deaf youth, whom he had so successfully taught as to render him capable of speaking with tolerable correctness. Many members of the academy addressed the youth through the medium of his learned instructor, and put questions to him regarding his age and the course of his studies, all of which he answered without the least hesitation. The tone of his voice had not striking, not to say unnatural effect, and would seem to issue from an automaton, but for the motion of his chest, and the play of the organs of articulation. M. Jamet entered into some details explanatory of the manner in which this extraordinary result had been attained. His practice was first to draw on paper, and trace out a tongue in all the necessary positions for the emission of different sounds. Many of these, especially the nasal sounds, he had great difficulty in teaching his pupil. It took him six months to master the quid Ps; and it is observable that this is the sound which he pronounces with the least distinctness. The youth is so entirely deaf as not to even hear the loudest thunder; but when a carriage passes through the street, he says he perceives a noise beneath his feet. He is the nephew of Cardinal Latre, is eighteen years of age, and has a countenance expressive of much intelligence.—Athenaeum.

A novel operation has been performed in Philadelphia, under the direction of Drs Jackson and Draper, of that place, by the internal application of leeches by means of silver tubes being passed down the throat of a gentleman who was afflicted with what is termed "throat consumption." The result was satisfactory.—American paper.

SCOTLAND.

PERTSHIRE ELECTION.

The election of a member of Parliament for Perthshire, in the room of Lord Ormelie, who had acceded to the peerage, as notified in our last paper, took place on the 1st and 2d of May; the candidates being Sir Geo. Murray, in the Conservative interest, and Mr Robert Græme, advocate, lately appointed to a seat at the Treasury Board, and of course a ministerialist. This election, which was contested with extraordinary keenness, and excited very considerable interest among all parties, was at length decided in favour of Sir George Murray; 1464 voters having polled for him, and 1267 for Mr Græme—majority for Sir George, 197. In consequence of the result of this election, the newspapers of a conservative character have been loud in their exultation, and have declared that the constituency of Perthshire have earned to themselves unfading honour, and deserve the gratitude of the country for their votes on the present occasion; while the liberal papers are equally downcast, and allege that the agricultural constituency were obliged to vote in such a way to please their landlords, and that, therefore, there is now an obvious necessity for voting by ballot. In whatever manner this election was carried, the result has created a considerable sensation in Scotland, and must have been felt as a blow by the present administration.

EDINBURGH AND LEITH ELECTIONS.

While the eyes and thoughts of the public were still directed to the subject of the Perthshire contest, an incident occurred which turned the attention of all towards the metropolis. Lord Craigie, an aged Lord of Session, had an apoplectic fit upon Saturday, April 26, and he expired on Friday, the 2d of May. In consequence of his lordship's death, a vacancy occurred in the bench of the College of Justice. The ordinary routine would have been to have raised the Lord Advocate Jeffrey to the bench; but, for very weighty reasons, it seems to have appeared dangerous for the government to confer this honour on his lordship. As this will most likely form a remarkable subject of after inquiry, we shall explain it. By the acceptance of the function of a Lord of Session, the Lord Advocate would have had to vacate his seat in Parliament, which would have left Edinburgh open to a contested election resembling that of Perthshire. As Mr J. A. Murray, member for the Leith, Portobello, and Musselburgh district, was expected to be appointed Lord Advocate in the room of Francis Jeffrey, his acceptance of this government office would have caused him to vacate his seat, and hence there was a double danger of a contested election. There can be no doubt but this view of the matter was taken by the administration, as well as by Jeffrey and Murray; for the singular course was adopted of canvassing Edinburgh and Leith while yet no appointment to place and no vacation of seats had occurred. The first symptom of electioneering appeared, by Mr Murray arriving in Edinburgh, and immediately commencing his canvass; and the citizens immediately concluded that the anticipated alterations were about to take place, if they had not already occurred. On Saturday evening, May 10, Mr Murray presented himself to a public meeting at Leith, and as a species of palliation of the anomaly of his proceedings, he, on this and other occasions, stated that his only object was to ascertain the electors' opinion as to the manner in which he had discharged his duties, and that he had done so from hearing that a canvass had already begun in the district! After the first of these announcements, an active canvass commenced betwixt Mr Murray and Mr Aitchison, jun. of Drummore, the latter in the Conservative interest, and who had retired from the contest at the previous election.

Edinburgh became now also agitated with electioneering schemes, although, as above stated, no vacancy was announced. The supporters of the Ministry at first nominated and put forward Sir J. C. Hobhouse, the rejected member for Westminster, but this gentleman having declined to stand, they next brought into the field Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General of England, and who had recently been rejected by the electors of Dudley, on his entering office. In opposition to Sir John, the late Lord Provost Learmonth came forward as a candidate in the Conservative interest, and James Aytoun, advocate, on the Radical reforming side. The conflicting claims of these candidates have divided the sentiments of the inhabitants of Edinburgh in a very remarkable manner; chiefly from the circumstance of neither being exactly such as the parties to which they belonged entirely approved of. While the character and talents of Sir John Campbell met with no objection, it was remarked that he did not understand the complicated condition of the affairs of Edinburgh, and many persons conceived that his having been put forward in so singular a manner before a vacancy occurred, showed a want of a manly straightforwardness in the government party. As for Mr Learmonth, he put himself forward on the plea that he was well acquainted with the local affairs, although, in this respect, he has certainly no reason to boast; for, on his leaving the office of Lord Provost, he represented that the revenues of the town for the last year surmounted the expenditure, which was not the case; the excess of expenditure during the last year of his administration having in reality been betwixt four and five thousand pounds. Mr

Learmonth was also known as having always been an inveterate supporter of abuses. With regard to Mr Aytoun, a large number of the more liberal electors considered he wanted the ability and clear-sighted views necessary for a member of Parliament, although to none could be given greater credit for frank expression of opinion, and exceeding honesty of intention. On Saturday the 17th, a very numerous meeting of the electors of the city was held in the Waterloo Rooms, the Lord Provost Spittal in the chair, when Sir John, in a lengthened speech, delivered his sentiments on various important topics, and it was carried by acclamation that he was a fit and proper person to represent the city. A similar public meeting was previously held by the supporters of Mr Learmonth; and, on the evening of Monday the 19th, Mr Aytoun attended a crowded meeting of those who were to support him, also in the Waterloo Rooms, and delivered his sentiments to the satisfaction of those present.

May 20. All doubts about the probable vacancy in the representation of Edinburgh and Leith are now completely set at rest by the elevation of Mr Jeffrey to the bench, and the consequent appointment of Mr J. A. Murray to the office of Lord Advocate. Canvassing has therefore now commenced in good earnest; and as the new writs have been issued, and the elections fixed for next week, the comparative strength of each of the parties will very soon be put to a decisive test.

THE REJECTION OF DELEGATE ELDERS.

The formation of town-councils in Scotland, by means of popular elections, has led to a circumstance which may prove dangerous to the church establishment. The town-councils have a right to delegate elders to sit in the General Assembly, and there is now therefore a chance of these civic bodies appointing men favourable to the views of the dissenters. Hitherto, any kind of persons were made elders, and got themselves to be sent to the Assembly, for political or other purposes quite unconnected with religion. But as these individuals were conservative in principle, the anomaly of Episcopalians, or perhaps "practical heathens," sitting in a deliberative Presbyterian church-court, was little regarded. The matter has now, however, begun to attract notice, and create alarm in the church. As the votes of elders could perhaps almost overbalance those of the clerical members, it is plain that through this crevice an arrow might be directed which would very materially wound the ecclesiastical fabric. Under impressions of this nature, Mr Aytoun (the radical candidate for Edinburgh) has had an appointment as delegate elder from Kinghorn rejected by the presbytery of the bounds, on the plea that he holds opinions inimical to the welfare of the establishment. A similar instance has elsewhere occurred, and it is likely that this very important question will create some stir in the present General Assembly, to which there is an appeal. The church of Scotland, in its head court, may now and subsequently try to keep out elders who do not approve of the connection between church and state; but it will hardly be able to endure this siege with ultimate success, for, inasmuch as it is necessarily composed of the people, it must advance along with the sentiments of the people. As for rejecting delegates, that is out of its power, provided the said delegates live in conformity with the standards of the church; and if such a rule is enforced, three-fourths of the present admitted elders will require to vacate their seats.

EDINBURGH CLERGY AND CHURCH TAX.

The Town Council of Edinburgh, after an immense deal of discussion, not of the most pleasant kind, has at length framed a bill to remedy the grievances connected with the city churches and annuity tax, and which government engaged to introduce during May into the House of Commons. The following are the heads of this proposed bill:—The number of clergy to be reduced from eighteen to thirteen, as vacancies occur by death. The sums payable to the different clergymen to be fixed and permanent, and to be £530 yearly to each, being the average amount received by them for the last five years, and £500 to each of their successors in office. The revenue derived from the rents of the city churches (in so far as these may be found to be the property of the community) to be applied solely to ecclesiastical purposes. The sum to be levied as annuity tax to be no longer six per cent. on the properties liable to such tax, but to be so much only as, with the free proceeds of the seat-rents, and the proceeds of the dues from Leith harbour and Port Hopetoun and other funds, as at present levied for the clergy, shall be sufficient to provide the sum of £580 to each of the present established clergymen, and £500 to each of those hereafter appointed. The amount to be levied on the inhabitants to be rated by the police assessment. The whole sum to be so raised as annuity tax shall belong to the established clergy; and it shall be lawful for them, by their collector, to pursue for and recover the annuity tax hereby made payable. That no member of the College of Justice shall be entitled to any exemption from the annuity tax, or from any other tax within the city, in respect of his being such member.—This bill does not please all parties of reformers, but it has been very generally approved of, and, if carried into effect, would most likely save the Church of Scotland from very serious injury, if not total destruction. This, however, is not seen by the members of the established church, and their opposition may very materially alter the features of the bill. All right-thinking persons in the metropolis are exceedingly anxious that a measure such as the above should put an end to the ferment upon this very vexatious subject.

POLITICAL PROSPECTS.

There can be more clear, and yet nothing appearing less thought of, than that Great Britain is now approaching some great crisis, or revolution, to describe it in the most gentle terms, some change in the constitution of its government. We are not by means experiencing "the torrent's smoothness dash below;" we are shooting along a series of steps, foretelling the more abrupt descent down which we are about to be precipitated. It may be that the elections about to take place will be attended with violence either to persons or property; but that no alteration, exceeding all that has taken place in the grand change of the monarchical principle of 1688, is about to happen, no man who looks carefully at the passing events and circumstances, and studies the mood of the majority of the British people, can fail to observe.

During the whole period of the agitation for the Reform bill, it was studiously promulgated by the friends of that measure, and generally believed, to the surprise, by the people, that it was a measure necessary for restoring the representative part of the constitution to its ancient and just balance. The influence of the peers in that branch of the legislature was disclaimed against as the chief evil; and every one seemed to conclude that all would be right in the constitution, if that influence were only got rid of. It never seemed to strike any one that to strip off a fraction of aristocratic influence from one side, while an integer was left in another, was an unsatisfactory. Except in one respect, the Houses of Lords and Commons were known to be equal in power, and every body must have been aware that, if the latter become as liberal as possible, all its bills excepting money bills, were liable to be rejected by the former. But in the excitement which then prevailed, these considerations were overlooked by the great mass of thinkers in this country, and were only remembered to some who observed from a distance. They were pointed out by the North American Review, in an article which was not perhaps so agreeable to the feelings as to the enemies of Parliamentary reform. "You are eager," such was the reasoning of this able reviewer, "to purify your House of Representatives; but you overlook, however, the existence of a Senate, which is in no respect representative. We hear you are all out vehemently about nomination boroughs, which only form a part of your lower house; but we never hear you say a word of a house which is nominated altogether, and which seems to us totally inconsistent with any degree or kind of representation. Their aim at once at a thoroughly representative legislature, or let your real masters, the peers, continue to have their influence in the lower house, which, as far as we can discern, is of little importance either to them or to yourselves."

The reasoning of the American writer was not in the least respect good; but his very errors might have served a Briton into juster views than any he had previously entertained, of what is styled "the British constitution." This thing, if it can be so called, has never been supposed, by politicians of nearly every order, to possess some peculiar and most felicitous merit of a triple character; both as a whole, and in its several parts, it was looked upon as excellent, no one being more than that the representative house would be really entitled to that appellation. The truth is, however, there never was any properly representative part in the constitution: taken in the whole the constitution was an oligarchy, with a part bearing the title of representative, but never intended to be so in spirit. The reform bill proceeded entirely upon a misapprehension, either real or assumed; and there cannot be the slightest doubt that it disorganised, instead of repairing, the constitution. It engrafted a perfect representative system upon a stock entirely different in character, and evidently incompatible; and we have now two alien systems strangely united, or pretended to be united, in one. Either the former unique constitution—an anomaly which had grown up by accident—ought to have been retained, or men, in making the change, should have made up their minds to further changes. Those who sincerely believed that a new House of Commons could consist with an ancient monarchy and aristocracy, are yet destined, we fear, for a serious waking from the dream they have so vainly cherished. The event will probably gratify the secret expectations of some, while the understandings of most will be self-condemned.

No one can reasonably doubt this, who sees all the elements of our present position. The majority of Tory peers is understood to be at least sixty; these stand like a granite wall to prevent the passage of every measure of reformation and supposed improvement, which the House of Commons, under the pressure of the people, may send up to them. The Commons, on the other hand, are so liberal, that, even upon the ticklish question of what is called church property, Earl Grey says there are 416 out of 658 members willing to go on with the spirit of the age. As well try to bind the clouds to the earth, as think there can long be a connection between bodies so different as these. The Ministers seem to hope that they will be able to satisfy the people on most of the great questions, without bridling up the House of Lords into its full powers of opposition; but these statesmen act so much from motives of expediency, and encounter such strange accidents in their course, that we cannot be assured of their ever looking on any occasion beyond the passing day. Nor are reasons wanting for a totally different conclusion. The chief matters in which the people—by which we mean the great mass of the middle and lower orders—wish to see reformations, and appear determined to effect them, are—the church establishment, dissenting disabilities, the expenses and other regulations of justice, the corn-laws, restrictions on commerce, unequal taxation, the duration of Parliaments, taxes on information and knowledge, and pensions. Just as certain as it is that the people will not be satisfied without large concessions on these subjects, is it that the House of Peers, independent as it is of popular control, and interested in conservatism both on general and on special grounds, will refuse to grant them. The will of the house must, of course, in some way or other, be thrust aside; and the only question that remains is, will they sullenly await the blow that must be dealt to them, or will they, by a giving way against their well-known inclinations, deprive themselves of all appearance of legislative authority, and thereby sign their own virtual, if not real, resignation? We have much reason to believe that the former alternative will be chosen: this proud senate will wait passively, like the purpled fathers of Rome, till the invaders of their privileges come to push them from their seats; they feel that they will be serving both their honour and their interest to meet the popular demands with a conscientious refusal, and put their opponents to the difficulty of making the first departure from constitutional practice. If they do so, the privileges of their order may suffer the more, but their personal dignity, and their historical character, will suffer the less.

Such a change as this—the effectuating of the representative system—can hardly be expected to take place without a greater agitation of the public mind than any which we have heretofore known, accompanied, if not by actual violence, at least by a disruption of many of the social ties, and no little misery to that order upon which misery in such cases always falls first. Unpleasing, however, as the prospect may be, it ought to be contemplated steadily, and even at this hour some efforts might be made to avert it.

If the Lords and the People could be brought to an understanding as to each other's views, some hope might be indulged of a respite, if not an absolute reprieve, to the constitution. One thing, we think, is seen imperfectly by their lordships. They do not discern the distinction between agitation for redress of external and accidental grievances, and agitation for alterations in the government. The whole are put under one category, and hence much mischief arises. Alterations in old and rickety institutions, which the sense of the community has demanded for years, are mistaken for a disposition to overthrow the whole fabric of the state, and out of the ruins to carve new systems. We conscientiously believe, after much study of the public mind, that, though the desire of alterations of the former kind is a feeling almost as strong and uncontrollable as it is universal, there is little solicitude for radical changes in the constitution. If the people were gratified on the points which we have enumerated above, we believe it to be likely that the new House of Commons would be permitted to settle down quietly in a connection—awkward, perhaps, but still fast—with the fragments of the old constitution; and that the system of King, Lords, and Commons, might yet exist for many a long day. The great argument of the Conservativists is, that the more concession that is made, the more lively becomes the spirit of demand, and the less easy is it to resist it. But how stands the case? The people began a few years ago to ask for reforms in a great number of institutions: there was a certain amount of what they considered wrong, which they wished to convert into right. If it could be shown that all which they originally asked was granted, and that they then brought in claims altogether new, there would be grounds for the allegation of the Conservativists; but, in reality, the case has been that of a debtor whose claim was originally twenty shillings, who has got half a crown to account, and who is still calling out for the remaining seventeen and sixpence. Till the whole has been paid, there can be no peace. The utmost that can be said against the reformers is, that they have employed the first instalment in prosecuting for the balance; and in this there is nothing strange, much less immoral. However, this is not nearly so much the point at issue, as whether the people, by squaring the Irish church and a few other matters with what they consider common sense, will be the more likely, thereafter, to subvert the government. Assuredly there are few unsophisticated intellects which would decide that such a consummation was probable. It must appear to most that the House of Lords is rather endangered than defended by the antiquated walls behind which it is endeavouring to ensconce itself: as the native Americans were slaughtered by the Spaniards, for the sake of a few paltry ornaments which they did not know to surrender, so are the peers likely to perish on account of things which they would lose little by giving up; and compared with which their existence as a house is as gold to dross. The peers may be assured that the suppression of their house is an idea regarded with complacency by very few individuals in the country, and which hardly ever occurs to the imagination of any one, except when forced into notice by some ungracious obstruction on their part to the progress of those subordinate reforms, on which, we repeat, the people have set their hearts. Is it not worth while, seeing that an unavoidable destruction lies in one course, to make a trial of the other, which offers what we think a good chance, and what no one can deny to be a chance, of avoiding the evil in contemplation?

The people, on the other hand, may be reminded that a change in the constitution of our government and legislature, however apparently to the better, will hardly produce all the advantages that may be expected from it. There is an element in the question which they perhaps are hardly aware of, but which nevertheless has been proved on many striking occasions to exist: this is, the greater ability of an old government, though of unpopular constitution, to allow liberty to the subjects, than a new one, of however popular construction. The security which the first acquires from the prestige of antiquity, allows of its acting with indifference respecting popular manifestations; while the critical condition of the other—the novitas regni, to use a phrase, here more expressive than in the work of the Roman poet where it was first used—renders it suspicious of every movement of the people, and obliges it to trench itself round with laws unfavourable to liberty. It is from this cause that the present government of France is more despotic than that which preceded the revolution of 1830: a stronger coercive power is assumed, in order to protect the state from farther revolutions, and the great mass of the better citizens evidently acquiesce in the expedient, from a sense of its necessity, though they must no doubt be disappointed at finding the freedom they sought in 1830 thus elude their grasp. The people, then, before urging on a revolution, would do well to work this element into their calculations. The advice is given them by one who has endeavoured, in a spirit of candour, to divest himself of political prepossessions, and who has no interest, beyond that of an ordinary member of the commonwealth, in directing the current of events to any particular issue. It is not impossible that, for the sake of improvement on some minor points, they may deteriorate their condition on one of transcendent importance; for the sake of an improved legislature, they may subject themselves to a worse executive. The evils complained of, however adverse they may be to the spirit of truth and justice, yet press very little on the personal condition, comfort, and fortune, of any member of the community: we may, therefore, be at least deliberate in the business of their removal, and take due care that, in forcing them off, we do not subject ourselves to a worse evil. Far be it from the present writer to dispute what seems the general opinion respecting the reforms alluded to; he would only hope that a better thing—the present mild executive—may not be sacrificed in obtaining them.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

THE Chamber of Deputies was dissolved on the 25th of May, and the new one is convoked for the 20th of August: M. Dupin, the late president, has taken the opportunity to pay a scientific visit to England. The state of the French funds betokens increasing confidence in the present state of things; the three per cents., which eighteen months ago were at 68, are now at 80.

A very important alteration is about to be made in the commercial regulations of France. In terms of an amendment, by the Chamber of Deputies, to the budget of receipts, M. Duchatel, the new minister of commerce, lately laid before the Council of Trade the draught of a royal ordinance, by which it is proposed to permit the importation into France, from the 1st of September next, of the following articles—cotton-twist, wool-twist, shawls, laces of all kinds, silk handkerchiefs, iron cables, watch-work, Russian leather, lead, potash, rum, rack, and ratafia. The Council of Trade approved of the measure proposed by the minister, and recommended that the duties to be levied on cotton-twist shall be fixed at seven francs per kilogramme on the single thread, and eight francs on the twist of all descriptions of make. The ordinance has accordingly been issued. "By the experiment of the admission of cotton-twist, the question must at length be set at rest as to whether or not the French manufacturer, the French consumer and exporter, and the state, will be benefited by that measure in a greater degree than by the system of contraband trade in the article, hitherto pursued; because no cotton cloths of French manufacture have ever been able to equal those of England, Germany, and Switzerland, without the use of foreign twist. It is also contemplated to lower the duties on various raw materials; but the ordinance to this effect will not be issued until after the elections.

In these measures may be perceived some of the practical results of the exertions of the commissioners employed by the governments of France and England, "to ascertain as clearly and exactly as possible from the documents and information which either government can command, what is the present state of the trade of the two countries; to examine how it is affected by the tariffs; how far their provisions are rendered inoperative by the smuggler; and how, with regard to existing interests, and the obstacles they must necessarily create to the introduction of a better system, a change in favour of a freer communication can be effected." These were the instructions of Mr Poulett Thompson to Mr Villiers and Dr Bowring, the British commissioners, in 1831. The French commissioners, one of whom was M. Duchatel (now minister of commerce), received a similar charge from their government. These gentlemen performed the duties entrusted to them with unusual assiduity, ability, and success. No power was given to them to negotiate treaties, but they were enabled to perform a more useful service to their respective countries. They were authorised to apply to the best sources of information for facts and arguments, which must sooner or later have their due weight on the public mind, and lead to the formation of correct views of commercial policy. When men are convinced that their real interest would be promoted by an unrestricted trading intercourse, the downfall of the prohibitory system must speedily ensue. The labours of the commissioners in this respect have been eminently useful in France.

An excellent arrangement has been made between the British and French post-offices, which will give great facilities to the exchange of newspapers between the two countries. English newspapers are to pass through France by the post, free of charge, and French newspapers through England on the same terms. As the English government has a profit of threepence farthing by the stamp duty, on every paper sent abroad, the French government, in order to be on something like a footing of equality, is to charge an inland postage of four sous, or twopence on each French newspaper sent to England, the stamp duty being only a halfpenny. Thus our government will be indemnified for the free transmission of French papers through Britain, by the stamp duty on the English papers sent abroad; and the French government will be indemnified for the transmission of English papers through France, by the twopence halfpenny of duty and inland postage, which it receives upon every French paper sent to England. This new arrangement is to take effect in a few weeks.

PORTUGAL.

THE civil war in this kingdom was terminated at the close of May, by the submission of Don Miguel. The defeats sustained by the forces of that prince at Figueras and Coimbra, alluded to in our last, and more recently the surrender of the garrison of Orem, with 500 men, to Admiral Napier, and a signal overthrow sustained in a pitched battle with Terceira near Thomar, when upwards of 1000 men were taken prisoners, were the proximate causes of this event. The last mentioned action took place on the 16th of May, and, on the ensuing day, Don Pedro renewed his proclamation to the adherents of Miguel, pointing out to them the desperate state of their affairs, and promising protection to all who should immediately return peaceably to their homes. The first movement of Don Miguel after this defeat was the evacuation of Santarem, the fortress in which he has so vigorously defended himself almost ever since the surrender of Lisbon. Crossing the Tagus in the direction of Evora, he was immediately pursued by the troops of Donna Maria, one division of which marched upon Montemor to cut him off from the sea, whilst another bore down upon Estremoz, to prevent him from reaching Elvas. Thus beaten, hunted down, and surrounded, paralysed by the dissensions among his followers, and driven to despair by the quadruple treaty, Don Miguel consented, on the 26th, by a paper signed by his lieutenant-general, to retire from the kingdom by any port in the Algarve, and on board an English vessel.

It is said that Don Miguel will retain an income equal to about L.16,000 a-year, on condition of his never again interfering in Portuguese politics, to which he agreed in terms of the following document:—

"To satisfy the demand of the marshals, the Duke of Terceira and Conde de Saldanha, in the name of the government, I declare that I will never interfere, directly or indirectly, in the political affairs of these kingdoms and their dominions.

"D. MIGUEL.

"Palace of Evora, May 29, 1834."

He embarked, May 31, on board the Stag, a British vessel, at Evora, and proceeded to Italy.

Don Pedro has issued two important decrees, the one for the abolition of the Oporto Wine Company, the other for the suppression of the monastic orders throughout Portugal. The property of these religious establishments is to be incorporated with the funds of the state, and the existing monks are to be pensioned, except such as have engaged actively in the service of the usurper. From the terms of the decree, we infer that it does not apply to nunneries, and the parochial clergy retain their possessions untouched. The suppression of the Oporto wine monopoly is a salutary measure, which will give great satisfaction both within the kingdom and without. The Portuguese Cortes is to meet on the 15th of August.

SPAIN.

THE 24th July has been fixed for the meeting of the Cortes, which is to consist of 188 members, the qualification being the possession of L.120 a-year, and a nativity in the province, or a residence in it for two years. The Prussian minister has received orders to quit Madrid, and it is said that the Russian and Austrian governments have signified their displeasure at the removal of Zea Bermudez from the Spanish ministry. It is believed that the recognition of South American independence will be among the first acts of the Cortes. An amnesty for political offenders has been in the meantime proclaimed; and the cause has declined so much, that its chief and Don Carlos himself, has left the peninsula, having arrived off Portsmouth, in the Donegal, on the 14th June.

UNITED STATES.

THE contest between the President and the Senate respecting the United States' Bank still continues, though the pecuniary affairs of the country are said to be improving. The elections are going against the President; and the Senate has rejected his proposal and denied his right to issue such a document.

PARLIAMENT.

1. GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

Wed. May 21. Mr LYALL moved the second reading of his bill, the object of which was to transfer the monthly sixpences, now paid by merchant seamen into the Greenwich Hospital Fund, to the Merchant Seamen's Institution, by which the money would be applied to the benefit of those who paid it. Mr Lyall proposed that Greenwich Hospital should be compensated for the loss by an equal payment from the consolidated fund.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM and several members of the government opposed the second reading, which, however, was carried by 94 to 57 majority, 37.

2. IRISH CHURCH.

MR WARD addressed the House of Commons on May 27, for the purpose of moving a resolution (the subject). The basis of his argument was to show the necessity, the imperative necessity, of making a change in the Protestant church of Ireland, the house were sincere in its desire to tranquillise the country, to heal her old wounds, to repair past injustice, and to identify the interests of Ireland with those of the empire. The hon. member proceeded by quotations, to prove that some of the wisest and greatest of those statesmen whose names adorn our annals, had always sought the cause of the discontents of Ireland rather in religious than in political wrongs; and the evidence bore not less strongly on the present day upon the last relic of that system—compulsory support of a church by those who do not belong to it. The hon. member contended, that the suppression of tithes alone could they look to the establishment there of tranquillity, good order, and a chance of eventual civilisation. Commutation would never do. Any thing short of a new appropriation would be regarded by the people as a mere mockery. It was idle to talk of dealing with the mode of collection, or of seeking to diminish the amount of the tithes; those points did not really constitute the matter in issue—but the question was, shall the tithes be re-allocated or not? He then animadverted on the working of the system as respected the market and police expenditure incurred for the carrying of the present tithe system into effect. They had tried law, they had tried force, they had tried libel, they had tried every thing under the present system of tithes, without effect; and he now called upon them to do away with the cause of the discontent, without which all other remedies would be futile. He requested to be allowed for a moment to see how the legal operations had resulted. The tithe cause in Ireland from 1817 to 1821, were, in the ecclesiastical courts, 3418; at quarter sessions, by civil bill process, before assistant-barristers, 86,487; making a total of 89,905; or annually, on an average, 198. Of the cost of the established church to the community at large—of the property which it enjoyed in the services which its clergy performed, some notion might be formed from a statement which he then had before him, from which it appeared that the total cost was very nearly L.1,000,000. With a small proportion which the Protestants bore, the Catholics, was it to be endured that the cost of a curate for the former should amount to such a sum? The number of curates was not less than 730, who received an income varying from L.18 to L.100. He would, however, take the average at L.70 a-year; and for this small sum men could be found ready to do the work of the Protestant establishment in Ireland, but must be the feelings of the Catholics with respect to that part of the establishment which did not work. He did not see the justice of giving L.800 or L.1000 a-year to a clergyman in whose living not more than ten Protestants could be found, consisting in many cases principally of the vicar's family. He would propose that commissioners should have the power of granting to the working Episcopal clergy in Ireland salaries at least equal to the minimum of those enjoyed by the clergy of Scotland, whose efficiency was highly praised. The hon. member then contended for the right of the state to interfere with the distribution and appropriation of church property. He called upon the house to consider what would be the effect of any attempt to evade the question he was now bringing forward. He concluded by proposing the following resolution:—"That the Protestant Episcopal establishment in Ireland exceeds the spiritual wants of the Protestant population; and that, by giving the right of the state to regulate the distribution of church property in such manner as Parliament may determine, it is the opinion of this house that the temporal possessions of the church of Ireland, as established by law, ought to be reduced."—Mr GORDON seconded the motion, Lord ALTHORP rose and said, "Since my hon. friend, who supported this motion, commenced his address, circumstances have occurred to my knowledge which induce me to move that the debate upon it be adjourned to Monday."

I cannot now state what those circumstances are, but I hope the house has sufficient confidence in me (here the noble lord was interrupted with loud long-continued cheering from all parts of the house) I hope, I repeat, that the house will have sufficient confidence in me to believe that I would not propose such a proposition unless I were convinced of its propriety. (Cheers.) I now move that the further debate on this motion be adjourned to Monday next."

The motion was put and carried.—[The whole of the resolutions contemplated by Mr Ward on this subject, were as follow:—1. That the property now held by the Irish church, whether consisting of bishops' lands, glebes, tithes, or any other species of endowment, is the property of the state, and ought to be reserved for such purposes as the legislature may determine. 2. That in the opinion of this house, the Protestant establishment in Ireland, as now established, exceeds the spiritual wants of the Protestant population, to which standard it ought to be reduced. 3. That, with a view to effect this reduction, the principles of the Irish church reform bill of last year be extended, and the ecclesiastical commissioners appointed by that bill be empowered to act as trustees of the whole of the church property in Ireland, including bishops' lands, glebes, tithes, and every other species of endowment. 4. That out of the fund thus created, the commissioners shall issue to every archbishop, bishop, dean, rector, vicar, &c. &c., the full amount of the sums which they are now entitled to receive during the term of their natural lives; they continuing to discharge their ecclesiastical duties as at present, where required. 5. That upon the death of the present incumbents, no issue shall be made by the commissioners for any future incumbent, in any parish where the registered number of the Protestant population does not amount to one of the whole of the population. 6. That upon the death of any bishop whose diocese does not contain parishes, each having a Protestant population consisting of one of the whole of the population, no issue shall be made by the commissioners for any future bishop; but the see shall be annexed to that adjoining see by which the duties of episcopal superintendence can be most conveniently discharged. 7. That out of the fund arising from bishops' lands, glebes, and tithes, thus gradually being in, the commissioners be empowered to extinguish all private rights of presentation, by buying up the advowsons, where they are the property of individuals; but that the advowsons now in the hands of the sees shall only be retained by them where the living is retained, and shall drop without compensation wherever the living is extinguished by the want of a Protestant congregation. 8. That discretionary power be given to the commissioners in cases where the number of resident Protestants falls short of that proportion of the whole population fixed by the fifth resolution, to assist such Protestants in keeping up the performance of divine service, by an advance from the general fund, not exceeding L.150 annually, a return being made to Parliament of all such cases as may occur. 9. That the portions already made for sale of the bishops' lands, the repairing of churches, and the commutation of tithes into a tax upon land, shall not be affected by the present resolutions. 10. That the surplus fund remaining in the hands of the commissioners be applied, either in the promotion of education, or in the employment of the poor, or in making a provision for the religious instruction of the people by the ministers of every branch of the Christian church, or in such other purposes of public utility as Parliament in its wisdom may think fit.—Mr Ward's motion had been contemplated for some time with great interest, both by the liberal party in the country and by the cabinet. Although the principle of a right in the state to meddle with the church revenues had been given up by the Ministry last year, when the 147th clause in the Irish church reform bill was withdrawn, a serious division of opinion still existed in the cabinet on that subject. The leading opponent of the principle was Mr Stanley, whose mind is said to have a strongly religious turn; but he was joined by Sir James Graham, the Earl of Devon, and the Duke of Richmond, the last of whom has at all times been a zealous high-churchman. The cabinet was divided as to the way in which Mr Ward's motion should be met, the liberal party seeing the advantage of putting aside the question, when Mr Stanley and Sir James Graham proposed to retire. Nothing seems to have been determined on up to Tuesday night, when Lord Althorp had to face the House of Commons, where, it seems, he soon saw that support of the Conservatives gave him an occasional support, had on this occasion deserted him. During Mr Grote's speech, he learned that not only had Stanley and Graham resigned, but that they had been followed by the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Devon. All thoughts of moving the previous question were then given up, and the resolution taken to move an adjournment till the ensuing Monday, which the house, under an impression that this indicated a falling together of the liberal residue of the cabinet, received by acclamation.]—On Mon. June 2, to which day the house had been adjourned, Lord Althorp, after moving the order of the day for renewing the debate on Mr Ward's motion, and having given an account of the circumstances which had induced him to move the adjournment, stated the course which the Ministers had adopted. "They had advised his Majesty to issue a commission, and that commission was to be a lay-commission, having power to visit all the parishes and ecclesiastical divisions in Ireland, for the purpose of ascertaining in each of them the number of members of the established church, not only in each union, but in each separate parish in each union; also the number of ministers of the established church in each union and parish respectively, of whatever rank, and whether resident or not, and the number of times divine service is usually performed in each, and the number of persons attending such services—that is, the average number—and whether the same be increasing, or diminishing, or stationary; with similar information respecting the number of Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, and other dissenters, in each parish, with every particular respecting the moral and religious education of the people; the number of schools established in each parish, whether they were increasing, diminishing, or stationary, and the same particulars respecting the children attending them; likewise, whether in any or all of the parishes there did appear to the commissioners adequate means for the purposes of moral and religious instruction for the people. The commissioners to report not only on these subjects, but on all other matters relating to the moral, political, and religious condition of the members of the church, and of those belonging to the various denominations of dissenters, so as to acquire as complete a comparative knowledge of the relation in which those several classes of religionists stood towards each other as circumstances permitted. Having in that way proposed to make known the number of Catholics and Protestants in each parish and union respectively, he was sure the house would do them the justice to believe that they had not given advice to his Majesty to issue such a commission unless they were prepared to follow up that advice by acting upon the report to be made by the commissioners in such manner as the exigency of the case might seem to require."—On the strength of this concession to the spirit of Mr Ward's motion, and the maxim that inquiry should precede legislation, Lord Althorp called upon that gentleman to withdraw his motion; which proposal being rejected by Mr Ward, his lordship moved the previous question.—This, after a very long debate, in which Mr STANLEY explained his reasons for resigning, was carried by 396, including Conservatives and Ministerial Liberals, against 120; majority for Ministers, 276.—On Fri. June 6, in the House of Peers, the Duke of NEWCASTLE, and other Conservative members, made a violent attack upon the Ministry in reference to the commission, of which the Earl of WICKLOW moved for a copy. The lord last named called upon Earl Grey and the Marquis of Lansdowne to say whether they agreed with Lord Althorp, who had said that, by issuing the commission, they were doing their best to carry Mr Ward's resolutions into effect. Earl Grey, he said, had commenced his career amidst the dissemination of French Jacobinical opinions, and he seemed about to conclude it with the downfall of the church of England.—Earl GREY replied in dignified terms to the attack which had been made alike upon his Ministry and his personal character. He asserted the right of the legislature to regulate and re-appropriate the ecclesiastical revenues, and asseverated that the course he and his brethren were taking had for its object the preservation and not the subversion of the church. He contended that Ministers had taken the only prudent course, when it appeared that 416 members of the House of Commons were prepared to address the King to act upon the principle on which the commission was issued.—The retiring Ministers then explained their reasons for secession.—After some further debate, the Earl of Wicklow's motion was agreed to.

3. NATIONAL EDUCATION.

A motion, by Mr ROEBUCK, for a select committee "to inquire into the means of establishing a system of national education," was debated, June 3.—The motion was supported by Sir W. MOLESWORTH, and opposed by Mr COBBETT.—Lord MORPETH proposed as an amendment, that a committee should be appointed to inquire into the beneficial effects of the late grants of L.40,000 for the building of school-houses, and into the state of the education of the poor in England and Wales.—After some discussion, in which Lord Althorp, Mr Abercromby, and Mr Poulett Thompson, took part, it was finally determined, on the motion of Lord ALTHORP, to appoint a select committee "to inquire into the state of the education of the people in England and Wales, and into the application and effect of the grant made last session for the erection of school-houses, and to consider the expediency of further grants in aid of education."

4. PREVENTION OF DRUNKENNESS.

On the motion of Mr BUCKINGHAM, June 3, carried by 64 to 17, a select committee was appointed "to inquire into the extent, causes, and consequences of the vice of drunkenness among the labouring classes of the United Kingdom, in order to ascertain whether any legislative measures can be devised for preventing the further spread of so great a national evil."

5. COUNSEL FOR PRISONERS.

A bill for allowing counsel to prisoners in England and Ireland, introduced by Mr EWART, was, June 4, read a second time, after an ineffectual attempt to obstruct its progress.—Lord ALTHORP, on this occasion, though disapproving of some parts of the bill, approved of the principle, and said that the argument which was employed against allowing counsel to address the court in cases of felony, would apply with equal force against permitting the practice in cases of misdemeanour. In the course of his experience, he had frequently been pained at hearing a counsel make a speech against a poor unfortunate prisoner, who was denied the privilege of having a counsel to address the court in reply. It appeared to him that the point for the consideration of the house was not so much what was for the interest of the prisoner, as what was for the interest of truth. If it should be thought that the interests of truth were best consulted by allowing the counsel on one side to put all the strong points against the prisoner in as striking a point of view as possible, and at the same time denying the prisoner the privilege of having a counsel to speak in his defence, let the present system continue; but if a different opinion should prevail, then let that system be changed, by allowing counsel on both sides to speak. In cases which depended upon circumstantial evidence, it was particularly necessary for the ends of justice that the counsel for prisoners should be allowed to address the jury.

6. REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

Leave was given to Lord JOHN RUSSELL, June 9, to bring in a bill for the more effectual registration of voters. He gave the following explanation of its principal provisions:—"The clerk of the peace in counties was to issue a warrant to the high constable, who would issue precepts to the overseers. In boroughs, the town-clerk was to be invested with the office of putting up a list of freemen's places of abode. With respect to towns, he proposed that the registration shilling should be paid once, and that the first time of the payment the name of the voter should be placed on the list. The bill would also contain some provisions to prevent what in some places had been found an inconvenience—namely, the practice of frivolous claims and objections. It was proposed that, where a person claimed the right of voting without probable cause, or where an objection was made without probable cause to a person claiming such right, the barrister should have the power of allowing certain costs. There was another point: a phrase used in the reform act, of 'other buildings,' had given rise in some boroughs to an abuse, whereby persons not substantial voters had been made nominal voters by the erection of sheds, and similar buildings, which conferred upon the occupiers a right of voting, which was exercised in favour of the person erecting them. It was intended to define the phrase 'other buildings' more strictly, so as to confine the right of voting to persons occupying substantial buildings, such as mills, brewhouses, granaries, &c., and thus to obviate this abuse."

7. IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Leave was given to Sir JOHN CAMPBELL, June 12, to bring in a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud. He mentioned, that on the first day of the session he had given notice of a motion to bring in a similar bill; but on the day it was to have come on, he ceased to be a member of the house. On the very day, however, of his restoration to the house, he had renewed his notice, and hoped he should be able to carry through a measure which lay so near his heart. He then went into a general argument in favour of the abolition of imprisonment for debt, and read an extract from Burke in confirmation of his opinions on the subject. He could not, however, propose to abolish imprisonment, unless he could offer some equivalent to the creditor, and effect some improvement in the law of debtor and creditor. He proposed, first of all, that there should be a power of instant execution upon all bills of exchange, promissory notes, and bonds. Another improvement he intended to introduce, was for the purpose of more effectually compelling the debtor to surrender his property. He proposed by this bill, whatever the amount of the debt was, that the debtor should be subjected to an examination before a competent tribunal; and if he should not fairly disclose and surrender his property, he should be put into close confinement and treated as a criminal. Common debtors would thus be treated, in fact, as bankrupts. He also proposed that all manner of property, securities, money in the funds, copyholds, &c., should be surrendered for the benefit of creditors. Another improvement of considerable importance would be, to allow the cessio bonorum without imprisonment. If a debtor were honestly disposed to surrender his property, why should he not be allowed to do so voluntarily, without being arrested by a sheriff's officer, and thrown into prison? The creditors would have the opportunity of judging whether the debtor was honest or not. At present, all future effects were liable, and the spur of industry was entirely taken away; it was therefore proposed that a certain proportion of the creditors in number and value should give a certificate, and the debtor would then become a new man, in the same manner as if, under the present system, he had been a bankrupt. If, however, on the other hand, he contracted debts on false pretences, or made an assignment of debts and property with the view of defrauding his creditors; if, in short, he did not make a just and fair disclosure of the state of his affairs, he should be guilty of a misdemeanour, and subject to punishment accordingly. There would be some expense incidental to the machinery for this measure; but nothing like the cost of the insolvent debtors system, which was £300,000 annually, and which would be done away with.—Several members suggested what they considered improvements in the bill, which Sir John Campbell promised to attend to. A separate measure, he said, would be proposed for Ireland.

8. POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

At various sittings, the house in committee sanctioned the clauses of this bill up to the last, which was agreed to on June 20. The only alteration of importance agreed to in committee was on the 33d clause: it was agreed that owners of property should be allowed six votes in vestry, while tenants have only one; but they are only to vote on the election of guardians of the poor, the building of workhouses, and the union of parishes.

9. PAROCHIAL EDUCATION IN SCOTLAND.

Mr COLQUHOUN, member for Dumbartonshire, moved, Tu. June 17, for leave to bring in a bill to regulate and enlarge the provision for parochial education in Scotland. Mr Colquhoun stated that he thought a grant of £60,000 necessary to make education in Scotland keep pace with the increase of the population; and when the expense of police establishments, which education tended to do away with, was taken into consideration, he trusted such a sum would not be considered extravagant.—Several other members having suggested a committee to inquire as a preliminary measure, Lord ALTHORP said he thought the bill might be advantageously introduced first, and then referred to a committee up stairs. He did not throw out this suggestion as one which he pledged himself to support; but he certainly thought that inquiry should precede legislation.—Ultimately, Mr Colquhoun withdrew his motion.

10. MINOR SUBJECTS.

A motion, by Mr MAXWELL, for a select committee to inquire into the distress complained of in the petitions of the hand-loom weavers, was carried against Ministers, June 11, by 70 to 42; majority, 28.

The House of Commons, June 9, on the motion of Lord DUDLEY STUART, voted £10,000 for the relief of the Polish refugees in Britain, whom the sum will support for a twelvemonth.

The house-tax repeal bill has passed through all its stages, and received the royal assent.

IRELAND.

"THE O'CONNELL ANNUITY FOR THE PAST YEAR, 1833."—Such is the title of a huge advertisement, covering an entire page of the Morning Register of June 2. It details, in alphabetical order, the donations of several congregations throughout Ireland, giving a sum total of thirteen thousand five hundred and sixteen pounds! What part in the gift of the crown could compensate for the loss of that? The principal contributors are from the disturbed counties. The north gives little or nothing; but every county which sent repealers to Parliament is most munificent. Well may he exclaim, that "repeal, after all, is the only vital question."—Morning Herald.

A new National Commercial Bank of Ireland, with a capital of five millions, in five pound shares, is in contemplation. It is calculated that there will be established through its medium about three hundred banks throughout the country.

ENGLAND.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

AN account of the circumstances which led to a change in the Ministry is given as an interpolation in our Parliamentary department. Three of the places vacated by the four retiring Ministers were filled up in the course of the week in which the resignations took place, as follows:—

Colonial Secretary, Mr Spring Rice.
First Lord of the Admiralty, . . Lord Auckland.
Lord Privy Seal, Lord Carlisle.

The Post-Office continued vacant for a longer period, Lord Mulgrave having refused it without a seat in the Cabinet: it was eventually given to the Marquis of Conyngham. About the 10th of June, Mr Abercromby was appointed to the office of Master of the Mint, with a seat in the Cabinet. Mr Ellice, retaining his present situation, also becomes a Cabinet Minister.

The minor arrangements rendered necessary by the changes are—Mr P. Thompson, President of the Board of Trade; Mr F. Baring, Secretary of the Treasury; Captain Byng, a Lord of the Treasury; and Colonel Leith Hay, Clerk of the Ordnance.

During the temporary disarrangement of the Cabinet, about 150 members of Brookes's, and members of the House of Commons, signed a letter prepared by Lord Ebrington, and addressed to Earl Grey, expressing confidence in his lordship, and a hope that he would remain in office. To this Lord Grey returned the following answer:—

"Dear Lord Ebrington—I received yesterday evening your very kind note accompanying the letter, which had been written under the impression that I had determined to retire from the situation which I now hold. Whether I regard the expressions contained in the letter itself, or the number and respectability of the signatures, I cannot help feeling this to be one of the most gratifying testimonials of confidence and good opinion ever received by any public man. It imposes on me the duty of making every personal sacrifice that can be required of me, and which can be useful for the support of the principles on which the present administration was formed. But I will not conceal from you, that declining strength makes it extremely doubtful whether I shall be found equal to the task which is thus imposed upon me. If my endeavours to supply the places of those of whose services the country has been so unfortunately deprived prove successful, it is only by the support of honourable and independent men, in conducting the government on safe and moderate principles, that I can hope to get through the difficulties which are before me. Founded on the principles of reform, the present administration must necessarily look to the correction of all proved abuses. But in pursuing a course of salutary improvement, I feel it indispensable that we shall be allowed to proceed with deliberation and caution; and above all, that we should not be urged by a constant and active pressure from without, to the adoption of any measures, the necessity of which has not been fully proved, and which are not strictly regulated by a careful attention to the settled institutions of the country, both in church and state. On no other principle can this or any other administration be conducted with advantage or safety. I am, &c.

INSTALLATION OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON AS CHANCELLOR OF OXFORD UNIVERSITY.

THIS ceremony commenced on Tuesday, June 10, and was conducted with the greatest splendour throughout. It was quite manifest, from the spirit which prevailed, that there existed, not only among the clergy but the laity of the establishment, a most earnest desire to avail themselves of the prominent and interesting occasion, to testify their zeal in support of the connection between church and state, under circumstances threatening to dissolve it. The Duke of Wellington arrived on Monday, accompanied by the Duke of Cumberland, and a select party of private friends. On Tuesday morning, a number of noblemen, heads of houses, doctors of divinity, and doctors of law, together with the proctors of the university, formed a procession, which ranged along University Hall; and at ten o'clock it advanced in full state, with the Duke of Wellington at its head, to the Theatre, where the ceremony of the installation was celebrated. This elegant building, which is of a circular form, and calculated to hold 3000 people, was completely filled, and presented a sight of surprising magnificence and beauty. After the noble and learned parties had entered it, the first proceeding that took place was to confer honorary degrees on certain exalted and eminent persons, whose claims to the honour had previously been allowed. Dr Cramer, the public orator, spoke the Creweian oration, and there were also odes in Greek, Latin, and English. One was in Latin verse, with the title "Cicero ab exilio rediit" (Cicero returning from exile), and had been adjudged to Mr Arthur Kensington, scholar of Trinity. The second composition was an English essay, having for its theme "The influence of the Roman conquests upon literature, and the arts in Rome." The proceedings of Tuesday closed with a sacred oratorio, by Dr Crotch. In the evening, the Duke of Wellington dined with a distinguished party in University Hall. On Wednesday, there was a convocation held in the Clarendon Rooms (formerly the celebrated printing office); the procession composed of the same individuals, and observing the same order, as on the preceding day. Here also honorary degrees were conferred; among the persons so honoured were Sir Astley Cooper, Sir Charles Wetherell, Mr J. G. Lockhart, Mr Wilkie, the painter, Mr Westmacott, the sculptor, and Mr Blore, the architect. The Chancellor's prize Latin essay, "De provinciarum Romanarum administratione ratione," was next recited. The prize had been adjudged to Mr Robert Scott, B.A., student of Christ Church. Then followed the Newdigate English prize poem, the successful competitor for which was Mr Joseph Arnold, scholar of Wadham. The subject was "The Hospice of St Bernard." The convocation was finally dissolved in dumb show with deafening cheers.

On various occasions during this splendid series of ceremonies, the young men took an opportunity of playing their political leanings, which appeared exclusively to be towards Toryism and high church. Lord Durham, many members of the government, and "O'Connell with his Tail," were the subjects of groans and hisses. There was a contemptuous look for the dissenters, and a loud cackling for "John Grey's disinterested relations in office." On the other hand, the names of many Tory statesmen were received with applause. We should not wonder if the action of these young persons were to produce some effect not very favourable to themselves, on a future session.

PLURALITY AND NON-RESIDENCE BILLS.

LORD BROUGHAM's bill for the prevention of pluralities bears this concise and expressive title, "An act to prevent spiritual persons in England and Ireland from holding more preferments than one." And the object of the bill would seem to be reached by the fourth clause, which enacts, that if any spiritual person shall become in any way possessed of a second piece of preferment, his right to retain the first shall be as absolutely extinguished as to all intents, effects, constructions, and purposes whatsoever, as if such spiritual person were actually dead. But upon reading a little farther, it appears, that notwithstanding this positive enactment, in an immense number of cases nothing of the kind is effected; for by the seventh clause, it is declared, that, provided two benefices do not exceed together £300 in annual value, and their limits touch each other in some part, in that case both may be held by the same "spiritual person."

A bill "to prevent non-residence of the clergy" properly accompanies that for prevention of pluralities. By the sixth clause of this bill, it is enacted that no spiritual person shall be absent more than thirty days at once, or more than sixty days altogether in one year, from his living or curacy, under the penalty of forfeiting three times the income of his living during his absence for a first offence, and the preferment itself for a second. Bishops are allowed to attend Parliament, and to be absent on visitations; and certain officers in the universities may reside within five miles of their benefices for five months of the year. In cases of sickness of the clergyman himself or any member of his family, or in case of his being summoned as a witness or party in a court of law, the bishop of the diocese may grant a license for his absence; but in all cases where such dispensations are granted, a statement of all the circumstances is to be published in the Gazette. All persons under the jurisdiction of a bishop are to transmit to the bishops of their respective dioceses an account of the time they have been recent or non-resident on their livings, the value of them, and the salary paid to their curates. The bishops are to send a similar account to the archbishops; who are in turn to report their own absence from their dioceses to the King in Council, together with a digest of all the cases of non-residence which have occurred throughout the kingdom during the year.

THE KING'S SPEECH TO THE ARCHBISHOPS.

THE Standard gives, with glowing expressions of gratitude, an account of a speech supposed to have been delivered by the King in reply to a congratulatory address presented to him on his birthday by the Archbishops of Canterbury and Armagh. The Standard believes that the following were the very words of the King, but does not mention the name of the reporter:—

"I have been, by the circumstances of my life, a by conviction, led to support toleration to the utmost extent of which it is justly capable; but toleration must not be suffered to go into licentiousness; it has its bounds, which it is my duty, and which I am resolved, to maintain. I am, from the deepest conviction, attached to the pure Protestant faith, which this church, of which I am the temporal head, is the human means of diffusing and preserving in this land.

"I cannot forget what was the course of events that placed my family on the throne which I now fill. These events were consummated in a revolution which was deemed necessary, and was effected, not, as has sometimes been most erroneously stated, merely for the sake of the temporal liberties of the people, but for the preservation of their religion. It was for the defence of the religion of the country that was made the settlement of the crown, which has placed me in the situation that I now fill; not that religion, and the church of England and Ireland [Ireland with peculiar emphasis], the prelates of which are now before me, it is my fixed purpose, determination, and resolution, to maintain.

"The present bishops, I am quite satisfied (and am rejoiced to hear, from them and from all, the sanction of the clergy in general under their governance), have never been excelled at any period of the history of our church by any of their predecessors in learning, piety, or ability in the discharge of their high duties. If there are any of the inferior arrangements in the discipline of the church, which, however, I greatly doubt [the expression of doubt was again delivered by his Majesty with great emphasis]—that require amendment, I have no distrust of the readiness and ability of the prelates now before me to correct such things; and to you, I trust, they will be left to correct, with your authority unimpaired and unshackled.

"I trust it will not be supposed that I am speaking to you a speech which I have got by heart. No, I am declaring to you my real and genuine sentiments. I have almost completed my sixty-ninth year; and though blessed by God with a very rare measure of health, yet having known what sickness is for some years, yet do not blind myself to the plain and evident truth, that an increase of years must tell largely upon me when sickness shall come. I cannot, therefore, expect that I shall be very long in this world. It is under this impression that I tell you, that while I know that the law of the land considers it impossible that I should do wrong—that while now there is no earthly power which can call me to account—this only makes me the more deeply sensible of a responsibility under which I stand to that Almighty being before whom we must all one day appear. When that day shall come, you will know whether I am sincere in the declaration which I now make, of firm attachment to the church, and resolution to maintain it.

"I have spoken more strongly than usual, because of unhappy circumstances that have forced themselves upon the observation of all. The threats of those who are enemies of the church, make it the more necessary for one who feels their duty to that church to speak out. The words which you hear from me are indeed spoken from my mouth, but they flow from my heart."

The Standard adds—

"His Majesty was affected to tears during the delivery of this declaration, and concluded the interview by inviting the prelates to partake of the Holy Communion with him at the Chapel Royal, on Sunday, June 22."

May 22. The ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of a convent in Manchester took place. The site of the structure is near St Patrick's Chapel, in Oldham Road. There were about twenty Catholic clergy present on the occasion, and a vast concourse of spectators. The convent is intended for the education of 400 or 500 poor female children, and is to be conducted by four nuns of the order of St Francis de Sales.

— 25, Being Trinity Sunday, a Mrs Brown did penance in the church of Redruth, for calling Mrs Michell a naughty woman. This very ridiculous piece of mummery was witnessed by at least 5000 persons, of which five-fifths, of course, were of the fair sex. Mrs Brown came to the church in a post-chaise about mid-day, and entered it in the middle of the sermon, when the church became in a complete uproar, by the audience standing in the seats—in fact, mounting as high as they could—see the two ladies, Mrs Brown and Mrs Michell, the latter looking more like a culprit than the former. Mrs Brown was very showily attired, with a smart bonnet, powers, and ribbons, and at once put aside her long flowing veil, showering her smiles around to the admiration of all. In short, no theatrical queen could perform a part better than Mrs Brown did; and Mrs Michell the loser of nearly six score pounds sterling law expenses.

June 3. A deputation of gentlemen from the central committee for the circulation of a declaration of the duty of the church of England, in favour of the establishment, waited upon the Archbishop of Canterbury with a copy of the address recently presented to his Majesty. The copy presented to his Grace, the original signatures, 230,000 in number, were appended. His Grace expressed his high satisfaction at being entrusted with this important document.

— 4. A considerable number of workmen, principally consisting of excavators, were put into employ by the surveyors and contractors who are engaged in the extended London and Birmingham railroad, the commencement of which will be from the Hampstead Road, Camden Town, close to the bridge over the Regent's Canal, and will pass within about one hundred yards of the gardens of Chalk Farm Tavern.

— 7. A majestic steam-ship, the largest ever built in England, named the Pacha, was launched from the dock-yard of Messrs Fletcher and Fearnell, at Limehouse, in the presence of a numerous and respectable company. The Pacha has been built by the order of the Viceroy of Egypt for a vessel of war, and (besides affording accommodation for the transmission of a large body of troops, provisions, stores, ammunition, &c.) will carry twenty carronades, and two long traversing guns. Some idea may be formed of the Pacha's immense size and capability by the following dimensions:—Extreme length, 111 feet 6 inches; extreme breadth, 56 feet; extreme depth, 32 feet 6 inches. Supposed admeasurement, by beam-boat mode, from 1800 to 2000 tons, being nearly equal to the burden of a 74-gun ship. She will be furnished with two steam-engines, each of 120 horse power.

— 10. The Birmingham Political Union resolved to suspend its meetings and deliberations for the present.

— 12. The result of the new election for Cambridge, in room of Mr Spring Rice, who had changed his office in the Cabinet, was declared; when it appeared there were for Mr Rice 615, for Sir Edward Sugden, his Tory rival, 590; majority for Mr Rice 25.

— 13. At the Salford sessions, the men concerned in the late outrages at Oldham, thirteen in number, were tried, and ten of them convicted, whereupon the court sentenced three of them to twelve months' imprisonment in Lancaster Castle, and the remainder to six months' imprisonment in Salford House of Correction. Two men were also convicted of conspiring to administer illegal oaths in a trades' union, and entered into recognisances to appear when called on to receive judgment.

— 14. A cargo of tea—the first introduced into Great Britain by a different channel from the East India Company—was landed at Liverpool under very remarkable circumstances. The late act, it seems, allows the importation of tea from any port east of the Cape of Good Hope, but without specifying that African and Asiatic ports were alone meant. Now, it appears that Dantzic is fifteen miles to the eastward of the longitude of the Cape of Good Hope; and a vessel, taking advantage of this circumstance, has introduced the cargo in question from that port. The vessel is the Betsy of Peterhead, Duthie master.

— 16. The house-tax repeal bill received the royal assent.

— 18. Don Carlos, his family, and suite, landed at Portsmouth from the Donegal, on board of which they had arrived from Spain. Among the suite of Don Carlos, was General Moreno, who commanded at the execution of the unfortunate Torrijos and his followers. The royal party was received with great respect by the people of Portsmouth.

It is said that the Lords of the Treasury will shortly issue an order to the Postmaster-General, permitting the free transmission through the Post-office, to authors residing in the country, of the proof-sheets of any work in the press. The proofs, it is said, are to be sent to Sir F. Freeling, who will enclose them in a Post-office cover according to the address; and they may be returned in the same manner.—Morning Post.

Mr Robert Grant, judge advocate, has been appointed governor of Bombay, and his vacant situation has been conferred on Mr R. C. Fergusson, M.P. for the stewardship of Kirkeudbright, for which district, as well as for the metropolitan borough of Finsbury, a new election will accordingly be required.

It is the intention of the inhabitants of Truro to erect a monument in that town to the memory of Mr Richard Lander, who met his death in Africa. The Landers were natives of Truro.

Intelligence has been received by a private letter from Mauritius, by which it appears that the island was visited by a violent hurricane on Monday the 20th of January, which occasioned a considerable loss of life and property. The governor called a meeting, and issued a proclamation to condole with the people on the occasion of the painful disaster. The governor subscribed 1000 sacks of rice and 5000 dollars (which, with the public subscription, now amounts to 20,000 dollars) to be distributed among the poor surviving inhabitants.

The government have issued instructions to the assessors of taxes throughout the country, not to charge any houses with the inhabited house-duty from the 5th April last.

To those who watch the signs of the times, there is no fact more remarkable than the various degrees of earnestness with which the different classes of the community demand knowledge. The higher class of mechanics spare from their hard-earned wages considerable sums, in order to procure in their institutes the best scientific instructors. Those immediately above them, comprising clerks in offices, smaller tradesmen, and others, have also their reading-rooms and lectures. Several of these institutions have lately arisen in the metropolis, in which amusement is wisely combined with science. The middle and some of the upper classes have long had their Royal and London Institutions, and these are now much better attended than formerly. But the mere fact that the scientific exhibitions at the Adelaide Gallery, at the Museum of National Manufactures in Leicester Square, at the chemical exhibition in Regent Street, and, above all, that difficult, abstruse, and, we may add, splendid subject, of polarised light, are each of them successfully taken up as mercantile speculations, proves most indisputably the demand for scientific knowledge.—Correspondent of the Times.

From a paper published by authority of the Factory Commission, we find that in a certain number of factories, taken indiscriminately, there are (in Yorkshire) 9087 persons who can read; 1630 who cannot read: 5523 who can write; and 5194 who cannot write. In factories in Lancashire there are 11,393 who can read; 2344 who cannot read: 5184 who can write; 8553 who cannot write. The proportion of those who can read and write in the agricultural districts of these counties, is, it is feared, much less.—London Patriot.

Public Charities.—A Parliamentary return has been made by the secretary to the commissioners for inquiring concerning charities in England and Wales, of the amount of the income of charity estates and property of all kinds, in the several counties. The following are the total sums as received and applied:—

Annual income of all the charities	L.413,041
Portion of the whole income applied for education in established schools	101,199
Portion applied for or appropriated to education, otherwise than in established schools	10,260
Total applied for education	111,450

One of the main effects of the union system must be, simply, a shift in the location of tradesmen. In places where strikes have prevailed, new men from a distance will be received, while the old ones will require to wander abroad in search of new masters, if they can get them. It is stated that about 2000 German tailors have now obtained regular employment as journeymen in the metropolis, in consequence of the strike of the natives of the same class.

The East India Company is winding up its commercial affairs rapidly. The court has issued a notice that it will not in future receive any goods of private merchants into its warehouses, or undertake the management or sale of them. It has already ceased to send out ships to the East, and its last cargoes of tea will soon be landed. It will then become a purely political body, and the commerce of China, after having been in its hands upwards of two hundred years, will pass into those of the merchants of England.

An appeal has been made to the public on behalf of Joseph Lancaster, the able and energetic founder of that widely diffused system of education which bears his name. This highly meritorious, though in a worldly sense we must admit by no means prudent individual, it appears, is now upwards of sixty years of age, residing in Canada, earning for himself, his wife and children, a hard and scanty subsistence as a common labourer.

The second son of Sir John Pringle was drowned in the Thames, between Erith and Woolwich, on Whitsunday. He was on a sailing excursion in a boat with another young gentleman, who gives the following account of the accident:—"We had sailed down the river as far as the Half-way-house, between Erith and Woolwich, and in consequence of the adverse wind and tide, were unable to return. A barge passing up the river, and seeing our situation, hailed us, and offered to tow us up. We then pulled a little way up the river, and the barge tacked across, coming towards us. We came alongside, and I went to the stern of our boat to catch a rope thrown to me, which, as the barge passed us, I fastened to the thwart in the bow of our boat. As we came alongside of the barge, Mr Pringle went to the bow, either as I imagine with the intention of getting on to the barge, or for the purpose of preventing our boat striking against it. I, being intent upon securing the boat, heard no splash or noise, and therefore thought he had got on to the barge, till one of the bargemen asking me where he was, I told him on the barge. He seeing no one there, immediately called out, 'there was a man overboard,' and we looked about in expectation of seeing him rise, but unhappily no traces of him were visible." The deceased was a young man of fine promise, a cadet in the Military Academy at Woolwich. His father came to town on the day following the accident, just in time to learn the distressing news. The body was found a few days afterwards, floating near Gravesend.

The report of the coroner's inquests for one district only in Somersetshire, furnishes the statement of no fewer than five cases having occurred, within the last week, of the loss of children who were burnt to death. The Taunton Courier, which records this fact, adds, "In the space of about thirty years, during which we have conducted this journal, the almost incredible number of two thousand five hundred children have lost their lives by fire within this county."

The sums levied under the name of poor-rates, for the year ending 25th March 1833, amounted to L.8,739,881; of which L.6,790,799 was expended for the relief of the poor, L.254,412 in suits of law, and L.1,694,669 in other purposes. The diminution on the whole, as compared with the previous year, is four per cent. In some counties it is as much as nine per cent.; but in others there has been an increase of four per cent.

In the Hunterian oration, recently delivered by Mr Lawrence, occur the following just observations:—"It has been a trite, but, in my opinion, a most unfounded complaint, that genius is neglected, and that men of talent and information are precluded from opportunities of exertion and display, by favouritism, monopoly, or other obstacles. Within my own experience, the difficulty has always been to find talent for the plot, not opportunity for the talent. This, indeed, is natural: genius being rare, while fit occasions for its exercise are of constant occurrence. Genius will never be neglected by the public, unless it neglects itself; it must not disdain the humble alliance of industry. How can it expect encouragement, unless its existence can be manifested by performances? The chemist can apply tests for latent heat, but what criterion is there for latent ability? The surest evidence of superior talent is, that it forces itself into notice in spite of adverse circumstances; that it makes a road where it finds none."

Mr Kitching, surgeon, Aldersgate Street, has recently published the following strange statement in the Lancet:—"I have at present under my care a man who is nearly encrusted with a stone-like skin, very closely resembling the barnacles of the native oyster, or what is called 'rough casting,' so frequently seen on the outside of lath-and-plaster houses. He cannot sleep for any length of time, because the recumbent position causes in him the sensation of lying upon a board thickly studded with nails, or, as he expresses it, 'lying on a bag of sticks.' The first appearance of this covering occurred about six months ago; since which time it has been rapidly increasing; and little doubt exists but that in a short time the man will become as thoroughly encased in a hard coat as the armadillo or the rhinoceros."

In the committee on the Great Western Railway bill, Mr George Stevenson, the civil engineer, said, that by the proposed railway, 10,000 soldiers might be conveyed from London to Bristol in four hours!

Mr George Rennie is making a survey for a line of railroad between York and Leeds. About L.70,000 have been subscribed towards the undertaking.

The Reverend Mr Connop Thirlwall, one of the most distinguished scholars of the University of Cambridge, and the translator of Niebuhr, has been dismissed from his office of classical lecturer, and called upon to resign his fellowship, in consequence of having written a pamphlet in which the admission of dissenters to university honours was advocated. This has been done at the instance of Dr Christopher Wordsworth, master of Trinity College.

So numerous are the omnibuses which now run in and about London, that the mileage duty alone amounts, it is said, to nearly L.200,000 per annum.

A circular has been received by the masonic lodge at Bury, and probably by those of other places, requiring them to make a return to the clerk of the peace, of the name, employment, or profession, and place of residence of every member; in default of which, they will be declared an unlawful secret society. The circular is signed by the Grand Master, the Duke of Sussex. This is understood to be a step taken in contemplation of putting down all spurious lodges, whether of trades' unions or benefit societies.—Manchester Guardian.

There is a very fine horse in the possession of Sir Henry Meux and Co. the eminent brewers, which is used as a dray horse, but is so tractable that he is left sometimes without any restraint to walk about the yard, and return to the stable according to his fancy. In the yard there are also a few pigs of a peculiar breed, which are fed on grains and corn, and to these pigs the horse has evidently an insuperable objection, which is illustrated by the following fact:—There is a long deep trough in the yard, holding water for the horses, to which this horse goes alone with his mouthful of corn, which he saves from his supply. When he reaches the trough, he lets the corn fall near it on the ground; and when the young swine approach to eat it (for the old ones keep aloof), he suddenly seizes one of them by the tail, pops him into the trough, and then capers about the yard, seemingly delighted with the frolic. The noise of the pig soon brings the men to its assistance; who know, from experience, what is the matter; while the horse indulges in all sorts of antics, by way of horse-laugh, and then returns quietly to the stable.—Globe.

A correspondent of the Times gives the following account of the carpets he saw at the late royal exhibition of French manufactures at Paris:—"The carpets are superior to the English, in being made of one piece, and of more solid and durable workmanship. But then, the price of that species of labour, and the cost of materials, make them such expensive commodities, that none but very wealthy people can afford to use them. There is one at the exhibition of about twenty feet by twenty, the pattern of which is an imitation of a black Cashmere shawl, for which the most exorbitant price of 55,000 francs (L.2200 sterling) is asked."

It is stated that the potato crop in the south of Scotland and north of England is likely to be a failure to a considerable extent, on account of the rotting of the sets in the ground. Several reasons have been assigned for this—the most likely is, that a number of insects have attacked the sets on the cut sides, and destroyed the germinating principle. Others say that the crops have been too long raised from sets, and recommend having recourse to seeds; but such conjectures do not account for the suddenness of the deterioration. We would hope that the alarm will turn out to be in a great measure unfounded.

There is now making at the steam-engine boiler manufactory of Mr John Harrison, near St Mary's Bridge, in this town, perhaps the largest vessel that ever was put together in this kingdom, of wrought iron. The dimensions are as follow:—Diameter, 47 feet; depth, 20 feet 3 inches; weight, between 50 and 60 tons. It will contain 218,947 imperial gallons, or 980 tons of water, which will be a pressure on the bottom of 88 lbs. on the square inch.—Derby Mercury.

Among the adventurous excursions planned by Englishmen for the present summer, is one to visit a mountain between the 66th and 67th degree of north latitude, not far distant from Tornea, at the extremity of the Gulf of Bothnia, from which point during the latter part of the month of June the sun may be seen at midnight. The facilities for this novel undertaking are, however, greater than is generally imagined. By the steam-boats from Hull, Stockholm may be reached in eight days; and the rivers may be ascended in boats to nearly the point desired, while to those who prefer travelling by land, relays of horses, which are abundant in that country, are to be obtained on moderate terms. The natives go from great distances to visit the spot mentioned, and to pass midsummer-eve on the mountain; making a species of festival, which, from the varieties of costume and rustic finery, is said to be of very striking and picturesque effect.

A few days ago, on the arrival of a French lady, named Augustine Renier, in one of the Calais steamers, off the Custom House, her bulky appearance excited the suspicion of a revenue officer named Fernyhough, who intimated his suspicions that she had smuggled goods concealed about her person. The lady denied the accusation, declaring she was encente, and that the officer was a rude fellow. He, however, handed her over to a female searcher, a Mrs Probert, who delivered the fair foreigner of 145 yards of lace, six foreign lace veils, a pelerine, 17 pieces of nets, 13 scarfs, 6 reticules, 9 pairs of silk stockings, 2 pairs of silk gloves, 38 pairs of mittens, 21 pairs of coloured silk gloves, 15 pairs of thread gloves, 6 collars, 2 remnants of foreign muslin, and 28 silk purses, all of foreign manufacture, which she had concealed about her. The value of the goods seized is about L.110, and the Custom House authorities intend proceeding against Madame Renier for penalties amounting to treble the value of the goods seized.

A letter dated Lisbon, May 10, says—"A very melancholy event took place the other day on board his Majesty's ship Ringdove. A sailor was to be flogged for getting drunk, but as he made great resistance, he was put in irons, and in this state was brought on deck, when about to receive his punishment. On being ordered to strip, he laid hold of a knife, which he had concealed about his person, and killed himself by plunging it into his heart."

An association has just been begun at Naples, which is worthy of remark, on account of its originality. Sixty advocates and eighty other distinguished persons have formed a society, with a view to enable the widows, orphans, and wards, to defend their rights against the rich and powerful. The society engages to carry on gratuitously suits of the poor until judgment be definitively pronounced, and to make all the advances for the requisite expenses.

A direct trade is about to be opened between Quebec and China. Two ships for this trade have been already launched at Quebec, and a valuable commerce, it is expected, will be the result.

There has been recently established in Pekin, a literary and commercial journal in Chinese. A magazine has also been published in the same language.

The Gazette de Tribunaux gives an account of an event as strange as it is deplorable, which has just thrown three honourable families in Paris into dismay. A Mr C—, residing in the Rue St Lazare, with his wife, a young and handsome woman, to whom he had been but recently married, was in the habit of receiving at his table a particular friend, a Mr S—. A few days ago, Mr C—, from some sinister feeling of jealousy, returned home from his office at an earlier hour than usual. He rang the bell at the outer door leading to his apartment, but no answer was made from within. Mr C—, thinking it strange, applied his eye to the key-hole, and plainly perceived Mr S— sitting by the side of his wife. The infuriated husband ran down to the porter's lodge, and asked the porter who was with his wife. The porter, however, denied that any one had been to Mr C—'s apartment. Mr C— immediately sent for a locksmith, and on forcing the door of his apartment, he was struck with horror and surprise at discovering Mr S— by the side of his wife; both of them were perfectly inanimate. Madame C— was cold, but the body of Mr S— was still warm; and the surgeon who was called in gave his opinion that he might have been restored if assistance had been rendered five minutes sooner. It is impossible to say whether the death of these two persons is to be attributed to suicide, or whether they were suffocated accidentally by charcoal. There is ground to suppose the latter, as some charcoal was burning very intensely in an iron pot, which had been placed too forward on the fireplace, so that the fumes from it did not ascend the chimney. There was no disorder in the attitude or dress of the two victims.

Among the curiosities which M. Ruppel has brought from Abyssinia, are two remarkable manuscripts. One is a Bible, said to contain a new work of Solomon, one or two new books of Esdras, and a considerable addition to the fifth book of Esther, all perfectly unknown in Europe. It also contains the book of Enoch, and fifteen new Psalms, the existence of which was already known to the learned. The other manuscript is a species of code, which the Abyssinians date from the Council of Nice (325), the epoch at which it was promulgated by one of their kings. This code is divided into two books: the first relates to canonical law, and treats of the relations of the church with the temporal power; the other is a sort of civil code. There are also some remarkable hymns, because they present the return of consonancy, the only feature of poetry to be found in Abyssinian literature.—Galignani.

Accounts have been received from Swan River to the 29th of November. The arrival of Governor Stirling was looked for with much anxiety. The Brilliant, Hopwood, from London, arrived at Swan River on the 8th of November. The crops were looking very healthy, and a favourable harvest was expected. The settlement was healthy and going on favourably.—Scots Times.

The decree for giving a representative form of government to Denmark has been published. There are to be four provincial assemblies for the four political divisions—Jutland, Schelsing, Holstein, and the Islands—and they are to meet every second year.

The most accurate idea of the state of Persian artillery may be gathered from an anecdote in the Sketches of Persia, in which the besieged commandant of a fort requests his enemy to fire off his other ball, and so put their minds at rest.—Conolly's Journey to the North of India.

SCOTLAND.

ELECTIONS FOR EDINBURGH AND LEITH.

THE nomination for Edinburgh, in consequence of the retirement of Lord Advocate Jeffrey, took place on the hustings at the Cross, May 28, when Mr Aytoun, the ultra-liberal candidate, was proposed by Messrs Tait and Jameson; Sir John Campbell, the Ministerialist, by Lord Provost Spittal and Sir Thomas Dick Lauder; and Mr Learmonth, the Tory, by Mr P. Robertson and Colonel Macdonald of Powderhall. The result of the poll which afterwards took place, was announced by the sheriff on the hustings, June 2. There were, for Sir John Campbell, 1932; for Mr Learmonth, 1401; for Mr Aytoun, 480; majority, 531 for Sir John Campbell, who was accordingly declared to be duly elected. Mr Aytoun was consoled for his defeat by a procession of artisans in his honour; and Mr Learmonth by a dinner which was given to him in the Waterloo Rooms, June 13, attended by about 500 gentlemen.—In consequence of the acceptance of office by Mr Abercromby, another election took place, June 23, when, there being no opposition to the return of Mr Abercromby, he was proposed by Mr Cunningham, advocate, seconded by Dean of Guild Macfie, and re-elected.

The nomination for Leith took place on the 26th May, when the new Lord Advocate Murray was proposed by Provost White of Leith, and Provost Bailey of Portobello; and Mr Aitchison, the Tory candidate, by Mr Hardie, merchant, and Mr H. G. Bell, advocate. The result of the poll was declared, June 2, when there appeared, for the Lord Advocate, 686, and for Mr Aitchison, 449; majority, 237, for the Lord Advocate, who was accordingly declared duly elected. Mr Aitchison was subsequently honoured by his friends at Leith, Musselburgh, and Newhaven, by dinners respectively given to him at those places.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

In this high spiritual court, which, as stated in our last paper, sat down on the 22d May, the principal business of the session was brought on, Tuesday the 27th, by Lord Moncrieff, who, after thirty-six overtures on the subject of calls had been laid on the table, proceeded to address the Assembly in reference to that important question. After alluding to the agitation which at present threatens the very existence of the church, his lordship professed his desire, by restoring some of its ancient regulations respecting popular rights, to fortify it against its enemies. He asserted it, as a principle of the church, from the Reformation down to a comparatively recent period, that no minister should be intruded into a parish against the will of the congregation; he wished to make calls once more a reality. The motion which he submitted was as follows:—"That the General Assembly, having maturely considered the overture, do declare that it is a fundamental law of this church, that no pastor shall be intruded on any congregation contrary to the will of the people; and that, in order to carry this principle into full effect, the Presbyteries of the church shall be instructed, that if in moderating a call to a vacant pastoral charge, the major part of the male heads of families, members of the vacant congregation, and in full communion with the church, shall disapprove of the person in whose favour the call is proposed to be moderated in, such disapproval shall be deemed sufficient ground for the Presbytery rejecting such person, and that he shall be rejected accordingly, and due notice thereof forthwith given to all concerned; but that, if the major part of the said heads of families shall not disapprove of such person to their pastor, the Presbytery shall proceed with the settlement according to the rules of the church; and farther declare, that no person shall be held to be elected to disapprove, as aforesaid, who shall refuse, if required, solemnly to declare, in presence of other Presbyteries, that he is actuated by no factious or malicious motive, but solely by a conscientious regard to the spiritual interests of himself or congregation; and resolve, that a committee be appointed to report to the interim diet of the Assembly in what manner, and what particular measures, this declaration and instruction may be best carried into full operation." This motion, having been seconded by Mr Craig Buchanan of Kinross, was opposed by Dr Mearns, who contended that to allow congregations to reject without reason assigned, was to give them virtually the chief power in the matter, to the exclusion of both the patron's rights, and the church's power of supervision. He preferred the spirit of the report of the committee of the last General Assembly, which allowed of the power of the heads of families to object, leaving it for the Presbytery to consider the objections, and declare them valid or otherwise at their discretion; and moved, as an amendment, that this report be approved. After various members had spoken for and against the two motions, the Assembly divided, when the following was the state of the vote:—For Lord Moncrieff's motion, 184; for Dr Mearns's, 138; majority in favour of the popular right, 46.—An enthusiastic burst of cheering followed the declaration of this triumph, the first obtained by the popular party for nearly a century within the walls of the Assembly.

A series of regulations for giving effect to this decision was afterwards moved in the Assembly, and was agreed that they should be sent as an overture to the Presbyteries, a majority of which having approved them, they will become the law of the church. The substance is as follows:—"The persons entitled object to a presentee are the male heads of family in full communion with the church. The presentee having preached at least once before the congregation the said communicants, on the day appointed for moderating the call, may allege 'special objections' his morals or doctrine, or his sufficiency and fitness for the particular charge; and these must be substantiated in the usual way to the satisfaction of the church courts. Secondly, the said communicants may express 'dissent' without reason given, either viva voce or in writing: if the dissentients are less than one half of the qualified communicants, their opposition no bar to the appointment of the presentee: if they form an apparent majority, the Presbytery is to a journal proceedings to a second meeting at the distance of ten days, and in the interval, if they see proper, are requested, may appoint him to preach again to the congregation. At the adjourned meeting, form dissents may be withdrawn, but no new ones can be tendered without reasons given, and in this case the Presbytery decides on their competence. If the dissentients then persist in their dissents, and are found to be a majority of the congregation, the presentee falls to the ground; but at the demand of the patron or presentee, or any member of the Presbytery, or all of the dissentients may be cited to appear at third meeting, ten days from the second, and pur themselves of impure motives, by declaring that they are not actuated by private malice, but by a conscientious regard to the spiritual interests of themselves or the congregation. Any person so cited neglects to make the declaration is struck off the list of dissentients. When the patron names a second presentee the same proceedings are repeated: and if he and the parishioners cannot come to an understanding within the usual period of six months, the jus devolutum the Presbytery comes into operation. Against a presentee named by it, no dissent without reason given is available, but the presentation is conducted in the old form. A roll of the qualified communicants is to be kept by the session clerk, and revised annually November after the sacrament."

[A strong protest, or, as it is technically called dissent, has been entered against the decision of the Assembly by 106 of the most distinguished members lay and clerical, including Principals Macfarlan, Baird, and Haldane, Drs Cook, Forbes, Mearns, Ritchie, Stirling, and Rose, the Duke of Gordon, the Earl of Aboyne, the Lord Justice Clerk, the Dean of Faculty, and Messrs Whigham, Dundas, and Ferguson. The dissent chiefly proceeds upon the grounds—that the decision disturbs the balance which has hitherto subsisted between the rights of patron church-courts, and people, taking away all power from the two former, and conferring it on the latter. The Dean of Faculty, in an additional dissent of his own, states further, amidst other reasons—"Because I am persuaded that the measure adopted by the Assembly will lead to a great and most mischievous interference in parishes on the part of the adjoining ministers in favour of or against particular candidates—to much canvassing among the people for support by the candidates for the presentation—will tend to lower and degrade the clerical character—to lower the standard of qualification—to substitute a busy, intermeddling, factious, and fanatical clergy, in lieu of the amiable, pious, learned, and unobtrusive class of men by whom the pastoral duties have hitherto been performed—to diminish the weight and authority of the parochial clergy, in consequence of the means which will be employed to obtain livings—to create great disorders, and dissatisfaction in many parishes—settling in a great measure the uniformity of doctrine in the church, by leading candidates to endeavour to recommend themselves by any tenets which are popular in the parish at the time—to impair and to diminish the authority of the church courts when they are obliged to reject a candidate (whom the people regard) on account of his doctrines, after the church has themselves sanctioned the principle, that people, if dissatisfied, may reject without assigning a cause.”]

The only other subject of general interest before the Assembly was the question as to an alteration in the office of chapel of ease ministers. A strong feeling in favour of the elevation of those clergymen to a level with their parochial brethren has long existed. An objection chiefly urged on the present occasion was the danger of erecting new parochial divisions without an endowment, which many contended was not the spirit of an established church. At length a motion by Dr Brown of Aberdeen, for a committee to frame an act for the elevation of the chapel ministers, and other requisite regulations, was carried against a counter-motion of Dr Cook, by 153 against 16; majority 50.

The Assembly agreed to the disjunction of seven parishes from the presbytery of Paisley, to be formed into a new Presbytery, and to meet at Greenock. The parishes of Largs and Cumraes were also disjoined from the Presbytery of Irvine, and added to the newly constituted one of Greenock.

On Wednesday, May 28, agreeably to a desire expressed by the King, the Commissioner, Lord Belhaven, entertained about 200 of the members of the General Assembly to dinner, in the Picture Gallery, Eyrood House. The company sat down to dinner at seven o'clock, his Grace the Commissioner in the chair, supported on the right by the Duke of Gordon, and on the left by the Earl of Aboyne, Mr Fennet, his Grace's purse-bearer, acting as croupier. Among the company were, the Earls of Morton and Sathmore; Lord Ruthven; Sir William Seton; Mr Murray of Abercainry; Colonel Macdonald; Col. John Hay, M.P.; Mr Johnston, M.P.; Lord Provost of Glasgow, &c. In the evening Lady Belhaven held a drawing-room, which was attended by all the beauty and fashion in town.

On May 15. The inhabitants of Dundee, to the amount of 15,000, met in a meadow near the town, to constitute an anti-corn-law association. The chair was taken by the Provost, and the meeting was attended by two country gentlemen, Mr Kinloch of Kinloch, and Mr Chalmers of Aulbar. Resolutions were passed unanimously, to the effect that the operation of the corn-laws is unjust and oppressive; that the landlords have no claim to their monopoly in consequence of having any extra weight of taxation to bear; that the benefit of the corn-laws, even to the landlord, is very doubtful; that the principles of free trade generally are the only sound and safe ones; and that a committee should be appointed for the purpose of organising an anti-corn-law association. It was also determined that a petition to Parliament, embodying the principles laid down in the above resolutions, should be drawn up; and a committee was appointed to procure signatures to it, and to present it to Sir Henry Campbell for presentation.

On May 31. William Noble was hanged at the west end of the Court-house, Elgin, for the murder of William Ritchie.

At a meeting of the Court of Session, Francis Jeffrey, Esq., the late Lord Advocate, presented his Majesty's letter, appointing him a judge in room of the late Lord Craigie, and next day he sat along with Lord Medwyn in the Outer House to hear a case as Lord Probationer. He reported the case, June 6, and took his seat as Lord Jeffrey. A conservative dinner took place in the Tontine Coffee-room, Glasgow, attended by upwards of 900 gentlemen, the Duke of Gordon in the chair.

6. The Royal Chapel at Holyrood was surveyed by his Majesty's architect and others, with a view to consider the capability of its being repaired or fitted up for the meetings of the General Assembly, as well as to restoring the stalls for the ancient Scottish Order of Knights of the Thistle.—A clerk to a waiter to the signet in Edinburgh, who had absconded on the 22d Nov., with a large sum of money belonging to his employer, was caught by the active and persevering exertions of Mr Wilson, lieutenant of the city police, apprehended on board of the brig Scotsman, bound to New York, while detained in the Firth of Forth by contrary winds. It appears that the delinquent, after having gone on board the vessel, had, with a view to escape the vigilance anticipated pursuits of the authorities, been concealed in the hull, immediately below the cabin, where he was captured, ensconced beneath some of the goods. He had, however, previously to his apprehension, contrived to spend upwards of £70 of the money, but fortunately a considerable part was found in his possession.

7. A considerable interest was excited at Rothsay, by the effects of the late celebrated tragedian Kean, at his residence in the neighbourhood of that town. The most valuable articles had, we believe, been previously removed to London, and those sold differed in nothing from the usual furnishings of such a mansion, and, considering the sums which its owner had been accustomed to receive and squander, were of a more ordinary kind than might naturally have been expected. The competition, however, was brisk, and, generally speaking, the articles brought good prices. The house, two stories called a cottage, is not at that style, but is a neat two-storyed mansion, creditable to the taste of its late proprietor, and calculated to give a more favourable opinion of his prudence in such matters than either his general conduct or Mr Robinson's flighty description. Of the surrounding grounds, a great deal has been said, and not without justice, but it is obvious that but a small portion of Mr Kean's despatches has been carried into effect. If completed in a kindred spirit, it might, in a few years, exhibit a scene of great picturesque beauty. Taking into account the probable fact, that a mere cursory glance had impressed Mr Kean with a sense of their capabilities, the choice, and their subsequent adaptation, do honour to his judgment and taste; and no one who surveys this romantic beautiful spot, and, in thinking of the greatest tragedian of our time, can cast aside the recollection of the errors of the individual, but must regret that he was not permitted to wear out an old age in the seclusion he had planned, and planted, and cherished. The following lines, in Mr Kean's handwriting, we found among his papers. They are understood to be his own composition, and are not without merit:—

But lent thee by the great Creator's hand;
The virtuous—wicked—fall in the same hour—
Destined are all to thy express command.
Canst thou not, Tyrant! ere consistent be?
Why leave the child to mourn a mother's death?
In taking all I loved, why not take me?
To sigh my last with her who gave me breath!
One bliss is left above thy proud control,
While Heaven condemns me thus to linger here—
To indulge the filial duties of my soul,
And daily o'er my parent drop a tear!”—Glasgow Courier.

Sir John Campbell, since his return from Edinburgh, has so powerfully represented to the Ministers the impropriety of a compulsory tax for the support of the city clergy, that they have agreed, it is said, to remove it, both in the capital and in Montrose, substituting a grant from the consolidated fund.

Colonel Leith Hay having been appointed Clerk of Ordnance, in room of Mr Maberly, who has been nominated a Commissioner of Customs, there will be new elections for the Elgin district of burghs, and for Chatham. Colonel Leith Hay has addressed the Elgin constituency, and no opposition is expected.

The Lord Advocate is immediately to introduce a bill for the appointment of an accountant-general of the Scottish courts, to take charge of the funds consigned in the courts, of unclaimed dividends in cases of bankruptcy, and of landed estates managed by their authority. The sums and properties in the management of the courts during the last seven years exceed ten millions; and of seven hundred agents to whom it has been entrusted, four hundred are said to have neglected their trust in a greater or less degree.

It would now appear that Greenock is to be the fixed headquarters of the Irvingites in North Britain, and in which all the apostles of the doctrine are to be educated, and from which all the future churches are to emanate. They have commenced building a chapel in Nelson Street, directly opposite the meeting-house of the third congregation of the Secession at present erecting in Union Street; and from the princely wealth of one of their leaders, Mr Drummond, the great London banker, there will be no lack of any earthly requisite calculated to insure the success of their object.

At present they form two congregations, one of which meets in the Gardeners' Hall, and the other, which is composed entirely of the truly faithful, meets in the house of Mr Wilkinson, some time ago minister of the Episcopal chapel here. Mr Tait jun., from Edinburgh, and a Mr Place, a gentleman from London, officiate jointly in the Gardeners' Hall, which they state to be merely a place for teaching and initiating; and when any disciple there is found worthy, he receives admission into the congregation. Lady H. Drummond, who, with her family and servants, arrived in town from London a few days ago, has become a prophetess, and has already “spoken unutterable things” on several occasions; and her son, a fine little boy about 14 years of age, also prophesies occasionally. Mr Drummond himself is the appointed prophet; and on the occasion on which we heard him, his voice was most tremendous and overwhelming, and powerfully calculated to excite the nervous feelings of weak females, of which the greater part of their audiences are composed.—Greenock Advertiser.

The dispute between the Dundee manufacturers and their workmen belonging to the Dundee and Lochewe Weavers' Union, remains unadjusted, and upwards of 1000 men continue idle in consequence. At a meeting of the union, held on June 6, it was resolved to make an attempt at manufacturing for themselves. The flax-dressers of Dundee have also turned out in consequence of a proposed reduction of wages. The number idle is 350. Another combination has started up, that of the “United Ploughmen” of the Carse of Gowrie and Strathmore.

The pastoral charge of St George's Church in Edinburgh, vacant by the death of the Rev. Mr Martin, has been conferred by the Town Council upon the Rev. Mr Candlish, and the vacant charge in the collegiate church of Old Greyfriars has been filled by the Rev. Mr Sym, lately minister of Symington.

The General Assembly, on the suggestion of the Rev. Dr Bryce of Calcutta, have constituted the clergymen of the Scotch Church at Calcutta, with the ordained ministers of the Assembly's mission, and two lay elders to be chosen by the Kirk Session of St Andrew's Church, into a kind of Presbytery, having powers to employ native converts under the authority of the Church of Scotland, as religious instructors of their countrymen.

A lady in Falkirk has been in the habit, when she pulled her fruit, of reserving about a peck to be preserved, which is simply effected by digging a hole in the garden about two feet deep, and lining it with straw. Upon this the apples are laid, and being well covered with straw, the earth is beaten over the whole. Not only is the flavour and smell quite entire, but the fruit looks just as if newly taken from the tree—well coloured and hard.

Every where the appearances give token of an early and abundant herring fishing. The fishing still continues in Gairloch, and is daily improving both in the quantity and quality of the fish taken. In Lochlong, herrings and mackerel have been taken, the latter in considerable numbers. In Lochfinn, the fishing has also commenced, and the fish are particularly fine. It is anticipated that the fishing will be general in the course of two weeks.

A Phrenological Society has just been started by twelve young men in the village of Alyth, Perthshire. They have procured a supply of phrenological books; and Mr Fenton, surgeon in Alyth, has engaged to give them a course of lectures on anatomy and chemistry, and to aid them in their phrenological studies. This is one of the many examples of the increasing appetite for knowledge which the industrious in Scotland are displaying.—Phrenological Journal.

A letter in the Perthshire Advertiser gives a list of 37 isolated returns which have taken place since the last general election.

The analysis of these gives the following members to each of the three parties, Tory, Whig, and Radical, viz.—Radicals, 5; Tories, 12; Whigs, 20. Majority of Whigs over Tories, 8; over Radicals, 15; over their combined opponents, 3. Out of the 37 seats vacated, 30 had been occupied by Whigs, 5 by Tories, and 2 by Radicals. The Tories have therefore gained in strength, by 7, and the Radicals by 3.

Several heavy failures, one of them to a very considerable amount, have taken place in the grain trade in Glasgow.

POETRY FOR THE PEOPLE.

THE following beautifully written sentences, the truth of which we entirely allow, are extracted from a review of the Poems of Ebenezer Elliot, in the sixth number of the “Printing Machine,” a fortnightly report of literature published by Mr Charles Knight of London:—“It does not appear that the feelings of the great body of the people in any country are to be most effectually awakened and engaged by such poetry as dwells chiefly on the obtrusive features of their every-day existence. The privations and sufferings, the anxiety, vice, and wretchedness, out of which such poetry weaves its most vivid descriptions, hang over them in darkness too thick and oppressive for the imagination to illuminate. It is too sad and stubborn a reality to be turned into poetry, or at least into a source of poetic pleasure in the contemplation, to those by whom it is actually felt. The verse that would move the poor man's heart and fancy must draw its music rather from his holiday experiences and feelings, from his happier hopes and remembrances, from those common passions of our humanity which make him forget that he is poor—in short, from whatever there is to brighten the generally sombre hue of his lot and history. And is not poetry of right a sublimation from the bloom and finer spirit of things? Do not its moral use and highest excellence lie in this—that it can lift us out from amidst those realities, often dull and wearisome enough, from whose continued presence we should otherwise have no means of escape? The feelings to which poetry appeals when it aims at extensive popularity and influence, must indeed be such as are of universal familiarity—but not such as the wear and tear of life has either deadened or vulgarised, much less such as it has a tendency to render positively painful. Passions that live in the heart's core, though lying there almost as dead under the pressure of the world's business and cares; old memories that need to be awakened from their sleep—the glad sunshine of life's spring—the loves of early manhood—the friendships knit in other days—sorrows that time has softened and made sweet—and, out of the limited world of actual experience, dreams of the pictured past, or of the wonders of far away lands, with other visions that stretch, it may be, beyond both the breadth and the duration of ‘this visible diurnal sphere;’—these are the themes of all such poetry as the mass of the population in any country has ever taken delight in. forcible descriptions of their real condition in life, of their laborious days, their scanty accommodations, or even of any injustice or oppression to which they are subjected, may excite a feverish attention for a short space, but never grow up into the permanent power of a national poetry. That exaltation is reserved, and we think, fortunately reserved, for other strains—for the mythologic tale, the religious hymn, the heroic romance, the song of love, the common ballad. Thus, in our own country and times, we have seen the poems of Burns become almost a second mother-tongue to all his countrymen; while those of Crabbe yet fail to attract their proper regard from those of whose actual life he has drawn so many admirable pictures.”

NEW STATISTICAL ACCOUNT OF SCOTLAND.

WE mentioned in the 125th number of our Journal, that a new work of this kind has been commenced, and is to be comprised in ten volumes. Two numbers have already appeared, and from one of these the following table of particulars respecting the twenty Dumfriesshire parishes has been condensed by the Spectator, and may be interesting to the inhabitants of the southern part of the island:—

This table may furnish to many of our readers the means of comparison between their own parishes and those of a country where every clergyman is obliged to reside, and do the duty for which he is paid.

It may not, perhaps, be less interesting to see the following table of pauper charges upon the parish of Ruthwell, as drawn up by its able clergyman, Dr Henry Duncan:—

REMARKABLE DOG.

Not long ago, a butcher in Dundee possessed a dog of very remarkable habits, which is perhaps still alive. It is usually called “the dog which went to see Burke hanged,” on account of its having paid a visit to Edinburgh, by itself, on the day when that event took place in 1829. A jaunt to Edinburgh, however, without the company of its master, is no uncommon thing with this extraordinary member of the canine species; and this, indeed, is just the circumstance which makes the dog so remarkable. Two or three times every year, it leaves Dundee unattended, contrives to obtain a gratuitous passage in the boat across the river, crosses the kingdom of Fife on foot, and, having ferried the Firth of Forth

* Stipends under £150 are made up to that sum by government.

† F marks the females, and M the males.

‡ The sum advanced for this pauper was afterwards recovered, by legal steps, from her son.

in the same manner as it has previously ferried the Fifth of May, reaches Edinburgh at its leisure. What may be the exact nature of the business which it transacts in the capital, or whether it transacts any business at all, we cannot say: but we believe it generally looks in at the market, where its master has a few human, as it has a few canine acquaintances, and there it may accordingly be seen—not exactly enjoying “the feast of reason and the flow of soul,” perhaps, but more probably engaged, with its companions, in the frolics so happily described by Burns—

And worrying other in diversion.”

In serious earnest, there is some reason for supposing that the animal is chiefly actuated in its journeys by a desire of seeing a few Edinburgh friends; an exemplification of the gregarious principle such as has seldom, perhaps, been observed before in any class of creatures. The dog is now well known on both the ferries, and his transits are looked upon as a matter of course by the persons who guide the boats. Generally, after spending a couple of days in town, he returns to his master's residence in Dundee, from which, therefore, he is never absent so long as a week at a time.

POPULAR GRAMMATICAL ERRORS.

The word Episcopalian is often used as an adjective: a Episcopalian Church, for instance. It should be Episcopal Church, Episcopalian being a substantive, and applicable only to individuals adhering to that form of ecclesiastical polity. A reverse but equally common mistake is made with the word Antiquarian, which is an adjective only. An antiquary is often called an antiquary, apparently from a mere desire to give the longer instead of the shorter word, and thus make every thing as complete as possible. A man may be spoken of as addicted to antiquarian pursuits; but if it be wished to describe him in one word, he must be called an antiquary.

INTEMPERANCE.

DRUNKENNESS is too generally treated as simply a moral offence. It is a mischief which in reality arises from a number of various causes, and for which, of course, a variety of remedies must be pointed out. There is one kind of drunkenness which springs from an uncontrollable appetite for ardent spirits—a disease, in fact—which is as often found among people of elevated as of inferior station. Another kind may be described as a chief pleasure or recreation of persons of little mental cultivation, or individuals in extreme idleness, who see no better way of enjoying themselves. A third kind is that vice of the lower orders, which may be so clearly traced to the hardships and privations of their usual course of life. It would evidently be wise to prescribe the same salve for a cut, a bruise, and a burn, as it is to treat these different kinds of drunkenness with but one moral corrective; and yet do we ever hear of any corrective but one? That one consists in a mere moral injunction or preaching, which sets forth the ruinous consequences of the vice to both soul and body: it is administered by men of the best intentions, and with no stint of zeal or care; but we fear it is of little more avail than the charms with the leeches of old said over wounds and fevers, to neglect of bandages and bleedings.

This must be peculiarly the case where the vice arises from a morbid physical appetite. No person can have fallen a victim to this disease, till the physical has completely gained an ascendancy over the moral—all the better sentiments of his nature—religion, love of the approbation of his fellow-creatures, regard for the interests of his family and those connected with him—must have sunk under this passion of his flesh, before he could become the slave to it which he now is. We are thus deprived, as it were, of a fulcrum on which to plant the moral engine by which he might be recovered. We work on mortified parts, which need all chirurgery. In this malady, as in most others, a sudden alteration of system may be advantageous. Change of scene, of circumstances, of employments, something that will tend to create a new spirit within, may have some effect; a vigilant moral regimen taking advantage of every bit of the recovered nature to improve and regain the rest. But merely to preach to an unfortunate of this kind—as well preach to the liquor in which he indulges!

With regard to convivial drunkenness, as the vice is not inveterate, neither is the corrective treatment difficult. The indulgences of the Bacchanal may either be taken as a relief to the ennui of idleness, or as amusement after the toils of a day otherwise well spent. It is the kind of recreation which best suits the dispositions of good-humoured and slightly-indulgent men. In no very remote age, persons of all ranks were addicted to this vice; but as the superior orders have become more enlightened, they have given it up, and it is now very little encouraged even in the middle ranks. Literature, science, refined domestic amusements, now present themselves to the mind of men as equally entertaining, and a great deal more innocent, if not in some measure positively advantageous. Now the course is easy. Let us aid such as we can in disseminating a taste for intellectual pleasures of a pure kind, and the taste for a cheap and tipsy sociality cannot fail to decline. The remedy, observe, will be had: the great object is to ensure that it be of a harmless, or, if possible, of a useful kind. The reading of good books is so. The study of a language or of some important science is so. Only inspire a young man with a taste for something that will engage him in the cultivation of his moral and intellectual nature, and he is safe from the dissolute habits which marked our unidealized ancestors.

The third kind of drunkenness is that which most clamorously demands a remedy, though not that which will be most easily remedied. It seems undeniable that a large proportion of the working people of this country are overtasked, while their pay, even for the present excessive labour, is so small, that they could not, without great inconvenience, yield to a curtailment of the working hours. The effect of bodily labour, carried beyond the strength of the individual, is to exhaust the nervous system of its energy and vivacity. When toil ceases, there is a painful feeling of want and depression, attended with a craving for stimulus, which is nearly intolerable. Thus beset, and unable from his wages to purchase the comforts of good food, lodging, and domestic entertainments, such as compensate a hard-brought professional man for his perhaps equally severe labours, the artisan flies to the public-house, where he can purchase something which forms a kind of substitute for all those enjoyments, and beguiles him of his distresses, physical and mental, at least for a while. It is obvious that nothing can cure men thus affected, but either to take away the causes of the malady, or else to provide something which will fill the void without producing such direful consequences.

To what extent we may hope to see the labours of our manufacturing population abridged within a few years, it would be difficult to say. Certainly we have at least become aware of the absurdity and mischief of the excessive-labour system; and that is in itself, perhaps, no small progress towards a remedy. Moral restraint upon the increase of population, emigration, and other causes now in cheering operation, may help in a few years to render it possible for our labourers to gain a sufficiency for decent subsistence, without an overstraining of the physical powers; and when that is the case, the chief excuse for occasional ebriety will be abolished. While this shall be going on, some less detrimental means of recruiting from hard labour will probably be coming into use. We have been informed by a remarkably intelligent inhabitant of one of our Scottish manufacturing towns, that, in his belief, the public-houses thrive in no small degree on account of the prevailing want of public walks and of places of healthy sport and recreation. Two young workmen, whose natural tastes would lead them to a ramble by some burn-side, or a game at quoits, as a means of spending the hour that follows the dismissal from labour, meet yawningly on the street, and, there being no outlet from the town except by the dusty and wall-enclosed road, nor any arena of sport that is open to men of their rank, they lounge into the next public-house, not because they are willing to go there, but because they can go nowhere else. It is also very clear that public-houses are much resorted to on account of the uncomfortable state in which the dwellings of the working men generally are. Their wives, having been early sent to the factory, are seldom good housekeepers: all at home is squalor and discomfort. Of course, when a temporary home of greater elegance can be got for a trifle next door, it is not surprising that working men resort to the latter. Another circumstance to be taken into consideration is the ignorance of this class of the people. Some well-educated persons affect to think that the common people are too knowing, and make no good use of their knowledge; in reality, it is the imperfect nature of their knowledge that produces any mischief. The excessive-labour system has rendered it almost impossible for them to master any branch or kind of knowledge, even the most elementary; and we are credibly informed, that, in one manufacturing town in particular, intelligence has made a rapid retrogression, and vice and drunkenness a great progress, since the leisure of the men has been so much abridged. All of these causes, however, must, we think, be gradually diminished from this time forward. The subject of public places of recreation has of late attracted so much attention, that some provision will probably be made ere long for opening both walks and gymnasia in the neighbourhood of all large towns where they are at present wanting. As articles of household convenience and of aliment become cheaper, through the effects of shortened labour, reduced taxation, and the abolition of monopolies, and as increased sense shall show to women the absurdity of neglecting household accomplishments for factory labour, we may expect to see the poor man's house rendered a great deal more attractive to him. Again, as the means of knowledge become more accessible, through an improved school system, the diffusion of cheap literature, and the extension of mechanics' institutions, working men will both acquire a more agreeable and innocent kind of recreation after their labours, and penetrate so far into their own interests, that, in morals as well as in every thing else, they will be their own best guardians.

Such, we apprehend, are the causes, and such, we apprehend, will be the remedies of that drunkenness which has of late years engaged so much of public attention. It is enough for the most of those who interest themselves for the abolition of this vice, when they can get a guilty individual to make a profession of contrition, and undertake an engagement of future abstinence. But all merely mental impressions are vain in such cases. Till the circumstances which produce drunkenness are taken away, an engagement of abstinence can be of little more utility, than would a resolution never again to take the gout ensure a patient against a recurrence of the disorder. In the meantime, it is gratifying to think that drunkenness is on the decline. We lately showed in the present paper, that a great improvement on this point has taken place among the artisans of Edinburgh during the last nine years. We observe the same testimony borne by an intelligent individual as to the working men in the metropolis. Mr Francis Place, senior, in a small treatise just published on the "Improvement of the Working People," makes the following statement:—"Formerly, and even within my own recollection, the education and manners of all sorts of workmen in London were so nearly alike, that they may be said to have differed in no material particular. The most skilled and the most ordinary workmen were equally ignorant and dissolute; few could write, none read books of any use to them, and very few ever looked at a book of any sort. Those among them who had even the meanest accomplishment were remarkable exceptions. The whole body was much more dissolute and profligate then than they are now, and drunkenness was their conspicuous and prevailing vice. Without information on any subject, and without any desire for information, their leisure could alone be occupied with the grossest enjoyments; and the most skilled and best paid workmen were, as they had the most means of being so, much more dissolute than the less skilled and worse paid workmen, whose means were less. Now the difference between skilled workmen and common labourers is as strongly marked as was the difference between the workman and his employer; and in many cases the difference is nearly as great and as well defined between the skilful and unskilful workmen in the same business. Drunkenness is no longer the prevailing and conspicuous vice among workmen; the very meanest and least informed being much more sober as a class, much more orderly and decent, and much more cleanly in their persons, than were those who, in former times, were far above them in respect to the amount of wages they received; whilst the most skilled and best paid are, as classes, more sober, more moral, and better informed, than were the generality of their employers at the time alluded to. The most remarkable, and at the same time the most commendable and praiseworthy part of the case is this—that until lately the acquisition of knowledge and the reformation of manners are almost wholly attributable to their own unaided exertions. It must not, however, be concluded that workmen were, at any time, drunkards to the extent it has been common for writers and talkers to represent them as being. * * * Drinking to excess should be considered rather as the error than the crime of the working man, which, however much it is to be lamented, admits of a better apology than many, and indeed than most of the vices of those who are not compelled to labour with their hands for a scanty subsistence. * * * Drunkenness ought no doubt to be discouraged; but the only cure is an increase of knowledge, and a consequent increase of the means of producing pleasurable ideas: every new idea which the working man acquires necessarily increases his means and his desire for rational enjoyment, and thus adds to his permanent prosperity and happiness. That this is so, we have practical proofs: it has been observed that those workmen, taken in classes, who were in former times the best paid, were the most dissolute, and that this was the consequence of their ignorance. The contrary may now be observed; the best paid classes are the best informed and least dissolute; and as the older members of these classes die off, and the younger ones succeed them, improvement, in all respects, will be more and more apparent."

Such testimonies, however, ought by no means to induce either the working men themselves, or those who are interested in their welfare, to slacken in their exertions for the abolition of this degrading vice. They ought rather to be encouraged, by such assurances, to greater activity in the good cause which they have taken in hand.*

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

IN consequence, apparently, of a considerable victory gained by the Carlists in Navarre, over the united forces of Quesada and El Pastor, the intelligence or which reached London at the end of June, Don Carlos had hardly settled with his family in the mansion taken for their residence at Brompton, when he left the metropolis, and, travelling through France, entered Spain on the 10th of July, where he immediately issued a proclamation to his "subjects," promising them true liberty, the convocation of the Cortes, and something approaching to universal suffrage, in place of "that shadow of representation" which has been proposed by the regency. This event—though so unlike all the former conduct of Don Carlos as to be a subject of doubt—has occasioned a great sensation. M. Jauge, the banker of Don Carlos at Paris, said to be a highly respectable individual, has meanwhile published a scheme of a loan for his royal constituent, to the amount of five millions, to which he calls upon all true Spaniards to subscribe. Every thing, in short, has suddenly assumed the appearance of determination and confidence on the part of this claimant of the Spanish throne, who is said to have considerable reliance on the Tory party in Great Britain, while it is certain that the quadruple alliance makes no provision for extruding him from Spain, though it makes sure that he shall not have refuge in Portugal.

Meanwhile, a highly liberal Cortes has been returned; and the Count de Toreno, one of this party, has been appointed Minister of Finance, in place of M. Imez. Considerable alarm has been occasioned in Madrid by the appearance of cholera at Toledo.

FRANCE.

THE elections for the new Chamber terminated before the end of June, and prove highly favourable to the existing ministry. Notwithstanding that the Carlists and Republicans every where lent a zealous support to each other, it is stated that their united opposition will not exceed eighty in a house of 459 members. Some striking anecdotes have been related, in illustration of the enthusiasm displayed by Carlist for Republican, and vice versa. In explanation of the small success they have met with in the contest, the latter party point out that, in elections of officers for the national guards, by more extensive constituencies, the government was defeated, even in those places where it triumphed in elections for the Chamber. Instead of the 20th of August, the 31st of July is now appointed for the meeting of the Chambers; but the business to be then transacted will be trifling, and a short prorogation will ensue. Some dissensions are said to have lately broken out in the cabinet, on account of the appointment of the Duke de Cazes to be governor of Algiers.

PORTUGAL.

THE Cortes, consisting of 140 members—that is, about one for every 125,000 souls in the kingdom—is about to be assembled, and is expected to contain a powerful party unfavourable to Don Pedro. The Portuguese Regency has decreed that the money due by the Brazils to Portugal, said to be about L.1,600,000, is to be applied to the payment of the British loans. Don Miguel has arrived at Genoa.

THE EASTERN POWERS.

OUR domestic politics, and those of Western Europe in general, engage so much of our attention, that the Eastern Powers are allowed in a great measure to escape observation. It seems pretty clear that, notwithstanding the British and French fleets maintained in the Levant, Russia and Austria are about to deceive us in one or more important points. The latter power seems at present marking out the province of Bosnia as her own—the turbulence of its inhabitants being set forth as a pretext for the appropriation—while on the other hand she is bullying the Swiss cantons on the subject of refugees, in such a manner as to show an eager desire to crush those republics. An attempt has also been made by Austria to establish a tribunal for disputes in the German states; evidently a scheme for increasing her own influence over those communities. It has been baffled by the liberal King of Bavaria, who has also been recently purging the councils of his son, the King of Greece, from Russian influence. It seems unquestionable that, if a more vigorous policy be not assumed by the Western Powers of Europe, those of the East will soon appropriate all the territory in their vicinity, including Turkey, and thereby add immensely to their means of checking the advance of liberal opinions.

SWEDEN.

UPWARDS of two thousand persons of property have petitioned the King of Sweden for a reform in the representative system of that country.

IRELAND.

THE election of a new member for Wexford, in place of Lord Carew, took place on the 3d July. Mr O'Connell, on the 18th June, addressed a strong appeal to the electors, calling upon them to oppose the interest of the "audacious and imbecile Ministry," and elect a repealer; but subsequently, in consequence of the communications of Mr Littleton, elsewhere alluded to, he withdrew from interference. The candidates were Mr Hervey on the Ministerial side, and Mr Cadwallader Waddy, a repealer. Notwithstanding Mr O'Connell's non-interference, the latter was elected, chiefly, it is said, through an union of the Tory and Repeal interests.

A great Protestant meeting was to have taken place on the 3d July, under the patronage of Lords Winchelsea, Roden, and Wicklow; but, "for many reasons of a prudential nature," it has been postponed. Lord Roden has addressed a powerful letter to the Protestants of Ireland, calling upon them to exert themselves for the defence of their religion.

Dr Doyle expired, June 16, at Carlow, and his funeral was attended by about 20,000 persons.

One of the most horrible party feuds that have ever occurred, even in Ireland, has just taken place near Tralee, in Kerry. Besides eight or ten killed in actual fighting, thirty-five were drowned in a river, on the banks of which the fray took place, and into which the defeated party were pursued. Several magistrates were present, but their efforts to put a stop to the combat were unavailing. At least a thousand persons of both sexes were engaged in the fray, many of whom were unconnected with either party, and merely fought for amusement.

The 12th of July, the noted anniversary of the battle of the Boyne, passed over without any remarkable disturbance.

PARLIAMENT.

1. COERCION BILL—MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

July 1. Earl GREY moved that the bill for renewing the Irish coercion act, from August 1, 1834, to August 1, 1835, be read a first time. His lordship supported his motion by a long speech, in which he quoted a number of documents to prove the good effects of the coercion act during the past year, and the necessity of its renewal. In Kilkenny, the principal county in which the act had been enforced, the outrages, in the year ending March 31, 1834, were only 331, instead of the 1550 of the preceding twelvemonth. On the whole, there was only a decrease of 79 crimes during the first five months of the present year, as compared with the first five months of the past; but this decrease was all in Leinster. He did not propose to renew the court-martial clause. His lordship concluded by expressing his fear that Ireland would not soon be in a condition to do without this act.—The bill was read a first time, and ordered for a second reading on Friday (July 4.).—July 2. Mr O'CONNELL requested to know, from the Right Hon. Secretary for Ireland, whether the renewal of the coercion bill had been advised and called for by the Irish government.—Mr LITTLETON said that the bill had the entire sanction of the Irish government.—Mr O'CONNELL said that was not the answer he sought for; but he would now ask the right hon. gentleman whether he should introduce the bill into the house.

—Mr LITTLETON in reply stated, that, what he brought in the bill, it should have his vote.—Mr O'CONNELL said he had been exceedingly deceived by the right hon. gentleman.—Mr LITTLETON said that the last observation of the hon. member rendered it incumbent on him to occupy the attention of the house for a short time. He stated that he had been induced to have an interview with the hon. member at the Irish Office, in which he informed Mr O'Connell of his repugnance to certain parts of the coercion bill, and cautioned him against taking a violent course against it; that he had made the communication in confidence, and the learned gentleman had so received it. Mr Littleton then went on to say, that, in consequence of the violent manner which the hon. gentleman adopted, he thought it right to let him know no decision had been come to as to the bill, but regarding to his own honour, which was of far greater importance to him than any other consideration, obliged him to acknowledge that he had a strong repugnance to that part of the bill which related to the suppression of public meetings. But there were many parts of the transaction which he (Mr Littleton) was restrained from mentioning, by that confidence which he had made the communication to the hon. member and learned gentleman. The coercion bill had so often applied about, and in consequence of which who applied not being satisfied with the answers received, they made application elsewhere, which led to the introduction of the bill in another place. He had sent for Mr O'Connell to make the communication, to prevent him from committing acts which might compel the government to adopt measures which they were anxious to avoid, and which would be prejudicial to the country. As soon, however, as he ascertained that it was the intention of the government, he sent a mutual friend, the hon. member Bridport, to communicate the intelligence to Mr O'Connell; but as these communications had been all given in confidence, the hon. member was in a bound not to have communicated to any one until the thing had been publicly noticed, or, at all events, until he (Mr Littleton) had communicated with him. The circumstance had, however, passed on to all confidence on his part in future in the honourable member for Dublin.—Mr O'CONNELL said the right honourable gentleman had said he "in saying that he should henceforward place no confidence in him; he had deceived him once, and he would take care that he should not do so again." The honourable gentleman stated that, in consequence of the communication made to him by the honourable secretary that the bill was not sent for by the Irish government, and that it would not be brought before the house, he had declined canvassing the county of Wexford, the election for which was then pending, for a repeal candidate, and in consequence the Whig candidate, a very rare thing in Ireland, had obtained the majority, which, before the deception practised upon him, would not have happened. After what they had heard, he would leave it to the house to decide how far confidence was to be reposed in a government who were so the masters of their own determinations.—Mr LITTLETON replied that the whole course of the hon. member's speech was an attempt to justify his breach of confidence, by making the house believe that he had tricked him.—Mr O'CONNELL said that he should not have mentioned anything about it, had confidence been kept with him; but when that confidence was broken, he considered himself at liberty to denounce it every where.—An altercation then took place between the hon. members as to whether Mr O'Connell had demanded Mr Littleton's resignation as an expiation of this deception which he had been led to practise upon.—Mr O'CONNELL said, that, as a test of what place relative to the subject of dispute, he should vote for the production of the whole correspondence between the Lord Lieutenant and his Majesty's government.—Mr LITTLETON said that such portions as the government might think necessary for the defence of its measures would be laid before the house, and Mr O'Connell's motion was then negatived without a division.—The bill was read a second time, July 4, in the House of Lords; on which occasion Lord DURHAM expressed a strong objection to the clause putting down public meetings, which Lord BROUGHAM strenuously defended.—The House of Peers, July 7, resolved itself into a committee on this bill, and Earl GREY announced that the change of venue would be allowed to drop, in consequence of the readiness of juries to proceed to convictions. The clauses of the bill were agreed to, and the report ordered to be received next day.—On the same evening, July 7, a conversation took place in the House of Commons relative to the conduct of Mr Littleton, and of Ministers in general.—Lord ALTHORP, in language the promised papers on the table, and moving that they be printed, stated that Mr Littleton had tendered his resignation to Earl Grey on Saturday, and at the request of his brethren in the cabinet had agreed to retain office.—Mr HUME asked Lord Althorp if it was true that the coercion act, in its present form, had been urged in the cabinet by one individual, and agreed to by the rest on the threat of his resignation.—Lord ALTHORP having declined to answer the question, it was assumed by other members that the report was true.—The production of the correspondence with the Lord Lieutenant was then laid before the house.

August, 1834.

* We have been indebted for some of the ideas in the above article to the June number of the Phrenological Journal, and to a stray number of the Greenock Intelligencer newspaper.

urged, and Lord ALTHORP endeavoured to the house by declaring that the Marquis Wellesley was now decidedly in favour of the renewal of the coercion act.—Mr O'CONNELL asked how the Marquis came to be in favour of the bill on the 20th of April, adverse to it on the 20th of June, as appeared from Mr Littleton's communication, and was once more favourable to it. He concluded each of severe invective against Ministers, by saying, as an amendment, that the papers should be referred to a select committee.—After a great deal of discussion, in which Ministers were not treated with much respect, Mr O'CONNELL renewed his argument. On the 20th of June, he said, they were supposed to have a coercion bill. "But yet, being the First Lord of the Treasury was opposed to it—because he was obstinate, and the prolonged existence of the administration was threatened—because you preferred your places to your political consistency, you are contented to be branded, as I brand you now, with being the tyrants, the miserable despots of a country which you believe has not at the moment the power to resist. But let me tell you, that there is no safer nation in the wide world than the Irish nation. I may be taunted—I am liable to the taunt, and a perfectly safe taunt for all who may choose to put it—above all doubt secure from any imputation."—After a prolonged discussion of the same kind, Mr O'Connell's amendment was rejected by 156 against 77.—On Tuesday, July 3, Earl GREY asked in the House of Lords for a postponement of the day for taking the report on the coercion bill into consideration; which was granted. Next evening, July 9, on the morning of the day for receiving the report being read, Lord Althorp advanced to the table, and after much hesitation, the result of agitated feelings, informed the House that he no longer acted as a Minister of the Crown. He stated that the late communications between a member of his government and an individual known for the strong part he took in the affairs of Ireland, had been made without his knowledge, as they were certainly contrary to what he thought safe and proper. Up to the 23d of June, no doubt was entertained in the cabinet as to the propriety of recommending the coercion act; but a letter was then received from the Lord Lieutenant, giving a new view of the subject, not so much the result of any new view of Irish affairs, as of considerations apparently suggested to him by others respecting certain political circumstances in this country. Ultimately, however, it was resolved in the cabinet, that the bill should be brought forward in the state in which it had lately appeared before their lordships. He had now to advert with respect to the practice which had lately sprung up, of putting questions and calling for papers which Ministers could not answer and produce, consistently with their duty, and which rendered the business of government altogether impossible. A member of the other house, having been put in possession of the facts referred to, had made use of them to bring charges against the government; and the consequence was, that his noble friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, feeling he could not with satisfaction to himself or the government any longer continue in office, had yesterday morning sent in his resignation, which he (Earl Grey) had since transmitted to his Majesty. It then became necessary for him to consider what he himself should do. At the close of last session it had been his anxious wish to retire; but he yielded to the strong and united representations of his colleagues, and remained. When the late secessions from the cabinet occurred, he again wished to give up his post; but again the representation of his colleagues, and of a large body of gentlemen in the House of Commons, prevailed upon him to retain it; notwithstanding, he felt the separation from his colleagues most painfully, and he regretted the loss of the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Ripon. Feeling how unable he was to continue to discharge the duties of his offices, he then made up his mind to retire, as he would have been justified in retiring. He had completed his seventieth year in March last; and though, at his age, being blessed with good health, he might be able to conduct the affairs of the country in ordinary times, yet, in such times as these, a person arrived at that age was unequal to so great a charge. The places, however, of those who seceded were filled up; and he was in hopes that the administration would go on at least until the measures before Parliament were completed. Being now deprived, however, of the assistance of one who was indispensable to him, he had found it necessary to tender his own resignation, along with that of Lord Althorp. The noble lord then proceeded to take a review of the measures pursued by the administration since they had been in office, contending that they had fully redeemed the pledges they had given on the three great and leading objects, of reform of Parliament, peace, and economical reform. He also contrasted the present state of the country with its condition when Ministers took office. The political and trades' unions, of which they had heard so much, had all disappeared, without any application for new laws or extraordinary powers for their suppression. It had been urged, as a matter of reproach to him, that, more than any other Minister, he had endeavoured to provide, at the public expense, for his relations; but no charge could be more unjust. He left office with not more than sufficient to support himself in society, charged as he was with the maintenance of a numerous family, and certainly with a fortune not improved by the emoluments of place. Some of his relations had doubtless been placed in situations, but they were laborious situations, their conduct had justified the appointments, and their connection with him could not be considered a disqualification for their entrance into the public service. He recommended their lordships to agree to the report now proposed, but not to proceed to the third reading of the bill until they could reasonably hope that it would pass the other house.—Some remarks from the Duke of WELLINGTON called up Lord BROUGHAM, who said he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to have resigned, and declared that he had not resigned himself. His lordship concluded by passing an eulogium on Earl Grey.—The report was then agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed.—In the House of Commons, on the same evening, Lord ALTHORP made a statement explanatory of his resignation. "When the bill for the renewal of the coercion act was first brought under the consideration of the cabinet, I felt it my duty to concur in that renewal, with the omission of certain parts referring to courts-martial. I need not say that I concurred in it with the greatest reluctance, and nothing but an absolute conviction of its necessity would have induced me to do so. After that, a communication of a private and confidential nature from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland brought the subject again under the consideration of the cabinet. Perhaps it may be as well to say, that at this time it was that my right honourable friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland suggested to me that it might be desirable to inform the honourable and learned gentleman opposite (Mr O'Connell) that the question was not yet finally settled. I saw no harm in his making that communication, provided it went no farther. I am bound to say, for my own justification, that I stated to my right honourable friend, that I hoped he would act with the greatest caution, and would be careful not to commit himself or the government. The private and confidential communication of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to an individual member of the cabinet, brought the subject again under consideration in the week before last. From the nature of this communication, I was led to believe that the first clauses of the bill, those which relate to meetings in both parts of Ireland, were not essentially necessary, and might be omitted without endangering the peace of that country. Under this impression, I objected to the renewal of those clauses. (Cheers.) In this objection my right honourable friends the members for Inverness-shire (Mr C. Grant), for Cambridge (Mr S. Rice), for Edinburgh (Mr Abercromby), and for Coventry (Mr E. Ellice), concurred. (Much cheering.) I need not state to the House that we were in a minority in the cabinet, which decided against us. The question we then had to decide was, whether we should acquiesce in that decision, or break up the government. Upon that consideration we felt it our duty to acquiesce." Lord Althorp then proceeded to state that he felt the difficulty he should be placed in when engaged in carrying the bill through the House of Commons; but when, on Thursday, he had heard the statement of Mr Littleton, and became for the first time aware of the nature and full extent of his communication to Mr O'Connell, he thought that the difficulty would be insuperable. The debate on Monday night convinced him that he could not continue, with credit to himself or advantage to the country, to conduct the business of government in the House of Commons. "Accordingly," he continued, "when I returned home, I wrote to Lord Grey, requesting him to tender my resignation, which his Majesty was graciously pleased to accept. I have the authority of my right honourable friends, already alluded to, for saying that they approve and concur in the step I took. This is the case as respects my right honourable friends and myself. I should be extremely sorry if the course I have pursued upon this occasion should not be approved by my colleagues; and I should be still more deeply grieved if I found that the large body of gentlemen who have hitherto honoured me with so much of their confidence, and to whose steady and handsome support it is owing that I have been able to maintain a position for which, otherwise, my talents rendered me quite incapable—I say, I should feel most deeply indeed if they did not approve my conduct. (Reiterated cheers from every part of the house.) I have now made the statement I thought it necessary to submit; and I have only further to say, that I continue to hold office until my successor is appointed, and that I shall of course feel it my duty at present to conduct the ordinary business of government in this house." (Long-continued cheers.)—Mr LITTLETON then expressed his regret at not having resigned the moment he learnt the determination of the cabinet to renew the clauses against public meetings; a line of conduct which he certainly was only prevented from adopting by a fear of thereby injuring the government to which he was attached.—Mr O'CONNELL congratulated Mr Littleton on his candour.—Mr HUME expressed great regret at the resignation of the liberal portion of the cabinet, and of Lord Althorp in particular.—The house next day adjourned till the ensuing Monday (July 14).—On that day, Lord MELBOURNE, the late Secretary for the Home Department, informed the House of Lords that he had received his Majesty's commands to form a new administration, in which he had the cordial cooperation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.—On the same evening, Lord ALTHORP announced the same fact in the House of Commons, which, upon his motion, was adjourned till Thursday.—On Thursday (July 17), Lord MELBOURNE stated that the new Ministry did not intend to proceed with the coercion bill, but to bring it into the House of Commons with the omission of certain clauses, as it would be impossible to pass it there otherwise.—This announcement caused a burst of indignation among the opposition members, some of whom (as the Earl of Wicklow and Lord Wharcliffe) delivered their sentiments in very animated terms.—Lord BROUGHAM, who was described in all the papers as having defended the public meeting clauses on the 4th of July, in answer to Lord Durham, now endeavoured to make light of them, and, in reply to a charge from the Earl of Wicklow, denied having ever attached any importance to them.—Lord MELBOURNE, in repelling some of the attacks of Lord Wicklow, reminded him that the party which now so violently attacked Ministers were unable to form an administration themselves.—In the House of Commons, on the same evening, Lord ALTHORP, in rising to move for a new writ for Nottingham, in the room of Lord Duncannon, took occasion to state to the House that Lord Melbourne, having been commissioned by his Majesty to lay before him the plan of an administration, had completed his arrangements, and reconstructed the cabinet. (Cheers.) The addition made to the Ministry was, that Lord Duncannon having accepted the office of Secretary of State for the Home Department, Sir John Cam Hobhouse had been appointed to the Woods and Forests instead of Lord Duncannon, with a seat in the cabinet. Therefore, as far as relates to any addition, the alteration in the cabinet would not be very great; but, undoubtedly, the alteration is great—very great indeed—in the loss of the services of Lord Grey. Having lost the services of Earl Grey, his Majesty had selected Lord Melbourne as the head of the Ministry, and Lord Althorp thought a wiser choice could not have been made. "Lord Melbourne possesses great abilities, natural and acquired, great judgment, and great decision. These, the House will be aware, are qualities very necessary in the first Minister of this country; and as far as my own opinions are concerned, I may mention that I have had the satisfaction of concurring with Lord Melbourne in most of the subjects brought under the discussion of the cabinet. Under these circumstances, his Majesty has been graciously pleased to require the continuance of my services." (Repeated cheers from every quarter.) Lord Althorp then spoke of his own natural disinclination to office, which his experience in office had certainly not diminished. He had retained it so long only at Earl Grey's earnest desire. "But," he continued, "I am obliged to say, that if I looked to public duty, I saw every reason for continuing my services, such as they were: I could not, in fact, find one ground of a public nature justifying my relinquishment; and such being the case, I felt it my imperative duty to act as I have done. I do not know that on the formation of the Ministry it is necessary for me to say more: I only wish to add in a very few words—and a very few words will suffice—something of the principles on which we mean to act. The principle on which I conceive the administration of Great Britain is bound to proceed, is, that while it preserves the institutions of the country, it will carry forward such reasonable and effectual reforms as the people have a right to expect would be the consequence of the reform in Parliament. (Much cheering.) While it feels it its bounden duty not to propose anything which can produce danger to the institutions of the country, it should take care that the remedies are neither more than adequate nor less than adequate to the evil intended to be remedied. All should be arranged and settled according to the existing circumstances of the country. This, I will say, was the principle on which the government of Lord Grey proceeded: it has met with obstructions and difficulties; but such was its principle, and such ought to be the principle of every administration. (Cheers.) Upon that principle we are now prepared to act: we too, may meet with obstructions and difficulties; but if we do, we will endeavour to overcome them."—Colonel EVANS expressed his disapprobation of the conduct of the members who had signed an address calling on Lord Althorp to resume office.—After a long discussion, in which Lord ALTHORP avowed his intention of bringing in a new coercion bill, and of carrying through the Irish tithes bill, the writ was ordered.—The coercion bill, shorn of the clauses alluded to, was accordingly brought in, July 18, and the first reading carried by a majority of 140 against 43.—On the same evening, the opposition Lords made a powerful attack upon the government for giving up the bill introduced into their house, and for omitting the clauses.

2. IRISH TITHES.

June 23. Mr LITTLETON moved that the Irish tithe bill be recommitted, in order that some alterations proposed by government might be taken into consideration. It was intended to omit that part which invested the revenue of the church in land, and consequently the redemption clauses. The plan now contemplated by the government was to convert tithes into a land-tax, which would be collected by the crown in the same amounts and from the same parties who were now liable for the composition; this to con-time for five years, in order to give the system a proper stability, and in order that the late advances of the government might be repaid by instalments. At the end of the five years, four-fifths of the land-tax to be converted into a rent-charge, which owners of estates would have it in their power to recover from tenants and others liable to the existing law of composition.—To Mr Littleton's motion, Mr O'CONNELL moved, as an amendment, "that the surplus of any funds raised under this bill, which would remain after due regard had been paid to vested interests, and to the spiritual wants of the Protestant church, should be disposed of for purposes of public utility and charity." Mr O'Connell uttered one of his most powerful speeches against the measure as it at present stood. In his estimation, it would do nothing to improve matters in Ireland. A church begotten in violence, raised in blood, and fed with the tears and miseries of the people for three hundred years, was still to be maintained by the same armed powers as before; and, after all, the government which takes the duty of blanket-hunting and pig-seizing upon itself, would have to pay L.500,000 every November, without having, with its utmost efforts, collected more than L.30,000.—After a long discussion, in which Ministers were severely handled by Sir ROBERT PEEL, on the subject of the commission lately issued for inquiring into the state of religion in Ireland, the house divided on the amendment, when there appeared for it 99; against it, 360; majority for Mr Littleton's motion, 261.

June 30. On the order of the day for going into committee on this bill being read, Mr LITTLETON explained some farther alterations proposed on it by government. The Irish landlords having objected to a land-tax convertible into a rent-charge, unless means of redeeming that rent-charge on advantageous terms were offered them, it was proposed, for their conciliation, that the amount they now pay in tithes under the last composition act, should be multiplied by four-fifths of the number of years' purchase that their land was valued at, and that they pay on this sum $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent to the commissioners (for the tithe-owner) annually; dissentients from this plan to continue to pay the amount of their composition in the form of a land-tax, instead of tithe. [The Spectator, in explaining Mr Littleton's plan, which was somewhat obscure, says, "In order to make this arrangement more clear, we will suppose that a landowner pays L.10 a-year as tithe now, in future as land-tax, to the commissioners: suppose also that the farm out of which this payment issues is worth twenty years' purchase, four-fifths of which are sixteen; let the L.10 be multiplied by 16, and we get L.160. On this sum of L.160, he is to pay only $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., or L.5, 12s. Thus he will save L.4, 8s. per annum by acceding to the government proposition: he will get a bonus, as Mr Littleton said, of from 20 to 40 per cent. at least, according to circumstances. The tithe-owner is to submit to a reduction of $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., in order to repay government for the cost of collection, and in return for regular receipts of his dues, which he now with difficulty gets at all. But $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. deducted from L.10 leaves L.7, 15s.; and government will collect only L.5, 12s.; how is the difference (L.2, 3s.) to be made up to the consolidated fund out of which the tithe-owners are to be paid? Why, from the perpetuity and other funds in the hands of the commissioners acting under the church temporalities act of last session! Thus, as Lord Althorp admitted, the principle of the famous 147th clause is to be acted upon after all, and the state is to have the use of ecclesiastical property."]—Mr O'CONNELL opposed the plan with great vehemence, and asked for delay, which, after much debating, was granted till the ensuing Friday.—On that day, July 4, Mr LITTLETON proposed a resolution, founded upon the plan last explained. In the course of the debate, Mr STANLEY distinguished himself by a very acrimonious speech, in which he likened the policy of the Ministers on this subject to the tricks of the thimble-rig-men at country fairs. Ministers had adopted, he said, a system of plunder, not avowed or open, but timid, shuffling, and cunning. The present was a mere petty larceny project.—Lord ALTHORP made a spirited reply to the attack of his late colleague, and, in contrast with the present plans of the government, alluded to Mr Stanley's own measures as Secretary for Ireland, which, though well-intended, were too late, and he was sorry he could not congratulate him on their success.—The resolution was eventually carried by 235 against 171; majority, 64.

3. POST-OFFICE REFORM.

June 26. Mr WALLACE moved an address to the King, praying his Majesty to appoint a commission to inquire into the management of the Post-office and Packet-service. In his opinion, four great principles ought to be observed in reference to the administration of the Post-office. First, that the head of that department should not have the power to delegate his duties to another person; second, that no monopoly should be allowed to exist; third, that the public money should not be employed for the purposes of speculation, either with respect to the employment of packets or otherwise; and, lastly, that the persons who had to receive the revenue from the Post-office should not be allowed to disburse that revenue. He submitted at some length that there was no establishment which so extensively and urgently required revision and amendment as that of the Post-office; for, according to the existing system, most unconstitutional powers were exercised, and most unnecessary obstructions were thrown in the way of the fullest exercise of the capabilities of the establishment.—The motion, having been seconded by Mr E. L. BULWER, was opposed by Mr V. SMITH, on the ground that great improvements were at present going on in the Post-office.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER also opposed it, and it was finally negatived without a division.

4. BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

June 27. Lord BROUGHAM called the attention of the House of Lords to a gross breach of privilege, and a false and malicious libel on himself, in the Morning Post of that morning. The passage in the paper to which he referred, charged him with having garbled an entry on the journals of the House of Peers, after having been warned by Lord Denman and another friend that he had given wrong judgment in a cause to which the entry referred. The cause was that of "Solarte versus Palmer," which was appealed from the courts below. Lord Brougham was formerly engaged as counsel in the same cause, and, it was asserted, had recommended the appeal to be made, which he now dismissed with costs. The libel was couched in extremely irritating and contemptuous language, and concluded with these words: "If there is one nobleman in the upper house, solicitous in the very least degree for the dignity of his order, this matter must be noticed without delay. If what we tell is true, Lord Brougham is unfit to preside in the Court of Chancery as a Judge, to sit in Parliament as a Peer, to move in society as a gentleman. If what we tell is false, there never was committed a grosser breach of privilege than that of which we are to-day guilty." Lord Brougham utterly denied the truth of the charges against him. He had received no hint from Lord Denman, or any other person, that his decision was wrong or injudicious; and he had not in any way interfered with the record on the books of their lordships' house. The libeller fancied that he had grounds for his charge, because the decision was not entered on the minutes in the same terms as it was given vivâ voce; but it was the invariable practice, that when a motion that the judgment of the courts below be affirmed was agreed to, it was entered, "judgment postponed." Lord Brougham also denied having, as counsel, advised the appeal to the House of Lords.

—On the motion of Earl GREY, it was resolved by the house that the article in the Post was a gross libel and breach of privilege. It was then resolved that Thomas Payne, the publisher of the Post, should appear at the bar of the house next day.

—June 28. Mr Payne was accordingly brought up to the bar, and interrogated by the Lord Chancellor as to the department he filled on that journal. He said he was the registered printer and publisher of the paper; he had no discretion in the rejection or approval of articles in that paper, and could not prevent the insertion of any thing in it. The editor, who could, was named Biddlestone.—Motions for the discharge of Payne, and for bringing up Biddlestone, were then carried.—June 30. Mr Biddlestone appeared, and underwent a long examination, in the course of which he fully admitted his responsibility for the article, but refused to state the name of the writer.—[It was generally understood to be the composition of a peer opposed in politics to Lord Brougham.]—He also admitted the libellous nature of the article, but pleaded honesty of intention, and the liability of their lordships' mode of entering decisions to be misunderstood.—Lord BROUGHAM, after some laborious explanations, expressed a wish to have Mr Biddlestone discharged with a reprimand; but Earl GREY and other peers were of opinion that this would be dealing too lightly with the offence.—Mr Biddlestone having been withdrawn in custody, presented a petition next day through Lord Wynford, craving pardon for his offence.—He was accordingly brought up, July 2, and, after a solemn reprimand from the Lord Chancellor, was ordered to be discharged, on payment of fees.—The reprimand was inserted in the journals of the house.

5. POOR LAW BILL.

July 1. This bill was read a third time in the House of Commons, by a majority of 187 to 50, and passed. It was read a first time in the House of Lords, July 2, when some desire was expressed by the opposition lords to postpone it till next session. The second reading subsequently was oftener than once postponed.

6. AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

July 14. On Lord ALTHORP moving that the house go into committee on the Irish chancery bill, the Marquis of CHANDOS moved as an amendment that an address be presented to his Majesty, representing the distressed state of the agricultural interest, and praying the attention of his government to the relief of part of their burdens.—Lord ALTHORP admitted that the distress of the landed interest still continued, but opposed the motion for the address. He was of opinion that the agricultural interest would obtain relief from an amendment of the poor-laws, and the commutation of tithes; the bill for which he had reluctantly abandoned for the present, as he had no hopes of being able to carry it this session. He was, however, disposed to do all in his power—all that the state of the revenue would permit—to remove some burdens which pressed heavily on the agricultural interest. He intended to remove the window-tax on farm-houses below a certain amount; he would allow boys under fifteen to be employed as servants by farmers without being taxed for them as for household servants; husbandry-horses, used as riding-horses, should be untaxed, and be let out for hire without tax; he should also take off the tax on shepherds' horses and dogs.—On a division, the Marquis's amendment was rejected by 190 against 43; majority 16.

7. MINOR SUBJECTS.

Mr POULTER's Sabbath observance bill was finally rejected, July 18, by 35 to 31.

The Upwell tithes bill was thrown out, July 19, on a second reading, by 60 to 45.

ENGLAND.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

THE account of the Ministerial changes given in the Parliamentary department of the present sheet is nearly complete, that little is required to be said in addition. It is understood that the King, on receiving the resignations of Earl Grey and Lord Althorp, took first into consideration whether it would be advisable to form a Coalition Cabinet out of what remained of the present administration, joined to some of the late seceders, or to the chiefs of the Tory party. It is said that the latter were sounded on this point, and very promptly refused to accede to any such arrangement. Nor was the project of a Coalition Ministry well received by the press or the public. The King then sent for Lord Melbourne, to whom he committed the duty of reconstructing the cabinet, himself assuming Earl Grey's place. His lordship, having prevailed on Lord Althorp to retain the Chancellorship of the Exchequer, had no farther duty than to supply the Home Department, vacated by himself; which is done by the translation of Lord Duncannon from the Woods and Forests, the latter being given to Sir John Cam Hobhouse.

Few Ministers have ever received, on such an occasion, so many marks of approbation from the House of Commons or from the country, as Lord Althorp. He has been borne back to his seat, apparently, by the mere affluence of public favour. On the 16th July, the following address, signed by 240 of the members of the House of Commons, was presented to him:—"My Lord—Convinced that, at the present crisis, the peace and prosperity of the empire would be promoted by your lordship holding a distinguished place in Majesty's councils, we beg to express our deep regret at your retirement. If his Majesty should be graciously pleased to desire a continuation of your services, we beg to assure you that we shall be prepared to afford to your lordship our best support in carrying into effect the reforms and improvements so anxiously desired by the country, in accordance with that liberal and enlightened policy which secured to the people the great and salutary measure of Parliamentary reform. We believe that we shall fulfil our duty to our constituents, and best promote the interests of the realm, by thus evincing our confidence, that your lordship, and those with whom you may ally yours, will act upon constitutional and liberal principles in the administration of public affairs."

As not more than two Secretaries of State are allowable in the House of Commons at once, it has been found necessary to elevate Lord Duncannon to peerage, under the title of Baron Duncannon of Bborough, which will of course drop when he succeeds his father, the Earl of Besborough. By his lordship's removal to the House of Peers, a vacancy takes place in the representation of Nottingham. Viscount Iwick having resigned his under-secretaryship, it has been offered to, and accepted by, Mr E. Stanley, member for Cheshire, "an able man, of liberal principles as the newspapers describe him."

NEW COLONY.

A NEW colony has been projected on the southern shore of Australia; and having received the sanction of the new Secretary for the Colonies (Mr Spring Rice), a bill for erecting the contemplated tract into a separate province was brought into Parliament July 17, by Mr Wolryche Whitmore. Previously, however (June 30), a large and most respectable meeting assembled in Exeter Hall, to pass resolutions on the subject, and afford an opportunity to the gentlemen forming the South Australian Association to explain their plans to the public. Mr Whitmore, who took the chair, stated that what chiefly distinguished this from all preceding attempts at colonization, and gave it its best chance of success, was the resolution of the association to plant a colony in which there should be a supply of labour equal to the supply of capital, and all the different branches of society should be established at once for mutual support. Such, as was explained by this and other gentlemen, had been the plan followed in ancient times; and hence the success of the Greek colonies, which so surpassed the states that had planted them. But in modern times, men of capital alone had in general been the first planters of colonies; and hence all of them have experienced great difficulties, except in instances where they had been able to command slave labour. In order to maintain the co-operation of capital and labour in the new colony, no land would be given away; it would be sold at the best price it would bring. Then no one would take more than he could cultivate, and the colonists would be kept together. The proceedings were concluded by a vote of thanks to the speaker.

land would be used, under the direction of commissioners, for the purpose of facilitating the emigration of working people, so as to keep up the just relation between land, capital, and labour; and working people would be taken out in the first expedition by money advanced on the faith of repayment from this source. The government of the colony by commissioners would only be temporary: as soon as the number of the inhabitants becomes 50,000, a constitution would be granted by the king.

The land marked out for the colony was described by Hanson as a tract which "has peculiar advantages over every other part of Australia, by the position of that which has hitherto formed one of the chief impediments to the settlement of that country—viz. facilities of communication amongst the settlers prior to the formation of roads. You are all aware that the rapid progress of the American colonies was greatly facilitated, and their prosperity increased, by the advantages derived in that country of easy water-carriage. Advantages of a similar character, and not greatly inferior in degree, are to be found in the present location. Around the shores of two Gulfs which are included in the limits of the new colony, the settlers may locate themselves; and they will be enabled to convey by water all their produce to the central market of that colony, whence they can bring home in return all those manufactures and conveniences and luxuries of life which they may be able to produce at home. This is an advantage which was denied to previous Australian colonies."

The fertility of the soil, Mr Hanson says, was unquestioned. "One of the most important pieces of evidence is that of an individual who resided for more than seven months on Kangaroo Island. He not only gives the strongest testimony to the fertility of the soil, and the amenity of the climate, but is willing to give the best proof of his veracity by himself becoming one of our colonists, and settling himself on the island he has discovered. And this he has been induced to do, although he possesses many acres in Van Dieman's Land, owing to the superior fertility of Southern Australia. Owing to the difficulty experienced two years ago in getting government to sanction the proposition, he was unable to wait, and as he was one to Van Dieman's Land: but he pledged himself that he would join the colonists the first opportunity; thus furnishing the strongest possible proof of his sincerity, and of his confidence in the fitness of the place for new settlers." Mr Hanson concluded by mentioning, that he had given the clearest proof of his confidence in the truth of the statements he made, by having himself resolved to proceed with his family to the new colony with the first body of settlers who left this country. Mr M. D. Hill stated that the province of South Australia would include such ground as the whole of France, Spain, and Portugal. [A minute account of the country has been published by Mr C. Knight, London.]

The Morning Chronicle states that "the office of the South Australian Association is daily crowded with persons who contemplate settling in the new colony. Amongst these there are several gentlemen of considerable property, and many officers both of the army and navy. They are engaged in making preparations for the first expedition of colonists, which is to follow an expedition of engineers and surveyors, and will sail, it is expected, before the middle of October, so as to reach Spencer's Gulf by the end of December, which is the middle of the Australian summer. Jersey and Jersey are likely to furnish a separate expedition, formed by heads of families amongst the numerous British officers, from the rank of general downwards, to that of lieutenant, who reside in those islands. As, in fact, it will be as easy for the new colony to obtain food and live stock from Van Dieman's Land as if it had been planted on an unoccupied portion of that island, there is no necessity for bringing any cattle, or any large supply of provisions, from England; nor is it at all requisite that every colonist should become a farmer. On the contrary, the colonists are informed, the first object will be the building of a town, upon a well-regulated plan, with an episcopal church, a Dissenters' church, a large hotel, a boarding-house, &c. This is the method of colonizing so successfully pursued on the western frontier of the United States, where it is less easy to obtain provisions and live stock from a distance, than will be the case with the first settlement in South Australia. The number of persons above the working class who have already decided to be amongst the founders of the colony, amounts to nearly two hundred. That number will probably be doubled in a month. Four hundred persons intending to buy land, to engage in mining speculations, to lend money at colonial interest, to set up shops and schools, to conduct a provision trade with Van Dieman's Land, and to work the mining-grounds of Spencer's Gulf and St Vincent's Gulf, will find employment, we may calculate, including domestic servants, for at least 2000 persons of the labouring class; and as every man of property will be enabled to take with him, without cost to himself, such a number of workmen or domestic servants as he may choose to employ, while for every male so taken to the colony a female also will be conveyed cost free, we may estimate that the first expedition of the colonists will amount to nearly 5000 persons. In the way of planting a colony, nothing so great has been attempted at the time of the ancient Greeks."

We present the foregoing as a brief account of what has occurred relative to the planting of a new colony on the Australian continent, of which there seem to be general expectations of success. We would humbly recommend those who feel disposed to emigrate thither, to procure, in the first place, satisfactory information from respectable and impartial authorities—persons who have carefully surveyed the country—to assure them that the land is really what it is represented to be. The horrors of the Swan River settlement ought to teach a useful lesson of caution in the present instance.

ROYAL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THIS great festival, on which so much public attention had been fixed for some time past, commenced, Tuesday, June 24, in Westminster Abbey, under the immediate patronage of his Majesty. The arrangements made for the accommodation of the public were on the most extensive scale. The abbey was so divided that the music could be heard by every person in it to the greatest advantage. At the extreme ends were placed their Majesties' box and the orchestra, which were connected by galleries running on each side, capable of containing an immense assemblage. The space below was filled with level seats between the pillars, while the benches on the side were elevated so as to afford a more commanding view. The whole interior woodwork was covered over with crimson cloth, trimmed with yellow, and the sides of the galleries were decorated with a drapery of the same material. Against the wall were hung curtains of a pleasing pattern and fabric, which served to conceal the stonework, while they formed an agreeable ornament. The royal box was erected in a style of architecture perfectly in accordance with the character of the building in which it was placed, and placed in such a situation that nearly every person in the abbey might obtain a sight of the King and Queen. Over the box was another gallery, and beyond this the fine old abbey organ. The orchestra was strongly and elegantly built.

The band consisted of seven organists, eighty first and second violins, thirty-two tenors, eighteen violoncellos, the same number of double basses, ten flutes, twelve oboes, eight clarionets, twelve bassoons, ten horns, eight trumpets, eight trombones, two ophicleides, two serpents, one side drum, tower drum, and other drums an octave higher. There were about forty principal singers. The semi-chorus consisted of twelve cantos, eight altos, eight tenors, and twelve basses. The chorus contained one hundred and twelve cantos, sixty altos, fifty-six tenors, and about ninety basses, making an orchestra of 574 of the best performers in the kingdom.

The first rehearsal commenced on Saturday, June 21, with Handel's grand Coronation Anthem and Chorus, followed by Haydn's Oratorio of "The Creation," and the last division consisted of a selection from Handel's Oratorio of "Sampson." The company began to arrive about ten o'clock, and before twelve there were at least eighteen hundred persons comfortably seated. With the exception of a few trifling blemishes, the rehearsal went off most admirably. If any thing was prominent in excellence, it was the choruses, all of which were sung in a style as nearly approaching perfection as is possible.

On the first day of the regular performances, his Majesty arrived at the abbey at a quarter past twelve, in full state, with the Queen, the Princess Augusta, the Duchess of Kent, and the Princess Victoria. There was a numerous attendance of the leading nobility, nearly all of whom had entered their names as presidents of the festival. The Archbishop of York and the Archbishop of Canterbury were both present, and about six of the Bishops. The introductory piece was Handel's Coronation Anthem, composed to the following words:—

"Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet anointed Solomon King; and all the people rejoiced and said, 'God save the King, long live the King, may the King live for ever. Hallelujah. Amen.'"

When the chorus began, the whole of the company stood up, and remained standing till the conclusion of the piece. When it came to the passage, "God save the King, may the King live for ever!" the most lively emotion was perceptible among the audience, particularly in the more sensible part of it, and many ladies were with difficulty kept from fainting. Others burst into tears, from the pleasure, not the pain, of the novel sensations excited.

The performances, of which it is impossible in the present sheet to give a detailed account, closed on Friday, July 4, with Handel's chef d'œuvre, the Oratorio of the Messiah. The leader of the band was F. Cramer, and Mr Knyvett took the organ. Mr Braham gave "Comfort ye my people" at the opening of the oratorio, with "Every valley," the air that follows it, very beautifully. His voice appeared to be as powerful as ever, and under as much command, and the execution of the passages as perfect as ever. "The people that walked in darkness" was splendidly sung by Mr Phillips. In this piece, again, the wind instrument accompaniments were very beautiful, moving in chromatic passages in Mozart's peculiar style, and blending richly with the voice. The chorus "For unto us" almost electrified the auditory, from the immense power of the band, now heard in all its richest combinations. "Rejoice greatly," by Caradori, was greatly admired. The whole concluded with the "Amen Chorus," which was played and sung with a power never we should think heard except on this occasion.

The festival appears to have, upon the whole, given high satisfaction to those who attended it, among whom were many distinguished persons from the Continent. Those among the audiences who recollect the Commemoration of 1784, acknowledge that a great improvement has taken place since then, in the musical power of the nation.

June 14. A severe hail-storm took place at Brighton, damaging glass to the value of £3000.

— 17. In the Court of Exchequer, John Cleave was found guilty of publishing the Weekly Police Gazette, an unstamped newspaper; and on the same day, Mr Hetherington was charged with selling the People's Conservative and the Poor Man's Guardian. The jury found a verdict for the crown upon the Conservative, and for the defendant on the Poor Man's Guardian. Hetherington said, "I am glad that, for it legalises the publication."—The case of the King versus Lord Teynham and another, for a conspiracy to defraud a Mr Langford of £3000 and upwards, upon the pretence of procuring him a place under government, was called for a new trial; but no person appeared to prosecute, and a verdict of not guilty was returned.—Lieutenant Parry, of the first regiment of life guards, was drowned in the Serpentine River, which he had attempted for a wager to swim across in his clothes.—A considerable number of the inhabitants of Dover met in the town-hall of that place, and determined to commence a railway to London, which has for some time been in contemplation. Many shares were taken, and there is a prospect of the scheme being carried through in a spirited manner. The plans are in a state of forwardness.

— 24. Two prize-fights took place near Andover, under the usual high patronage. One of the parties, named Noon, died soon after fighting. Owen Swift, who had been the immediate means of his death, was found guilty, at the Winchester assizes, July 12, of manslaughter, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment and hard labour in the county jail.

— 25. Admiral Napier landed at Portsmouth from Portugal, and was received with many marks of popular approbation.

— 26. A seaman, named Drinan, obtained £100 damages, against Captain Ward, of the Sir David Scott East Indian, for cruel treatment, when on his homeward voyage last year. It appeared that the plaintiff had struck the captain, but had been unmercifully punished for the offence, by being flogged, and then put in irons.—The Chatham election terminated in favour of Captain Byng, the government nominee; the votes being, for the Captain 262, for Mr Ching 192. Chatham is well known to be a borough peculiarly under the influence of the government.

— 28. A large cotton-mill, occupied by Messrs Mayall and Garside, at Oldham, was discovered to be on fire about two o'clock in the morning. The fire originated in some of the machinery, which not being oiled sufficiently, ignited through friction. During the fire, thirty persons ventured into the mill, in the hope of saving their property. While they were inside, all the four floors of the building fell in, and fifteen out of the thirty were buried in the ruins, and burnt to death. One poor fellow laid hold of a red-hot bar at a window, and stuck to it till taken down from without; but his hands were so dreadfully burnt, every particle of flesh sticking to the iron, that he died in the course of next day. A coroner's jury found a verdict of "accidental death" on the bodies of thirteen of the sufferers.

July 2. The result of the Finsbury election was declared, when there appeared for Mr Duncombe, 2514; for Mr Pownall, the Tory candidate, 1915. Messrs Babington and Wakley had inferior numbers. Mr Duncombe is pledged to the ballot, triennial parliaments, and other ultra-liberal objects.

— 5. Edwards, and his associates in the attack on Mr Gee, the solicitor, were tried at the Old Bailey sessions on a charge of having demanded by force and menace the sum of £1200 from the prosecutor; but the court ruled, that as the prisoners had not taken money, the indictment could not be sustained, and they were acquitted. They were again indicted for demanding certain valuable deeds from Mr Gee. On this charge they were also acquitted, as the court thought there was no difference between this and the previous case. The check for £800, to which they had obtained Mr Gee's signature, was not stolen from him, as he never had it; therefore the offence was no felony. The prisoners, however, with Mrs Canning of Old Ford, will be tried at the Middlesex sessions on a charge of conspiracy.—The Queen, accompanied by her brother, the Duke of Saxe Meiningen, and a distinguished party, embarked at Woolwich, for Rotterdam, where they arrived next evening. Her Majesty designs to pay a visit to her relations in Germany, for whose convenience she travels incognita, as Countess of Lancaster.

— 10. Don Santiago de los Santos, the celebrated Spanish dwarf, from Manila, who has been exhibited at the Adelphi and other theatres, and most of the great towns throughout the kingdom, was married to Anne Hopkins, of Birmingham, at St Martin's church in that town. The Don is forty-eight, and about twenty-five inches high, and Miss Hopkins is twenty-eight, and forty inches high. The High Bailiff gave the lady away. The bride and bridegroom were brought to the church in a sedan.—Coventry Herald.

— 13. A serious affray took place in Manchester between the Catholics and Orangemen, the latter of whom assembled in considerable numbers from Bury, Oldham, and Bolton, determined to walk in procession on that day instead of the 12th, the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne. The Catholics gave the first provocation, by hissing, tying a green ribbon to a lamp-post, and other means of annoyance. This the Orangemen resented. A general battle ensued, and many were seriously hurt, but none killed. All the rioters dispersed before the military arrived, and thirteen were apprehended.

— 14. A fire broke out at North Tawton, near Plymouth, which destroyed between sixty and seventy houses. The church steeple was partially, and the workhouse totally consumed. The inmates of the workhouse were removed to the church. The scene in the town was very alarming and distressing. Two years ago, more than forty horses were burnt in the same place.

— 15. At eleven o'clock at night, a fire commenced in Knockton Hall, near Lincoln, the splendid seat of the Earl of Ripon, which, before next morning at six, was burnt to the ground, including most of the furniture.

By the death of Mr M. H. Taylor and Sir William Guise, the elevation of Lord Duncannon to the peerage, and the resignation of Colonel Torrens, who goes out as Governor of Southern Australia, there are vacancies in Sudbury, the northern division of Gloucester, Nottingham, and Preston.

It is understood that Earl Grey has received a letter from Mr Stanley, expressing his deep regret that in his late speech he had been betrayed into the use of language respecting his late colleagues for which he is now sincerely sorry.

The personal and political friends of Lord Grey are promoting a private subscription of L.2000, to enable them to present Lady Grey with a statue of the late Premier.

The Lords of the Treasury have decided that the tea imported into Liverpool from Dantzic cannot be permitted to enter for home consumption, but permission has been given to export it.

There are two estates in the market at present, which formerly gave the power of returning six members to Parliament, but which, having been deprived of that privilege by schedule A, are no longer thought worth keeping by their noble owners. These estates are Aldborough, in Yorkshire, the possession of which enabled the Duke of Newcastle to return two members for Aldborough and two for Boroughbridge; and Stockbridge, in Hampshire, which gave the Marquis of Westminster the control of that borough. The noble duke's estate will probably produce L.50,000 or L.60,000 less than it would have done five years ago, and that of the noble marquis about half that sum.—Leeds Mercury.

The tables of the revenue up to the 5th of July show an increase on the year, L.390,236; on the quarter, over the corresponding quarter of last year, L.350,952. The items which exhibit an increase on the quarter are:—Customs, L.414,205; Stamps, L.38,504; Taxes, L.3764. The decrease is in the following items:—Excise, L.151,076; Post-office, L.7000; Miscellaneous, L.3740.

It appears that in the Treasury Department of the United States, the receipts for the first quarter of 1834, compared with the corresponding quarter of 1833, exhibited a deficiency of no less than 2,600,000 dollars, such being a portion of the results of the "experiment" of President Jackson. This deficit was also in the face of double the amount received during the 1834 quarter from the sale of public lands, compared with that carried to the account of the first quarter of 1833.

The committee on steam navigation to India have made their report to the House of Commons, giving it as their opinion that a regular and expeditious communication with India, by means of steam-boats, is an object of great importance both to Great Britain and India, and accompanying this opinion by recommending a Parliamentary grant of L.20,000, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and the expense of such communication by the line of the Euphrates. This route, in the opinion of the committee, besides having the prospect of being ultimately less expensive, presents many other advantages, physical, commercial, and political, over that by the Red Sea—justifying, therefore, the proposed outlay in bringing its practicability to the test of a decisive experiment.—True Sun.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart. of Brayton Hall, Cumberland (brother-in-law of Sir James Graham), is said to have been so strongly impressed by the arguments of Mr Pollard, who is lecturing in behalf of temperance societies in that county, that he has had the whole of his brandy, rum, gin, and whisky, taken from his cellars to the back of the Hall, and destroyed by fire in his own presence.

General Moreno, who shot Torrijos, finding public sentiment excited in a considerable degree by his presence in England, and dreading perhaps some prosecution for the death of Mr Boyd, left the country a few days after his arrival.

Public feeling has been considerably excited in the metropolis by an unusually severe case of military flagellation, which took place, July 14, in St George's Barracks, Charing Cross. The sufferer was a private named Henderson; his offence, drunkenness on duty, and attempting to strike a sergeant; the punishment, three hundred lashes. During the operation, many of the soldiers fainted; and the cries of the poor man were so loud, that the drums were beat to drown the sound.

A few days ago, the piercers in one of the Oldham cotton-mills struck work for an advance of wages. Their ages are from ten to fourteen; but such is the extraordinary precocity of these little operatives in matters of business, that a meeting of their important body was called to take place at a beer-house, a chairman and secretary were appointed, and a copy of the resolutions ordered to be furnished to their employers. The circumstance at first bore an alarming aspect; but the momentous affair was at length compromised, and all is quiet again in Oldham.—Bolton Chronicle.

A battle took place lately at Ghent, between two parties of women, amounting to nearly one hundred and fifty. The contest arose from one party wishing to force the other into a combination to cease working. Innumerable caps and bonnets were torn into rags, several ears were pulled off, and handfuls of hair were seen floating away in the breeze.

The ship James of Limerick, bound for Canada with emigrants, foundered at sea about the 25th April, when 11 of the crew and 247 of the emigrants perished, only 11 persons escaping in one of the boats. There seems great reason to apprehend that ill-found vessels are engaged in the emigration trade; and it would be well, perhaps, if government could institute a system of inspection in this department.

At a late meeting of the academy of medicine in Paris, M. Velpeau exhibited a man who possesses the very singular power of making himself two inches taller, or shorter, at will. Standing erect, he can elongate the spine, and contract it again, by moving the sacrum, which plays like a wedge between the bones of the pelvis. He is at present forty years of age, and had a carriage pass over his body when a child, to the injury received at which time the power of executing this curious manoeuvre may be attributed.—Medical Gazette.

In 1833, there were received into the Foundling Hospital at Paris 4803 children, of which 1751 came from the Lying-in-Hospital, and 281 from other hospitals. Of these, 1259 (one-fourth) died in the hospital before they could be put out to nurse.

A letter from Rome states that Torlonia's house has just received a privilege for the establishment of steam-coaches between that city and Naples.

The Brussels papers announce that the Ministers of Leopold have offered a premium for the best copy of verses set to music to commemorate the days of September!

In Hungary, millions of beetles are devouring the crops and the foliage. To destroy them, smoke and other means have been resorted to, but without success, as these experiments appear rather to make them come out of the ground than to exterminate them.

A subscription is about to be entered into at Stuttgart, for the purpose of raising a monument in honour of the poet Schiller. The statue is to be of colossal dimensions, and represented in a sitting posture; the head will be copied from the fine bust, the work of Dannecker. Thorwaldsen, the prospectus states, has offered to make a sketch of the statue, and to watch over the execution of the model.

A curious statement has been published by one of the papers in Madrid, respecting the number and revenues of the Spanish clergy. It appears that the number of buildings appropriated to religious purposes throughout Spain is 28,249; that of the clergy, 159,322; that of the friars and nuns, 96,878. The entire amount of the ecclesiastical revenues is calculated to be fifty millions of dollars; and of this sum, the part consumed by them is shown to exceed the whole revenue of the state by some eight millions of dollars.

The great canal in Burgundy, which was begun many years ago, is at last opened to navigation. The States of Burgundy had ordered the first works in 1775, and the Emperor had continued them. The sums expended on this prodigious undertaking may be estimated at about L.1,600,000 sterling. Its length is forty-eight French leagues, and a line of interior navigation of three hundred leagues is now thus assured to trade. There are 189 edifies, and a subterranean gallery, pierced through a mountain to the extent of about one-third of a league.

SCOTLAND.

Emigration.—The public will be glad to learn that a government agent for emigration has been appointed to the port of Leith. Lieutenant James R. Forrest, R.N., is the gentleman to whom the duties of this office have been assigned. Such an appointment had long been required for the protection of emigrants in general, and it may be satisfactory to those intending to leave the country to know, that all passage-vessels will in future be subject to strict survey, both as regards their fitness for the voyage, and likewise that a proper store of provisions and water is provided, as also, that every protection and assistance will be afforded them, in making the vessels sail at the specified time, or procuring a suitable allowance from the agents while detained beyond that period. We have no doubt that this arrangement will be looked upon as a public benefit, and tend to encourage emigration from the port of Leith.

The salaries of the Judges in the Court of Session are to be increased—those of the heads of the two Inner Courts to L.5000 each, and those of the other Judges to L.3000; all the Judges to do duty as Lords of Session, Judiciary, and Jury Court. It is proposed that any Judge of the age of 75, who has done duty for fifteen years, should be allowed to retire on full salary. The following Judges may, and very likely will, avail themselves of this privilege, viz., Lord President Hope, Lords Glenelg, Balgray, Gillies, and Clerk of Edinburgh.

Education.—During the last month, some excitement has been created in Edinburgh by a proposal made in the Town Council to examine into the state of education at the High School. This establishment has cost the town an immense sum of money, and the number of scholars is yearly declining. The chief cause of this declension is considered to be the extent of classical education, which engrosses nearly the whole time of the boys, and it is believed that the introduction of various branches of education in useful knowledge would tend to restore the seminary. The Council are in the meantime making investigations into these matters, and some beneficial reform agreeable to the spirit of the age is anticipated.

Racing.—The annual Edinburgh races took place at Musselburgh on Tuesday, July 15, and the two following days. The races were good, but the assemblage small which witnessed them. This is one of the most convincing proofs of the improved taste of society. Horse-racing, bull-baiting, boxing, cock-fighting, and similar games, are every year losing ground in Scotland, and will probably soon only be regarded by horse-jockeys, stable-boys, and listless idlers among the lowest and highest classes.

Dogs.—In consequence of proclamations issued by the local authorities in Glasgow and Edinburgh at the beginning of July, empowering the officers of police to seize all stray dogs, the streets of these cities have been cleared of these animals, the great number of which was becoming a serious and dangerous nuisance.

Smoking on the Streets.—Two gentlemen who were lately smoking cigars on Prince's Street, dashed off some burning embers, which, falling on the muslin dress of a young lady passing at the time, set it instantly in a flame. A gentleman, walking with the lady, with much presence of mind took off his coat, and wrapped it about her person, by which means the flames were extinguished; but both parties were considerably scorched, besides having part of her clothes destroyed. A similar occurrence took place about ten days before. The practice of smoking on the streets has become a perfect nuisance, and ought to be put down.

Ploughmen's Unions.—The ploughmen of Perthshire and several other districts have begun to imitate the example of the Trades' Unions, by forming associations among themselves for the purpose of raising their wages and regulating the hours of work. The landlords and farmers have as yet formed no counter combination, but whenever they were aware that any in their service had connected themselves with these unions, immediate intimation was given that they should quit at next term.

Forrest, one of the self-taught sculptors of grotesque objects who have lately come into notice in Scotland, and who exhibit his works in a temporary building on the Calton Hill, Edinburgh, has just made a first and highly successful effort in the superior art of his art. The subject is Mazeppa on the dying horse; a statue which art proves in our opinion, by the manner in which he treats it, that he is qualified to excel in subjects of elevated design and feeling, as well as in the delineation of ordinary figures. The struggles of the prostrate and exhausted animal, and the agony of the victim who still writhes on its back, are executed with great power, and without the slightest trace of the heavy style to which the sculptor has heretofore confined his efforts. He is also disposed to think that the anatomical part of the statue has been executed in a very correct manner. Encouraged by success in this first attempt, Forrest is marking out a large block for the Conversion of St Paul, a subject in which we have little doubt that he will achieve a still greater triumph.

The Summer.—Accounts from all parts of the country describe this as having been one of the finest summers which has been enjoyed for several years. The weather during June and July has been generally sunny, clear, and delightful. All agree in presenting the appearance of the country as promising the highest degree of fertility, or border counties, exhibit every indication of an early and productive harvest. The Upper and Lower Ward of Lanarkshire, with the exception of the orchards, is quite a picture for the eye of a farmer; and the Lower Ward is no less attractive. The Lothians are in one universal glow of fertile beauty; the Carse of Falkirk never looked better in the memory of the oldest tenant; and Fifeshire, particularly as regards the potato crop, indicates more than an average return. Indeed, we have been assured that the much-talked-of failure among the potatoes is, after all, but a very partial affair, and will be scarcely if at all felt on the aggregate amount of the harvest. The Highland districts are also doing well; and Ayrshire, we are happy to say, is, in point of promise, not behind her neighbours. Thinly drawback in this prospect consists in the failure of the fruit crops in the great orchard districts on the Clyde. The cause of this deficiency is ascribed to the frosts in the spring, and the warm dry weather in the beginning of summer, affecting the blossoms, which were from the then wet winter, very early out.

Dr Murray's Monument.—The foundation-stone of a monument, sacred to the memory of the late Dr Alexander Murray, the celebrated linguist, has been laid adjoining his birthplace, Galloway, the ceremonial having been attended by an immense concourse of people. Dr Murray was born near the Doon, within the estate of Cairnsmuir, and the elevation so named has already become the site of his future monument. The situation is alpine in a high degree, and partakes very largely of the romantic, and sublime character of the mountain scenery.

A few weeks ago, Mr Richard Carlile, of London, arrived in Edinburgh, for the purpose of delivering a series of lectures on his peculiar theory of religion, which he terms Catholic Christianity. An analysis of his lectures was given in large placards, which were extensively posted throughout the city; but, nevertheless, although only sixpence was charged for admission, his audience were remarkably small in number, and those probably consisting of many who had no object but curiosity, as any other thirty persons attended the two first lectures, and about one or seventy the last. A dissenters' chapel in Brighton Street was the place chosen by Mr Carlile for his exhibitions. The lectures have been still less successful in Glasgow.

Steam-Carriages.—These vehicles, adapted for common sixth roads, are now running regularly between Glasgow and Paisley, the passengers, the distance, which is seven miles, being performed in from thirty to forty minutes. In appearance, these vehicles, with the cistern attached as a separate carriage, are cumbersome and unwieldy, yet their running is now considered successful, and the Glasgow Courier speaks of their operations in high terms of commendation. We have seen them experimenting on the roads in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, and they seem to possess one or two evils worthy of correction. The waste of escaping by the upright tube is must be cured. Their speed must be very various, and the steady pace of a mail-coach, notwithstanding the rate of perhaps fifteen, and at other times five or six, miles an hour.

New Steam-Vessels from London to Scotland.—Within the few weeks a regular steam communication has been established between Dundee and London, by means of two vessels of 300 tons power each. Already they have been very successful in their operations; and as there is a daily ready and cheap communication between Dundee and Edinburgh, this forms a serious rival conveyance to the Leith steamers. It has been proposed to establish a communication of the same description between Charleston, the Forth and London, which is meant to carry off the good passengers from Glasgow, now proceeding by way of Leith. We hail this as another vast improvement in our steam communication with London. There can be no doubt whatever that any company could at present carry off nine-tenths of the Edinburgh passengers by lowering the fares from four guineas to one guinea sum. A great improvement would consist in giving just slightly plain accommodation with rapid sailing, at a low price, without victuals, leaving passengers to pay for their food, if they chose to take any, as in the Glasgow and Liverpool services. We shall be glad to hear that some plan of this kind is arranged, and we are certain it would succeed beyond all calculation. One of the monstrous errors in the construction of the Leith vessels, has hitherto been the making them what is called splendid in other words, causing passengers to pay for mirrors and other expensive ornaments of no real use. We hope this will be avoided in the proposed new steamers.

Steamer Sunk.—A few days ago, while the steamer Helens was coming down the Clyde, and near Erskine ferry, she came in contact with an anchor, and almost immediately sunk. Very happy to state that every person on board got ashore uninjured.

An Island for Sale.—An entire island (Eday, in Orkney) containing 700 inhabitants, a parish church, school-house, and other signs and tokens of civilisation, is offered for sale. To a man ambitious of becoming, like honest Sanchez Panza, governor of an island, and who has more money than to purchase such a "gem of the ocean," this little island offers a chance of continuing much happier on his fellow-creatures.

Scottish Wool Trade.—The wool trade in Glasgow and Stirling, and the surrounding districts, is very dull at present, especially in the manufacture of worsted shawls and blankets. The reason is the high price of wool, without a corresponding advance in the price of goods. In Stirlingshire there are few manufacturers in which the whole of the weaving-looms are going, on account of the masters waiting for a reduction in the price of wool, which new clip is brought to the market.

Battle of Bannockburn.—Tuesday, June 24, being the anniversary of this famous battle, by which Scotland was relieved from English oppression, was celebrated with the usual festivities at Stirling and in its neighbourhood, as well as in some parts of the country. A flag, with the motto "Scotland is free," was hoisted in commemoration of the event, on the tower of Clackmannan, the ancient seat of King Robert the Bruce; as also, with the Scottish arms on the ancient stone from which the town derives its name, which has been elevated on a pedestal of granite, ten feet high, and weighing twelve tons. Robert the Bruce having stopped at this stone in the clock on this spur, went away and left his mantle, or glove in the stone. When he discovered his loss, and mentioned it to one of his attendants, who answered, "Stop here and look about you, if I shall return for it." The place where this occurred is still called "Look about ye," from the circumstance; and hence the derivation of Clackmannan from the old word clack or rent, and man, which signified a glove. The stone is still preserved, and held in high veneration by the inhabitants.

The extraordinary state of the potato crop merits notice from the naturalist as well as the farmer. In some fields there is a single plant. In this case, there is reason to suppose the seed potatoes had been hurt either by being heated or by frost. In other fields, the end or middle of the drills for a considerable space, well planted, while the other part is without a single stem. In this case, the cause of failure can neither be in the seed nor the manure, but must be sought for in the qualities of the soil. As far as we have observed in such cases, it is the stiff part of the

WALTER-SCOTTIANA.

There was scarcely a family of whatever class, for many miles round Abbotsford, with which Sir Walter was not more or less acquainted. Among others, was that of a late unfortunate writer, whose father was a small but respectable farmer in Roxburghshire. Sir Walter had shown much disposition to befriend the young author, but the irregular and unsteady habits of the poet marred the kind intentions of his friend, and he lost sight of him for several years. At length, after various changes of fortune, the young man was brought with his aged parents in Edinburgh, where he endeavoured to support himself by his pen. On his mother's decease, which happened about the year 1788, the poor poet had not, like Dr Johnson, wherewithal to defray the expenses of her funeral. From this unhappy state of destitution he was relieved by the receipt of £20, sent to him by some nameless friend under a blank envelope. He could not even form a guess from whom this timely aid proceeded; but he preserved the envelope with its address, and many years afterwards discovered his benefactor to be Sir Walter, by a friend identifying the handwriting as that of Miss Scott. This anecdote we have from a gentleman to whom the poet himself communicated it. The following is equally well authenticated:—

hile strolling on the banks of the Tweed, one day Scott came upon an individual who was fishing, and whose features he recollected as those of an old schoolfellow, although he had not seen him for perhaps a quarter of a century before. His dress and appearance denoted one at variance with fortune; and he seemed to shrink from being recognised by his old more fortunate companion, Scott addressed him as a mere stranger, and after chatting for some time walked away. He had not been long gone, when the stranger came up, and challenged the individual who had rudely for intruding on the grounds, and concluded with demanding his name and address. Then, after some demurring, the fisherman gave, and walked off, cursing in his heart the tyranny of those "lords of the creation" who grudged a poor man the privilege either of enjoying pastime, or extracting a morsel from the free stream. But it proved a lucky chance for him. He was one of those many unfortunate individuals in Scotland, whose parents, like those of Dominie Sampson, had determined, in spite of nature and poverty, that their son should "sing his pow in a poopit." After passing several years of starvation and labour in vainly striving to fit himself for the ministry, he had returned to his poor parents, and was endeavouring to scrape together a few pounds a-year as a teacher in his native village, about fifteen miles from Abbotsford. These particulars Scott had taken the somewhat odd plan we have seen of ascertaining. A few days after their interview, the poor dominie received an anonymous enclosure of L.5, as "from an old friend," and shortly afterwards was appointed to a clerkship in an extensive colliery at some distance—the only sort of employment he was perhaps fitted for—by which he was maintained in comfort and respectability till his death.

to these instances of practical benevolence we have to add, that Mr Alexander Campbell, well known as the author of "Albyn's Anthology," was, during the last years of his life, solely maintained by Sir Walter. When the latter heard that the old man was in want, he said, "Well, well, I always intended to support him, and I will not now retract;"—and he was as good as his word. Campbell's sole employment lately was, transcribing old manuscripts for his benefactor; and he was understood to be in the secret. Upon his death in 1824, Sir Walter procured the publication of many literary and other friends at the expense of £100, and published a very feeling obituary notice in the Edinburgh Review, and the Weekly Journal newspaper.

have from a gentleman who was his classfellow, and was intimate with him till his death. One day the teacher, Mr Luke Fraser (of the High School), read out an English translation of a portion of that part of the Æniad, beginning "Turnus, Rex Rutulorum" (Turnus, King of the Rutuli), to be translated by his pupils into Latin on the spot. As Fraser was a rigid disciplinarian, the scholars forthwith applied themselves assiduously to their task, and had proceeded some time in profound silence, when all of a sudden the stillness and decorum of the classroom was interrupted by loud and continued explosions of laughter from Scott. "What's this, Walter?" cried Fraser; "what's the meaning of this conduct?" "Look here, sir, look here," said Walter, when he had recovered his breath, handing to his master, at the same time, the version of the companion who sat next him. The boy, it seems, had mistaken the meaning of his master's translation, and instead of re-translating the first words into "Turnus, Rex Rutulorum," had rendered them into "Verte nos, Rex Rutulorum" (Turn us, oh King of the Rutuli!) Fraser could not help smiling at the mistake, but told Walter he had begun rather early to criticise.

The same gentleman tells a ludicrous instance of the effect of our old Scottish ballads on Scott's youthful fancy. At a small party in the lodgings of the former (who like Scott was then studying law), one of the company sung the old and somewhat vulgar song, "Fie, gae rub her o'er wi' strae." Scott, who had never heard it chaunted before, sat drinking in every note with delight: when it was finished, he started from his chair, and catching up his lame foot in his left hand, he hopped round the room until exhausted, roaring out all the while, at the top of his tuneless voice, "Fie, gae rub her o'er we strae;" to which his strong burr gave a truly laughable emphasis.

[From Mrs Jameson's Visits and Sketches at Home and Abroad.]

“THE German women are much more engrossed by the cares of housekeeping than women of a similar rank of life in England. They carry this too far in many instances, as we do the opposite extreme. In England, with our false conventional refinement, we attach an idea of vulgarity to certain cares and duties in which there is nothing vulgar. To see the young and beautiful daughter of a lady of rank running about, busied in household matters with the keys of the wine-cellar and the store-room suspended to her sash, would certainly surprise a young Englishwoman who, meantime, is netting a purse, painting a rose, or warbling some ‘Dulce mio Bene,’ or ‘Soavi Palpiti,’ with the air of a nun at penance. The description of Werter’s Charlotte cutting bread and butter has been an eternal subject of laughter among the English, among whom fine sentiment must be garnished up with something finer than itself; and no princess can be suffered to go mad, or even to be in love, except in white satin. To any one who has lived in Germany, the union of sentiment and bread and butter, or of poetry with household affairs, excites no laughter. The wife of a state minister once excused herself from going with me to a picture-gallery, because on that day she was obliged to reckon up the household linen; she was one of the most charming, truly elegant, and accomplished women I ever met with. At another time, I remember that a very accomplished woman, who had herself figured in court, could not do something or other—I forget what—because it was the ‘grosse Wsache’ (the great wash), an event, by the way, which I often found very mal-a-propos, and which never failed to turn a German household upside down. You must remember that I am not speaking of tradesmen and mechanics, but of people of my own, or even a superior rank of life. It is true that I met with cases in which the women had without necessity sunk into mere domestic drudges—women whose souls were in their household stuff—whose talk was of dishes and condiments; but then, the same species of women in England would have been, instead of busy with the idea of being useful, frivolous and silly, without any idea at all.

As to what we term accomplishments, there was certainly much less exhibition and parade of them in society; they formed less an established and necessary part of education than with us; but of really-accomplished, well-informed women, believe me, I found no deficiency—far otherwise: if the inclination or the talent existed, means and opportunity were not wanting for mental culture of a very high species. I met with fewer women who drew badly, sang tolerably, or rather intolerably, scratched the harp, and quoted Metastasio; but I met with quite as many women who, without pretension, were finished musicians, painted like artists, possessed an extensive acquaintance with their own literature, and an uncommon knowledge of languages; and were, besides, very good housewives after the German fashion. More or less acquaintance with the French language was a matter of course, but English was preferred; every where I met with women who had cultivated with success, not our language merely, but our literature.

I observed, and I verified my own observations by the information of some intelligent medical men, that there is less ill-health among the superior ranks of women in Germany than with us; all that class of diseases which we call nervous, which in England have increased, and are increasing in such a fearful ratio, are far less prevalent; doubtless, because the habits of social life are more natural."

In this list have been omitted sixteen millions sterling of Spanish loans, which, although ostensibly contracted by the French houses of Lafitte and Arduin, were in reality sold in the English market.—Pebner's British Empire, 1833.

The Commercial Gazette of St Petersburg, of May 23, has the following:—It has been remarked that, during the last twenty years, the water in this port has become considerably lowered, and affords a new proof of the correctness of the observations made by the ancient inhabitants of the shores of the Baltic, that the bottom of this sea is continually rising, that the level and body of the water is gradually diminishing, and that the land is increasing on every side. According to the researches of the ancient naturalists, phenomena of this nature most frequently occur in the countries near the North Pole. We can quote as examples the lakes of Denmark, which have sunk so low, that some of them are almost entirely without water. Sweden and Norway, 2500 years ago, formed one island. The town of Pittea, in forty-five years, became distant from the sea two miles, and the water receded from Loulea one mile in twenty-eight years. The ancient port of Lodisa is now four miles from the sea, and that of Westerwich two miles. At the time of the foundation of Torneo, large vessels could come close up to it; now it is in the middle of the peninsula. The islands of Errgsœe and Carœe, Apsoe and Testeroe, have been for many years joined to each other; and Louisœe, Psalmodi, Magdelone, and many more, have become part of the mainland. It was upon these facts, connected with other observations, that Linnæus and Celsius concluded that the depth of the Baltic sea diminished four inches in every century, and that in 2000 years it would entirely disappear. Although more accurate observations made in modern times do not confirm the diminution to be so rapid as this, they concur with the generally received opinion, that the bottom of the sea, in the northern hemisphere, rises in a degree, though the level of the water does not sink.

On the Continent, every child, almost before he learns his alphabet, before he can even crack a whip, is taught what is termed in Europe civility ; a trifling example of which I witnessed this very morning. At nearly a league from Langen-Schwabach, I walked up to a little boy who was flying a kite on the top of a hill, in the middle of a field of oat stubble. I said not a word to the child—scarcely looked at him—but as soon as I got close to him, the little village clod, who had never breathed any thing thicker than his own mountain air, actually almost lost string, kite, and all, in an effort, quite irresistible, which he made to bow to me, and take off his hat. Again, in the middle of the forest, I saw the other day three labouring boys laughing together, each of their mouths being, if possible, wider open than the others ; however, as they separated, off went their caps, and they really took leave of each other in the very same sort of manner with which I yesterday saw the Landgrave of Hesse Homburg return a bow to a common postilion. It is this general, well-founded, and acknowledged system, which binds together all classes of society. It is this useful, sensible system, which enables the master of the Allée Saal, as he walks about the room during dinner-time, occasionally to converse with the various descriptions of guests who have honoured his table with their presence ; for, however people in England would be shocked at such an idea, on the Continent, so long as a person speaks and behaves correctly, he need not fear to give any one offence. Now, in England, as we all know, we have all sorts of manners, and a man actually scarcely dares to say which is the true idol to be worshipped. We have very noble aristocratic manners ; we have the short stumpy manners of the old-fashioned English country gentleman ; we have sick dandified manners ; black-stock military manners ; your “ free and easy man-

STATE OF THE ARMY.

THE HOUSE lately stated in Parliament the remarkable fact, that "in the last two years, one-fifth of the army on English stations has passed through the public gaols." He afterwards corrected himself, informing the house, that, the Irish garrisons having been omitted from the calculation, the proportion was a reality only half of what he had formerly indicated—that is to say, a tenth of the soldiery had been committed in two years for crime. Still, he allowed, the increase of crime shown by this statement was frightful. And frightful it certainly is. The annual committals in England and Wales are as 1 to 100,000 of the general population, including the army; but in the army they are as 1 to 20! The state of demoralisation proved by this fact to exist in the military force, is truly deplorable.

The British people pay annually between seven and eight millions for the support of the army, if we include the half-pay, which is paid that men may be enabled to enter it. This sum is more than the half of the whole expense of the country, exclusive of the interest of the national debt. Thus, we have not only to support an army which is a sink of vice and crime, but which is the object of an expenditure, which, if directed, might do almost infinite good—might, for instance, support and educate the whole poor of the country!

Through the pomp and circumstance of the army, and other besetting and deluding influences, it is always an object of popular affection. We remember the only part of Mr Cobbett's lectures (delivered in Edinburgh) which called down the disapprobation of the more plebeian part of the audience, was that in which he justly pointed out the whole, in which he exposed the needlessness of a large military establishment in a well-conducted state. It is also observable on all occasions of military parade, with what admiration and admiring eyes the common people will follow the marching squadrons. If the humbler orders of the community really knew their own good, they would regard the army at the best as a great necessary evil, an engine liable to be applied for the suppression of wrong as well as for the redress or maintenance of right, and a thing kept up at the expense of their purses and their blood, both of which they have constantly expended through this channel from time immemorial, under the most degrading and empty of pretensions. The sense of the whole nation is now called for, by the state of our own army, to consider some means of correcting the mischiefs which cling to it.

Things are desirable—that the army should be reduced in number, and that it should be moralised. It may be much lessened by a setting straight of what is wrong in the condition of Ireland—a country which is governed on principles inconsistent with the dictates of human reason, and for which the coercion of the sword is therefore necessary. A just attention to the moral and intellectual interests of the manual class throughout the rest of the empire would tend to diminish the necessity for military force, which, we repeat, is only an evil for correcting the deficiencies of a good. Enable this class to pursue their advantage in an enlightened spirit, and to see that it is always identified with that of the employing class, and a fourth part of the army might be spared. Let us not always be so blind as to think it better to pay millions for the checking of dangerous passions after they have come into existence, than to provide for the prevention of the birth of such passions.

As to the means of moralising the army, the first step ought to be a weeding out of the worse characters, which might be done in some measure as part of the operation of reduction. We must also take means to prevent bad characters from entering the army. The pay ought to be made more nearly equal to that of a labouring man, so as to afford to that class a fair pecuniary inducement for enlisting. Perhaps this addition to the pay might be made from a different source than the national purse. The soldiery must become less idle than they are at present. No one can look along the lower streets of a garrison town, without being convinced that want of employment for mind and body is a great cause of their viciousness. Their real duties are a series of trifles, and, to fill up their spare time, they amuse themselves by keeping the lowest and most profligate company, wherever they are. Nor are their crimes of an ordinary kind: the newspapers of the past month contain no fewer than four instances of a party of soldiers, infuriated by drink, drawing their weapons upon an unarmed crowd, and inflicting serious injury upon several individuals. They ought to be set to public works, or to courses of private industry—any thing rather than their present vacant and sauntering life. As a further inducement to good behaviour, prospects of promotion ought to be opened to the men. They entirely want at present all the more generous impulses to steady conduct; and these should be given to them.

We need hardly point out that, every step taken towards bettering the circumstances and elevating the general morality of the soldiery, the less difficulty would be found in enlisting sober and honest men. If it were once understood that a soldier was not necessarily a low and hopeless outcast, as he is now too generally considered even by civilians of his own humble rank, steady moral men might assume the profession as readily as any other. Thus, too, all the base deceptions which have heretofore been practised for the purpose of inveigling men into the service, would be no longer requisite. These arts, whether consisting in the glossing language of a recruiting serjeant, or the exhibition of a bounty as a temptation, are inconsistent with a right morality—are, in fact, a national sin and disgrace, in almost as great a degree as the slave-trade formerly was. If nothing else were wanting to show how utterly wrong the whole of our military system at present is, these mean and unworthy trickeries would do so; for if the army were what it ought to be, they would be unnecessary. We do not mean to say that they ever could be necessary, in the sense of their being on that account justifiable. It is clear that no plea of expediency in the multitude can excuse the oppression of any individual whatever, however lowly his station: we only point out that, if the army were put upon a right footing, even "the tyrant's plea" might be obviated.

Much attention has lately been directed to the question of military flogging. This horrible violation of humanity is, however, only part of the larger violence in which our whole military system exists. We are told that the state of the army renders it unavoidable, and we can easily believe it. But why keep the army in such a state as to render this monstrous practice unavoidable? This very assurance, usually put forth by military men, self-convicts the system of all we have laid to its charge, and clenches every argument we have used for its reform. Discharge the bad, admit only the good; to attract the good, raise the pay, and hold out prospects of promotion; set the men to work, to school; and flogging will perish of itself.

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

THE arrival of Don Carlos in a hostile capacity does not appear to have as yet materially affected the state of public affairs in this country. For a month after his invasion on July 8, he had not succeeded in surrounding himself with such a force as to enable him to assume a firm position in the face of the constitutional troops. He has, during all that time, been shifting about from one obscure place to another in the Pyrenean province of Navarre, attended by a few hundreds of adherents, and never venturing to come to more than the slightest and most unimportant kinds of collision with the army under General Rodil. At the same time, the loan attempted to be negotiated for him in Paris has been defeated by the arrest of M. Jauge, the contractor; and British and French vessels cruise along the Spanish coast, to prevent the access of supplies from his friends in other countries. He has published a decree, declaring guilty of high treason the ministers who proclaimed Isabella II.

About the middle of July, some violent popular excesses were committed in Madrid. They began on the 13th, by a scuffle which took place between parties of the Urban Militia and the Guards, on account of the alleged Carlism of the latter. Meanwhile, the cholera reached the city, and the deaths increased from 38 on the 15th to 270 on the 17th. As among other unenlightened communities, the disease was ascribed to the poisoning of the wells, and popular rumour ascribed this supposed atrocity to the monks. The mob consequently broke into three convents, and massacred a number of their inmates. In the Jesuit convent of San Isidro, upwards of thirty were killed. While this bloody work was going on, the working clergy were treated with the usual marks of public respect. Soon after, the malady became less destructive, and the popular frenzy was allayed. On the night of the 24th, however, a conspiracy was discovered, having for its objects a recognition of the democratic constitution of 1812, and the choice of another regent. The chief persons implicated, General Palafox, Romuero d'Alpuente, and General Ván Halen, were taken into custody, and many inferior persons have been arrested.

The Queen Regent opened the Cortes on the 24th (July), with a speech in which she expresses regret for the ill-advised proceedings of Don Carlos, expresses satisfaction at the establishment of amicable relations with England and France, and mentions that, although some other powers have as yet delayed recognising the government of Donna Isabella, they have not shown any desire to interfere in the domestic concerns of Spain. She also alludes to the distracted state of the country, the necessity of strengthening the army, and the reforms in institutions and in expenditure, which, notwithstanding the critical position of the country, she has been able to effect. The address of the Proceres or Peers, in answer to her majesty's speech, was voted unanimously, August 2. That of the Procuradores or Commons was too liberal to permit of its being agreed to by the ministers, and they divided the house against it, but were defeated by a majority of 49 to 35. The chief point in contest seems to have been the freedom of the press, from which the Liberals, or Exaltados as they are called, wished the late restrictions to be taken off. The ministers succeeded in getting a vote that the clause to that effect should not stand, but, on attempting one to blink the subject altogether, were defeated by 44 to 36. These facts, with some features in the preceding riots, show the great progress which liberal sentiments have made in Spain. Some of the members are said to speak remarkably well, and the proceedings are very fully reported in the Madrid newspapers.

FRANCE.

In the latter part of July, Marshal Soult retired from the presidency of the council, and was succeeded by Marshal Gerard, the hero of Antwerp, who has since appointed Count Drouet d'Erlon to the governorship of Algiers. The celebration of the Three Days of July took place under the usual circumstances, but with rather less enthusiasm on the part of the people than formerly; and the king is said to have been treated with very partial cordiality by the people. On the 31st July, his majesty opened the Chambers in person. In his speech he congratulated the Chambers on the result of the elections, and on the tranquil state of the country since the suppression of the deplorable struggles excited by criminal, but, as they have proved, impotent agitators (alluding to the occurrences at Lyons, &c.) Commerce, manufactures, and agriculture, were described as flourishing; and the relations with foreign powers formed the subject of gratulation. By the quadruple alliance, he informed the Chambers that a salutary influence has been exercised on the restoration of peace to the Peninsula; and he intimated that in any steps to be taken with regard to recent occurrences in that quarter, he would act strictly in concert with England. The condition of the East was stated to be satisfactory, and an opinion was expressed that the peace of Europe is not likely to be disturbed.—The address of the Peers was voted by a majority of 81 to 9, but that of the Deputies proved a matter of greater difficulty. Emanating from the Tiers Parti, who occupy a central place between the Carlists and ultra-Liberals, it is represented as indicating a coolness in that important body towards the ministry, though it chiefly displeases them by expressing a wish for a more liberal commercial policy, and a better equilibrium between the public income and expenditure. The debate was closed August 14, when the original address was given way to by the ministers, who seem to have dreaded a defeat from a coalition of the Tiers Parti with the other two parties. The more extended views of commercial policy are said to be well represented in the new Chamber of Deputies, and there is every reason to anticipate some changes in that branch of public affairs.

PORTUGAL.

OUT of 80 returns to Cortes already ascertained, it is said that 69 are decided ministerialists. Don Pedro is, meanwhile, engaged very actively in several schemes of internal improvement. He proposes to change the paper currency into a metallic one, and is about to apply a million and a half of British money, procured on loan, to the improvement of the roads throughout the kingdom, and the formation of canals. Lord Howard de Walden, British ambassador in Portugal—a Tory—is accused of an imprudence which may be attended with serious consequences, in having interfered to prevent security being taken from Don Carlos for his good behaviour, previously to his being allowed to quit Portugal; which security, it appears, the Spanish and Portuguese governments had agreed to exact.—Don Miguel has issued a protest at Genoa against the constraint under which he was lately obliged to leave the kingdom, and re-asserts his right to the throne.

The Pope held a consistory on the 2d of August, and made a long speech on the affairs of Portugal, deprecating any reform in the ecclesiastical affairs of that kingdom by Pedro, and threatening the vengeance of the Holy See if any change take place. As the Portuguese, we suppose, are still floundering in the sloughs of ignorance and bigotry, these threats may produce some mischief. "What a libel is it," says the editor of the Scotsman, "on the boasted light of the nineteenth century, that a people cannot reform the most palpable abuses in their domestic institutions without permission from a croaking, imbecile, superannuated monk, living in Italy, and representing in his person the ignorance, superstition, and barbarism of the dark ages! Happily, however, the schoolmaster is abroad, and this antiquated tyranny is rapidly falling into contempt."

HOLLAND.

THE long-contested question between this country and Belgium being at last on the point of settlement, and the finances of the former becoming inadequate to the support of its large military establishment, King William has at length dissolved the army, retaining only a staff for each regiment upon half-pay.

SYRIA.

A FORMIDABLE insurrection has broken out in Syria against the government of Mehemet Ali, which is stated to have proved very tyrannical.

BELGIUM.

AT the close of July, a change took place in the Belgian ministry, Messrs Rogier, Lebeau, and Duvivier, Ministers of Justice, the Interior, and Finance, having been replaced by Messrs Ernst, de Theux, and d'Huart. While the obstinacy of the King of Holland has produced financial exhaustion in that country, the revenue of Belgium is undergoing rapid improvement. The receipts of the first half of the present year equalled eleven hundred thousand pounds, being about seventy thousand above the corresponding part of 1833. The king and queen set out, August 4, on an excursion through their dominion, and have been well received every where—even in Ghent, the almost sole-remaining stronghold of Orangeism in Belgium.

UNITED STATES.

A very violent explosion of mob feeling took place at New York on the 9th, 10th, and 11th of July. It seems that much excitement has prevailed among the least reputable of the white inhabitants, in consequence of the efforts of the Anti-Slavery Society to procure the emancipation of the negroes in the slaveholding states. A trivial circumstance irritated the people on the evening of the 9th. A number of blacks had assembled in a chapel for the celebration of the 4th of July, the anniversary of American independence; a ceremony which they had for some reason deferred for a few days. A society of singers also intended to meet at the same chapel; but they found it pre-occupied, and were much enraged at the insolence of the negroes. A crowd soon collected, and attacked the poor blacks; and thence they proceeded to break the windows of several unpopular individuals, as well as demolishing the interior of four churches and chapels where anti-slavery doctrines were preached. The police and the military at length succeeded in suppressing the riots, which, however, continued during the greater part of three days. Similar outrages took place about the same time in some places in Connecticut and New Jersey.

A vast quantity of gold has lately been shipped from Great Britain, to supply the state banks patronised by the President with the means of establishing a metallic currency.

SWEDEN.

THE King of Sweden has returned an answer to the petition of his subjects, for an extension of the representative system, so as to bring it more in unison with the relations of society in the present times. He points out that the constitution committee and the members of the diet possess the right of proposing such alterations; and that, as it lies with them to do so, he considers himself as not called on to take any step in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

IRELAND.

THE rejection by the Lords of the Irish tithe bill has had the uncommon effect of pleasing both of the parties which divide this ill-regulated and unfortunate country. The Orange party, though sensible that it endangers the immediate subsistence of the clergy, rejoice at the overthrow of a measure proceeding from their opponents, and which would, if passed, have deprived them of the pleasure of harassing the tenantry, as they have been accustomed to do for centuries. The Catholic party are equally rejoiced that their opponents have become the immediate instruments of settling the question against themselves—for, as the impossibility of levying tithe in the old way is now acknowledged on all hands, and as the only remaining plan has been repudiated by the Orangeists, the Catholics hold it clear that the former have cut off their last chance of realising this fund, or any part of it.

Attempts are still made, under the protection of large bodies of soldiery, to collect tithes, but with no success. A rector named Whitty, of the parish of Rathvilly, near Carlow, who refused the aid offered by government, and has been endeavouring to gather this unhallowed tribute, the bane rather than support of religion, is defeated in every attempt by the peasantry. The chief expedient for evasion seems to be the immuring of the cattle within doors, whenever the police or military approach. So long as the property is in lock-fast places, it cannot be touched. Formerly the people had an opportunity of knowing the movements of the troops as they approached the parish of Rathvilly, along the hills from Carlow, and persons were stationed to give a signal of their approach. The troops have since been moved to Balinglass, on the other side of the parish. Balinglass is in a low ground, and sentinels from the recusant tithe-payers are stationed on the adjoining hills. The moment the troops are drawn up in marching order, a woman comes out of a house as if to spread clothes on a hedge; the instant she spreads a white table-cloth, that moment a person on the top of the hill lights a fagot of furze, and instantly every human being in the parish is out, and every four-footed animal is removed from the parish long before the troops can reach the scene of action.

While these proceedings are going on, all the usual labours of the country are suspended; but the people seem determined to incur any loss or inconvenience rather than yield support to a religion of which their conscience disapproves, and the establishment of which has so long been the main source of the misery and dispeace of Ireland. Meanwhile, under the influence of that exasperation which an unnatural and unjust system of things has produced in this country, the most barbarous murders and other atrocious outrages are daily occurring.

On the 14th of August, the most distinguished members of the Orange party held a meeting in the Round Room of the Mansion House in Dublin; present, the Marquis of Downshire, the Earls of Roden, Mayo, Winchelsea, Longford, Rathbone, and Bandon; Viscounts Massareene, Castlemaine, and Lorton; Lords

Downes, Mandeville, Hillsborough, and Cole; Colonel Wingfield, Hon. James Hewitt, Hon. deacon Agar, Colonel Verner, M.P., Colonel M.P., Henry Maxwell, M.P., Edward J. M.P., Thomas Lefroy, M.P., Sir Edmond Bart. M.P., Sir Augustus Fitzgerald, Bart., ward Stanley, Sir Richard Baker, Alderman Lord Mayor elect, Alderman Warren, Alderman Dixon, &c. &c. The Earl of Roden was placed on the chair, and various individuals moved the resolutions, the most important of which were as follows:

"That the maintenance of the Protestant religion is the right and the privilege of all his Majesty's Protestant subjects; and that the tenure upon which the house of Brunswick is seated—the fundamental principle on which the union of the kingdoms is based, and the bond of allegiance subsisting between these realms and their King.

"That the measures already adopted by his Majesty's government with respect to the future government of the country, the political alliances they have formed, the nature of the support they seek with a view of commanding majority in the Commons' House of Parliament upon Irish questions, leads to the conclusion that the invasion of the Protestant religion, and the establishment of Popery, are not only contemplated but resolved upon.

"That any attempt to interfere with the integrity of the Protestant religion—whether by rendering her clergy dependent on the Treasury for support, or confiscating the church, and applying it to secular purposes, or separating the connexion between church and state—is a fundamental violation of the constitution and a flagrant infraction of the articles of Union, that we will rally round the throne, in resisting such attempts on our properties and our lives.

"That the line of policy adopted by the present government in reference to the Established Church of Ireland, appears to be founded on the principle that the Christian faith is to be upheld, not with respect to its truth or importance, but to the opinion of mere numerical majorities; that this principle is to the very essence of Christianity, and we consider that the Protestant clergy of all denominations are called upon to assume responsibilities of their sacred offices, to expose and denounce the greatest mischief, as widening the distinction between Protestants and Roman Catholics, and as preparatory to the expansion of the Protestant ministry in those parishes where the latter predominates, in proportions to be fixed at the dictation, and at the bitterest foes of our religious institutions."

"My Lords, we have met together on many occasions, and we have met together when the ramparts of our holy religion were attacked; we defended them, but, my lords and gentlemen, we are now defending the citadel, because our altars are devoted to destruction. (Cheers.) We have to return thanks to the Lords, who have nobly done their duty—the nation will participate in that noble conduct. The lords have done their duty; they have plucked up courage which I regret to say was manifested by them in that fall of apostacy in 1829. The bishops performed their duty—there is an indissoluble bond between the crown, the coronet, and the mitre, which should not be severed. We will hand down our institutions to those that will co-operate with us pure and unsullied. We will get rid of the bloody popery from amongst us. We will stock our lands with honest tenants. We will banish the illicit distiller from amongst us who disgraces to us. I would, and I declare it most solemnly (the Rev. speaker raised his arm and his voice)—I would rather eat a potato and salt with a good Protestant than live like a pig in the midst of Papists. (Cheers, and a cry of 'the true bill of Belford.') That God who clothes the lily of the field in beauty far surpassing the beauty or the wisdom of Solomon, who sent his raven to feed his dejected and rejected prophet in wilderness, will protect the persecuted Protestant clergyman in Ireland." (Cheers.)

When such sentiments are found to proceed from the mouths of educated men, and to be heartily approved by other men of the same kind, the sanguine philanthropist might be pardoned for despairing not only of the regeneration or redress of Ireland, but of the prospects of the race.

PARLIAMENT.

1. POOR-LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

This bill was brought forward for a second reading in the House of Lords, July 21, when the LORD CHANCELLOR, in making a motion to that effect, detailed the abuses which it was intended to correct, and defended that part of it which was intended to introduce a central board. At present, the pauper was in what appeared a better condition than the destitute man; and a bounty being thus placed on pauperism, it had increased to an alarming extent. The present bill, by putting every able-bodied pauper for relief to workhouse labour, would make that none but the really helpless were relieved, the poor law originally intended.—Lord WYOMING moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read day six months.—It was supported by the LORD WINCHELSEA, the Duke of WELLINGTON, and the conservative peers, and opposed by Lord ELDON and the Marquis of LONDONDERRY.—The second reading was carried by 76 against 13.—In the committee, the business of which occupied several days, the most remarkable debate took place, July 24, on the 67th clause, which seeks the diminution of the number of illegitimate children by throwing the support exclusively on the mother.—The Bishop of Exeter moved an amendment for rendering both father and mother liable; which was lost by 38 to 14.—The Lords afterwards agreed to expunge the 70th clause, which had been introduced in the committee of the House, on the motion of Mr Miles for rendering the putative father of a bastard liable for its support on the oath of the mother after its birth in the house.—The bill was read a third time, August 1, after some ineffectual attempts to alter the bar clauses.—August 11, the amendments of the bill were taken into consideration by the Commons, agreed to, except the erasure of the 18th clause relating to the right of dissenting clergymen to admission into the workhouses, which the Commons inserted.—On a conference respecting this clause the Lords agreed to its re-insertion; and the bill then passed.

2. IRISH COERCION BILL.

The bill was read a third time, July 26, and passed, some ineffectual attempts by Mr O'Connell to stop it. It was on the same day taken up to the House of Lords and read a first time; second time, 28, without discussion.—On the third reading moved, July 29, Lord MELBOURNE entered in statement to show the necessity of the measure, proceeded to vindicate the government for re-introducing the bill in an altered form into their lordships' house. On the latter point several lords spoke in severe terms, but the bill was read a third time without a division.—On the motion that the bill should be read a fourth time, the Duke of WELLINGTON moved the re-insertion of the omitted clauses.—A conversation ensued respecting the late alterations in the cabinet, when Lord BROUGHAM vindicated himself and Lord ALTHORP from the charge of having conspired to procure the resignation of Earl Grey, and stated that that noble lord had on five previous occasions made an effort to do so, but had always been prevented by him (Lord Brougham) and others, whose constant duty it had been to see the office as easy and agreeable for the late Premier as possible. His lordship also denied the report that Earl Grey had been offered the Privy Seal subsequently to his retirement as Premier.—The Duke of WELLINGTON ultimately withdrew his amendment, and the bill passed.

3. IRISH TITHES BILL.

On the motion (July 29) that the house should go into a committee on this bill, Mr O'CONNELL moved an amendment that it be read that day six months, on the plea that it would not quiet Ireland. He would propose, instead, that the sum of between £200,000 and £300,000 of last year's grant, which still remained undisposed of, should, with a further grant of £100,000, be applied to the relief of the clergy.—Lord WARD was favourable to the bill, as a means of relieving tithes till a proper means of disposing of them should be devised.—Dr LUSHINGTON opposed a further grant to the Irish clergy. His mind was made up that the Established Church of Ireland stood upon its own merits, which no eloquence, no ingenuity, could sustain, because it was not founded on justice. There could be no greater enemy to Ireland than he who would tie the living to the dead, and continue the system of past years, of compelling men by oppression to convert to another faith.—The house, on a division, decided to go into committee by 154 against 106.—In committee, July 30, Mr O'CONNELL proposed an amendment to the third clause, that, in lieu of the complicated and tedious process set forth in the bill [described in our last], the landlords should be once burdened with the duty of paying the tithes, to the sum of 40 per cent., which should be remitted to them in consideration of their undertaking that duty. To make up the deficiency to the point at which tithes were levied, some such sum as £120,000 would be required for the country; but this, he thought, would not be sufficient.—The Ministers presented a feeble opposition, or rather an equivocal support, to this amendment, which was carried against them by 82 to 33.—In consequence of the alteration, 106 clauses were struck out next day, and 22 new ones admitted.—The bill was passed, August 5, without a division, and introduced next day to the House of Lords, and read a first time.—The second reading was moved in the Upper House, August 11, by Lord MELBOURNE, who called on their lordships to dismiss all party feeling on the present occasion, though he allowed that it might naturally look with dislike on this bill, considering the quarter from which part of it had emanated. By the arrangement which it proposed, tithes would receive £72, 10s. for every £100 of tithes, a proportion highly advantageous to them, considering the security they would have for it. For the sake of the clergy, many of whom he had already ascertained to be highly favourable to the measure, he called on their lordships to read the bill a second time.—Lord ELLENBOROUGH said, if the Irish clergy pressed the bill to pass, their poverty and not their conscience. He approved of the former plan, which made the clergyman a land-proprietor. He said that the bill be read that day six months.—The Duke of WINCHELSEA, the Bishop of MEATH, and the Earl of MANSFIELD, opposed the bill, which they said their lordships would reject without any fear of collision with the other house.—The Lord Chancellor defended the policy of the government; and the Duke of RICHMOND and the Earl of RIFON supported the bill.—On a division, there were found—for a second reading, 122 (present 51, proxies 71); against the second reading, 189 (present 85, proxies 104); majority, 67.—The bill was accordingly thrown out.

4. THE BUDGET.

Lord ALTHORP brought forward his budget, July 26. The receipts for the year ending July 5, 1834, had been £46,914,586, exceeding the expenditure by £177,030; a surplus larger than any since he had held office, notwithstanding that £1,500,000 of the surplus had been taken off; while the expenditure had been diminished by £150,000. The charges for the year he calculated at £44,971,213, while the receipts, assuming the same grounds as in last year, would be £46,914,586. The surplus of £1,943,373, which would be diminished by £750,000, payable in August as interest of the slavery loan; and hence would only amount to £1,193,373. By various additions to the productiveness of the revenue, which his lordship specified, he calculated on increasing this once more to £1,815,000, which would allow of his making the following reductions of taxation:—House tax, £1,200,000. Various small articles of importation, including palm oil, &c., £200,000. Starch, £75,000. Stone bottles and sweets, £6,000. Assessed taxes on shepherds' dogs, horses belonging to poor clergymen, dissenting as well as of the church, windows in small farm-houses, &c., £75,000. Almanacks, £25,000. The sum total of the reductions would be £1,581,000. And he further proposed to lower the duty on spirits in Ireland from 3s. 4d. to 2s. 4d., for the purpose of more effectually checking illicit distillation. The amount of taxes reduced since 1831 was £6,300,000, but the reduction of income had only been £3,000,000. This year, after providing for the interest of the slavery grant of twenty millions, he had still been able to reduce the taxation of the country to the amount of £1,500,000. He read some tables of the official value of British exports; from which it appeared that there had been an annual increase of £9,351,000 on an average of the last three years, over the three preceding years. These were proofs that our trade and resources were in an elastic and flourishing condition.

5. ADMISSION OF DISSENTERS TO THE UNIVERSITIES.

After going through a third reading in the House of Commons, July 28, by a majority of 164 against 75, the bill for admitting dissenters to the universities was introduced to the House of Peers, where its second reading was moved, August 1, by the Earl of RADNOR.—After a long and keen debate, an amendment that it be read that day six months, which was moved by the Duke of GLOUCESTER, was carried by 187 (present 85, proxies 102) to 85 (present 38, proxies 47).—Lord BROUGHAM observed, that something more advantageous to the dissenters would soon meet the sanction of the legislature.

6. MILITARY FLOGGING.

Mr TENNYSON presented a petition, July 21, complaining of the inhumane flogging which had been lately inflicted on J. Hutchinson, private in the Scots Fusiliers, who had received three hundred lashes for drunkenness on duty, and attempting to strike a serjeant.—Mr ELLICE said he knew nothing further of the case than the sentence of the court-martial, and the bad character of Hutchinson, who had been several times punished for former offences. Cases of violent insubordination were increasing in the army, and it was necessary to exercise some strong power to maintain discipline, in times like the present, among men who had arms constantly in their hands. It was his intention to recommend his Majesty to issue a commission composed of a few persons of great experience, and well acquainted with our military laws, to inquire into the state of the present code, and also into the nature of other military codes, and to embody the whole into a system.—This debate being resumed, July 23, Sir M. W. RIDLEY defended the conduct of Colonel Bowater, Hutchinson's commanding officer, who had it not in his power to mitigate the punishment, and who was an excellent and humane officer.—Major FANCOURT gave notice for next session of a motion for the entire abolition of flogging in the army.

7. APPEALS TO THE PEERS.

August 14. The Lord Chancellor introduced a bill for improving the mode of hearing appeals in the House of Peers. The present mode of proceeding he characterised as mischievous and absurd. When the first hearing of an appeal came on, two noble lords sat and assisted at the opening; two others attended the hearing on the other side. On the third day, two noble lords, who had not been present before, came down and heard the reply. The cause was then set down for judgment; and in the fourth instance, two noble lords assisted at that judgment who had not heard the beginning, the middle, nor the end of the proceeding. Such a system was not in accordance with common decency, either to noble lords who were thus called in rotation to assist in appeal cases, to the suitors whose interests were to be considered, or to the house itself. He exposed the absurdity of appealing from the decisions of the courts to persons utterly ignorant of the law. For instance, an appeal from the decision of thirteen Scotch judges might be adjudicated by men as ignorant of the law of Scotland as of the law of Japan. It was also wrong that the same judge should have the power of reversing or confirming his own decisions. Yet at the same time, a judge who was not accustomed to the forensic streptitus would be worth nothing as a judge. There was but a middle course to take; and that was, to compose a due admixture of the various judges whose decisions were appealed against, on the principle of analogy to the common law courts. The bill would give their lordships the power of calling for the services of the judges in equity, and of directing any case in which an appeal might be resorted to, to be tried by a judicial committee to be appointed under the bill. This judicial committee would pronounce its judgment in open court, which would be reported to the house, and then the house would pronounce its judgment in open court. The rights and dignity of their lordships' house would be preserved inviolate as heretofore. He proposed that the judicial committee should always have presiding over it either the Lord Chancellor for the time being, or the Chief Justice of the King's Bench; or a new officer, a Vice-President, without salary, to be appointed by the crown, and to hold rank next to the Privy Seal, and who must previously have filled the office of Lord Chancellor or Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, or of the Common Pleas. The Vice-President, however, would only be called upon to act when the Lord Chancellor or the Chief Justice of the King's Bench might be prevented from presiding in consequence of being engaged elsewhere. Lord Brougham made several statements as to the amount of business he had got through, and the small number of cases left undecided, and then pronounced an eulogium on the House of Peers as a court of revision and appeal from the decisions of the House of Commons.

8. PROXIES OF PEERS.

The Marquis of WESTMINSTER made some observations, August 6, relative to the privilege of voting by proxy, enjoyed by the peers. He said he was so convinced that this anomalous and absurd practice tended to make their lordships unpopular in the country—not only considering what had formerly occurred, but looking to what had happened even within a few days—that he was more than ever confirmed in his opinion that this subject was not only worthy of, but demanded, their serious attention; and in truth it appeared to him that it would be decorous if their lordships would at once give up the privilege. The marquis proceeded to remind Ministers what was expected from them. He expected to see, both in the ecclesiastical and civil departments, the most piercing, the most searching reform. He looked for the repeal of that disgraceful act, the septennial act. Unless questions of that nature were brought forward by Ministers with a determined design to act in a manner the most satisfactory to the inhabitants of this country—unless the government were determined to act with vigour and sincerity, he feared that they would not long remain in those places where he was very glad to see them at present.

9. CASE OF THE BRIGHTON GUARDIAN.

In a committee of supply, August 4, on a sum being voted for prosecutions in Ireland, Mr HUME asked if the government had engaged to pay the expenses of the prosecution of the Sussex magistrates against the Brighton Guardian.—Lord ALTHORP and Mr SPRING RICE replied in the negative; but, next day, the former stated, that, on inquiry, he found that the expenses of the prosecution had been paid by the Treasury, as had frequently been the case in regard to other prosecutions since 1819.—Mr WARBURTON objected to the practice: it was one which might lead to gross injustice and oppression of individuals.—Mr SHELL and Mr O'DWYER also reprobated the practice, which Mr SPRING RICE said was not unusual; the Home Secretary applied to the Treasury to pay the expenses of such prosecutions, and the Treasury generally gave the money.

10. WARWICK DISFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

In the House of Lords, August 5, Lord BROUGHAM moved that the Warwick borough bill be read that day six months, having satisfied himself that the facts of the case did not afford a ground for proceeding with the bill. If disfranchisement, he said, were awarded in all cases of bribery, it would be easy for any candidate, however much in the minority, to cause his friends either to bribe or be bribed, and thus prevent his successful opponent from sitting.—The Earl of RADNOR concurred, and the motion was agreed to.—The House of Commons, August 7, voted, by 67 to 18, to suspend the writ for new members to this borough till a fortnight after the next meeting of Parliament [a proceeding understood to be in resentment of the throwing out of their bill of disfranchisement by the House of Lords.]

11. MISCELLANEOUS SUBJECTS.

Reference was made, July 21, by Mr O'CONNELL, to a fact which had been elicited in evidence from Lord Western, on the committee appointed to inquire into the case of Mr D. W. Harvey. This fact was, that Mr Ellice, in company with Lord Western, had exerted himself to procure £500 to be employed in behalf of the ministerial candidate for Colchester.—Mr ELLICE explained, that this sum of money had been drawn from a fund subscribed by friends of reform, and in the direction and appropriation of which he was consulted. It was given to assist both, and not one only, of the reform candidates. Not a shilling of the public money went to the purpose of supporting any candidates.—Mr O'CONNELL made an unsuccessful attempt, July 23, to have this matter referred to a committee of privileges.

In a committee of supply, July 21, on the motion of Mr LABOUCHERE, £60,000 was voted to enable his Majesty to make gratuities to the officers and men engaged in the battle of Navarino.

In a committee of the House of Commons on the excise acts, July 29, Captain GORDON moved that the reduction of one shilling a gallon on Irish whisky, as proposed by Lord Althorp, should be extended to Scotland.—Mr GILLON seconded the amendment; which was opposed by Mr J. A. MURRAY (the Lord Advocate), Lord ALTHORP, and others; and rejected by 36 to 9.

The report of the committee on drunkenness was brought up, August 5, by Mr BUCKINGHAM, who moved that it should be printed.—This was opposed by Mr HAWES, on account of the ridiculous and impracticable nature of many of the recommendations of the report.—It was finally agreed, on a division of 63 to 31, that the report should be printed.

In the House of Peers, August 6, the Earl of Gosford having presented a petition from the Chamber of Commerce at Greenock, respecting the conveyance of the mails, the Duke of Richmond said he would take that opportunity of making some remarks on the subject. The petitioners complained that letters were not transmitted by steam-packets along the Clyde, from which they averred that great inconvenience arose. Now, the fact really was, that the Post-Office took the opportunity, whenever it could be done with advantage, of transmitting letters by the steam-packets. This petition, he had every reason to believe, was got up by an individual [meaning Mr Wallace, M.P. for Greenock] who had distinguished himself elsewhere by his opposition to the Post-Office department; an opposition which the facts did not by any means warrant, for he believed that there was not a department under the government in which more zeal was displayed.

The capital punishments bill was returned to the Commons, August 7, with many alterations, with which much dissatisfaction was expressed; but as some improvements were still retained, such as the abolition of capital punishment for returning from transportation, the Commons agreed to give it their sanction.

The Australian colony bill was read a third time in the House of Lords, August 14, and passed.

The Scots burghs bill, and the royal burghs bill (relating to municipal elections), and the Scots registration of voters bill, received, August 15, the royal assent.

The county coroners' bill has been lost, in consequence of the Peers having introduced a clause to exclude the public from coroners' courts, which the Commons would not sanction, on the bill being returned to them.

The bribery bill has been withdrawn, in consequence of the amendments proposed in it by the Lords not being agreed to by the Commons.

12. PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

August 15. The King proceeded to the House of Peers, and took his seat upon the throne. The Commons were summoned; and the Speaker, attended by about eighty members, having appeared, the royal assent was given to several bills. The Speaker delivered the usual address relative to the labours of the session. His Majesty then received the speech from the Lord Chancellor, which he read as follows:—

My Lords and Gentlemen—The numerous and important questions which have in the present, as in the two preceding years, been submitted to your consideration, have imposed upon you the necessity of extraordinary exertions; and it is with a deep sense of the care and labour which you have bestowed upon the public business, that I at length close this protracted session, and release you from your attendance.

I continue to receive from all Foreign Powers assurances of their friendly disposition.

The negotiations, on account of which the Conferences in London upon the affairs of the Low Countries were suspended, have not yet been brought to a close; and I have still to lament the continued postponement of a final settlement between Holland and Belgium.

On the other hand, I have derived the most sincere and lively satisfaction from the termination of the civil war which had so long distracted the kingdom of Portugal; and I rejoice to think that the treaty which the state of affairs in Spain and Portugal induced me to conclude with the King of the French, the Queen Regent of Spain, and the Regent of Portugal, and which has already been laid before you, contributed materially to produce this happy result.

Events have since occurred in Spain to disappoint, for a time, the hopes of tranquillity in that country, which the pacification of Portugal had inspired. To these events, so important to Great Britain, I shall give my most serious attention, in concert with France and with the other Powers who are parties to the treaty of the 22d of April; and the good understanding which prevails between me and my Allies, encourages me to expect that our united endeavours will be attended with success.

The peace of Turkey remains undisturbed, and I trust that no event will happen in that quarter to interrupt the tranquillity of Europe.

I have not failed to observe with approbation that you have directed your attention to those domestic questions which more immediately affect the general welfare of the community, and I have had much satisfaction in sanctioning your wise and benevolent intentions by giving my assent to the Act for the amendment and better administration of the laws relating to the poor in England and Wales. It will be my duty to provide that the authority necessarily vested in Commissioners nominated by the Crown, be exercised with temperance and caution; and I entertain a confident expectation, that its prudent and judicious application, as well as the discreet enforcement of the other provisions of the Act, will by degrees remedy the evils which at present prevail; and whilst they elevate the character, will increase the comforts and improve the condition of my people.

The amendment of the Law is one of your first and most important duties, and I rejoice to perceive that it has occupied so much of your attention. The establishment of a Central Court for the trial of offences in the metropolis and its neighbourhood, will, I trust, improve the administration of justice within the populous sphere of its jurisdiction, and afford a useful example to every other part of the kingdom.

To the important subjects of our Jurisprudence and of our Municipal Corporations, your attention will naturally be directed early in the next session. You may always rest assured of my disposition to co-operate with you in such useful reformations.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons—I thank you for the readiness with which you have granted the supplies. The Estimates laid before you were somewhat lower than those of former years, although they included several extraordinary charges, which will not again occur. The same course of economy will still be steadily pursued. The continued increase of the revenue, notwithstanding the repeal of so many taxes, affords the surest proof that the resources of the country are unimpaired, and justifies the expectation that a perseverance in judicious and well-considered measures will still further promote the industry and augment the wealth of my people.

My Lords and Gentlemen—It gives me great gratification to believe, that in returning to your several counties, you will find a prevalence of general tranquillity and of active industry amongst all classes of society. I humbly hope that Divine Providence will vouchsafe a continuance and increase of these blessings; and in any circumstances which may arise, I shall rely with confidence upon your zeal and fidelity. And I rest satisfied that you will inculcate and encourage that obedience to the laws, and that observance of the duties of religion and morality, which are the only secure foundations of the power and happiness of empires.

After the speech was finished, the King took his departure, attended by several of the Peers. The Commons then retired to their own house, where the Speaker read a copy of the speech; and the whole then separated.

ENGLAND.

AMENDMENT OF THE POOR-LAWS.

ONE strikingly redeeming feature of a session remarkable for the small amount of useful business which it has performed, is the completion of the great measure of poor-law reform. The material improvements introduced by this measure are these:—1st, It abolishes the allowances made to able-bodied labourers at their own houses, when out of work, or when their wages are supposed to be inadequate to the support of their families, and (with trifling exceptions) restricts the relief granted to those who go into the parish workhouse. 2d, It deprives magistrates of the power of ordering relief to able-bodied paupers under any circumstances—a power which has been one great source of profuse expenditure—and thus more directly confines the disposal of the parochial funds to the vestry or guardians chosen from the ratepayers, who have an interest in the economical management of the money. 3d, It establishes a central board of three commissioners, with very extensive powers of superintendence and control. Their duties are to restrain the laxity of the parochial managers, to enforce the provisions of the act, to make new rules where necessary, to promote unions of two, three, or more parishes for the erection or support of workhouses, and generally to introduce, what is greatly wanted at present, uniformity of system. The act is grounded upon the experience of the best managed parishes; and one object in appointing the commission was, to supply the means of introducing the great changes desired in a cautious and gradual manner, by leaving the choice of time and mode to the discretion of a board, instead of forcing on the change at a specified day, by the letter of an act of Parliament, upon parties whose circumstances were infinitely varied. The central board is now fully formed. Mr Frankland Lewis is the chairman or chief commissioner; Mr John Lefevre, Under-Secretary of the Colonies, and Mr Nichols, the manager of the Birmingham branch of the Bank of England, are the two other commissioners. The selection of these gentlemen, without reference to political opinions, but simply for their personal merits, is creditable to the government.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON DRUNKENNESS.

THE report of this committee has unfortunately excited a good deal of ridicule, by the exaggerated view which it gives of the causes, extent, and effects of drunkenness. If we overlook these, however, some of its suggestions for the remedy of the evil, such as it is, are worthy of the best attention of the legislature. For instance—"34. The prohibition of the practice of paying the wages of workmen at public-houses, or any other place where intoxicating drinks are sold. 36. The payment of wages at or before the breakfast hour in the mornings of the accustomed market-day in each week, to enable the wives or other providers of workmen to lay out their earnings in necessary provisions at an early period of the market, instead of risking its dissipation at night in the public-house. 38. The establishment, by the joint aid of the government and the local authorities and residents on the spot, of public walks and gardens, or open spaces for athletic and healthy exercises in the open air, in the immediate vicinity of every town, of an extent and character adapted to its population, and of district and parish libraries, museums, and reading-rooms, accessible at the lowest rate of charge, so as to admit of one or the other being visited in any weather and at any time, with the rigid exclusion of all intoxicating drinks of every kind from all such places, whether in the open air or closed. 39. The reduction of the duty on tea, coffee, and sugar, and all the healthy and un-intoxicating articles of drink in ordinary use, so as to place within the reach of all classes the least injurious beverage on much cheaper terms than the most destructive. 40. The establishment of temperance societies in every town and village of the kingdom; the only bond of association being voluntary engagement to abstain from the use of any spirits as a customary beverage, and to discourage by precept and example, all habits of intemperance in themselves and others. 43. The removal of all taxes on knowledge, and the extending every facility for the widest spread of useful information to the humblest classes of the community. A national system of education, which should embrace as an essential part the instructions given by it to every child in the kingdom, accurate information as to the poisonous and invariably deleterious nature of ardent spirits in article of diet in any shape, and the inculcation of a sense of shame at the crime of voluntarily destroying or thoughtlessly obscuring that faculty of reasoning and that consciousness of responsibility which distinguish man from the brute, and which his Almighty Maker, when he created him in his own image, implanted in the human race to cultivate, to improve, and to refine, and not to corrupt, to brutalise, and to destroy." All of these remedies except the last are only calculated to be of local, occasional, and superficial utility. Nothing will ever effectually banish or reduce the evil but an elevation of the moral and intellectual status of the people, by means of a system of education, suitable to the capacities, and passions of human nature.

QUACK MEDICINES AND CONJURING.

NOTHING is calculated in so great a degree to damp the hopes of reflecting persons respecting the progress of the national mind, as the extensive encouragement which is still given to quack medicine. It might be supposed that the total want of authority for the value or appropriateness of such medicine, the risk consequently attending their use, nay, the artful puffery which is employed to bring them into notice, might put the people of this comparatively enlightened country on their guard against such senseless, such dangerous trash. On the contrary the quack system flourishes as extensively as ever, and is perpetually appearing in new forms, each apparently surpassing the preceding in brazen-faced impudence and profligacy.

At the York assizes, July 19, Joseph Wells, agent for "Morison's pills," was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment, for administering that medicine to a young man named Robinson, who was ill with the small-pox, and who died through the effects of Webb's prescriptions. A medical evidence on the trial described the stomach of the deceased as greatly inflamed, apparently in consequence of poison, and stated that one ingredient in the pills was of that character.

A coroner's inquest was held, August 8, on the body of Rebecca Cross, aged 15, at Pershore, near Worcester. The verdict returned was, that she deceased "had died from mortification of the bowels, occasioned by taking two pills called Morison's pills."

Death of the Western Conjuror.—A few days ago, there died at Westleigh, in the parish of Burlescombe, Devon, Benjamin Baker, the far-famed conjuror. This man was by trade a carpenter, but contrived to extract from the pockets of the most long-eared public an income of more than £200 a-year, by pretending to a knowledge of the stars. At his door were frequently to be seen the carriages of the wealthy seduced thither by the fame of some sovereignlixir, or by the "wise man's" skill in horoscopes, &c. indeed, so high was the repute of this prince of conjurors, that individuals from Dorsetshire, Wiltshire, and counties afar off, have travelled many a weary mile to exchange cash for counsel at Westleigh. As was of course held in high repute by the poor who preferred the "wondrous doctor" to any member of the Apothecaries' Hall. His coffin and tombstone were prepared in his lifetime, and he willed that his body should be deposited in a spot near his own dwelling, professedly through fear that the young scoundrel would have him out of the churchyard, but more probably under the hope that devotees may flock to his shrine, to enrich it too.—[A belief in the power of such wretched impostors as we here mention is fully more scandalous than the faith put in quack medicines and should, if possible, be held in greater contempt.]

A NEW ENGINE OF WAR.

A NEW instrument or machine has been invented by Mr Toplis, of the Museum of National Manufactures in Leicester Square, which he considers calculated to put an end to wars, and to prevent civilised nations from engaging hereafter in the work of mutual destruction. Mr Toplis has constructed an engine, which, according to his views, will render armaments powerless against any people disposed to defend themselves; a score of men with this auxiliary power being competent to annihilate the largest army which could be collected. The engine is portable and without its casing, might be carried by two men; mounted on its proper carriage, it can be moved with celerity into any situation where horses or men cannot go; it is ready for action in a moment, and can be made at will to pour out, for any desired time, continuous stream of bullets, which can be directed towards any point or object, with the same facility as the stream of water from a fire-engine; and with perfect precision! whilst the men who direct it are sheltered in entire security. Mr Toplis looks forward so much confidence to the moral influence of this new and mighty power must exercise upon the world, that he denominates his engine the Pacifier.

It is Mr Toplis's own account of his invention. He had an opportunity of inspecting the machine, and of having its construction and mode of operation explained by the inventor; and, notwithstanding the scepticism naturally excited by the multitude of contrivances which daily form subjects of a "nine wonder" to the public, and then are no more of, we certainly think this machine calculated to accomplish its objects. Its construction is exceedingly simple: A long tube, like the barrel of a rifle, mounted on a swivel. The breech of this barrel communicates with a chamber, in which gas is rapidly produced by the combustion of gunpowder, so prepared that it burns without exploding. This gas rushes through the barrel, and propels the bullets, which enter the barrel through a funnel, from a reservoir placed above it. The barrel can be elevated or depressed, or turned in any direction with the utmost ease, so that the men who work it can discharge, with perfect aim, a stream of bullets that must destroy anything that is exposed to it. An obvious remark is on looking at the smallness and lightness of the machine—that it, and the men who work it, might be blown away by a cannon shot or two; but the inventor answers this objection by saying, that the most important use of the engine would be to be used defensively against invading troops, it might be placed in situations (such as the brow of a hill) where it could pour destruction upon the enemy without being exposed to their shot.—Morning Chronicle. [We shall be exceedingly glad to hear that the mentioned instrument is able to perform all that it pretended it can; but we have heard so many reports of inventions of this nature, which in the end come to nothing, that we are by no means sanguine in our anticipations of its capability. It has appeared to us that nothing would so effectually put an end to war—which is confessedly the worst of moral evils—as the introduction into use of an engine which would sweep whole armies to destruction in an instant. We anxiously wait to hear of this interesting invention of Mr Toplis, who expresses the best wishes of every philanthropist.]

18. Major Pitman, a magistrate in the county of Somerset, was fined £5 by the justices at Exeter, for using, beating, and using gross and abusive language to Mary Stamp, a female servant in his house. The 1 Chancellor subsequently found it to be his painful duty to remove this individual from the roll of justices.

22. The Sarah, with a cargo estimated to be worth £4,000,000, entered the St Katherine Docks, being the first private trader from China.

24. A farewell dinner was given to General Mina at the Albion Hotel, London, and attended by all the principal Spaniards in town. Don Augustin Arguelles was in the chair. None of the toasts excited greater enthusiasm than "a close and an eternal alliance between England, Spain, and Portugal." Señor Arguelles induced the toast in an eloquent speech, calling on heaven to bless the union, and make it subservient to the motion and preservation of constitutional liberty in three countries.

25. The poll for the Sudbury election closed with 21 numbers—namely, for Mr Bagshaw 263, for Sir E. Parnes 263. The mayor, who had voted the first day as an ordinary elector, gave what he claimed to be considered as a casting vote in favour of Sir E. Parnes, the Tory candidate, who was accordingly declared to be re-elected. This procedure occasioned much violent rioting in the town, and has been petitioned against in Parliament.—Mr S. T. Coleridge, the poet, died at 74 years of age. He was interred, August 2, in the vaults of St George's Church.—The Nottingham election closed with the return of Sir J. C. Hobhouse, who had 1591 votes against the 566 of his Radical opponent, Mr Eagle. At a nomination and other occasions during this election, Mr John was treated by the populace with many marks of disapprobation, particularly in reference to his support of flogging in the army.

Aug. 1. Festive meetings were held almost all over the country on this day, to celebrate the termination of colonial slavery, which took place on that day.—The trial of Edwards, Lacasseagne, Weedon, and Mrs Canning, accused of conspiracy and assault on the person of Mr W. E. of which case the general particulars have already been communicated—came on at the Middlesex sessions. They all pleaded not guilty. The jury pronounced the following verdicts:—John Edwards—guilty of conspiring to imprison Mr Gee; Peter Lacasseagne—guilty of a common assault; Jeremiah Weedon—guilty of conspiring to imprison Mr Gee; and Maria Canning, alias Edwards—not guilty. The chairman and magistrates retired an hour to consider of their sentence. On their return, Mr Rotch, having addressed Edwards in an impressive speech, sentenced him to be imprisoned two years at Newgate; Weedon to imprisonment for twelve months at the House of Correction; and Lacasseagne to six months' imprisonment. The chairman admonished Mrs Canning as to her future conduct.

6. James Garside and Joseph Mosley were convicted at the Chester assizes for the wilful murder of Thomas Ashton, Esq., of Pole Bank, near Hyde. The owing is the substance of a confession made by the prisoner Garside to Mr Lockett, the magistrate, in Derby, where he was imprisoned for stealing tools, which led to his own conviction and the apprehension of accomplices:—James Garside stated that he was about 25 years old. On the 3d of January 1831, he lived with his father at Barnsford, in Marple. On the afternoon of that day he met Joseph Mosley, on the top of a hill called

Werneth Lowe, who told him that he was going to do a bit of a job that night. They were afterwards joined by William Mosley (a brother of the convict). Garside admitted that he had known both James and William Mosley for six months before this time, and that they had been engaged together in various robberies. They all three sat down in a plantation at the top of Werneth Lane, when the two Mosleys told Garside that they were going to shoot Mr Ashton. Garside said he would have nothing to do with it. Joseph replied, "Oh, ay, thou mun come and go with us; thou need'st do nothing but watch—I shall do the job." He then pulled out of his pocket a horse pistol, which he said was loaded. Garside added: "As we went down the footpath from the plantation, I asked what money it was the job was to be done for, and whether Mr Ashton was to be robbed for it; and Joseph told me he was employed by the Spinners' Union at Ashton, and was to have £10; and as he went along, he said that he and an union man had been over the ground the day before, and settled how we were to proceed, as he had explained to us in the plantation." They then proceeded together towards Aphorn, and lurked under a hedge till Mr Ashton came by, when Joseph Mosley got between him and the hedge, and discharged the pistol into his body. He fell on his back across the road, and the murderers ran off. They afterwards met, according to previous agreement, at the Canal Bridge, where all three took an oath of secrecy, on their knees, and prayed God to strike them dead if they told of what had been done. "When we left the bridge, and were on the towing-path," added the prisoner, "we considered whether Joseph or William Mosley should go to Ashton to inform the union that the job was done, and to draw the money. It was determined that William should go. Joseph wanted to get home, having a wife and family, and one of his children very ill. William went directly from the bridge to Ashton. Joseph and I went on the towing-path till we came to Hyde Bank Tunnel." They met on the next morning, when Joseph said that William had brought him the money from the Spinners' Union; and they appointed to meet on the next Monday night at Dan Bank, to divide it. Joseph said, on that occasion, that he did not regret what he had done, that he would shoot all the Ashtons if the unions would give him £10 a-piece. "On the Monday following, Joseph and William Mosley, an union man, and I (Garside), met at Dan Bank-Wood to divide the money. Joseph said I need not be afraid, that he was one of the union men. He offered me £3, but I would not take it. He said he believed we had shot the wrong man, and offered it me several times, but I refused it, and would not take it. I thought our folk would know that I had got money, and that it might betray me. I have had no peace of mind since the job. I have been cast down, and wished to have told, but durst not speak for fear of getting into trouble." The truth of the confession is doubted in many of the particulars; and it is believed that Garside substitutes the convict Mosley for himself as the man who actually fired the pistol. The reason for this substitution is of course obvious, as Garside must have known, by the proclamation in the Gazette, that the man who actually caused the death would not be pardoned. Great exertions are being made to discover the confederates of the assassins, and a person named Schofield, an active agitator among the unions, has been apprehended on the charge of having paid the murderers their blood wages of £3, 6s. 8d. each. Both the malefactors, however, deny that Schofield is guilty.

13. The King held a chapter of the most noble Order of the Garter, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Earl Bathurst. The Duke of Norfolk was unanimously elected, and afterwards invested with the riband and order, with the customary ceremonies.

Her Majesty the Queen, after her short visit to the Continent, landed at Woolwich on Wednesday the 20th August, at four p.m. and proceeded immediately to St James's Palace.

The equestrian bronze statue of his late Majesty George the Fourth, admirably executed by Chantrey, at the price of nine thousand guineas, is just completed, and will shortly be placed over the grand marble entrance to the new palace in St James's Park. The magnificent gates, enriched with mosaic gold, designed and manufactured by Parker, are also in readiness to be fixed on the archway; they are considered to be the largest and most splendid in Europe, not excepting even the great gates of the ducal palace at Venice, hitherto esteemed the most remarkable for their size. The cost, per contract, of the new gate, including the circular railings already fixed on each side of the marble arch, has been £10,200; so that the whole expense of this entrance alone (archway, statue, and railing) will have amounted to considerably more than £70,000, judging from the printed estimates.

The Earl of Carlisle having resigned the office of Lord Privy Seal, it was accepted, July 29, by the Earl of Mulgrave, lately governor of the West Indies. Lord Mulgrave is distinguished by high literary and political talent, and is a decided reformer.

Cholera prevails at present in Spain, at Gottenburg, at Glasgow, in London, and in Essex. The mortality in Spain is very severe, no fewer than 1100 having been swept off in one day, the 29th of July.

The Lords of the Treasury have approved of the under-mentioned ports for the importation and warehousing of tea, viz. London, Liverpool, Bristol, Hull, Leith, Glasgow, Greenock, Port-Glasgow, Dublin, Belfast, and Cork. Leave is also given for tea and other Eastern produce for the Glasgow market being transhipped into lighters at Greenock or Port-Glasgow, in charge of revenue officers. Tea, as well as articles the produce of the East Indies, may be removed, under bond, from the original port of importation, to any warehousing port in the United Kingdom, for the purpose of being re-warehoused for home consumption, with liberty to pay the duty any time within two years; and while, at the port of importation, tea can only be deposited in a warehouse exclusively appropriated for that purpose, it may, on such re-warehousing, be placed in any warehouse legalised for other goods.

A small balloon was found by a shepherd boy on the manor of Priorsdale, near Alston in Cumberland, a short time since, with a label attached to it, stating that it had been sent off on the 2d of June, at Rotterdam, by Mr Green, the celebrated aeronaut.—Newcastle Journal.

Between 200 and 300 tons of the bones of the horses, and amongst them some of those of the men, which were lost in Napoleon's retreat from Moscow, have arrived and are arriving at Grimsby. Few subjects have excited of late more public attention than the present deteriorated condition of the mercantile marine. The calamitous loss of human life and devastation of property which the public journals almost daily exhibit, are at length raising the commercial classes into activity. A petition on this subject from Edinburgh and the vicinity was presented to the House of Commons, August 1, by Mr Abercromby, comprising the signatures of the magistrates and many of the most influential merchants of Edinburgh and Leith. The petition, after adverting to the fact that Lloyd's Lists represent the destruction of commercial vessels during the year 1833 at not less than 800, while not one ship of the royal navy has met with a similar fate, alleges as the proximate cause of so many wrecks, the imperfect system of ship-building which prevails in the mercantile shipyards, but considers the real and influential cause to be the pernicious control exercised over the commercial interests by the Sea Insurance Companies. After alluding to the mode of classification adopted by these bodies, and pointing out the flagrant injury inflicted on the nation by the superficial method of ship-building it occasions, the petition concludes by soliciting the house to take the subject into serious consideration, with a view to remedial measures—perhaps by appointing surveyors, under the control of the Board of Trade or other public board, to superintend and report on merchant ships while building and before proceeding to sea. Mr Buckingham, in seconding the petition, remarked that he had perused it with care; that it was clearly and ably stated; that he concurred in every word expressed in it; and trusted that it would meet with the best consideration of the house and of a select committee.

Mr Poulett Thompson has given a conditional promise to repeal the duty on cotton wool.

A select committee of the House of Commons, ordered to take into consideration the circumstances connected with the suppression of the Calcutta Journal in the year 1823, and the loss of property entailed on Mr Buckingham in consequence of that measure, have reported their opinion that the suppression of the Journal and the deportation of Mr Buckingham from India have been disastrous to him and his family to a degree which could not have been contemplated at the time of the adoption of this measure, and declare that compensation ought to be made to Mr Buckingham, but abstaining from expressing any opinion as to the amount of compensation.

The clause in the Bank charter which provides that after the 1st of August Bank of England notes shall be a legal tender, is beginning to produce the effect which was anticipated by men who had considered the subject. The country bankers being no longer obliged to pay in gold, have in many instances allowed the branches of the Bank of England to get possession of the whole, or nearly the whole, of their stock; and this gold the branch banks send up to the parent bank, in order that the latter may be enabled to make a grand display of bullion in its official returns. But while all this is going on, and the country is gradually robbed of its gold for the purpose of sending it up to London, if any one tenders a £50 Bank of England note to a branch bank and asks for gold, he cannot get it, and is told that if he will bring one of their own branch notes, they will give him gold, but that they cannot give gold for a Bank of England note but on payment of a premium of one-eighth per cent.—Times.

Several large seizures of machinery, about to be illegally exported to France and Holland, have been recently made by the revenue officers; and it is believed that the practice has been carried on to a very large extent. On the 1st August, Mr George Swainson, a tide surveyor of customs, on going on board the Columbine steamer, Captain Corbin master, bound to Hamburg, had his suspicions excited by a package which had been shipped as a mill-shaft, and the external appearance of which bore that description. Upon a very minute examination, it sounded hollow; when Swainson ordered a hole to be cut in the middle, by which he found that the external part was an entire deception, and made into the form of a mill-shaft. It proved to be a case fifteen feet long, containing 2840 spindles for bobbin-net machinery, which he seized and delivered at the King's warehouse, where it was valued at L.140. The officers have declared it to be one of the neatest deceptions they ever witnessed. A similar seizure of bobbin-net machinery was made on a steamer bound to France a few weeks ago. Of course no owner has appeared to claim the contraband property.

Mr D. W. Harvey, M.P. for Colchester has been excluded from the bar for some years, in consequence of some charges against his professional character, or at least under the pretext of these charges, of which a party of his political and other opponents appear to have been but too glad to take advantage. A committee of the House of Commons has now reported in favour of Mr Harvey, attributing the decision of the excluding benchers to imperfect reports of certain trials founded upon, and still more to the absence of all authority to compel the attendance of necessary witnesses, or to enforce the production of essentially important documents, which defects have in this inquiry been remedied by the power of the committee. Mr Harvey is thus at length righted, but not till after the loss of many precious years, and much undeserved suffering. In an address to his Parliamentary constituents, he thus alludes to the case:—"Many persons have expressed their surprise that I should have harassed myself to reverse a judgment so glaringly unjust. My reply has ever been, that its glaring injustice was the very cause of my resistance; that it was one of those iniquitous attacks to which I never could, nor ever would, yield. A public man does not suffer alone by the attacks that are thus made upon him. He encourages oppression when he gives, in his own person, an example of submission to it. He ought not to look to what, individually, he may gain or lose by a conflict with power. He should consider himself as a shield to ward off the strokes of persecution from the feeble and the friendless. The spirit of tyranny, be it lodged where it may, can only be kept down by making head against it. It is only by an unshrinking opposition that its malignity can be kept in check. Submission in such cases is treachery to the common cause; and in my own case few opportunities can occur to me of more effectually serving the public than the having resisted it with success."

The accounts from New York fully bear out the anticipation of the great demand for gold which is likely to follow the change in the relative value of the gold and silver coinage of the Union. It is plain that General Jackson's government is achieving, and with a very rapid progress too, one of the greatest reforms in the currency ever attempted by any country. It is admitted that a supply of specie and bullion has been already obtained from Europe of 20,000,000 dollars, or L.4,000,000 sterling in value, and that a further very considerable supply will be wanted and will be obtained. The predilection here and in other parts of Europe is so great for investments in the local stock of the several states of the American Union, that it finds purchasers to almost any extent that may be required: by the proper application of this power, bullion may in like manner be obtained, and the proper balance between bank-notes and specie—the great object of the president's policy—established throughout the United States. By our great monetary interests here, the progress of the operation cannot be watched with too much solicitude. —Times.

We have just seen a letter, dated March 1834, containing some of the latest particulars relative to the black colony at Liberia. It appears that the settlers amount to about four thousand, and possess by treaty, from their neighbour natives, a territory stretching two hundred miles along the coast, and thirty inward. So great is the fame of the new settlement among the Africans, that two tribes have placed themselves under the protection of its government, and sent their children to be educated and civilised at the schools of the new colonists. The two allied tribes amount in number to about twenty thousand; so that it may be said, without the smallest exaggeration, that the colony is advancing with unparalleled success, and has already made its way felt, by spreading the arts of life into the interior of the continent. —Calcedonian Mercury.

Charles X. has bought the domain of Nachod, in Bohemia, for 2,500,000 florins. This estate was said to comprise more than 40,000 inhabitants, and to confer almost absolute sovereignty on its proprietor.

The settlement in Paris, for the month of July, was attended with the following fatal consequences:—viz. four suicides, six cases of insanity, a loss of 11 millions of francs to the Parquet, another of 25 millions to M. Rothschild, and considerable embarrassment to many of the change agents, who have called for time to meet their engagements.

Letters from Naples mention that the eruptions of Vesuvius had become very menacing. Five large torrents of lava had descended the mountain, and enormous stones had been vomited by the volcano. The celebrated guide Salvatore had predicted that a tremendous eruption was about to take place. The torrent of lava on the 19th July, in the direction of Torre del Greco, had already burnt up several of the vineyards, and was not more than one quarter of a league from the first houses of that little town.

The fields of Baden have been so overrun by mice, that in one commune containing nearly 20,000 inhabitants, no fewer than 20,000 of these mischievous little animals have been killed. It is impossible to form an idea of the destruction they commit. No sooner is the harvest over than they betake themselves to the vineyards, where they make a greater devastation than amongst the corn. In an adjoining country, there is a race of small black rats, which appear to be multiplying to an equal extent with the mice.

The legislative palaces of the Spanish Cortes are thus described by a correspondent of the Times:—"That of the Proceres is magnificent, and indeed the most splendid and elegant in Europe. M. Marintegui has in sixty days transformed into a palace an old saloon for the reception of ambassadors, in the dilapidated palace of the Retiro, which, since the days of Philip the First, had become a mere receptacle for filth and dirt. All the seats are of fine mahogany, richly carved and gilt, and covered with velvet cushions. There are benches for the public, so placed that every one, even the most elevated, can see and hear all that passes. The internal and external galleries, the meeting-rooms for the officers and committees, the library, the room for the archives, the secretary's offices, the throne, the vestibules, the statues, and in fact every accessory, are magnificent. The frontispieces, as well towards the Prado, where the principal entrance is, as towards the Retiro, are sculptured in the finest style, most appropriate to the edifice which they adorn. The first represents the Queen Regent presenting to the representatives of the nation her daughter Isabella the Second, with the fundamental laws, while Despotism is sinking in convulsions into the arms of Death. In the palace of the Procuradores, however, the architect appears to have failed. Of a magnificent church, which at once afforded him a Chamber of Deputies that might have been one of the most grand and superb in Europe, he has formed only a very small, obscure, and paltry room. He might have found seats for half the population of Madrid, and yet not more than two hundred persons can find accommodation."

According to the last census, the entire population of Greece amounts to only 811,185 souls. There are 116 towns, and 2146 villages, exclusive of those of the isles of the Archipelago, of which 33 only are inhabited. There were in Greece 518 convents, which contained only 4111 monks and 287 nuns. Only 83 had six or more monks; many had only two, or one, or none at all. Reckoning the income of each convent at only 1000 drachms, 518,000 drachms were annually thrown away, and this revenue might easily be doubled. Now, however, the remaining monks and nuns have been collected in a small number of convents, there to devote themselves to their original destination, prayers, and agriculture, and to pay the tithes to the ecclesiastical treasury. The remaining convents are suppressed, and their revenues added to the church funds.

News has been received from Russia that the town of Tula, capital of the government of that name, one of the most flourishing towns in the empire, with a population of between 20,000 and 30,000 inhabitants, has been destroyed by fire, excepting the imperial manufactory of arms.

A letter of the 17th May, from Syria, inserted in the Garde Nationale of Marseilles, mentions that the crowd of pilgrims in the temple of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem was so considerable on Holy Saturday, that several persons were stifled by the pressure, and the heat arising from the immense number of lighted tapers, one of which each pilgrim held in his hand. These accidents having spread alarm through the multitude, a general rush towards the doors took place, in which several persons were crushed to death. Ibrahim Pacha, who was present, had very nearly been trampled under foot, in endeavouring to restore order, and was only saved by a man who recognised him in the crowd taking him on his shoulders, and forcing his way with him to the entrance. In the confusion, it is said, he lost his sabre and his diamonds.

A company has been formed at Amsterdam to construct a railroad from that town to Cologne, with a subscribed capital of twelve millions of florins. The distance is one hundred and eighty miles.

Dr Bowring has returned to Paris to resume his official duties.

The responsible editor of the National has been found guilty of a libel against Louis Philippe, and condemned to the minimum penalty of 500 francs fine, and six months' imprisonment. The article incriminated professed to attach individual responsibility to the king on account of his participation in the deliberations of the cabinet councils, and therefore in the measures of the government. —French paper.

In the course of its career, the Tribune Paris paper has sustained ninety-five prosecutions, involving damages to the amount of 125,800 francs, and twenty-seven years' imprisonment, apportioned between six editors.

Undeserved Friendship.—Some time since, several persons saw a young man approach the river that runs through a city in France, for the purpose of drowning a dog which he had along with him. Having procured a boat, he rowed to the middle of the stream, and threw the poor animal in; but in the exertion fell into the water also, and being unable to swim, could not support himself longer, when the noble animal immediately swam to his assistance, and kept him up until a boat from the shore relieved both of them from the perils of the water.

The Alphabet.—The 24 letters of the alphabet may be transposed 620,448,401,733,239,439,360,000 times. All the inhabitants of the globe, on a rough calculation, could not, in a thousand millions of years, write out all the transpositions of the twenty-four letters, even supposing that each wrote forty pages daily, each of which pages contained forty different transpositions of the letters.

According to Dr Roget in his Bridgewater Treatise, man is in one respect a mere furnace or stove for the burning of charcoal. Certainly it has long been a prevalent opinion with mankind, that the main business of life was to "make the pot boil," but few are perhaps aware what mere kettles they are themselves. Dr Doctory says:—"According to these views of the chemical objects of respiration, the process itself is analogous to those artificial operations which effect the combustion of charcoal. The food supplies the fuel, which is prepared for use by the digestive organs, and conveyed by the pulmonary arteries to the place where it is to undergo combustion; the diaphragm the bellows which feeds the furnace with air; and the trachea is the chimney through which the carbonic acid, which is the product of the combustion, escapes."

Hint to Teachers.—One practice, however, can be reformed, that of giving prizes and commendations only to those who get on the fastest. 'Tis the end, the struggle, the obedience, that should be praised and rewarded. Then a child will not be daunted by difficulties, nor humiliated by failure, because, when he does his best, he will be sure of approbation. Otherwise, as soon as he is passed in the race by his competitors, he will be inclined to lie down in the dust, with his little heart full of despair, and perhaps full of envy too. —Sharp's Letters and Essays.

Curious Custom.—I witnessed a peculiar trait in the customs of the Himalayan peasants, the putting an infant to sleep by the action of water. The successful issue of the experiment I had quietly made in my mind not to believe in, until convinced by actual proof. The method was as follows:—The child, whose age might be a year or two, was laid by its mother, who was employed in bruising grain, on a chiepo (low bed or stretcher), placed on a sloping green bank, along the top of which ran a small stream. A piece of bark introduced through the embankment conducted a slender spout of water, which fell, at a height of about half a foot, on the crown of the infant's head. It was fast asleep when I witnessed the process. —Mundy's Sketches of India.

Hospitality is one of the virtues which civilisation banishes; and lamentations on its decline are common—but are they well founded? Are the savage nations, with whom hospitality is a privilege and frequently a public duty, so much better than cold-hearted Sybarites, who let strangers put up at inns? These questions, we think, may safely be answered in the negative. Charity is recommended in the Testament as well as the Koran; but the fur which in Asia are directed to one object, and that obedience perhaps to public opinion, and certainly public wants, are in Europe diverted to many objects, but still obeying these two principles. In the East, men bequeath their superfluous wealth, or what they choose to think so, to build a public-house. In the West, they endow colleges, hospitals, schools, churches, the endowments varying with the spirit of the age. First, masses and monasteries were to fashion; then churches, which benefited the people with more certainty than the two first; next colleges, another step in advance; lastly, schools, hospitals, almshouses, and other objects of intended public advantage. In the amount of charitable benefactions Europe would doubtless equal Asia; but in broad and all-embracing charity, the fanatic Mussulman would conquer the humble Christian, upon whose works of love are expressly enjoined without regal creeds. —Spectator.

The following are the sentiments of Mr O'Connell respecting hereditary legislatures and church establishments, which were lately alluded to in the House of Peers. He uttered them at a meeting of the electors of Finsbury, July 31:—"In feudal times, they had often heard of hereditary lawgivers and hereditary judges; but did they ever hear of hereditary tailors or hereditary lawyers. What would you think of a man who would come and ask leave to mend your pantaloons, and who, when asked how he could mend them, would answer, 'My father was a tailor?' And how would you like a man to plead your cause, whose only claim on your confidence was, that his grandfather was a lawyer? There was neither reason nor common sense in it; neither was there reason or common sense in having hereditary lawgivers. It might be true that there were many worthy men in the House of Lords; and there were also many drivellers, but they were lords—there were idiots, but they were peers. The great evil was, that these lords stood between the people and their liberties. They put their long spoons into the people's plates, and take away with them the benefits of the people's industry. Let the people be up and stirring. What did the people care whether a man was a duke or a duck?—they were not good enough to care for them. What would they think a doctor in Finsbury were to come to an elector, and say, 'I will give you medicine, and you must pay me.' The elector's answer would naturally be, 'I am not a doctor.'"

I do not want your medicine, and so won't pay 'But,' says the doctor, 'I gave medicine to your hour, and cured him; so you must pay me, whether you require it or not.' Thus it was with the par- They said to the dissenters, 'I prayed with your neighbour, so you must pay me.' He was a lawyer, but he did not expect to be paid by one man for curing the cause of another. The hereditary legislature ought to be done away with. Both houses are to be representatives of the people. Two houses of members, elected by the people, were necessary to fixity to the liberties of the people. The time now come when this might be said; and the time fast approaching when the plundering of our hour in the name of God would be considered a most kind of sacrilege. The period was coming, when Christianity would vindicate itself from those who had defaced it."

throughout the whole of the Mongolian nations, from Japan to Bengal, including about 500,000,000 of people, or more than half the human race, the rod is the standard of rule and punishment. This instrument of rule and punishment, under its various appellations of bamboo, cudgel, or birch, is in these countries at work morning till night, and from night till morning. The grand patriarch canes his first minister; the minister canes the secretary of state; the secretary of state admonishes lords of the treasury, by belabouring their backs; these enforce their orders to the lords of the admiralty, by applying what is equal to a cat-o'-nine tails. Generals cane field-officers, and officers the captains and subalterns. Of course common soldiers of the celestial army are caned ad mortem by every body. Then husbands cane their wives, and wives cane their children. In short, the Mongolians may be truly described as a well-flogged has been computed that in England a twelfth of the population are paupers: their support cost last year L.6,790,799. In Scotland, the proportion is one-fortieth, and the sum raised for their support by assessment, voluntary contributions, and collections at church-doors, amounted to only L.114,000 in 1820; the allowance to each averaging 51s. per annum, or one shilling per week. In one respect, the laws, with all their abuses, have probably done more to keep the standard of living high than the working classes of England. They taught the peasant or labourer to think that he had a legal right to a full supply of wholesome and nourishing food at the public expense, if his own industry did not afford it in sufficient quantity, or if employment failed. When circumstances depress wages below a certain limit, the English labourer falls back on the parish funds; and if he has a wife and children, he probably receives three times as much for his idle, as the Irish peasant gets for the hardest day's work. On the other hand, the poor-laws have degraded the labourer's feeling of independence, the spring of active exertion and prudent conduct: they have encouraged premature marriages, and increased immorality in the intercourse of the sexes; they have chilled the natural affection between parent and child; they have discouraged industry, and created habits of improvidence, by securing subsistence to the idle, and a provision against old age and accident to the thoughtless and dissipated. Finally, they have fostered discontent, and filled two-thirds of the parishes of England with constant hearth-rumblings and litigation, and at times produced scenes of violence and outrage.—Scotsman.

no city that I have ever visited, did I see so remarkable an union of order and idleness as in the intellectual capital of the North. I walked slowly, in the middle of a working day, from the Castle to the Cathedral, and I counted four hundred and seventy idlers (men, women, and children) completely idle; some of them taking snuff, and some of them whisky. I saw one walk from St James's Palace to Leadenhall Street, along Pall Mall, the Strand, Fleet Street, St. Paul's Church, Chancery Lane, and Cornhill, and he will detect twenty idlers in all that stupendous tide of human existence! So much for idleness in Modern London. Now for order. In the evening of the day when the passing of the reform bill was commemorated in Edinburgh, I perambulated the streets of the city for two or three hours. It seemed as if all the vices, diseases, nay, the beds of sickness, had descended upon their tenants! I sometimes thought the graves given up their dead; for never in my life did I see such a multitude of meagre, stunted, half-starved, and sickly human beings crowding the streets. I required no Lavater to perceive a transient gleam of intelligence in the eyes of all; even where care had furrowed the brow, where poverty had sharpened the features, where disease had swallowed the complexion, and where endurance had fixed its degrading signet on the forehead! Yet, throughout this incalculable multitude of the lower orders, this immeasurable mass of human misery, so well adapted for anarchy, confusion, and lawless riot, I did not witness a single symptom of disturbance, or hear an angry expression! The only breach of the peace was in Prince's Street, where two gentlemen sallied or reeled out of a tavern, settled their political disputes by the argumentum baculum, and were conveyed to the watchhouse by the police.—In every countenance that we contemplated in Glasgow, we saw calculation—in every feature some rule of arithmetic (especially addition or multiplication) as legible as in the pages of Cocker. In Edinburgh, each physiognomy is characterised by the lineaments of either law, physics, metaphysics, or divinity. In Glasgow, there is also mind in every face; but it is "mind the main chance." At the time of my first visit to the western capital, however, it is but justice to say that there was an additional element of calculation in every countenance—that of life and death. Cholera-phobia intermingled its pale and lurid hues with the tints of commercial anxiety and domestic affliction! The inns and the theatres were deserted; man seemed cautious of associating with his species, except in places of public devotion; funeral processions superseded the cheerful promenade, and the moral atmosphere was as sombre as the physical. In a subsequent visit I found the streets as actively paced as those of the Strand or Cheapside; the care of commerce, but no longer the dread of pestilence, in every eye. In none of the principal streets did I see the arm-in-arm lounging of the upper classes, or the snuff-taking, toddy-tipping swarms of the lower orders, as in Auld Reekie.—The Recess, a serio-comic Tour to the Hebrides.

A very curious memorial of the rigid rule exercised by the Presbyterian clergy at a time to which Scotsmen long looked back as a period of unexampled religious freedom and prosperity, has lately been extracted into the newspapers from the Presbyterian Records of Paisley. The individual alluded to was Margaret Hamilton, of the family of Orbiston, wife of James Wallace of Ferguslie, in Renfrewshire:—

"June 8, 1643.—The guidwife of Ferguslie having been repeatedly summoned for not attending worship in her parish church of Paisley, and her husband reporting that she could not for want of health, the presbytery ordain the minister to go to Ferguslie, and in the presence of the guidwife read and expound the Scriptures, and sing psalms. He reports his having done so; they appoint him to examine her upon oath, whether it be inability of body or scruples of conscience which prevent her attendance.

June 22.—Report that he examined the guidwife upon oath, who deposes that she was for the present unable to come to Paisley, but was come if she was able; the presbytery stop procedure.

March 27, 1646.—The guidwife of Ferguslie, after being long dealt with, at last swears and subscribes the Confession of Faith and Covenants, and renounces Popery, before the two ministers of Paisley and the elders at Blackstone.

June 25.—The guidwife again dilated for not coming to church. She alleges inability of body; ordered to produce a testimonial from a physician.

July 30.—A testimonial produced; the presbytery find it satisfies their act; appoint the ministers of Paisley to deal with her husband to provide an chamber in Paisley for his wife, that she may reside there for her more easy coming to the kirk.

Sept. 3.—Her husband declares that she cannot be removed at all; ordered to bring her to Paisley that the ministers may have opportunity of frequent converse with her, or to bring a testimonial that she cannot be removed.

Sept. 24.—He reports that he had not an opportunity to see the physician; the presbytery advise him before next meeting to bring his wife from Blackstone, either by land or water, to Paisley to hear the word, and have conference with the ministers.

Dec. 17.—She is advertised to come and reside at Paisley between and February next.

April 1, 1647.—Order her to be publicly admonished for not coming to reside at Paisley, as the presbytery had appointed.

April 22.—Two members report that they had gone and visited the guidwife of Ferguslie, and had seen her in firm; and she still pretending inability, they had gotten her to promise to come to the kirk of Paisley within twenty days, to give content and satisfaction in that point, albeit she should be carried on her bed.

May 8.—Mr Henry Calvert, minister of Paisley, reports, that Margaret Hamilton, guidwife of Ferguslie, had come to the kirk of Paisley, carried on a bed."

SCOTLAND.

July 29. One of the steam-carriages which have been plying for some time with perfect success between Glasgow and Paisley, was brought down by the breaking of a wheel, immediately after starting from the Half-way House, about three miles from the former place. It appears that the vehicle, on its way to Paisley, had been stopped as usual at the Half-way House, for the purpose of taking in a supply of water. On its again starting, Mr Lochhead, the keeper of the house, as is frequently done, pushed one of the wheels partly round, in order to give it an impulse onwards, but had scarcely time to get again upon the footpath, when the large wheel on the right side of the carriage gave way with a crash, and the body of the vehicle, with the engine, came down with a tremendous force, crushing the boiler to the ground; the consequence was, that an explosion took place instantly, blowing part of the carriage to pieces, and wounding and maiming the passengers with more or less severity. The effect of the accident was so great, even on those placed beyond the range of its influence, that some seconds elapsed before any movement took place for the relief of the sufferers. The steam rushed from the boiler with such terrific violence, that large pieces of the carriage, the heavy metal on the road, along with showers of burning cinders, and immense quantities of boiling water, were blown off with the rapidity of lightning, and seriously injured passengers upon the path, as well as inmates of the adjoining houses on both sides of the road. The windows of the buildings which the carriage was passing at the time were shattered to pieces, and the projected cinders poured into the interior with frightful violence. One female, standing on her own floor, was thrown down by the force of the burning missiles, and her clothes ignited; she swooned away, and on some persons entering the house was found lying in a state of insensibility enveloped in flames—but for their prompt exertions in extinguishing the fire, the poor woman must inevitably have perished. A female passing on the road was also seriously injured by the scalding water, which burst upon her with resistless force. The curtains of a bed in the house mentioned above were set on fire, but fortunately soon extinguished, and some of the burning embers penetrating the glass head-case of an eight-day clock in the same house, ignited the wood within; but was also extinguished before great injury was sustained. The noise caused by the explosion was tremendous, having been heard, it is said, at a distance of more than two miles. Eye-witnesses describe it as one of the most distressing scenes they ever beheld. Independently of the catastrophe itself, the confusion was dreadful—the wounded were crying for help, many of them unable to move themselves from the wretched situation in which they were placed by the disaster, while the greater part of the passengers received their injuries in hurrying to escape from the carriages. Of these, twelve were more or less hurt or scalded, while a furnace-boy and the helmsman escaped uninjured. The greatest care was taken of the sufferers, and medical and surgical assistance speedily obtained for them; but nevertheless, four died within the next few days—namely, Mr James Morrison, merchant, Gallowgate, Glasgow; Captain E. B. Gilmer, from Ireland; Mr Thomas Blackwood, traveller for Messrs White, Urquhart, & Co. of Glasgow; and Mr W. Syme, miller, Partick.—The immediate cause of this lamentable accident is ascertained to have been the breaking of the wheel; but public report universally affirms the remote cause to have been the uncommonly deep layers of road metal which had been placed on the road by the trustees since the starting of these novel carriages, and in one of which the wheel in question was ploughing with great difficulty, while the other was in the air. Should such be ascertained to be the real cause, there will of course be room for some notable additions to the roll of those who have distinguished themselves by their hostility to science, and to the interests of humanity. That Mr Russell, the ingenious inventor of these carriages, is free from all blame, has never been questioned. The Edinburgh Weekly Journal remarks very justly, that the accident "is not to be attributed to any defect in the machinery or construction of the carriage. We mentioned lately our belief that the explosion of a boiler constructed on Mr Russell's patent would not be attended by the dangerous consequences inseparable from the occurrence of such an accident to an ordinary boiler, and the fact justifies our anticipation. The injuries occasioned by the boiler are of the most trifling nature, amounting merely to scalds and burns, and the loss of life is to be attributed to the violent concussions received by springing or being flung from the vehicle—misfortunes which would have occurred precisely in a similar manner if an ordinary mail-coach had been upset in similar circumstances, and which cannot therefore in fairness be laid to the account of the steam power. Some articles which we have seen in the pages of our contemporaries allude to the frequent accidents in the United States, arising from the use of high-pressure engines, and argue from these facts that such engines cannot be employed with safety in this country. This at first sight appears very plausible; but we beg that persons who speak thus will observe that the steam-carriages on the Glasgow and Paisley road are constructed on a principle which has effectually removed the very danger here alluded to. To overlook this fact, may arise from want of information; but in several instances we regret to think that it more probably arises from want of candour. The paths of science (alas!) are not free from petty jealousy, and when a discovery has been made which is likely to lead to important results, it is to be expected that the less successful competitors in the race of inquiry will readily avail themselves of the first opportunity to vent their disappointment by depreciating the labours of their rivals. It is to be feared that this accident will in some degree retard the general introduction of a means of conveyance which we have no doubt will eventually prove of the greatest benefit to the country; but, at the same time, we are glad to find that the generality of persons in the vicinity of the scene of the accident are aware of the true cause to which it is to be assigned. In proof of this, we may mention, that on the next day there were many applicants for places in the other steam-carriages, which had of course ceased to ply, until the result of the judicial investigation, still going on before the Sheriff, should be known."

Aug. 4. The west of Scotland was visited by a dreadful thunder-storm. An old and ailing female at Ayrd died through fright, and another temporarily lost her reason.

—5. In the Jury Court, in the trial of a case connected with the Fife Bank, Mr Dalziel, W.S., who was examined as a witness, stated the following singular circumstance:—Some papers connected with the case had been mislaid, and after a very diligent search, all hope of finding them was given up, until the night previous to the trial, when he dreamed that the papers were lying in a particular place. On going to the quarter indicated, he discovered them. We are well aware that other instances of similar revelations have been detailed, but we believe, none of them so well authenticated, Mr Dalziel having stated it on oath. The court, as might be expected, were very much astonished at the statement.

—6. A numerous and most respectable meeting of merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and other inhabitants of Glasgow, took place in the hall of the Black Bull Hotel there, for the purpose of testifying, in the most respectful manner, to James Cleland, Esq. LL.D., the grateful sense entertained by his fellow-citizens of his long and meritorious services as superintendent of public works in the city. The resolutions, after passing high compliments upon the character and talents of Dr Cleland, proposed that some mark of public approbation should be bestowed upon him—the nature of which to be afterwards considered upon—and that, in the meantime, a committee should be appointed to collect subscriptions. Upwards of L.2000 were subscribed for the testimonial at the conclusion of the meeting.

—15. A second general meeting of the creditors of Messrs Kinnears, Smiths, and Co. bankers, was held in the Waterloo Rooms, Edinburgh. Mr James Brown, accountant, the interim factor, laid before the meeting, with other documents, a report, in which it was stated that, though any estimate which could be made at present of the probable dividend to be realised from the estate must necessarily be vague and inconclusive, he was led to think that it might fairly be taken at from 10s. to 11s. per pound. Mr Brown was unanimously appointed trustee, and notice was given that the creditors might lodge their claims and grounds of debt with him at any time that suited their convenience.

The result of the attempt on the part of the government to impose the payment of tithes in Ireland, in a reduced form, upon the landholders, has excited general surprise in Scotland, for the plan very nearly resembled that which has been acted upon north of the Tweed for two hundred years, and which has been found to work admirably in all parts of the country. Indeed, had it not been for this excellent arrangement, there would long ago have been no church of Scotland at all.

Mr Aytoun, the late unsuccessful radical candidate for the representation of Edinburgh, on Wednesday, the 20th August, had a piece of plate presented to him at a public meeting of the working classes in Edinburgh. The plate is an elegant silver cup, on which is the following inscription:—"Presented at a public meeting of the operative classes of Edinburgh, to James Aytoun, Esq. advocate, as a mark of their esteem for his talents, their approbation of his civic and political conduct, and their gratitude for his arduous and important services in the cause of civil and religious liberty. Edinburgh, 20th August 1834. Fiat justitia, ruat cælum." A figure of liberty stands on the top of the cover—on the obverse of the cup the Incheardrie arms: Height of the cup and cover, 17½ inches—weight, nearly 70 oz.

Mr Wallace, member of Parliament for Greenock, has been received on his return to that flourishing sea-port in the most enthusiastic manner. Mr Wallace has addressed a letter to his constituents, giving them the option of continuing his services as their representative, or electing another, should they be displeased with his Parliamentary conduct. On the evening of Friday, August 22, a public meeting was held at Greenock, with the view to make a arrangements for the presentation to Mr W. of a piece of plate, in testimony of approbation of his services.

A motion, the object of which is to make a ship canal to Glasgow, with docks at the Broomielaw, was lately carried at a meeting of the council of that city.

Every thing connected with the season bears, in Scotland, a favourable aspect. The harvest is excellent; the news from most of the herring fishery stations is highly satisfactory; salmon fishing on the Tay and Tweed is unusually good; and the gentlemen of the moors were never better satisfied. In no season within our remembrance did the crops ever ripen more rapidly and equally; and hence the almost general complaint that the demand for reapers is greater than the supply. In not a few places shearers have been hired at 2s. 3d. per day with, and 2s. 6d. without victuals. In other districts, two shillings per day is stated as the maximum, apart from extras in the shape of food.

An opera by Mr John Thomson, son of the late Dr Andrew Thomson, of Edinburgh, is to be brought out in October, under the title of "Hernani."

Mr Galt, who lately arrived in Edinburgh from London, and has been since then experiencing some relief from his ailment, proceeded on the 7th August to Greenock, the scene of his early days, which he reached without inconvenience. Mr Galt's illness does not affect his mind, and he is able, almost every day, to go through a large amount of literary labour. He has just completed his literary autobiography, which is about to be published.

Dr Combe suggests to manufacturers the propriety of establishing for their workmen the means of bathing. If time were given them, they will willingly bathe, and will enjoy cleanliness, healthy skin, and less craving for the stimulus of spirits. The waste hot water of a steam-engine would give them the means of warm bathing.

It appears, from a statement made up to the 9th inst., that the amount of sailing-vessels, independent of steam-packets, which arrived at Glasgow during the last year, was 4654—and their register tonnage, 255,471: being an increase of 308 vessels and 21,755 tons.

The way in which the public money is spent for purposes of education in the Scottish towns, is beginning to attract attention. Municipal patronage and funds are generally confined to those grammar-schools and academies at which the middle and wealthy classes are educated, while schools for the poor either exist not at all, or are never regarded. At present, the classical education of between four and five hundred boys, the children of the superior classes, at the High School of Edinburgh, costs the public at the rate of L.3, 12s. for each boy, while only a few pounds are given in salaries to teachers of English.

The very ancient stone bridge of five arches over the Tweed at Peebles, which at no remote period was the only bridge besides that of Berwick over this river, and is now one of fourteen or fifteen, has recently been undergoing repair and enlargement. It is supposed to have been built by one of the co-heiresses of Simon Fraser of Neidpath, the companion of Wallace and Bruce, and ancestor of the Lovat family. Like all old bridges, it was only wide enough to admit a single wain; it has now been widened several feet by a comparatively cheap and easy process, the piers having projected so far on each side that nothing but additional archwork was required.

An institution of a very laudable and interesting kind has recently been established at Stirling by the enterprise of two private individuals, the Messrs Drummond. It consists of a collection of agricultural implements, and other objects connected with that science, liable, we believe, to inspection, on the payment of a small gratuity. The local benefits to be derived from such an establishment are so obvious, that we hope it will become the model of others throughout the country.

Among the Parliamentary invalids of the session, we regret to find Sir D. K. Sandford, the learned and eloquent member for Paisley, who has been obliged, for the last two months, to seek a restoration to health at a Scottish watering-place, and is stated to have received less benefit from the sea-air than his friends had expected. In the meantime, his opponent, Mr Crawford, has taken the opportunity of a visit to his Argyleshire relations, to pay his respects to his Paisley friends, with whom he is anxious to keep up a good understanding, in the prospect of again starting for the borough at the next vacancy. Sir Daniel, notwithstanding his extraordinary abilities, has made something approaching to a failure in Parliament. One of his earliest appearances before the house was on the question of the Jewish disabilities, the abolition of which he opposed in a speech full of that kind of fanaticism which now succeeds hardly any where, but least of all in the House of Commons. It was also delivered in a manner altogether burlesque. It was evident to an individual who sat that evening in the gallery, that he sunk at every sentence in the estimation of his fellow-speakers, and at the end was left without the slightest relic of the respect with which they had been prepared, by his reputation, to hear him.

On a Sunday lately, while the congregation was assembling in the parish church of Old Machar, a young weaver from the Spital took his station, with a fair damsel at his side, in the middle passage, and proclaimed aloud his own name and that of his companion, signifying at the same time his desire that they should be united in wedlock. He repeated this proclamation thrice with all due solemnity, asked if any one objected, then took her by the hand, declared that they were married man and wife, and forthwith departed with his new helpmate, leaving the congregation in no small astonishment at this novel and cheap mode of getting the matrimonial knot tied.

The turn-out calico-printers, after a determined struggle of about nine months' continuance, have been forced to yield to the superior power of their employers, and offer to work on their own terms. It is said that since the strike, the operative printers have paid to the hands standing out upwards of L.13,000.—Glasgow Courier.

The Greenock Intelligencer gives the following list of emigrant vessels which left that port between July 14 and July 29:—Inez, for New York, with 91 passengers; Mercator, for Pictou, with 60 passengers; Janet Izat, for Cape Breton and Quebec, with 210 passengers, who were taken on board at Gorbormory; Perseverance, for New York, with 72 passengers; George Barclay, for Pictou, with 47 passengers; Favourite, for Quebec, with 56 passengers; Robertson, for Montreal, with 33 passengers; Camillus, for New York, with 70 passengers.

The report of the committee of the Commons on church patronage was agreed to on the 18th July. It simply recommends to the deliberate attention of the house the sentiments entertained "by many of the individuals who occupy the most prominent place in public estimation, on account of their piety, their learning, their zeal, their talents, or their attachment to Presbyterian institutions." The committee "anticipates much advantage from the general circulation of the valuable facts and documents embodied in their minutes." On the question of patronage, the committee offers no opinion, willing, as most friends of the church are, that the late decision of the General Assembly shall have a fair trial. Its remark on the question of a substitute for the present system is, that "every intelligent and dispassionate reader will perceive that the difficulties attending the adoption of any of the various modifications suggested, are far more grave than he himself was probably aware of; and that a thorough and decided opinion on a question of such moment ought not to be adopted without the most anxious and the most deliberate consideration."—Scottish Guardian.

The Broomielaw presents the novel spectacle of a barque loading for China. This vessel is the Sovereign, lately launched at Dumbarton, and belongs to Messrs Henderson and McKellar of the Greenock and Sultan steamers. She will be the first vessel direct from Glasgow to China, and the second from the Clyde.

Postscript.

The opening of the Portuguese Chambers took place on the 15th ultimo, when Don Pedro delivered an address to the members, "which bodes the speedy settlement of affairs in the country on sound constitutional principles. He adverts to the propriety of the regulating the 'liberty of the press,' the responsibility of the ministers and public officers, the inviolability of the residence and property of the citizen, the organisation of public instruction, the laws for the protection and promotion of manufactures, commerce, and arts, and of agriculture—all, in short, that public necessity requires.

It has been at length arranged that the public dinner to be given to Earl Grey at Edinburgh, shall take place on Monday the 15th current, the Duke of Hamilton in the chair. It is expected that this will be one of the most splendid entertainments ever given in the Scottish metropolis. Of it, as well as of the meeting of the British Scientific Association, we shall be able to give a faithful record in our next.

Monday, Aug. 25.—Three per Cent. Consols, 94.

Neatness, elegance, order, and propriety, are excellent things, and without them life speedily degenerates into a brutal and intolerable affair: but there is a neatness, order, and propriety, so still, so cold, so passionless, that both the heart and imagination receive a sudden chill on entering where they reside. It was so at the drawing-room so purely fair, as the furniture fresh from the hands of the painter—the furniture so perfectly, yet so immovably arranged, that it appeared like presumption to move a chair out of its place, the book-shelves stored with elegantly-bound volumes, elegant to be handled or to be read—the cold, composed mistress of the house, not a fold of her cap nor a curl of her hair, but in the most perfect order, as if passion, hurry, and emotion, were alike strange to her bosom and to her household. . . . This was eminently a committee-woman, a member of societies, a drawer up and reader of reports, a frequent of meetings where great lords and gentlemen played business, and affect eloquence to please busy women of much time and much money. She was busy inspector of the poor, an enemy to all indiscriminate charity, an especial enemy to all Sunday recreation, to all idleness, all carelessness, all extravagance. She was one, indeed, whose activity would have been invaluable, had it been united with that "love," the gentle, indulgent spirit of love, which He who created the heart declared to be the foundation of all virtue—but, animated by no such sentiment, she walked, a cold and spectral image of charity, sent too often to disgust those who wished to do good by the means of doing it, and to reconcile those whose good works were the accidental effect of impulse and to their own negligent and careless good nature. The Admiral's Daughter.

truth, Custom is a violent and treacherous schoolmistress. By little and little, slyly and unperceived, slips in the foot of authority; but having, by this gentle and humble beginning, the benefit of Time, fixed and established it, she then unleashes a furious and tyrannic countenance, against which we have no courage or the power so much as to lift up our eyes."

Custom is the reason of the ignorant. While men are in a partially enlightened state, their understandings are not sufficient to be their guide through the considerable portion of the contingencies of life. They therefore square themselves to the common, helplessly hoping for the best, and knowing by this means they will at least be as well off as their neighbours, who generally act on the same principle.

While it is thus a benefactor to the dull, serving them better than they could be served by their wits, it imposes a grievous hindrance on the progress of superior intellects, and even does harm ready to the stupid. Custom, be it remarked, is formed out of the best wisdom of a preceding age, the worst of a present, age; it is always backward, sluggish, reluctant to admit new lights, and just as so, the more brilliant those lights are. There is as much wisdom above its pitch as below it; it is mediums only. Changes it detests, and even when it has had to cast off a principle, it will mourn its centuries. Mediocrity and inertia are its constitutive parts, and it suspects every thing that looks clean. If Madame Custom had been all her life used to a diet of chaff, she would have felt quite alarmed at a word of corn—would smell and snuff at it for ages, as a dog who dreads mustard, and at last cautiously, perhaps, with a pickle a-day. If she had been brought up to keep her hand on the crown of her head, in the manner of a Hindoo under a vow, she would regard any one with a good deal of distrust, and would tell her that she thereby did no good, but only degraded herself of the use of a member. The dogma that people were intended to use both arms would have appeared to her most heterodox and dangerous; and it would have prevailed upon to lower her elbow at the rate of an airbreadth in the month, it would be as much as possibly be expected from her. If Madame Custom heard any one crying new lamps for old ones, she would be the last person in the world to accede to the proposal. If any one were to tell her that she was to come into possession of a large fortune, left her by a relation, she would answer with cool indifference, that those are blessed who expect nothing, and they are never disappointed. If used all her life to dachies, she would be quite alarmed at suddenly going well: she would argue that she had lived too long with the headache to live long without it. If tormented all her days with a mephitic pool under her feet, which she smelt even in her dreams, and she gave her an ague regularly once a-quarter, she would consent to have it drained, think you? No. She would need that the marsh was an antidote to some other disease, which, if it were removed, would pre-attack her, she would cherish it as the very life itself. Sometimes, no doubt, she is and unquestionably she is a great protectress to the rational, who, wanting her, would be perpetually banging their heads against one mischief or another. In the other hand, she prevents the independent and wise from bringing one half of their faculties into use, and thus not only injures them, but intercepts that good which would otherwise flow from their minds to their own peculiar adherents.

Custom deals greatly in proverbs. They are her code of thinking, feeling, and action, and she constantly applying them, whether applicable or not. She would encounter any hazard in following some antique precept, rather than take it upon her to act upon a sense of expediency. The letter of a rule, too, is what she always looks to. The thing might have been intended metaphorically, or metaphysically, or some other ally, but, having no sense to see such distinctions, she takes it just as it happens to strike her obtuse wits, and defies all argument to the contrary. Madame Custom had once occasion to take a long journey, and after having advanced about half way along a rather rough and toilsome road, came to a piece which was tolerably smooth, but of no great extent. Finding herself comfortable on this short track, she did not like to quit it, but ambled all the remainder of the afternoon backwards and forwards, mispending her time, and altogether failing to observe that the day was wearing to a close, while she had yet a great way to go. Some one who chanced to pass, asked what she meant by riding so often over this little patch of road, instead of proceeding on her way; to which she answered, with a shrewd look, "When I am well, I like to keep well;" a maxim which had no doubt been impressed upon her by some very wise person, but which, it is easy to see, was quite misapplied in this instance.

No remark is more common, and none more just, than that custom is a second nature. Let us be born in whatever country, or in whatever sphere of life, we are there introduced to certain peculiar methods of living and thinking, which, coming to us with all the sanction that parental authority and example can give them, appear to us as exactly what nature had intended, and are adopted by us accordingly. Such practices soon become absolutely identified with our natures, and we no more think of questioning their propriety than we think of challenging the merits of our vernacular tongue. As these practices and modes of thought, however, are different in every country and in every sphere of life, it is clear that they cannot all be natural, or proper, or the best that might be. The European sentiment of loyalty to a monarchy, and the American notion of deference to an elected magistrate, cannot both be consistent with nature, for they are inconsistent with each other. The polygamy of the Turks, and the monogamy of the Franks, cannot both be in accordance with the original designs of providence, for the effects of these two customs upon surrounding society are altogether different. Yet, accidental and local as most of our modes of thought and feeling may be, they acquire in each instance, from custom, and from their being to a certain degree prevalent, a sacredness only inferior to that which would be due to the dictates of genuine nature, supposing these to be in real and universal exercise. Thus, what would be considered quite innocent in Kamschatka, may appear monstrous in New Zealand; and what might pass without remark in Baltimore, would perhaps raise the very paving-stones of New Bond Street. Custom has every where her treason-laws for coercing rebellious spirits, and many a man has suffered in latitude fifty-five for an offence which, ten degrees farther south, is not so much as the subject of a statute. She is somewhat like the British government, which executes English law in England, Scottish law in Scotland, Norman law in Guernsey and Jersey, Hindoo law in the East Indies, and something, nobody knows what, in the Ionian Islands. The only difference is, that she has a different system with almost every country on the face of the globe. It is really amusing to see with what gravity her officers—say, in France—will estimate an offence against her laws—aggravating every circumstance in the eyes of the jury, i. e. the multitude—and making the whole appear as a violation of her most important and venerable principles; at the very time, perhaps, when some of her judges in Holland are making out a circumstance directly the contrary, and which would be considered quite agreeable to her t'other side the Scheldt, as not less wicked and horrible.

It might afford matter for some curious reflection, to trace the judgments passed at the various tribunals of custom, in various countries, upon deceased public characters. The man who conforms most perfectly to all that is demanded by custom in his particular sphere of action, is always the best reputed: the eccentric, though sometimes only the occasion of a smile, seldom comes so well off in the long-run. Now, if biographical dictionaries applicable each to a different country, and written in the spirit dictated by the customs of that particular country, could be collected, no one can doubt that many striking discrepancies would be found among the virtues respectively held most in estimation by each. Even when we glance over the works of this kind belonging to America, Britain, and France, differences absolutely ludicrous are observable.

And what lesson, it may be asked, are we to derive from these observations upon Custom? We would respectfully answer, that they ought to teach us a lesson of toleration—toleration, too, not only for the people of other countries, but for those who think differently from us in our own. When we feel an emotion of contempt or rancour towards any man or set of men around us, on account of some difference in their modes of thinking and acting from our own; let us reflect for a moment on the infinite differences which prevail throughout the whole family of man, and the absolute impossibility of their all or any part of them being exactly consistent with nature; and stubborn indeed must be that heart which does not confess the error, not to speak of the utter futility, of all such emotions.

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

THE civil war in Spain still continues, although reduced to a sort of guerilla skirmishing. Don Carlos, who seems to persevere in his pretensions with a wilful defiance of destiny, is hunted from place to place, and has repeatedly escaped out of the very clutches, as it were, of the royalist troops, who have arrived at his hiding-place just in time to enjoy the viands cooked for the fugitive. Suspicions are entertained, however, that there is some deception in these manoeuvres, and that Carlos is lurking any where but where his pursuers suspect. It is pretty well ascertained, however, that he and his general Zumalacarraguy are acting separately. The latter is said to have organised a body of marksmen, composed solely of curates or monks, who are exceedingly expert in marking down the officers of the queen's troops. In return for this Carlism of the clergy, General Rodil has been diversifying the campaign by pillaging and burning the convents, and hunting down the fugitive curés in the villages, as Claverhouse did the Covenanter preachers of old. The first of these proceedings would seem little calculated to repair the impoverished resources of the government.

The proceedings of the Cortes are highly interesting and important, and the struggle betwixt a liberal and a temporising system of internal government is advancing favourably as yet for the former. On the 28th of August, a sort of Bill of Rights was introduced into the Chamber of Procuradores (Commons), which ministers have since been compelled to adopt with very immaterial modifications, after sustaining a series of defeats in the Chambers, which expose their inability lity to contend against the liberal party in the legislature. The document in question, as being the first successful effort at regeneration by a great people hitherto strangers to all the blessings of free government, must be read with interest by every friend to liberty. It consists of twelve articles, of which the following may be given as an abstract:—

Art. 1. Declares that the freedom of the subject is protected and guaranteed by the laws, and no Spaniard ought to be compelled to do that which the law does not prescribe.

2. Establishes the liberty of the press; no censorship, but laws calculated to punish those who may become guilty.

3. No Spaniard to be prosecuted, or arrested, or punished, but through legal means.

4. Ex post facto laws to be abolished, and commissions equally.

5. The Spaniard's home to be his castle.

6. The law to be equal to all the Spaniards, both to protect and to punish. This of course does not interfere with the privileges of the Proceres.

7. As a consequence of the last, all Spaniards to be fit to fill places, both civil and military, without their being required to be nobly born.

8. All Spaniards to be equally bound to pay taxes, in proportion to their means.

9. Confiscation to be done away with. Property declared sacred. Yet the Spaniards are bound—1st, to pay the fines imposed by legal sentence; 2d, to give up their property to the state, in case public utility should require it; but not without indemnification.

10. Public functionaries to be responsible for all acts against the freedom and rights of individuals.

11. Ministers to be responsible.

12. The Militia Urbana to be organised upon a broader base, and under regulations to be voted by the Cortes.

"These accounts" (the defeat of ministers) says the Spectator, "confirm the opinion which we formed and expressed several months ago, that there is no juste milieu party of any weight or importance in Spain. The nation is either Liberal or Carlist; and all the manoeuvres of foreign courts, and the dexterity of their envoys, cannot bolster up a Doctrinaire ministry for any length of time. For a few months, or perhaps even years, the Movement may be retarded, but that is the whole extent of success to which the trimmers can attain." The finance committee have reported upon the project of the finance minister, Moreno, for paying off the Cortes loans, respecting which so much anxiety has long prevailed, not only in Spain, but among the bondholders in France, England, and elsewhere. Moreno advised that the whole loans be recognised, and to pay them off; his plan was to separate them into two portions, which he respectively called an active and a passive debt; the first to be discharged immediately, and the second as means should arise through the institution of a sinking fund. A majority of the committee, however, advise the recognition of the Cortes loans from 1820 to 1823, and the rejection of the French loans, and also of the debt to France secured subsequently to 1823 by treaty. The minority recommend the adoption of the whole debt both previous and subsequent to 1823. The ground on which the majority of the committee advise the rejection of the French loans is, that the "Constitution of 1812 and the Estatuto Real have both declared that only the King and Cortes united could impose contributions." It follows, therefore, that the parties who lent money on the credit of the king only, had no national security for its repayment. It is doubted, however, whether the Cortes will venture to incur the anger of France by adopting this recommendation, more especially as it is suspected that Louis Philip has himself a share in the loans. Meanwhile, great excitement prevails among the Parisian bondholders on the subject, who lately presented a petition to the king, signed by 3000 persons, praying on behalf of 20,000 families that he would interfere for the full recognition of their claims.

It remains to be mentioned that the Proceres have resolved that "Don Carlos and all his line are excluded from their rights to the succession to the throne of Spain." This resolution was adopted by all the peers in Madrid, except one, who, for some reason unexplained, declined voting for or against it. The ministry have gained popularity by their decided support of this resolution.

PORTUGAL.

THE Portuguese Cortes assembled on the 15th August, and the session was opened by Don Pedro in person. The ministers of France, Belgium, England, Spain, and Sweden, attended the ceremony, which went off with much magnificence and eclat, and every demonstration of popular regard for the regent. He delivered a long address, detailing chiefly the cruelties and crimes of his brother, and the events of the by-past war. The only points for consideration to which he called the attention of the Cortes were—"1. Whether the regency ought or ought not to be continued during the remainder of the queen's minority. 2. To take the proper steps that her majesty may marry some foreign prince." No serious business was transacted till the 25th, when the regency question was decided by the re-election of Pedro, by a majority of 90 to 5 in the Chamber of Deputies, and 9 to 4 in the Chamber of Peers. As it was ascertained, however, upon the question of the reply to the regent's address, that there was a majority against the government in the Upper House, Pedro lost no time in swamping it by a creation of twenty-four peers.

The proposal of marrying the young queen to an European prince has been decided in the Chamber of Deputies by a majority of 67 to 27; the husband elect to be chosen by her father. It is since confidently reported that negotiations are in active progress relative to the marriage of her majesty with the Duke de Leuchtenberg. France is said to be so much opposed to the arrangement, as to have prevailed upon the British Ministry to assist in raising objections, and the King of Bavaria has in consequence been applied to by this government to withhold his consent; but his intentions on the subject have not transpired. Don Pedro, however, is stated to be very desirous of favouring his daughter's inclinations, which, as well as those of the prince, are for the match.

In consequence of the protest issued by Miguel at Genoa (mentioned in our last) against the constraint under which he was compelled to leave Portugal, and the re-assertion of his right to the throne, the Cortes have decided to withhold from him the pension he would otherwise have been entitled to.

The establishment of four banks at the four principal cities in the kingdom is contemplated, under the auspices of M. Mendizabal, the successful financier of the liberal party. Roads, canals, and other internal improvements, are also about to be contracted for. Church property to the value of L.1,800,000 will be sold in September and October, and in the following months further sales will take place. Altogether, it is calculated that the government has property worth ten millions to dispose of.

FRANCE.

WERE there no other grounds of complaint against the present government of France, the incessant persecution kept up against the press would of itself be no trifling one. It is stated, that there have been 450 prosecutions of this kind instituted since the accession of Louis Philip. These proceedings, it is well known, originate with the citizen king himself, who, constantly interfering with the policy and measures of his chosen advisers, feels proportionally indignant at any attack upon the wisdom of their administration. On the 23d of August, M. Armand Carrel, the able editor of the National, was tried before the Court of Assizes, charged with a personal attack upon the king, contained in some strictures upon the royal speech at the opening of the Chambers on the 31st of July. M. Carrel, who spoke in person, defended himself upon the ground that the continual and active interference of the king in the affairs of the administration, exempted him from the protection of the constitutional law, that royal acts, not adverse to the constitution, shall be free from censure; and although some obsolete enactment under the last dynasty was fished up for his condemnation, the jury unanimously acquitted M. Carrel, amid the deafening cheers of the auditors. An injunction was, however, issued, prohibiting any report of judicial proceedings from appearing in the National; for which M. Carrel was again cited, on the 29th August, before the Court of Assize, and in default was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, and a fine of 2000 francs. Yielding to the storm, M. Carrel announced his retirement from the editorship; but his successor, M. Rouen, followed up his steps with such vigour, that, on the 26th September, he was thought worthy of being sentenced to six months' imprisonment, with a fine of 6000 francs (L.240)—in short, the severest punishment authorised by the laws. The principles of the National are republican.

The Chambers, which were only opened on the 31st July, were suddenly dissolved by the king on the 16th August. The cause of this step it is not easy to explain, unless by referring it to the disorganised state of the government. M. Gerard, President of the Council, is laid up with repeated attacks of gout, which it is thought likely will unfit him for again resuming the functions of office; and there is much puzzling and conjecture about his probable successor. Several leading statesmen are said to have refused either this or any other office, while one or two of those in office are trying in vain to get out of it—Louis Philip having refused to accept their repeated resignations.

UNITED STATES.

THE American papers are filled with particulars of the burning of a Catholic convent at Charlestown in Massachusetts, near Boston, by a mob of fanatics and ruffians. The Boston Morning Post says—"A feeling hostile to the establishment on Mount Benedict has existed among a portion of the citizens of Charlestown since the institution was first located there; and many stories, doubtless exaggerated, or perhaps altogether destitute of foundation, had been circulated, derogatory to the character of that institution; and the last act reported to have been perpetrated—that of detaining a young lady without her own consent, and refusing to produce her when called upon, and declining to give any satisfactory explanation of the affair—appears to have excited the fury of the populace to an ungovernable height." Stimulated by these feelings, a mob collected on the night of the 11th of August, and, furnished with tar-barrels and torches, proceeded to the convent, and called upon the inmates to come out. Twelve nuns, and between fifty and sixty pupils, many of them quite young girls, fled to the garden, whence, however, they were soon driven into the neighbouring fields, and such houses as were opened to them. They had scarcely time to leave the building before it was set on fire from without and within. Fire-engines arrived from Boston, but were not allowed to act by the mob, who amounted in number to about four thousand. The building was destroyed and completely gutted; even a few articles with which the poor fugitives attempted to escape, were torn from them by the mob, and thrown into the flames. While all this was going on, not a magistrate or police-officer was to be seen. The next day, the citizens of Boston flocked in great numbers to a public meeting, at which resolutions,igmatising the conduct of the mob as base and cowardly, calling upon the civil authorities to bring the perpetrators to justice, and pledging themselves, individually and collectively, to protect the Catholics, were passed by acclamation. All this seems to have been mere talk; for on the night of the same day a mob paraded the streets of Boston, and after threatening to burn a Catholic church in that city, proceeded to Charlestown, where they completed the work of destruction, by burning the fences and trampling on the garden. The conduct of the Catholic bishop of Boston was admirable during the whole of this disgraceful affair. He dispatched priests and messengers in all directions, with entreaties to the exasperated Catholics, most of whom are Irish, to return good for evil. On the Tuesday evening, also, he summoned his congregation in Boston, and delivered a most eloquent exhortation to keep the peace, which seemed to have had the best effect.

The largest woollen manufactory in the United States, situated in the village of Somersworth, in New Hampshire, has been compelled to stop payment; the premises, machinery, and stock, are to be sold by auction. The number of persons employed in the concern was 423, and the amount of their sales for the year rather less than L.100,000.

By the recent advices from the United States it would appear that emigration from Germany to America is carried on to a considerable extent. The steamer turns at Baltimore, during fourteen days, of emigrants arrived there from the interior of Germany, stating the number to be two thousand.

WEST INDIES.

ACCOUNTS from Trinidad up to August 5, give an interesting details of the conduct of the emancipated negroes upon the 1st of August (first day of their freedom) and subsequent days. Crowds of negroes to the number of 400, thronged into the town of Port of Spain upon the morning of the 1st, and surrounded the government house, declaring their determination to work no more. Upon the governor endeavoring to convince them of the impropriety of their conduct, they abused and insulted him in the grossest manner, and set him at open defiance. Notwithstanding the outrageous conduct of the negroes, Colonel Hardy, who commanded the garrison, could not be prevailed upon to bring out a military force to overawe them, and the same scenes continued on the ensuing day (Saturday.) The militia, however, undertook to protect the town. In the afternoon of the 2d, Captain Hay read to the multitude that clause in the royal order in council which declares the assembling of three apprentices to be a riot, if continued ten minutes after notice to disperse; and this proclamation no effect for twenty minutes, the cavalry was ordered to charge upon and disperse the mob, which they did for the time, but still kept together in small parties. On Monday (the 4th), notwithstanding the continued threats of the negroes, the magistrature punished thirty-three prisoners with flogging. On the 5th, in consequence of the firm measures which have been taken, the inhabitants were comparatively free from alarm.

In many of the other colonies, there have been symptoms of a similar disposition to what has been manifested so unequivocally in Trinidad. In some of the negroes had declared their resolution to work no more after they ceased to be slaves, and in all there was a strong and revolting antipathy expressed towards the apprenticeship scheme. We must make one exception, however—Antigua, where the local legislature, by a voluntary act, passed on the 4th of January, dispensed with the right of apprenticeship over the slaves, and declared, that, from the 1st of August 1834, all the slaves should be entirely free, and eligible to receive relief from the different parishes on the same footing as the other inhabitants. It is further enacted, that, until the 1st of August 1835, it shall not be lawful for the owners of plantations to employ any labourer who shall be willing to continue to perform his work for stipulated wages, except for a period of insubordination, and then only with the sanction of two justices of the peace, who shall have inquired into the case. On June 19, every thing was perfectly calm, and the negroes were preparing for a splendid celebration of the day. Some of the neighbouring islands manifest no slight feeling of disappointment at the freedom of the Antigua slaves, whilst they have to wait six years.

SYRIA.

THE insurrection which we mentioned in our last having broken out in the dominions of Mehemet has been completely subdued, and Mehemet has returned to Alexandria. The sultan made no attempt to avail himself of the disturbance in his late viceroy's territories; and it is said that Russia, through the influence of England, notified to the Porte her intention of sending a fleet to the Mediterranean.

IRELAND.

Our last was a short notice of a meeting held in lin on the 14th August, by the heads of the Orange y, at which the Rev. Marcus Beresford was reed to have uttered certain declarations of exteration against the Papists, which we quoted. The rend gentleman has since publicly denied having ten in such terms, and it appears rather strange they were attributed to him by only one of the rters present—the Dublin Evening Post; which, ever, persists in the accuracy of the statement. A nd meeting of the Protestant party has since been l in Dublin, from which the public were excluded, n about L.2000, it is said, was subscribed for the pose of prosecuting the claims of the Protestant ymen for tithe—the Marquis of Winchester alone scribing L.500. The usual revolting system of ping and turning out poor families to raise the e is therefore likely to be prosecuted with greater ur than ever. One party of collectors lately, ased by military, turned out no less than thirty-two r families in one day, and from one property. It aid, however, that earnest remonstrances from ain military authorities in Ireland have been forded to the Horse Guards, complaining of the em-ment of the army in a duty so repugnant to the ings of a British soldier, and so foreign from his itimate avocations, as that of tithe-collecting. The rquis of Downshire has announced his intention ay in future to the clergymen the amount of the osition due to them from parishes on his lord-s's property.

Ir O'Connell has again betaken himself to "agion." In a long letter addressed to the "People of land," principally on the subject of the late Orange stings in Dublin, he sketches out a plan of resist-e to the enemy. This is the institution of "Li-al County Clubs," with a "Grand Liberal Club" for reland, to be assembled in Dublin. Among the pro-ed objects of these "clubs" are, the repression of arian crimes, the prosecution of members of Orange s, the extinction of tithes, and the repeal of the
on. The formation of clubs upon the above prines is already commenced in several counties. Mr Connell has since, in spite of his declaration in the er just mentioned, that he was "a decided ministalist," and that he thought "the best interests of country bound up with the present ministry," menced a series of letters to Lord Duncannon (of ch three have now appeared), wherein he pro-es to expose "the follies, faults, and crimes per-ated on the people of Ireland by the Whigs." He umences with the very beginning of the Whig administration, and has only as yet reached the eighth twenty-one principal charges which he says he has ring against them.

Mr Cobbett has gone on a visit to Ireland. He ar-rd at Kingstown by the Holyhead packet on the 1 September. Mr O'Connell having recommended by letter to the kindness of the people, he made a public entrance, on the 18th, into Dublin. He was ded at Ball's Bridge by the members of the com-tee, in eleven carriages. After a salutation by each he members of the committee, the carriages which y occupied formed into line behind an open care, in which Mr Cobbett was seated with Sir Geo.
ckburn and Mr Finn, M.P. for Kilkenny; Mr Nevin's pony chaise taking the lead, and the procession being headed by Mr T. Reynolds, mounted on a horse. At about a quarter before three o'clock vehicle in which Mr Cobbett sat stopped opposite Dodd's Great Rooms in Upper Sackville Street, re which a large crowd had assembled. Here Mr Cobbett alighted, and entered the house, followed by members of the committee; in a few minutes Mr Cobbett appeared on the balcony attached to the draw-room windows, accompanied by Sir George Cockburn, Mr Finn, M.P., Mr McNevin, and Mr John Reynolds. Mr Cobbett on his appearance was reded with loud cheers.

Mr Finn then addressed the meeting, expressive of happiness in introducing to them the staunch advocate of their rights. "They have been celebrating," said he, "the arrival of Lord Grey in Edinburgh week. (Groans.) They have been celebrating arrival of a sycophantic crew in Edinburgh—the isters of an hour; but nobler is our task here to-in celebrating the arrival of the manly advocate popular rights in every quarter of the globe. God l us a delivery from Whig legislation. (Laughter.)
ave but slight hopes of them, for no Tory govern-ent every executed arbitrary acts with more severity n the Whigs." Mr Finn concluded amid loud
ers. Mr Daniel McNevin then proceeded to read ingratulatory address to Mr Cobbett; after which, Cobbett addressed the multitude in a well-written sch of some length, expressive of the sympathy rtained for the sufferings of the Irish people, not y by himself, but all England. He expressed at thanks to the Irish members, and particularly Finn, but for whom he would have been comely borne down in Parliament. After Mr Cobbett had done speaking, Mr Reynolds addressed the rd, and requested them to retire in a peaceable orderly manner—a request which was literally plied with, after three cheers for "Mr Cobbett," three more for "O'Connell and Old Ireland."

ENGLAND.

Aug. 20. Her Majesty Queen Adelaide arrived at Woolwich from Germany, amid the acclamations of an immense multitude. The Mayor and Corporations of London presented her with addresses of congratulation.
—21. King William IV. entered his 70th year, being born August 1765.

—27. A large revenue cutter, the Cameleon, was run down by the Castor frigate off Dover, by which thirteen persons, including the commander, lieutenant, and mate, were drowned. A court-martial has since been held, the result of which was the acquittal of Lord John Hay and the other officers of the Castor from all blame, excepting Lieutenant McCleverty, the officer of the watch, who has been dismissed the service.

Sept. 3. A smart shock of an earthquake was felt at Portsmouth. Several houses were much shaken, and some slight damage was sustained. Slight shocks have also been felt lately at other places in the south of England.

—4. Mr Duncombe, M.P. for Finsbury, was bound over to keep the peace, himself in L.500, and two sureties in L.250 each, in consequence of sending a challenge to Mr Fraser, publisher of Fraser's Magazine, for a libel which appeared in that publication (September number) against him. Legal proceedings have since been instituted against Mr Fraser and another journal. The libel complained of charged Mr Duncombe with being "one of infamous notoriety for every sort and degree of vice;" and the dissenters of Finsbury are described as the "supporters of the favourite of Madame Vestris, and the patron of and partner in Crockford's hell."—A great Conservative dinner was held at Newton, about half way between Manchester and Liverpool. There were about 700 present, and the whole passed off with great splen-dour and éclat. Earl Wilson acted as chairman; and among the company were Lord Skelmersdale, Lord Lyndsay, Hon. R. Wilbraham, Hon. A. Powis, Sir H.
Mainwaring, Bart., Sir R. Brook, Bart., Sir T. Fremantle, M.P., Thomas Hawkes, Esq. M.P., Wilbraham Egerton, Esq., J. J. Blackburne, Esq. &c. &c.

—8. A murder, or rather a domestic massacre, was perpetrated this night in Southampton Street, Pentonville, by Nicholas Steinberg, a German, who, after killing Ellen Lefevre, a young woman with whom he cohabited, and four infant children (three boys and a girl), consummated the tragical scene by cutting his own throat. A servant who had waited on the family during a visit to Germany, whence Steinberg had just returned, did not sleep in the house on the night of the murder; though she returned to it next morning, and finding it all shut up, gave the first alarm. When her mistress desired her to return in the morning, Steinberg smiled in a peculiar manner: he did not wish her to go away. When the doors were opened in the morning, Steinberg was found lying on the kitchen floor, and the woman and children on the floor up stairs, all with their throats cut completely across. The head of the little girl, indeed, was completely cut off and lying beside the body; but the details are altogether too horrible to be recapitulated. Steinberg was a whipmaker by trade, and appears to have been but in indifferent circumstances; but no feasible reason for the commission of such horrible crimes was elicited in the evidence at the inquest. The scene at his funeral, if it can be so called, on the night of Thursday the 11th, was no less revolting. He was carried in an open shell, dressed only in the bloody shirt and drawers in which he was found; and after being exhibited for some time to the execrations of the immense crowds who attended, and who uttered the most awful curses on the dead wretch, he was pitched headlong into a hole eighteen or twenty feet deep. After the body was partially covered with earth, one of the attendants went into the grave, and with a heavy iron mallet smashed the skull of the murderer and suicide to pieces! There is only one case on record parallel in horror to the preceding—that of Rieshaw, an unordained clergyman at Hamburg, who in one night cut the throats of his wife and six or seven daughters. He was previously universally respected, and it was proven on his trial that he committed the murders under a mad fanaticism of fear of his family starving.

—15. A public dinner was given to Messrs Attwood and Scholefield, the members for Birmingham, by their constituents, in Beardsworth's Repository. The tickets sold amounted to three thousand. After dinner, Mr Edmonds, the chairman, gave "The King and the People." During the evening Mr Attwood announced his intention of speedily retiring from Parliament.

—17. Parliament was farther prorogued this day to the 4th November.

By a recent ballot at the East India House, on the question of increasing the pensions of such commanders and officers as have been ten years and upwards in the Company's service, from the time they first entered, to the termination of their last voyage, the following scale was decided on:—Commanders, L.250 per year; chief mate, L.160; second mate, L.140; surgeon, L.140; third
tant-surgeon, L.70; fifth and sixth mates, L.50; midshipmen, L.30; boatswains, gunners, and carpenters, L.25. Widows, one-half of their husbands' pensions during widowhood; children, the usual proportion.

Several of the leading Jews in the metropolis have presented Sir Robert Grant with a magnificent piece of silver plate, called a paundan (a vase used at Indian tables for handing round rose-water), as a token of gratitude for his exertions to procure the abolition of the Jewish disabilities.

The struggle against compulsory payments to the church, which was sustained so resolutely in Manchester, has ended in favour of the recusants. The following was the poll:—Against the rate, 7019; for the rate, 5897; majority, 1122. A wild shout was raised in the room on the announcement of the majority, which, rapidly communicating to the multitude in the street, was re-echoed by them.

A cargo of sugar has lately been brought into Liverpool from Lima, the capital of Peru, the first of that commodity ever imported into England from that quarter.

After all the "new rules" which have been made to reduce the expense of suits at law, it appears that the costs in an action (Heale v. Coppard) which was tried at the late Sussex assizes, to recover a ten-pound note, amounted to very little short of two hundred pounds!—

Travelling was never cheaper than at present in most parts of England. One may travel in any of the steamers on any day except Sunday for one shilling to Gravesend; for three shillings outside to Cambridge; for ten shillings ditto to Oxford; from Southampton to Havre in the steam-boats for five shillings. A person may travel outside to Cheltenham or Gloucester for twelve shillings, and on by the same conveyance to Hereford or Monmouth for six more.

Edward Forburn, a dramatist residing in Milton Street, was lately summoned before the Court of Requests, in the city of London, for the sum of L.1, 8s. 6d. the price of fifteen sheep's heads, and a vast number of trotters.
The bill, it appeared, had been running on for a great length of time, the defendant having obtained credit upon the representation that the lessee of the two great theatres had accepted, and promised from time to time to perform, a tragedy which he had consumed full half of his life in writing. The plaintiff sold other delicacies, which the defendant might have had if he had fancied them, instead of the heads and heels; but whatever was the cause of it, no order ever reached the shop from the poet which did not particularise one or the other of those dainties. Edward Plaiston, the plaintiff, stated that he had indulged the defendant with a much longer tally than he was in the habit of scoring, and would have even trusted him longer, had not a very ugly trick been played upon the house by the advice of the defendant, who could not check his disposition to put people in very unpoetical situations. The trade in "jemmies" had been flourishing greatly, when, one morning, as the cellar-door was up for the purpose of receiving a new half hundred, a fellow emptied a sack of horses' heads right into it, and said,
"When you've used these, Mr Plaiston, I'll bring you another eighteen-pennorth." (Great laughter.)—Mr Forburn: Upon my honour, I never was capable of playing you so villainous a trick. Whatever fun I may occasionally cause, I take care that it is never mixed up with mischief.—The plaintiff: I have a doubt on it. What made you begin to laugh before the man was within twenty yards of the house, if you didn't know what he had in the sack? Why, you laughed fit to bust. (Laughter.)—Mr Forburn: It was at the comical appearance of the man that carried the heads. He laughed so immoderately as he walked, that he was obliged to stop three or four times, and every body knows the power of sympathy.—The plaintiff: The power of the devil! I never see'd you cry when other people cried; not a bit of it.
I'm blest if you don't laugh more nor ever when others is vexed.—Mr Forburn: If I were given to shed tears, I'd have employment enough in your house when I look at your poor wife. (A laugh.)—The Commissioner: You don't deny the debt?—Mr Forburn: Certainly not. There isn't a more honest man breathing. I never got better sheep's heads in my life than at his shop, and I seldom touch any other meat.—The plaintiff: You won't get any more of my meat. Talk to me of cutting and blowing out a half-starved donkey by way of a calf! It aint half so bad as a horse's head, and then twelve on 'em to be shot in amongst my wholesome wittles! (Great laughter.)—The Commissioner: Well, we have nothing to do with that question. We suppose that Mr Forburn is not able to pay the amount he owes you. He has very frankly admitted the debt. Now, what time will you give him?—
The plaintiff: If he hadn't come down upon me with the horses' heads, he should a had his own time; but you see people says as they pass, "I say, master, ha' you got any stallion broth to-day?" (Laughter.) It's quite unbearable. It was only yesterday, a coalheaver as belonged to the unions was a-smoking of his pipe, and he says to another as was doing of the same thing—says he,
"I say, Bill, there's the man that's like Sampson, for I'm blowed if he can't kill us all with the jaw-bone of an orse." (Laughter.)—Mr Forburn: It is useless to try to remove this impression from his mind. I am willing to pay a shilling a-week until the whole is liquidated. You see, gentlemen, by my dress that I have had a hard wrestle with misfortune. She not only proved too strong for me, but she gripped me so hard, shoulder and elbow, as to leave the marks of her nails in my garment. Ay, she is a very tyrant, for she will not leave me a stitch of clothes either upon my back or my stomach.—The sheep's head merchant acquiesced; and the unfortunate poet betook himself to the shelter of the "academic bowers" of Milton Street.

A destructive fire broke out at Moscow on the 11th of August. It began in a private house, and taking the direction of the wind, communicated to three hundred others, which, being built of wood, were speedily consumed. Some buildings in stone were also destroyed. The damage is valued at several millions of rubles.

New South Wales.—There are now forty vessels, whose united tonnage is 9655, and which give employment to 1179 men engaged in whaling voyages from New South Wales. An enterprising mercantile house of Hobart Town, Australia, are about to send out a vessel to circumnavigate the circle in the centre of which is supposed to be the south pole. The expedition will be under the command of Captain Stein.—New York paper.

SCOTLAND.

FOURTH MEETING OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION.

By far the most interesting public event that has taken place in Edinburgh for many years, is the fourth meeting of the British Association, which was held within its walls, during the week commencing with the 8th of September. This body, whose object it is to widen and deepen the channels of science, by bringing into personal contact, and generating a fraternal spirit of emulation, as well as mutual enlightenment, among the learned of all nations, was first instituted about five years ago, in imitation of those migratory scientific associations which have been long established in Switzerland and Germany; and one or two of which, unfortunately, were holding their sittings during the recent seuerunt of their British rival in the Scottish metropolis. One point of difference, however—and it is a great one—exists between the foreign associations and that in Britain. The aim of the former is simply to promote the intercourse of scientific men, and to diffuse a taste for the prosecution of science. Their existence is not permanent; their only periods of communication are their annual meetings; during the intervening space they are in a manner torpid; and, in short, there is no combined system of continued co-operation. The British Association, on the contrary, is a permanent and organised body, of which these annual meetings are the least important part of the proceedings. While the world imagines it to be inactive, it is giving, by its extensive and co-operating ramifications, an impulse to every part of the scientific system, maturing scientific enterprise, and directing the labours requisite for discovery. Two volumes of Reports of their proceedings have been published, whose main object is to classify existing discoveries, so as to enable the student to start with the most complete knowledge of the advances already made in any particular science (serving as a sort of catalogue raisonné, by means of a lucid analysis and arrangement); to point out questions remaining for solution; and, in a word, to give encouragement and direction to scientific research in all its bearings and departments. The idea of organising an association of this permanent nature, and of bringing that idea into operation, is said to be principally due to Mr William Vernon Harcourt (General Secretary of the Association); and the signal success which has hitherto marked the attempt, must make it be regarded as the commencement of a new era in the annals of science. The first meeting was held at York in 1831, at which 350 members were present; in 1832, the second meeting took place at Oxford, when the members amounted to 700; at the third meeting, last year, at Cambridge, they had increased to 1400; and we understand, that, at the late assemblage in Edinburgh, their ranks were swelled to nearly double that number.

Much local interest, of course, prevailed, as the day of meeting, 8th of September, approached, and extensive preparations were made for the public and private accommodation of the illustrious visitors. Many of course were expected to partake of the hospitality of private families; but two ordinaries were provided by subscription, where the whole members might dine together daily after the forenoon sittings. It was arranged, that, in the early part of the day, the members were to hold sectional meetings in the classrooms of the college, for reading and discussing papers on Astronomy, Geology, Physics, Chemistry, Geography, Zoology, Botany, and various other branches of science. In the evenings, general meetings were to be held in the George Street Assembly Rooms (which the proprietors painted and decorated gratuitously for the occasion), to which ladies were admitted, when condensed reports of the proceedings of the morning sectional meetings were to be read, and afterwards a popular discourse delivered on some scientific subject, liable to general discussion.

The first general meeting, accordingly, took place on the evening of Monday, September 8, and the large room was completely filled by the brilliant assemblage—upwards of 1500 ladies and gentlemen being present. A platform was raised at one end, where the president sat; and among the distinguished persons upon it were Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Professor Arago, Sir David Brewster, Sir Charles Bell, Dr Dalton, Dr Daubeny, M. Le Baron Ende, Dr Lardner, Mr R. Murchison,

Professor Powell, Dr Vlastos, and Professor Whewell. Professor Sedgwick, president of the former year, opened the meeting with an address, in which he detailed at great length the rise, progress, and objects of the association. He then adverted to their bypast labours and published Transactions. Last year a discussion had arisen on the aurora borealis, which had been found to be connected with electrical phenomena; thus forming a link in physical science. Soon after that, a beautiful arch across the heavens was seen simultaneously at various parts by, he believed, most members of the association, and experiments having been made by Dr Dalton of Manchester, as to the altitude of the arch, it was found to be about forty miles above the surface of the earth. The association at last meeting had also recommended that experiments should be made on heated bodies long kept in fusion; in pursuance of which, certain bodies were at present in the furnace, and would probably be uncovered for examination in the course of ten years. Now, but for this association, these experiments would never have been attempted. He also alluded to certain observations which had been made at Greenwich; they were as yet in a crude unreduced state; but on application being made to government by some members of the association, some hundred pounds had been obtained to assist in preparing them for the benefit of the world. Observations on the tides were also in progress, from which great good was expected. The learned professor strongly urged upon the association the propriety of confining their researches to dead matter, without entering into speculations on the relations of intellectual beings. In conclusion, he moved that Lieut.-General Sir Thomas Brisbane be elected president for the present year. The latter took the chair, accordingly, amid great applause; after which, Professor Forbes read a long report of the progress of the affairs of the institution, of which it would be impossible here to give any proper abridgement.

On Tuesday, Sept. 9, the different sections met in the classrooms of the University, elected their officers, and appointed committees for conducting the business. These preliminary arrangements having been completed, the sections immediately proceeded to the discussion of their various departments of science. The following is a list of the sections which were formed, along with their respective presidents:—Mathematics and Physics, Dr Lloyd; Chemistry, Dr Dalton (in room of Dr Hope); Geology, Professor Jameson; Natural History, Professor Graham; Statistics, Sir Charles Lemon; Medicine, Dr Abercrombie.—In the evening, at eight o'clock, the general meeting took place in the Assembly Rooms, where the company was as numerous and brilliant as on the preceding night. The reports of the proceedings of the morning sections were read by various of the learned members, but our limits, we regret, will not admit of our giving any outline of the different scientific subjects discussed. In the department of Natural History, it appeared that a paper had been read by Professor Hooker, giving an account of an excursion in Quito, and to Chimborazo, along with Captain Hall, and containing allusions to the state of vegetation in that neighbourhood, showing the general similarity of the climate of that district with the climate of the south of Europe, and, at the same time, the remarkable effects produced by the continuous spring of that climate, contrasted with the effects on animal and vegetable life, by the alternate seasons of other climates, the result being in favour of the latter. In the section on Statistics, it appeared that important investigations were in progress on the statistics of India, Professor Forbes having obtained leave of access to the archives of the East India Company. Statistical societies had been lately formed in London and Manchester, and important information was reported on the state of the working classes of the latter town. Of 4100 families (including nearly 20,000 individuals) who had been visited, 8851 were children, and of these 252 attended day-schools, and 4480 attended Sunday schools, so that nearly a half were entirely destitute of education. 689 families were found in comfortable circumstances, 651 less so, and upwards of 2500 in uncomfortable circumstances. After the sectional reports were read, Professor Robinson of Armagh delivered a most luminous and eloquent discourse on comets, which gave rise to animated replies by Professors Whewell and Hamilton.

On Wednesday, September 10, in section on Mathematics, the conclusion of Professor Molle's paper was read. Amongst the distinguished individuals who had spoken in reference to this paper, was M. Arago, who took occasion to remark, that it is to our distinguished countryman, Dr Young, that we are indebted for the theory of transverse vibrations. Amongst other meteorological objects, the origin and suspension of clouds, the origin of hail, &c., were also discussed. In section on Chemistry, crystallography formed a prominent object of discussion. A paper by Dr Charles Williams, on a new law of combustion, was read.—Amongst other facts elicited was the following, viz. that bodies are inflamed at a temperature as low as 35 degrees of Fahrenheit. In section on Geography and Geology, Mr Stevenson's report as to the change in the relative level of land and water was read. This called forth some very interesting remarks from Professor Lyell, who has recently returned from a tour in Sweden. The professor has ascertained the important fact, that the sea on the coast of Sweden has within the last hundred years sunk somewhat more than three feet. Other chiefly geological, were read; in particular, Lord Greenock, on the coal strata of Scotland, section on Natural History, the remaining part of a paper on Captain Hall's excursion in Quito and Chimborazo was read by Dr Hooker. The question of the altitudes at which certain kinds of vegetation exist, gave rise to some discussion, as did that of limit of perpetual snow; the result of which was, that theory and observation were at variance with regard to it, the character of the country always forming an important element in determining at what height snow may be found permanent. In section on Statistics, an article was read on the advantages of a school education; also a discussion on the difficulties of ascertaining the exact amount of the wages of the poor. A paper by Dr Cleland, on the statistics of Glasgow, was read, in which he showed numerous inaccuracies into which those who depend on parochial reports had formerly fallen.—In the evening, the soirée of the association commenced at the usual hour of eight; half an hour before which the large assembly room was crowded with ladies and gentlemen. After the sectional reports had been read, Dr Lardner, at the chairman's request, gave a full explanation of the principles of Dr Babbage's celebrated calculating machine. The learned editor of the Cabinet Cyclopædia commenced his address by pointing out the absolute necessity of possessing a machine by which errors in numerical computation might be obviated. That even the most perfect tables by which navigators determine their longitude are incorrect, is a fact familiar to every one. These, in the first instance, from mistakes made by calculators; and it was stated as a singular fact, that, among even three individuals, independently of each other, to make the same calculations and construct the same tables, in twenty-nine cases out of thirty they fell into similar errors. This, Dr Lardner observed, arose in most cases from the calculators either forgetting to carry one, or carrying one too many. But even allowing that the tables were correctly constructed, still in the operation of printing errors would inevitably occur. The machine invented by Dr Babbage, it is contemplated, will prevent the possibility of error in forming those tables which indicate the longitude at sea; but it would be impossible, without diagrams, to convey any idea of the explanation given by Dr Lardner of the celebrated invention of Dr Babbage. We may refer our readers to the last number of the Edinburgh Review, where it is lucidly explained in all its details, and also to an article in the 134th number of Chambers's Edinburgh Journal.

On Thursday, September 11, in the Mathematics and General Physics section, a paper was read by Professor Rennie on hydraulics, and another by Mr Phillip, on a new form of the dipping-needle, to prevent errors regarding the centre of gravity. In the Geological and Geographical section, Mr Nicol and Professor Traill each read papers on fossil remains. In Natural History, Mr Selby and Sir William Jardine read papers on various ornithological discoveries made on a tour through Sutherlandshire. Papers were also read by Mr Trevelyan, Mr J. G. Dalil (on propagation of Scottish zoophytes, illustrated with drawings), Dr Arnott (on Coculus Indicus), &c. The most prominent feature in the Anatomical section, was an interesting exposition of his views on the nervous system, by Sir Charles Bell. In the Statistical section, an interesting discussion took place on a new statistical account of Scotland, when, at the suggestion of Earl Fitzwilliam and Lord Jeffrey, the committee agreed to communicate with the Highland Society on the propriety of procuring more minute agricultural statistical details.—In the evening, Mr Buckland delighted the general meeting by a beautiful and interesting lecture on various species of organic fossils, illustrated by drawings exhibited on the wall of the room.

On Friday, September 12, between thirty and forty interesting papers, most of them by members of the highest celebrity, on various important divisions of science, were read in the different sections; but our limits will not allow of a particular enumeration. In the Geological section, Dr Traill announced that five new species had been discovered by M. Agassiz, among the specimens of fossil fishes brought from Orkney. Mr Charles Maclaren (editor of the Scotsman) read an interesting paper on the geology of the Pentlands Hills, illustrated by a map and specimens. M. Blacadder exhibited a fossil fish, found in Glamis quarry which appeared to be quite new to the scientific world. M. Agassiz also read a paper on certain fossils found in the quarries at Burdiehouse, near Edinburgh, which he conceived at first to be reptiles, but which were in reality fishes, partaking of the character of reptiles. This remarkable fact was now brought for the first time under the notice of science. In the Natural History section, Sir David Brewster gave a luminous account of a remarkable structure in the web of the feathers of birds, for keeping the laminae from separating during flight. This extraordinary fact has hitherto escaped the observation of naturalists. In Anatomy and Medicine, several papers were read, and Sir Charles Bell concluded his lecture on the nervous system. In Statistics, Captain Maconochie read a long and interesting paper on the population and state of crime in France; from which he deduced the important fact, that education was not always a sufficient guarantee against the commission of crime, and that at object of education ought to be the cultivation of the moral feelings. In 100 crimes against the person, 86 were committed by men, and only 14 by women; and in the same number of crimes against property, 79 were committed by men, and 21 by women; of all the crimes against the person committed by women were infanticides.—In the evening, howell delivered a lecture on several interesting points connected with the tides. This being the evening soirée, he concluded his interesting lecture by expressing, in very warm terms, the feelings of gratitude entertained by himself and other members of the association, for the kind and hospitable reception they had met with in Edinburgh.

On Saturday, September 13, the last meeting of the association was held in the large hall of the Collegiate Church, which was crowded to excess, the more so from the presence of Lord Chancellor Brougham, who arrived about three o'clock. The business was of a routine and ceremonial—reading reports, votive thanks to the University patrons and officers, the College of Physicians, presidents, vice-presidents, and secretaries, of the present meeting, proposals of Assembly Rooms, &c. Strong expressions of gratitude were uttered by Dr Buckland, Professor Sedgwick, and other distinguished strangers, for the hospitality and kindness they had experienced in Edinburgh. Professor Sedgwick moved the thanks of the meeting to M. Arago, perpetual secretary of the French Institute, and the other celebrated visitors, which was seconded by Lord Brougham. The president then addressed the meeting, and in conclusion joined the association to the 10th day of August 1835, when it was to assemble in Dublin—Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, to be president. It might be mentioned, that, during the week, the delegates conferred the freedom of the city on Sir John Brisbane, M. Arago, Professor Molle (from Rome), Dr Dalton (from Manchester), and Dr Brown from Aberdeen.—The following are a few of the distinguished members who attended the meeting:—Le Chev. Gregoire Berardi, F. G. Von M. le Baron Ende, Monsieur Gerard, Dr Dr Bernhard Erbkam, from Berlin, Professor Ullman of Berlin, Sir D. Brewster, D.C.L., F.R.S.; Francis Bailey, V.P.R.S.; S. Joaze, M.D., M.G.S.C.; Rev. W. Buckland, D.D., Professor, V.P.G.S., F.R.S.; C. Daubeny, D.F.R.S.; G. B. Greenough, P.G.S.; W. Hutcheson, F.R.S.; Luke Howard, F.R.S.; Rev. J. S. Henry, F.L.S. & G.S., and Professor; W. J. Mackenzie, Professor; Charles Lyell, M.A., F.R.S., F.G.S.; Rev. D. Lardner, LL.D., F.R.S.; Captain Monochie, F.G.S.; Sir G. S. Mackenzie; R. Michelson, F.R.S., V.P.G.S.; Rev. B. Powell, F.R.S.; Colonel Silvertop, F.G.S.; Professor Sedgwick, M.A., F.R. & G.S.; D. L. C. Trevisan, Esq. Bonn; A. Van der Toorn; John Taylor, Esq. Treas. G.S.; Professor Edward Turner, M.D., F.R.S.; L. & E.; H. T. M. Witham, F.G.S.; Rev. J. W. Mewell, M.A., F.R. & G. SS.; James Yates, Esq., LL. & G.S.

EARL GREY'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND. *
eldom, if ever, fallen to the lot of any statesman, whose day of power was past, to receive at the hands of his countrymen such universal and enthusiastic testimonies of respect and gratitude as have been accorded to Earl Grey, since his retirement from office, and his return to his native land; and of these his reception in Scotland, and more especially in the Scottish capital, afford all question the most striking and magnificent spectacle—for as such it has often excelled on occasions of public festivity—as a great moral tribute to public talent, integrity, consistency. Modern history, we believe, furnishes no parallel to it in the latter point of view, and in the former, it is only—“alike, but Oh how different!”—in the triumphal entries of the Roman emperors to the capital, on their return from subjugated empires.

A numerous meeting of the friends and admirers of Earl Grey, held in Edinburgh about the middle of August, at which the Lord Provost presided, it was as a grateful acknowledgement of his public services, and to invite him to a dinner in Edinburgh. Sir James Craik and the Lord Provost were deputed to present the requisition (signed by nearly 700 names), with which accordingly they waited on Earl Grey at Howick Hall, who immediately agreed to accept of it; and Monday the 15th Sept. was fixed as the day of festivity. As it was resolved to get up a magnificent entertainment on as splendid a scale as possible, considerable difficulty arose in selecting a place in which to hold it. The hall of the Parliament House was the only room in Edinburgh capable of containing a large number of persons; but the numbers expected to be present; the building was much injured by the banquet given to his late Majesty in 1822, the proposal was abandoned; and after much consideration it was resolved to erect a temporary pavilion in the grounds of the High School on the Calton Hill, containing upwards of two thousand persons. The proceedings were forthwith commenced; and on the appointed day, a wooden structure was erected under the superintendence of Messrs Hadd Smith, architects, which, for solidity, elegance, and capacity, excited the admiration of all who beheld it. It was in length 113 by 101 feet. The roof was supported by 16 pillars. The four centre columns that supported the cupola (which ran to the height of 33 feet from the floor), were strong, and well calculated to give stability to the fabric. The side walls were about 18 feet high. The centre area was level, and the seats rose gradually about three feet, affording to every individual a complete and commanding view of the whole interior. The roof sloped up to the cupola, and the pillars which supported the rest of the roof were about twenty-five feet in height. Over the chair of arms of Earl Grey were painted, and on the other end of the roof the royal arms of Scotland. In the right hand compartment were the arms of the city of Edinburgh, and on the left those of the city of Glasgow; on the ceiling (the level part), St Andrew's cross, and shield at each angle, with the sword and sceptre crossed, and the Scottish crown. Behind the chair was a chaplet of laurel. The shafts of the columns were of porphyry colour, entwined with a spiral wreath of laurel in gold. The platforms at each end were raised about three feet above the floor, and behind the croupier's chair the gallery for the ladies was placed, so as to afford a commanding view of the whole area; the corner of it was raised off for the instrumental band. The lights were supplied by the great chandelier from the Theatre-Royal, in the centre, and at each of the four angles were immense crystal lustres, all lighted by gas introduced expressly for the occasion; the whole affording a blaze of light equal nearly to that of 2000 wax candles.

The great preparations made for the reception of the venerable guest strongly excited the public mind, more especially as it was understood that the most of his late colleagues would be present on the occasion. The premier duke of Scotland, Hamilton, was to act as chairman, and a long array of noblemen and gentlemen, to the number of 200, were appointed stewards. It was likewise agreed to present Earl Grey with the freedom of the city in a gold box; and deputations from every burgh in Scotland were expected to attend with addresses. A proposal, however, for a public procession of the trades in Edinburgh and Leith was objected to by a considerable number of those bodies, who at two public meetings expressed their determination to the contrary; but the majority of them at last consented to turn out.

Earl Grey, accompanied by his countess, arrived at Coldstream on Thursday (Sept. 11), on his way to Fless Castle, the seat of the Duke of Roxburghe, where he was to remain all night. At the former place his approach was hailed with enthusiasm by almost the whole population, who had erected a triumphal arch over the centre of the bridge, the (now ideal) line of demarcation between the two kingdoms. His lordship addressed the multitude from a platform in the market on various political topics, prophesying a progressive state of national improvement from the passing of the reform bill. On Friday (Sept. 12), his lordship was escorted, by a great concourse from Fless, into Kelso, in the Town House of which numerous deputations tendered him the several addresses which had been numerous signed in all parts of the county. The incorporated bodies of Kelso erected a balcony in front of the Town House, decorated with shrubs and flowers—and all the towns and villages in the county, Jedburgh, Hawick, Ancrum, Denholm, Melrose, Galashiels, &c. supplied their contingents of the “Scottish Borderers,” and met his lordship with the banners of reform, bands of music, &c. Earl Grey entered Mid-Lothian at Fala, the property of Sir J. Dalrymple, who met his lordship, with some friends and a numerous tenantry. He was received at Pathhead by an assemblage from the whole of the surrounding neighbourhood, with banners and a band of music, and was thence escorted to Oxenford Castle, the seat of Sir John Dalrymple, where his attendants presented him with an address. On Sunday, his lordship attended divine service in Cranston church, and in the afternoon the party at the castle was joined by the Lord Chancellor, who had arrived in Edinburgh on Saturday from the north. On Monday, his lordship arrived at Dalkeith about 11 o'clock, having been met and escorted a considerable way by the trades, with flags and music, accompanied by a great crowd of enthusiastic admirers. Hustings were erected in front of the Cross-Keys Inn, where his lordship was welcomed with reiterated cheers. Mr Gray, banker, then delivered a very complimentary, and at the same time highly spirited address; to which his lordship replied at some length, taking occasion to pass a high eulogium on Sir John Dalrymple, M.P. for the county.

Earl Grey, accompanied by his friends, then proceeded towards Edinburgh, where at an early hour the whole inhabitants were astir. The weather was truly brilliant, and added greatly to the joyance of the scene, as the trades passed in procession, with banners flaunting and music playing, to the Lord Provost's house at Newington, where many thousands were assembled to witness Earl Grey's arrival. His lordship arrived about half-past twelve, accompanied by Sir John Dalrymple, in an open carriage drawn by four grey horses, and escorted by about 50 horsemen, consisting of private gentlemen, farmers, and others, with a long train of carriages in the rear. There was little cheering, but all seemed animated by great cordiality of feeling. About one o'clock, the procession, in the midst of which was his lordship, accompanied by the Lord Provost in a carriage, proceeded along the bridges to the Waterloo Hotel; and the immense concourse of well-dressed people who lined the streets, and thronged the windows and lead, of the houses, had no parallel unless during the visit of the late king in 1822. The populace thronged round the carriage, soliciting a shake of his lordship's hand, which he very kindly complied with to as many as could grasp it, until he arrived at the Waterloo Hotel, Regent Bridge. Among the company here present to receive him, were the Duke of Hamilton, Lord Belhaven, the hon. Captain Grey, the hon. Admiral Fleming, Mr Abercromby, Sir John Dalrymple, Sir John Campbell, and Sir George Campbell.

The freedom of the city was then presented to Earl Grey in a magnificent gold box (which is said to have cost £200), the entablature on the top of which has the city arms, encircled by a wreath of thistles; the border is chased in the antique style, and the body ornamented with views of Edinburgh Castle, Holyrood, High School, &c. The following inscription is engraved inside the lid:—“To the Right Hon. Charles Earl Grey, K.G. & Co. This box, containing the act of the Town Council which confers upon his lordship the freedom of the city of Edinburgh, is presented by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, Councillors, and Citizens of Edinburgh, in testimony of their respect for his character, and of their gratitude for his eminent public services. 15th Sept. 1834.”

The Lord Provost prefaced the presentation of this testimonial by a few well-chosen comments on the political life of Earl Grey, which were much applauded, and made considerable impression on his lordship, who replied shortly and with much feeling. He hoped, he said, that the measure of Parliamentary reform would not be made the ground of farther attempts to effect extensive and dangerous changes. The deputations of the various trades of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, &c. &c., then successively presented their addresses, after which Earl Grey retired to his lodgings in Douglas's Hotel, St Andrew Square.

The arrangements for the dinner were extremely judicious, and reflected great credit on the managing stewards. At four o'clock, the gates of the High School area were thrown open, and the party then drew up in sections under the appointed superintendants, and were marched in order into the Pavilion. Those who could not be accommodated there were taken into one of the classrooms, and after dinner joined the party. In the absence of the Duke of Hamilton, who declined to officiate as president, in consequence of ill health, or rather a weakness in his eyes, the Earl of Rosebery took the chair at six o'clock, supported on his right by Earl Grey, the Marquis of Breadalbane, Earl of Errol, Earl of Strathmore, Lord Lynedoch, Baron Ender, Sir John Hobhouse, Right Honourable J. Abercromby, M.P., Colonel O'Reilly, Right Honourable Robert Cutlar Fergusson, and Sir John Maxwell. On the left the noble earl was supported by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Count Flahault, Earl of Buchan, Lord Torphichen, Lord Belhaven, Sir Thomas Brisbane, Bailie Gilmour (in place of the Lord Provost of Glasgow), M. Arago, Right Hon. Edward Ellice, — Blackburn, Esq. M.P., Rev. H. Grey, and the Lord Provost of Perth. The Lord Advocate officiated as croupier, and was supported on his right by the Earl of Camperdown, Earl of Kintore, Lord Elphinstone, Lieutenant-Colonel Grey, the Attorney-General, Lord Dalmeny, Hon. E. Petre, Mr Bannerman, M.P., Mr Blake, Professor Sedgwick, and the Provost of Greenock; on the left by the Earl of Fife, Lord Kinnaird, Hon. D. G. Halyburton, G. Wilbraham, Esq. M.P., Sir C. Lemon, Bart., R. Fergusson, Esq. of Raith, M.P., Rev. Mr Stanley, the Provost of Leith, E. Wood, Esq., and the Hon. Captain Grey.

There were no fewer than 2768 persons present, including 240 ladies in the gallery; and the coup d'œil was splendid in the extreme. A rather unseemly scene took place from the eagerness with which many of the company proceeded to attack the cold viands before them, without waiting either for Earl Grey's arrival or the pronouncing of the blessing. After dinner, the usual loyal toasts were of course given, the company all standing to sing “God save the King.” The chairman then gave the health of Earl Grey, apologising for his own want of preparation, having taken the chair at a quarter of an hour's notice. Earl Grey then rose to reply, and spoke with much dignity of feeling. What he had seen that day, he said, far exceeded anything he had ever witnessed, and almost overpowered him: “I believe there is no example of any thing of the kind, when I consider the occasion which has produced this assemblage, the numerous and intelligent persons of whom it is composed, and the place where it is held—the metropolis of the ancient kingdom of Scotland, no less famed for its genuine love of liberty, than for its general intelligence, for its cultivation of the arts of peace, for its distinction in literature and in science, and, above all, for that sober, calm, and reflective sense, which, without abating or cooling the energies of popular feeling, directs it in its legitimate course, by peaceable means, to the attainment of useful and legitimate objects. . . . Gentlemen, there is another reflection, personally affecting me, which presents itself, and which is perhaps to me the most gratifying of all. This honour is not paid to a minister newly raised to power, in the vigour of his age, with a long career of active and useful service before him, and hailed as the expected author of benefits not yet accomplished: it is paid to one who has descended—I will not say who has fallen—from power—(cheering)—to one whose official life has ended, and whose long Parliamentary career is hastening to its final close—(cheers, and cries of 'We hope not!')—when the balance has been struck between his promises and his performance; when the past is before his country for its judgment, and when the future, so far as he is concerned, presents no objects either for hope or fear. Gentlemen, surely I may be allowed to indulge a just and reasonable pride—approaching, I trust, in no degree to any improper feeling of vanity or presumption—when I find myself, upon an occasion like the present, in an assembly such as I see before me, pronounced here to have deserved well of my country." (Great cheering, and cries of "You have!") He then alluded at great length to the necessity of reform, especially in Scotland, and the assistance he had received in carrying his measure from the people of Edinburgh. He trusted irritation of feeling on all sides would cease, and all classes concur in reforming the abuses of church and state. He would cherish that hope, "notwithstanding the frantic declarations they had recently heard made, not only on the other side of the Irish Channel, but even in this country, from men who would drive us to a destructive and fatal conflict—from men 'who know not what they do'—from men who do not see that even a temporary success on their part (a thing that would be utterly impossible) would not fail to entail consequences ultimately fatal both to themselves and to the constitution." He then alluded to the cry that a "reaction" had taken place, and appealed to his own reception wherever he went for a proof of the falsity of the statement. His lordship concluded his speech, which was enthusiastically cheered throughout, by proposing "the new Constituency of Scotland."—The chairman next gave "Lord Chancellor Brougham and his Majesty's Ministers," which was drunk with great cheering.—Lord Brougham disclaimed any merits of his own for the flattering reception he met with; it was owing to his serving the gracious prince who lived in the hearts of his subjects, backed by whose confidence, and the confidence of the people, the present ministry would earn universal approbation; such as they had already done under their late colleague, whose unparalleled services they were met that day to celebrate. His lordship then alluded to the dinner given him in Edinburgh in 1825, when liberal men and measures were discouraged by the frowns of power; and then proceeded, in allusion to himself—"Gentlemen, upon that occasion I said, out of office (and at that time with little prospect of ever being in it), what I am now proud to repeat in the same words I used nine years ago, and which, conscientiously—as conscientiously, I repeat now, after being four years a minister, as I did then in opposition—'My fellow-citizens of Edinburgh, these hands are clean.' (Immense cheering.) In taking office—in holding it, I have sacrificed no feeling of a public nature—I have deserted no friend—I have abandoned no principle—I have forfeited no pledge—I have done no job—I have promoted no unworthy man to the best of my knowledge—I have stood in the way of no man's fair pretensions to promotion—I have not abused my patronage—I have not abused the ear of my master—I have not deserted the people! (Great cheering.) And because I am of this ministry—my noble friend is another, and I am one with him, who never have feared the people—I rejoice, and delight, and glory, in office and out of office, in every opportunity of meeting the people, to render an account to them of my stewardship, and, face to face with them, telling them what I think, even when I may happen to think differently from them. His lordship, after enumerating the various measures carried by the Whig administration since their accession to power, condemned the zealous haste of the over-ardent reformers, and in a series of ludicrous similes described them as men so anxious to drive on in their coach that they would not wait to put the lynch-pins in the wheel—hurrying on a voyage without a compass—building a house without plummet and line, &c. &c. "These," said his lordship, "are no sufficient guides—these are no just judges—no fair critics of the measures of any British statesman. Therefore, I will go deliberately—I will take care to have my vessel in order—to have my carriage road-worthy, as my ship is sea-worthy. I will use the plummet and the square, and I will build according to rules; and I will not begin to run up that which is never to be better than a shell, if it do not indeed tumble about my head; but I will go safely and surely to work, until I can build that house in which I may live." (Applause.) His lordship then alluded to the Conservatives, with whom he had "an irreconcilable difference." "Reform" was always on their lips; but their verb "reform" was an imperfect verb, which had only a future tense. Their cry of "reaction" arose from mortified pride and ambition. "But we shall not," continued his lordship, "be hurried on at any other pace than we deem expedient and safe. We shall not take any other course on account of any thoughtless clamour from those impatient quarters to which I have already adverted; but deliberately devising what we deem just, necessary, safe, and expedient measures, we shall defy all opposition from the other and the worse class of enemies—those who are against every reform, and who, if they were left to themselves, would renew over the people the reign of terror, and the empire of midnight darkness." (Immense cheering.) His lordship concluded by drinking the health of the chairman.—The Lord Advocate proposed the health of the "Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh."—The Provost, in reply, observed, that his principles had kept him out of office for twenty-one years. He then proposed the health of the "Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow," for which Bailie Gilmour returned thanks in a speech of remarkable brevity.—After the healths of the "Marquis of Breadalbane" and "Sir John Dalrymple" had been given, the Lord Advocate proposed the health of "Lord Durham," which was immensely cheered.—His lordship, in returning thanks, observed, that the present meeting was not merely a great act of national justice to his illustrious relative—it was valuable on public grounds, as proving that the spirit of reform was not dying away. "We may not," said his lordship, "have a majority of the nobility of the country; but much as we may regret their absence, and that of their veteran leader, we must console ourselves for it by reflecting that we have here present the provosts and magistrates of all the large towns in Scotland. That tells a different tale from that trumpeted forth by our Tory adversaries; and my mind is therefore full of happy anticipations for the free and independent, the liberal and patriotic. As it is here, so would it be in every part of the empire, if an occasion were offered for such a display." His lordship then alluded as follows to a part of Lord Brougham's speech:—"My noble and learned friend Lord Brougham has been pleased to give some advice, which I have no doubt he deems very sound, to some classes of persons—I know none such—who evince too strong a desire to get rid of ancient abuses, and fretful impatience in awaiting the remedies of them. Now, I frankly confess that I am one of those persons who see with regret every hour which passes over the existence of recognised and unreformed abuses. (Immense cheering.) I am, however, perfectly willing to accept the correction of them as deliberately as our rulers, and my noble friend among the rest, can wish; but on one condition, and on one condition alone—that every measure should be proposed in conformity with those principles for which we all contend. I object to the compromise of opinions, not to the deliberation of what they should be. I object to the clipping, and paring, and mutilating, which must inevitably follow any attempt to conciliate enemies who are not to be conciliated, and who thus obtain an advantage, by pointing out the inconsistencies of which you are guilty in abandoning your friends and your principles, and attribute the discontent felt on this score to the decay or dearth of liberal principles. Against such policy, I, for one, enter my protest as pregnant with mischief—as creating discontent where enthusiasm would otherwise exist—as exciting vague hopes in the bosoms of our adversaries, which can never be realised—and as placing weapons in the hands of those who use them, to the destruction of our best interests." His lordship then gave as a toast, "Peace and prosperity to Ireland;" though he excused himself from speaking on the subject, as he had not had time to prepare himself on so vast and difficult a question. Immense cheering followed his lordship's speech, which seemed more akin to the feelings of his audience than any other delivered during the evening.—Mr Abercromby's health was the next toast. That gentleman concluded a brief address of thanks, by paying some high compliments to Mr Jeffrey, and proposing "Health and prosperity to the Trades and Working Classes." The memory of Lord Archibald Hamilton was proposed by Earl Grey, and drunk in silence. Lord Brougham gave "Messieurs Arago and Flahault, and a perpetual good understanding between France and England." The two gentlemen returned thanks briefly, in French. The health of Mr Edward Ellice elicited a speech in reply from that gentleman, in which he declared his aversion to be as strong as Lord Durham's to the clipping and paring away of useful measures for the purpose of conciliating the Tories. Sir John Hobhouse spoke in the same strain, when his health was given. The last health was that of the Solicitor-General Cockburn, after which (about one o'clock) the greater portion of the company retired. Sir Thomas Dick Lauder was then called to the chair, and presided over the remainder of the festivities.

Earl Grey spent the remainder of the week in Scotland, and, wherever he went, was received with what appeared the sincere admiration and respect of the people. The terms in which his festival has been spoken of by the party journals, are coloured, of course, with their respective prepossessions. The Whigs exult in what they consider so signal a tribute of respect to their venerable leader, if not to the principles which they support; while the Radicals point with triumph to the superior applause elicited by the sentiments of Earl Durham; and the Tories ascribe much of the excitement of public feeling to curiosity, and reckon up the large numbers of public personages who did not honour the dinner with their presence. We should have been glad, if we had had room, to admit specimens of the various comments made by different parties upon the occasion, but must content ourselves with placing on this historical record the one article of all others which seems to us to treat the matter in a historical spirit, and with the dignity and pathos of historical composition:—

"The reception given to Earl Grey in Scotland, and the festival to his honour in Edinburgh, form the highest tribute ever paid to a retired minister in this country. If a monarch had made his public entry into the land, with all the 'divinity that hedges in a king,' and with the imposing pomp of a royal train, there could not have been a finer display of national enthusiasm than that which greeted this minister, no longer possessing power, authority, the means of conferring favours, but invested with the recollection of the benefits which a patriot statesman had conferred on his country. From the moment he crossed the Border, the roads and the streets of Scotland became a Via Sacra, along which the national benefactor was conducted in triumph to his capital (we had almost written, Capitol). The reception at Rome gave to her conquerors and deliverers, Scotland has given to the man who broke the yoke of oligarchical domination, and first gave to the people the reality of representative government. A burst of grateful feeling, that eagerness to do homage to a statesman who has been greatly good and manifested, not at the moment when his patriotic labours were achieved, not whilst men's minds are excited with the grandeur and novelty of the exertions, not whilst the minister retained any portion of the wonderfully attractive influence which power gives to men in place over the aspiring and the obsequious—but when (to use his own words) 'he had descended—he would not say, fallen—from power; when I of official life had ended; when the balance had been struck between promise and performance; when the part before his country for its judgment, and the future, as far as he was concerned, presented no occasion either for hope or fear;'—that manifestation of enthusiastic approbation, we say, at such a time and under such circumstances, was the highest public honour conferred on the retired Premier himself, as well as most creditable to the judgments and hearts of the people of Scotland. There is scarcely to be found in history a more remarkable instance of the reward often bestowed on a patient continuance in well-doing, on a steady adherence to patriotic principles through a life of discouragement than in the case of Earl Grey. To apply the beautiful and expressive language of Scripture, he 'sowed in tears'—so great was the gloom that hung over his early part of his course, but he has 'come again rejoicing, and bringing his sheaves with him.' During almost the whole of his political life, he fought the uphill fight of opposition; and it was only justly close that he unexpectedly gained the summit, over the partisans of abuse and corruption out of their trenches, and gained a triumph as brilliant as had been hardly won. In 1792, he sowed the seed of Parliamentary reform, and forty years elapsed before he gathered the fruit. He assisted Mr Wilberforce in the twenty years' struggle for the abolition of the slave trade: at the end of that period he was the minister who carried that great measure; and ten nearly twenty years more, he had the immortal honour of abolishing slavery itself. All his lifetime he contended in favour of reform, economy, and peace—at threescore years and ten he crowned that life by establishing those principles practically in the government of the country. Never was there a long public life more beautifully consistent: never did consistency receive a fuller recompense. There is a moral fitness, a poetic justice, in the events of Earl Grey's career, which constitute them a grand lesson to statesmen, patriots, to men of every rank and class. They are a splendid antithesis, such as fiction perhaps never equalled—gloom ending in brightness—defeat in victory—reproach in honour—the reign of abuse succeeded by the reign of reformation—a period when in Parliament, and People, were found in opposition to freedom, succeeded by a period in which all the reformers have joined to erect an imperishable bulwark for freedom."—Leeds Mercury.

LORD BROUGHAM.

AMONG the latest and certainly not among the least striking features in the political aspect of the day, is the sudden and thorough disfavour into which Lord Chancellor Brougham has fallen with certain parties who hitherto been his most staunch and efficient supporters. Where he before was accustomed to receive nothing but unqualified laudation, he is now experiencing as usual lifted abuse; and the warmest of his quondam partisans have all at once begun to assail him (to use the expression of Mr O'Connell) "with all the fervour of converted renegades." The ostensible reason for this sudden change of tone, is the part taken by the Chancellor in the House of Peers on various measures towards the close of the session, in some of which he conceived him to have departed from his usual principles, and in others to have deceived or abused his colleagues. Amongst these measures were the Wages bill, which Lord Brougham is alleged to have taken of Lord Durham's management, and to have yielded rejection in compliment to some of the Tory peers the "poor laws amendment bill," in supporting which he conceived him to have acted most unjustly; the "poor law" bill, and "coroners" bill, wherein his lordship in their opinion acted inconsistently with all his professed principles; and various other articles of impeachment against his legislative conduct, which were no room here either to enumerate or canvass the justice of. The Times newspaper was the first to lead the attack against his lordship; but there were other journals of perhaps equal talent, and professing an entire impartiality of party (among which were the Spectator and Examiner), which expressed their condemnation of his lordship's Parliamentary conduct with fully as much earnestness, if not with equal vehemence. The accusations in the Times are not confined simply to his lordship's legislative backslidings—they extend to his whole political character; some of them are too vaguely expressed to be generally understood, and would lead to the inference referred to private transactions betwixt the paper and Lord Brougham, in which he has treated it as a libel and ingratitude." Others, however, are as spoken out as charges of so grave a nature ought Lord Brougham is openly accused by the Times of being, by his treacherous intrigues, caused the removal of Earl Grey from the ministry, of having (as it is put) "politically slain his chief;" and although the positive evidence of his guilt is led, it continues to the charge with a pertinacity and confidence would lead to the belief that it could establish its truth if it pleased. There is also another remarkable instance, that the Chronicle, Globe, Courier, and journals in his lordship's interest, while noticing the attacks of the Times, have attempted no refutation, but confined themselves merely to retaliating the tergiversating character of that journal. Lord Brougham is also accused by the Times of affecting an alliance with the King which he does not really possess, and of announcing his ostentatious iteration respecting the confidence with which he is honoured at court, as a claptrap to propagate an exaggerated idea of his importance.

In the meantime, the lively Chancellor, as if to set at defiance these attempts to shake his popularity, has been making a tour through the provinces; and certainly his reception everywhere has been such as may well prove a little consolatory amid the storm of invective with which he has been pursued. Wherever he has gone, especially in the northern quarter of the kingdom, he has been greeted with all the homage and acclamations which his high station, and even his extraordinary talents, could have demanded. In almost every burgh through which he passed, he has been made a freeman, and regresses, and the public bodies have turned out to welcome him with banners and music; and scarcely a village whose inhabitants knew of his approach, but rendered him all the honours it could pay. We must except Glasgow, however, where there was not the slightest demonstration on his arrival. The Glasgow Chronicle called at one of the booksellers' shops there, and asked for Tait's Magazine; but the bookseller happening to have a number at the time, presented a few of the other Magazines. His lordship said, "Oh, these are not mine," and laid them aside. The bookseller was at first little surprised, but immediately inquired if he had the honour of being in the presence of the Lord Chancellor. His lordship rejoined that he was, if he considered it an honour. His lordship purchased a number of the Church of Scotland Magazine, and some trifling articles, and left the shop. A considerable number of people turned out to see the Chancellor; but there was no public demonstration. The magistrates did not even greet him with the freedom of the burgh. The Lord Chancellor was likewise unnoticed at Glasgow, through which he passed on his way to Taymouth, the seat of the Marquis of Breadalbane; and we find only one trace of him during his route thither, and this was his being recognised in the kitchen of a little inn near Balloch, anxiously attending the cooking of a mess of eggs and bacon. After abiding a few days at Taymouth, he proceeded on his way towards Inverness, where he arrived on Sept. 3, having travelled on his way Inverness, the shooting-quarters of the late Hon. Edward Ellice, and the Doune of Roxburgh, in the same district, the summer residence of Grace the Duchess of Bedford. About half-past four o'clock, Sept. 3, his lordship's carriage came to a stand at Millburn, in the vicinity of the town. The magistrates, a large number of the inhabitants, and the tradesmen, incorporated, with their banners displayed, were waiting to receive him. He was greeted with the most enthusiastic cheering, which was continued during the progress of the procession to the Caledonian Hotel, where his lordship alighted. He was accompanied by his daughter, Miss Spalding, and his private secretary Mr Edmonds. Here the freedom of the town and the highest tickets were presented to him, after which his lordship addressed the assembly at considerable length. Some of his lordship's expressions here, as also at the places he visited, have given rise to much animadversion; we shall extract a few of the more noted passages. He said he was conscious the reception he had met with was not owing to any personal merit of his, but chiefly to the circumstance of his having had the honour of serving a prince from whom, for four years, he had experienced only "one continued series of gracious condescension, confidence, and favour. To find at he lived in the hearts of his loyal subjects in the ancient and important capital of the Highlands, as it had ordered him (Lord Brougham) only pure and unmixed affection, would, he was confident, be so received by his Majesty, when he (Lord B.) told him, as he would do that night's post (cheers), of the gratifying circumstance." His lordship then alluded to the acts of the Whig administration, and the various parties they had to contend with. "One set," said his lordship, "from our prejudices, are against all improvements, because they are satisfied with things as they are, and believe they cannot be made better. I respect them, but differ from them. Another set think we never do anything. They open the trade to China, and you abolish slavery, and yet we were the work of one session, and yet we are doing nothing. My own opinion is, that we have done too much rather than too little, though it was necessary to do justice, and lay the foundation of future improvement. Less was necessarily done last session than the former, because, if you open the trade to China, you do not want to open it the next. (A laugh.) I set the slaves free in 1833, there are no slaves to be set free in 1834. If you reform the Court of Chancery, the session of Parliament, the same task is not left to the succeeding session. If we have done little last session, we shall do less in the next."

His lordship afterwards proceeded to Dunrobin Castle, the seat of the Countess of Sutherland, passing through all on his road. On his entrance into Dingwall, he was met by a procession, headed by the provost, magistrates, clergyman, and the sheriff of Ross and Crom-

marty. An address with the freedom of the burgh was presented to his lordship, who, after acknowledging the honour, proceeded to Dunrobin Castle. While at Dunrobin, addresses from the northern burghs, including Wick, Dornock, Tain, and Cromarty, were presented to him. After leaving Dunrobin, on Tuesday the 9th, he passed through Forres, where the civic authorities, trades, &c. received him with due form, and presented him with an address. He then went to Elgin, where, in pursuance of an arrangement made with him while at Dunrobin, he was expected to spend some hours. So great, however, was his haste to proceed on his journey, that he had scarcely patience to wait while an address was read to him.—On Wednesday, Lord Brougham arrived at Aberdeen, accompanied by Mr Bannerman. The magistrates went out in procession to meet him, and escorted him to the town-hall, where the freedom of the city was presented, with an appropriate address from the Lord Provost. After leaving the town-hall, he proceeded to the court-house, to receive addresses from the Society of Advocates, and the Principal and Professors of King's College (who presented him with the diploma of Doctor of Laws); also, from the heads of Marischal College, the civil authorities of Kintore, and Old Aberdeen. In reply to the address from Marischal College, Lord Brougham especially referred to the establishment of the London University, which he claimed to have founded with the assistance of Thomas Campbell. In the evening, a dinner was given to Lord Brougham, in the County Rooms, attended by 360 gentlemen. After the usual preliminary toasts, Provost Blakie, the chairman, proposed the health of "the Lord Brougham and Vaux." This being enthusiastically received, elicited a long speech from Lord Brougham, consisting mainly of a justification of the measures of the Whig government, and of his own conduct. He referred pointedly to the charges lately made against him in the public prints of political tergiversation, and entered into a long explanation of his conduct on the "Warwick bill" case, in which he endeavoured to show that his judicial character interfered with his political prepossessions. "When I saw a bill," said his lordship, "come up from the Lower House, proposing to disfranchise a borough containing 1250 voters, because 19 of the voters had been guilty of receiving bribes—when I saw that bill, the Warwick disfranchisement bill, abandoned by those who had the management of it, by the noble lord who was the steady friend of that bill—I mean my Lord Radnor—who declared his opinion that it was impossible for the bill to pass, and accordingly voted for throwing it out, I was satisfied that the bill could not be persevered in. I beg to state that I sat on the Warwick bill as a judge; I presided in a judicial capacity, to decide according to my conscience. That decision, it has been said, was against all my prejudices, and that I was running against myself, and against my own views. This might be true; and it was also true that my private and political friends were also in favour of it; and the object of the bill was one which I approved—I mean the disfranchisement of persons and boroughs found guilty of bribery. I decided, therefore, in opposition to my prejudices and inclinations, in favour of a political adversary." (The Spectator, in commenting on this definition by Lord Brougham of the "Warwick bill," alleges that its object was not to disfranchise but to extend the borough of Warwick, by including the adjoining parish of Leamington Priors.) Upon Earl Grey's health being drunk, Lord Brougham said, "You will no doubt all be aware of the stupid and absurd attacks, which, in connection with that minister's resignation, have been showered upon me. But (said he, in an impassioned manner) a day of retribution is at hand—it approaches. I have allowed certain persons to go on; they have gone on; the net is enclosed around them, and they shall soon be held up to ridicule and scorn—ay, and to punishment. (Great cheers.) The falsehood of these attacks all shall be made to believe in a very short time, except perhaps one or two contemptible individuals. But although they may not be made to believe, they may be made to feel, and their conduct held up to the view of a discerning country."

Lord Brougham proceeded next to Brechin Castle, the seat of Lord Panmure; having received several addresses on his road. While at Brechin, he attended a numerous meeting held in the church. A platform was erected before the pulpit, where the freedom of both Brechin and Arbroath was presented to him, with an address approving of his public conduct, which drew forth a reply very similar to his speech at Inverness. In the evening, Lord Panmure entertained a large party at dinner; the Earl of Camperdown and Lord Advocate Murray being among the guests.

The next place of importance which the Chancellor visited, was Dundee, which he reached on Friday the 11th. Preparations had been made to give him a public reception. The Town Council voted him the freedom of the burgh, and the Guildry of their incorporation. The provost, magistrates, and dean of guild, accompanied by Lord Camperdown, met the Chancellor on the eastern boundary of the royalty, and escorted him first to the town-hall, and then to the Steeple church in Dundee, where the addresses were read, and the ceremonial of presenting him with the freedom of the burgh and the guild gone through. The nine trades also presented an address to his lordship through the convener. Lord Brougham then addressed the assembly in a long speech, in the course of which he expressed his decided opinion of the impracticability of a republican form of government in the country; which drew forth partial hissing from the auditory. He concluded with paying a high compliment to Sir Henry Parnell. The meeting then broke up; and Lord Brougham had scarcely made his bow, when, says the Dundee Advertiser, he flew like an arrow to the door, and down Union Street to the steam-boat, before one-third of the assembly had left the church. He arrived on Saturday at Edinburgh, and in the afternoon, as we have stated in our account of the proceedings of the British Association, attended a meeting of that learned society then sitting.

Aug. 19. A number of the friends and admirers of Mr Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, dined together in Cameron's Inn, Peebles. Professor Wilson in the chair, supported by the Ettrick Shepherd, Sir John Hay of Haystoun, the Rev. Alexander Stewart of Douglas, the Rev. Hamilton Paul of Broughton, &c. The croupiers chairs were filled by William Aitchison, Esq. of Minzion, Lawrence Anderson, Esq. of Castlehill, and John McDiarmid, Esq. editor of the Dumfries Courier.

—25. A meeting held at Glasgow, at which it was resolved to invite the Earl of Durham to a public dinner.

—26. Within a few days the following vessels have cleared out from this port for North America:—Earl of Dalhousie, with fourteen passengers for Quebec and Montreal; Canada, with forty-seven ditto; Cherokee, with twenty-three ditto; Jean Hastie, with ten ditto, Halifax, Nova Scotia.—Greenock Intelligencer.

—30. Between three and four o'clock, a fire took place at Lochrin distillery. By the time the engines reached the scene of action, the roof of the millhouse had fallen in, and the flames had taken full possession of a large granary of three stories on the south, and had also got to one of the floors of a granary on the north. Both granaries were filled with grain and malt. The amount of damage done is the destruction of the millhouse and granary on the south, with all the grain it contained, the partial damage of one of the floors of the north granary, in which the flames were happily extinguished, and one of the kilns. We understand the proprietors are insured to a greater amount than will cover their loss, which is said to be about L.10,000. The fire is understood to have been caused from the friction of the millstones.

Government have decided not to fill up the chair of Belles Lettres in the University of Edinburgh.

Subscriptions in aid of the fund for erecting a monument to the memory of Scott in Edinburgh have been received from Calcutta, amounting to L.493, 0s. 8d., and L.134, 18s. 2d. has been sent from Bombay for the same purpose.

Since Earl Grey's dinner on Sept. 15, L.170 has been collected for various charities in Edinburgh, by exhibiting the Pavilion to the public at 6d. a-head. It is calculated that 30,000 individuals (including the children and inmates of different public institutions gratis) have visited it. It was closed on the evening of the 20th, and has since been taken down.

Cholera.—Cholera has again appeared in the west of Scotland. At Beith, in Ayrshire, it appeared on Sept. 5; since which time there have been 69 cases, 28 of which have proved fatal. On Sept. 18, it appeared at Springburn, a small village about three miles north from Glasgow; and up to the 21st, 13 deaths were reported, and 6 cases under treatment. Glasgow itself is quite free from it at present. It has also broken out with great virulence in the populous manufacturing villages of Duntocher and Glenhead, in Dumbartonshire.

Newspaper Reporting.—On the late occasion of the dinner to Earl Grey in Edinburgh, the Times London newspaper furnished an instance of the expedition of modern reporting, which, we believe, without parallel: a report of the proceedings in Edinburgh, on the evening of Monday the 15th, having appeared in the Times in London on the morning of Wednesday the 17th. The reporters for that paper, to the number of three or four, worked by subdivision, remained in the Pavilion till nearly 12 p.m., then got into post chaises, travelled by express, and with lights and desks inside, extended their notes as they passed along at the rapid rate of thirteen and a third miles per hour. They spent in all thirty hours upon the journey, thus proving that the mail, if disencumbered of passengers, might convey intelligence from London to Edinburgh in a much shorter space of time than at present.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MATERNAL SOLICITUDE.

The late Sir David Baird was one of the officers who survived the defeat of Colonel Baillie's detachment by Hyder Ali, and afterwards suffered a severe imprisonment of nearly four years in the dungeons of Seringapatam. When the news of the disaster reached his family, and it was mentioned that he was among the unfortunate captives who were chained in pairs by the tyrant, his mother, recollecting the mercurial character of her talented son, remarked, in a tone of real concern, "Lord pity him that's chained to our Davie!"

CURIOUS TRADITION.

In the New Statistical Account of Scotland, which has reached its third number, the minister of Bronghton in Peeblesshire gives the following curious traditional account of the acquisition of a small property in that quarter, which goes by the name of the Duke-pool:—"As one of the Scottish kings (perhaps James IV.), who occasionally, during the hunting season, spent a few days at Polmood or Badlieu, was returning from one of those rambles which he frequently undertook in disguise, he passed the castle of Drummelzier, the seat of Sir James Tweedie, who was in the habit of exacting homage, and levying tribute, from all passengers. The king came up to an old man, a cobbler, named Bartram, tending his cow, and amusing himself with a tune on the bagpipe. The monarch accepted an invitation to the cottage of his new acquaintance, where he was hospitably, but with homely fare, entertained by the cobbler and his wife. In the morning the king disclosed to his host who he was, and made him a grant of certain lands in view of his house, to the extent of fourteen acres, with the pool in the centre, to be called Drone instead of Duck-pool, in memory of the tunes played on the bagpipe the evening before, and as much more ground at the foot of the Holms water as would keep a mare and a foal, with a brood sow and nine pigs, and a free passage for them to and from his house; and they were to be driven at no harder rate than a woman could walk knitting a stocking, or spinning on a rock or distaff. Bartram was also to have five souns of sheep on Holms common. After the king, accompanied by the cobbler, who had offered to be his guide, passed the castle-gate without yielding the accustomed homage, they were immediately pursued and arrested by Sir James Tweedie and his armed followers. Thereupon the king, taking a small bugle-horn from his side, and sounding it, in the course of a few minutes four-and twenty belted knights came from Badlieu to his assistance. The haughty feudal chief, having now discovered the dignity of his prisoner, fell on his knees, and implored the clemency of his sovereign, who forgave him for the present, but upbraided him with his tyranny and exactions, and commanded him against a certain day to attend his pleasure at the palace of Holyrood. The pool in the Tweed where the king was arrested is to this day known by the name of the Drone pool. It is near the march betwixt Badlieu and Glenbreck. The king charged Bartram to appear in his holiday array at Holyrood on the day appointed for Sir James Tweedie's trial, which he did, and was honoured with taking precedence of all the nobles on their entrance into the royal presence. Tweedie was tried for his offences, strip of the greater part of his possessions and titles, and was the last descendant of the Frazers of Oliver that enjoyed the honour of knighthood. Lawrence Tweedie, Esq. of Oliver, is said to be the only surviving representative of that family. The property of Bartram, now called Dukepool, has dwindled down to its present dimensions (about an acre), as is alleged, by the encroachments of the neighbouring proprietors. It is now the property of Mr Seaton, son-in-law to Mr John Bartram."

READING MEN OF MANUFACTURING TOWNS.

I can add my attestation to that of Mr Coleridge himself, when describing an evening spent amongst the enlightened tradesmen of Birmingham, that nowhere is more unaffected good sense exhibited, and particularly nowhere more elasticity and freshness of mind, than in the conversation of the reading men in manufacturing towns. In Kendal, especially, in Bridgewater, and in Manchester, I have witnessed more interesting conversations, as much information, and more natural eloquence in conveying it, than usual in literary cities, or in places professedly learned. One reason for this is, that in trading towns the time is more happily distributed; the day given to business and active duties—the evening to relaxation; on which account, books, conversation, and literary leisure, are more cordially enjoyed. The same satiation never can take place, which too frequently deadens the genial enjoyment of those who have a surfeit of books and a monotony of leisure. Another reason is, that more simplicity of manner may be expected, and more natural picturesqueness of conversation, more open expression of character, in places where people have no previous name to support. Men in trading towns are not afraid to open their lips for fear they should disappoint your expectations, nor do they strain for showy sentiments, that they may meet them. But elsewhere, many are the men who stand in awe of their own reputation: not a word which is unstudied, not a movement in the spirit of natural freedom, dare they give way to; because it might happen, that on review something would be seen to retract or to qualify—something not properly planned and chiselled, to build into the general architecture of an artificial reputation. —Tail's Magazine.

RUSSIA IN EUROPE.

Vast as is this country, extending from 40° latitude almost to the extreme arctic region, it exhibits, over the greater portion of its surface, a vegetation very similar to what has already been described in treating of other European countries. The western portion is eminently analogous to Germany and the north of France; its northern parts resemble what we have described under the heads of Sweden, Denmark, and Lapland. On the east, the great chain of the Ural mountains forms a strong line of demarcation, separating the northern European from the northern Asiatic botany; and over this vast surface winter reigns with excessive rigour; while the short summer, characterised by an almost tropical heat, induces a most rapid growth in the vegetable productions, and as rapid a decay in autumn. It is in the southern and south-eastern provinces of the empire that we are to look for the chief peculiarities; where the widely-extended and celebrated steppes are bounded from Asia Minor by those great inland seas, the Caspian and the Black Sea, or by the inaccessible heights of the Caucasian and Circassian Alps. This country has been well investigated by the celebrated Pallas; but before mentioning some of the more important productions of Russia, in general, as of the districts nearer the capital, we shall give a short sketch of those of the Crimea, a peninsula of the Black Sea, which, from its geographical situation, climate, and soil, is the only region in the empire where all the productions of Italy and Greece might be introduced and multiplied, and where, indeed, many of them are indigenous; nor is any thing wanting to effect so desirable a state of things, save an industrious and well-governed population. No country, again, can be better suited to the vine, silkworm, sesame, olive, cotton, madder, bastard saffron, and other dyeing plants, which have hitherto been imported from the Baltic, the Caspian, and the opposite shores of the Black Sea, at a heavy expense. Even the indigenous produce of the country is most wantonly destroyed. The finest trees with which nature has clothed the mountains fall before the axe in order to make miserable carriages, though only a small part be employed in their construction. For the masts, the strongest elms and ash trees are cut down, of which the solid root only is used; the most beautiful young oaks and beeches are felled for spokes, axles, and even for fuel, and the full-grown trees for felling; yet when the wheels, constructed at such an enormous waste of timber, are brought to market, they frequently drop to pieces within a month after they have been purchased. Every winter the Tartars burn, for their convenience, the fences of their fields and gardens; to replace which, the young shoots and coppices are unmercifully cut in spring; while the windfalls, and the woods needlessly felled, lie rotting in the forests. This waste of young timber, the sale of which affords the chief maintenance of the people, together with the numerous herds of goats, destroy all the young forests; so that large tracts of land, formerly clothed with lofty trees, are now overgrown with worthless bushes and underwood. The beauty of the spring season, which continues from March till the end of May, is well described by Pallas. At that time, not only are the senses gratified with the sweetest perfumes, wafted from the gardens and woods along the banks of the rivers, the last of which exhibit an infinite variety of wild-fruit trees, white and red roses, lantana, wild vines, vitalba, and jasmynes intermingled, but likewise each hill and declivity, around the champagne country, is alternately diversified with the lovely colours of the flowers that every where clothe the earth; and sometimes one, sometimes another, species prevailing on different hills, according to their situation, aspect, or soil, vary and enrich the scene. Thus, at a distance, whole sides of mountains and extensive tracts, covered with red and blue, purple or yellow tints, relieved by a background of shaded greensward, delight the eye with the most fascinating prospects. The fragrance arising from this profusion of flowers, especially March violets, and the blossoms of trees, together with the grateful odours of the aromatic herbs, embalm the surrounding atmosphere. —Murray's Encyclopædia of Geography.

Postscript.

After some stormy debates, the Spanish Procuradores adopted, on the 16th September, the report of the committee on the Cortes bonds, and on the 17th agreed to acknowledge two-fifths of the Spanish debt. It is supposed that the debate will end in the recognition of the Cortes debt in full; but the minister Torreno points out that this will be an empty ceremony, in as far as there are no funds from which to make good the recognition.

The negroes in Demerara desisted from labour on the 31st of July, and for several days thereafter manifested a spirit of insubordination, which the authorities found it necessary to check by the most vigorous measures. Several of the ringleaders were seized, and ten of them subjected to punishment. By the last accounts, great alarm prevailed in the colony.

A meeting of the Protestants of the county of Cavan was held on Sept. 22, about a thousand persons being present according to one party account, and thirteen thousand according to another: W. Rathborne, Esq., high sheriff of the county, in the chair. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. J. C. Martin, the Rev. Marcus Beresford, and other persons, and resolutions were passed, condemning in the strongest language the ministerial policy regarding the Irish church.

NEW AGENT IN REFORMATION.

It seems to be generally acknowledged, that, saving for the old historical associations connected with the Houses of Parliament, their destruction by fire is a matter of national congratulation. In their constitution they were decidedly unhealthy. Respecting the House of Commons, at least, a tolerably exact calculation might have been made of the number of the best gentlemen who annually lost their lives by riding nightly, from dusk till past midnight, amidst the crazy and indispensible azote which gathered within the walls. There was no possibility of improving the houses; nor was there much chance of new and better ones being built. Economy, as well as several other virtues, has become very much a matter of cant among public men now-a-days; and it might have been long before a sufficient number of legislators would sufficiently bold to break through the prevailing mesh of hypocrisy. While things stood thus—annual deaths on the one hand, and fear of constituents and fondness for associations on the other—the King broke in and settled the dilemma. In one night he consumed both houses, historical associations and all; and immediately every body felt relieved from a distressing difficulty. The Fire-King is acknowledged to be a reformer of the first rank, and fully entitled to the homage paid to him in the East. His former services in destroying the narrow streets of London, which otherwise might have been a receptacle of the plague to this very day, are need to mind; and many one, no doubt, wishes that he could be made to act a little more frequently in the same beneficial manner, and in things moral as well as things physical.

The principal obstacle to all reforms is the vested interest of antiquity in the thing that already exists. It is a matter in which a considerable number of people have a concern, some are sure to condemn it, they perhaps because it is old, while others see all kinds of merit in it, merely because others condemn it. A dispute arises upon the point, and, in the excitement of party spirit, its real merits are soon lost sight of. In nine cases out of ten, the thing might have been originally as the innovators wished, and the opponents would have been quite content. It is change—that dreadful thing to some—which generally forms the real point at issue. It is the choice which perplexes men; and we are clearly of opinion that there are many occasions in which it would be a privilege for all parties that such a privilege were not withheld. The deprivation might sometimes be unfavourable to popular interests, but it would sometimes be favourable also. If, for instance, it could be decreed that the mysterious and supernatural dictatorship, that the privilege of the House of Lords to vote by proxy should be taken away, and yet no one in the house or out of it should be aware of the event, or recollect that such a right had ever existed, can there be any doubt that our prospects of domestic peace would be greatly improved for it? Could the same unseen Power direct the lower orders in the United States of those political rights by the abuse of which they seem to be perpetually injuring the cause of freedom all over the world? Would it not be a blessing both to their fellow-countrymen and others? These changes should undoubtedly be made, and some others besides, of not less importance; but it is hardly possible to see any means by which they may be brought about. The world in this manner wags on under many grievous evils, which properly ought not to be among the miseries of the human race—like the unfortunate mice, previous to their happy time when they were enabled to put a bell on their fell and feline enemy.

Another chief obstacle to reformation is a kind of vis inertia which operates upon men—a power of sitting still, and putting up with things. In this manner, we often endure inconveniences in private life, with a feeling of indolent submission, despairing of ever curing them by our individual efforts, and seeing no likelihood of their being remedied otherwise. The amount of error seems so great, that we have no heart to make an effort at its correction. We consent rather to put up with the current misery, grievous as it is, than encounter the larger, though comparatively temporary distress, which would attend the business of its permanent abolition. We rather submit to the chronic agony of the toothache, than, by the fierce momentary anguish of extraction, put an end to the mischief at once. How blessed would we be, in such cases, if it were given us not to choose—if we were compelled to exert ourselves vigorously for the remedy of our troubles, or obliged, by some irresistible law of nature, to encounter the pang of cure! A country squire in one of the late Parliaments used to talk of rousing the people, and what they might be expected to do if they were once roused. The difficulty is to rouse them. They are all so much occupied with the greater objects of life, that it is hardly possible to concentrate their attention upon any of its abstract and less imminently pressing evils. There is among them a far greater disposition, voluntary and involuntary, to endure gangrenes both in their own bodies and souls, and in the body politic, than some people would perhaps allow. Indeed, the ass is not more patient of blows, or the horse of established raws, or the polypus of processes of reduction, than the commonwealth is tolerant of evils, general and particular.

A new agent is evidently wanted in social science—something analogous to the fire which has done such worthy service in rooting out the insalubrious houses of Parliament—something which, "without the appearance of any stir," as the gunpowder conspirator wrote to Lord Montague, would give "a terrible blow" to things erroneous, and yet "no one would see who hurt them"—something of which it might be said, that "the danger would be over as soon as you have burnt this letter." If those reforms, which, done or undone, seem alike the sources of dispeace, could be effected in this quiet irresistible way, without any opportunity of a worry being allowed about the matter, or any one knowing that they were going on till the whole were effected—if, in short, we could be reformed against our will, and in a manner that would leave it to no one to blame another, how happy might we think ourselves—how splendid the effect upon the three per cents! Our good old constitution might then be fairly said to have taken out a new lease of life. The lords themselves would become popular, which every body wishes they would allow themselves to be. Whole clouds of party sophistications might be spared to the eyes of mankind. No more three weeks' wrangles in the newspapers about curricles without lynch-pins, and steam-boats stopping short in the middle of their voyages, from a fear of going too fast. The very saving in printers' ink would be a consideration—the saving in the characters of versatile statesmen a still greater one. Truth and reason would once more resume their reign, and frightened propriety come back to her station. The business of the nation, being confined to a few transactions of unquestionable necessity, would be settled in about a month, instead of six or seven, as at present, and thus several thousand columns of printed palaver would be dispensed with. The subject is clearly one of first-rate importance, and we hope it will be taken into consideration at the next meeting of the British Association, which, very appropriately for such a subject, is to be held in Dublin.

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

THE discussions most generally interesting in the Spanish legislature at present—we mean in reference to the recognition and liquidation of the Spanish debt—still continue; but there has been so much chopping and changing of views and propositions since their commencement, that it is impossible to calculate how they may terminate. On September 25, Toreno, the finance minister, succeeded in carrying the first article of his project for paying off the debt, which recognises "all the debts contracted by the government at various periods, and particularly the loans anterior as well as posterior to the year 1823." In the teeth of this decision, however, the Procuradores, on Sept. 27, annulled the loan negotiated with the firm of Guebhard in Paris previous to the French invasion, by a considerable majority. The report of the committee was then sent back to be remodelled; and a majority of seven to two agreed to recommend the recognition of the whole of the debt, excepting the Guebhard loan, and that the interest on the Cortes loans should be capitalised and divided into forty portions or series, one of which should be annually drawn, and, we presume, added to the recognised debt, bearing interest. The minority of the committee, consisting of Senor Flores Estrada and the Marquis of Montevirgen, reported in favour of dividing the debt into active and passive, in the proportion of two-thirds active and one-third passive. This latter project was opposed by the minister, who very decidedly advocated the views of the majority of the committee, and expressly abandoned his own plan. On a division, however, the report of the majority was rejected, by 57 votes to 41; and subsequently the project of the minority was adopted. According to all accounts, however, it signifies very little what resolutions may be ultimately adopted respecting the debt, as there seems little chance of any part of it being paid very soon. No capitalist can be found to negotiate the loan of four millions sterling, authorised by the chambers, notwithstanding the usurious terms offered—being not less than L.100 five per cent. stock for L.60 cash. But this is little to be wondered at, considering the state of the finances. By an abstract of a budget prepared by Toreno, it appears by the most favourable—and as is even supposed falsely concocted—estimate of the finances, that the deficiency of receipts under the expenditure must necessarily be L.637,158.

We mentioned in our last that the Proceres (or peers) had adopted a resolution to the effect of excluding Don Carlos and all his line in perpetuum from their right of succession to the Spanish throne. The Procuradores (or deputies) unanimously confirmed this somewhat perilous decision, October 8, although one of the members exposed its uselessness, by representing how easy it would be for Carlos to have it repealed, should he ever succeed to the dominion; and according to the latest accounts, this does not seem quite so impossible as at the date of our last summary. It is said that the Carlists under Zumalacarraguy have taken Bilbao by surprise, and with scarcely any loss or even resistance. The possession of this seaport will greatly facilitate the obtaining of arms and ammunition, the want of which has been one of the great causes of the speedy suppression of the Carlists in many provinces. L.4 has been the regular price for every sound musket; and it seems that Miguel has been supplying money in behalf of his royal prototype in distress; at least it is said that a General Ramagosa, bearing the commission of Captain-General of Catalonia from Don Carlos, who sailed from Genoa about the middle of September, and landed on the coast of Catalonia, where he endeavoured, in concert with the curate and provost of Salma, to raise an insurrection, had obtained the necessary money and arms from Don Miguel. He was captured almost as soon as he landed, however, and shot with his two companions.

Rodil has been superseded in the command of the army by General Mina, and it was full time he was so, as his conduct appears to have been most wanton, blood-thirsty, and inhuman. Poor men have been massacred in cold blood, for no other reason than that the Carlists obtained supplies from them by force, and such like unjustifiable pretences. From others more wealthy again, he prefaced their murder by the exaction of heavy fines. It is said, indeed, that the barbarities of Rodil and his myrmidons were the means of exciting the whole provinces of Navarre, and driving thousands into the ranks of the Carlists who were little disposed for such a step.

Mina is at Cambo, being unable to assume the command in person from ill health; nor is it supposed that he will be sufficiently recovered to proceed to operations before winter sets in. In the meantime, Carlos has published a general amnesty to "political offenders," but it is not anticipated that this manœuvre will avail him much.

PORTUGAL.

WE noticed in our last number the assembling of the Portuguese Cortes on August 15, and re-election of Pedro as regent on the 25th. He was not destined, it seems, to enjoy his honours long, his health having declined so rapidly that he felt it necessary to resign office on September 18, and expired at the palace of Queluz on the afternoon of the 24th. Whatever may have been Pedro's conduct through life, he appears to have exhibited much firmness as well as Christian resignation at the approach of death, of which he was well aware. He lamented his own violence of temper, and the misconduct of his youth, which he attributed to the demoralising ignorance in which he was kept in his early years. He took an affectionate farewell of the army, having sent for an officer and private from each regiment to his bedside. He was quite sensible to the hour of his death, and appeared to have a clear apprehension of the state of public affairs. On the morning of the day on which he died, he appeared to recover very considerably, but soon sank again. He called the young queen to his bedside, and laid his solemn injunction on her to issue a decree setting at liberty all persons imprisoned for political and civil offences; this she solemnly promised to do. He expressed several times his sense of obligation to M. Mendizabal for his great services, and requested that his funeral honours should be those of commander of the forces, not of a royal personage. The body was buried at the convent of San Triente, in Lisbon, on the evening of September 27, much seeming affection and regret being testified by the crowds who were present. More than one thousand of the poorer classes attended with torches of their own accord. Pedro's heart, according to his own particular request, is to be sent to Oporto.

The prospect of Pedro's dissolution was the signal for the commencement of various party intrigues respecting the choice of a successor; one faction of the Cortes being for the Princess Isabella Maria, the young queen's aunt; another for the Duchess of Braganza, Don Pedro's wife; and a third for the Duke of Palmella. While these machinations were proceeding, Silva Carvalho proceeded to Queluz, obtained Pedro's letter of resignation, and his sanction to a proposal for declaring the young queen of full age. This dexterous manœuvre disconcerted the other intriguers so much, that they seem at once to have laid aside their own schemes, and unanimously coalesced with it. It was also unanimously adopted by the deputies, and by the peers by a majority of 20 to 6; and accordingly, on Sept. 20, Donna Maria went in state to the Cortes, and after taking the prescribed oaths, was installed queen. It is certainly not a little strange, that, only a very short time since, the leaders of the various Cortes factions were as unanimous respecting the total inability of Donna Maria to assume the reins of government, from her "extreme youth," as they are now agreed concerning the "complete development of her physical and moral qualities." Rumours of bribery are current. The queen's first act was to commission Palmella to form a new administration, which he accordingly did, and communicated the same to the Cortes, September 25, as follows:—Duke of Palmella, President of the Council, without a portefeuille; Bishop of Coimbra, Minister of the Interior; A. Baretto Ferraz, Minister of Justice; Silva Carvalho, Minister of Finance; Duke of Terceira, Minister of War; Count Villa Real, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Agostinho Jose Freire, Minister of Marine. Of these, the Bishop of Coimbra, Ferraz, Carvalho, Terceira, and Freire, belong to the extreme liberal party; Villa Real is very moderate in his politics, and Palmella rather uncertain; it is supposed that he yields reluctantly to the superior influence and popularity of Carvalho, who has the complete ascendancy in the new cabinet. Indeed it seems quite out of the question to attempt the government of the country without this minister's aid. The directors of the bank of Lisbon, and M. Mendizabal, made a communication, to the effect that their accounts with the government must close if he left the finance department.

The young queen commenced her reign by shutting herself up for a week, and ordering the tribunals to be closed for the same period, in consequence of her imperial father's demise. There is to be six months' mourning, three months deep, and three months slight.

The Chambers were re-opened on October 3, and Saldanha, one of the defeated regency intriguers, proceeded to attack Palmella, upon some alleged breach of the charter in assuming the presidency; but the minister retorted to his opponent's discomfiture.

The proposed marriage between the Duke of Leuchtenberg and the young queen appears to be in a fair way of fulfilment, a messenger having been dispatched to Bavaria with the sword of Pedro, bequeathed to him by the latter, and an invitation to repair to Lisbon. This match seems to be exciting much contention among the European powers. Russia, Prussia, and Austria, are openly opposed to it; while Louis Philip is said to be anxiously but secretly intriguing for the preference of his son, the Duke of Nemours.

Highly prosperous accounts are given of the finance department. The last intelligence of Miguel represents his being at Rome on September 29, but that he had since left it, with the intention, as was supposed, of joining Don Carlos at Navarre.

FRANCE.

THE principal news from the French capital is the great excitement which prevails in the money market, in consequence of some alleged unfair dealing of ministers with the telegraphic intelligence from Madrid, respecting the decision of the deputies upon the Guebhard loan—(see article Spain). It is said that the information of its annulment was kept up until certain holders of the stock deriving from that loan had sold out. At all events, it is certain that several speculators had obtained and acted extensively on information received prior to the official announcement by government, and a fall of seven per cent. in the Guebhard stock was the consequence.

Louis Philip has been residing and entertaining company at Fontainebleau, but returned to Paris on the 14th, when his queen and two daughters set out on a visit to Brussels. It is asserted that the differences in the French cabinet are daily becoming more serious, and that Marshal Gerard has tendered his resignation, which, however, he withdrew on the earnest request of Louis Philip. The topic of dispute is still the amnesty, which Gerard, De Rigny, Guizot, Duchatel, and Jacob, the minister of marine, urge upon the king; while Persil, Thiers, and Louis Philip himself, are obstinate in opposing it. The government is apprehensive that republican principles are spreading in the army. It is certain that considerable efforts are made to circulate republican tracts and journals among the subalterns. At St Denis, the national guards had thrown down their arms, in consequence of a sentence of two months' suspension from the command of a battalion, passed on Count Leon, the illegitimate son of Napoleon.

The National has again been seized for the insertion of a letter from M. Carrel, its late editor, which has a tendency, it is alleged, to bring the government into hatred and contempt.

The fourteenth birthday of the Duke of Bordeaux has been kept by the Parisian royalists with considerable splendour, at private balls, fêtes, and banquets. At some of these, no ladies were admitted who did not wear white and green feathers, and all gentlemen wore white cockades.

WEST INDIES.

ADVICES of rather a favourable nature have been received from the islands of St Vincent, Grenada, Barbadoes, and Trinidad, to the middle of August. It appears that in St Kitt's martial law was proclaimed and kept in force from the 6th to the 18th of August, but from that date to the 26th, the period when the last accounts were dispatched, all was going on quietly.

The town of Santa Martha, on the Spanish main, has been destroyed by an earthquake.

SYRIA.

THE last accounts from the East represent the insurrection in the territories of Mehemet Ali as being by no means at an end. It is even stated that Ibrahim had been defeated, after a bloody conflict, and had thrown himself into St Jean d'Acre, whither his father was hastening to his assistance.

GREECE.

THE dominions of King Otho appear to be in a most troubled condition, owing, as is alleged by several authorities, to the intrigues of Russia, although there appears no satisfactory proof of this charge. The young king is said to be heartily tired of his crown, and to have expressed the utmost anxiety to be allowed to return to Munich.

UNITED STATES.

The brief articles of news admitted into this paper respecting the United States, are, like all the other articles of the same kind, made up from British journals. A gentleman from New York informs us that the latter in general give very imperfect and frequently erroneous accounts of the events which take place on the other side of the Atlantic, and he has favoured us with a few notes, corrective of what we have been induced by them to state, from time to time, in the present sheet.

February 1834, p. 122.—Two points in the President's message deserve especial notice. 1st, His charge against the United Bank for interfering in elections by using its funds for the purpose of bribing electors. This and all other charges made by him are entirely unfounded, although the various committees, or a majority of them, were devoted to him, and well disposed to find something wrong. The proceedings of the last committee appointed by the House of Representatives for that purpose will afford a good illustration of the temper of the enemies of the bank. The bank is in Philadelphia, where, of course, all the book vouchers are kept. When the committee arrived there, the members of the bank appropriated a room in the banking-house, and appointed one of their number to wait upon the committee to show the books, &c., and give all the information desired. But this did not suit the views of the committee; they insisted on having the books, &c. sent to the tavern where they put up, and unaccompanied by any director of the bank. Such a demand was very properly resisted. The committee returned to Washington, and reported that the bank refused to show its books to a committee appointed by Congress!

But what do you suppose was the means of corruption used by the bank?

I will tell you what was proved, and to which the directors pleaded guilty. About the year 1830, Albert Gallatin, who was secretary of the United States under John Quincy Adams, and who is acknowledged to be the ablest financier in the United States, published in the North American Review an article on American banking. It was generally esteemed a very able exposition; and the directors of the United States Bank finding this institution assailed by Jackson, and held up to public odium, at the hardihood to publish said article in pamphlet form for general circulation. They also published and circulated several specimens made by members of Congress in their places, among others at Mr George McDuffie of South Carolina. These I assure you were the only charges proved, and they were never denied. In spreading information among the people by corrupting them, they are indeed guilty. But admitting that they had been guilty of any or all of the charges, the course pursued against them is arbitrary and illegal. The greatest criminal is allowed to sit and call evidence in his own defence, and, if not proven guilty is in the eye of the law deemed innocent. But Jackson suspects the bank of guilt, and inflicts punishment on suspicion, by denying it of a privilege for which it paid one and a half million of dollars. The constitution pointed out the proper course, viz., to a secretary to bring the directors before the proper tribunal so glaringly arbitrary was this proceeding deemed by the treasury of the treasury. Mr Duane, who refused to sign the order for the removal of the deposits, although he was a devoted adherent of Jackson. But he soon received a hint that his services were no longer required. A plant tool was soon found in Rogh. Taney, the present secretary. The consequences have been as few, even more reckless if possible than Jackson, would have contemplated.

The second point to which I shall advert is the change one constitution, so that no President or Vice-President shall be eligible for more than one term. He showed his sincerity in this matter by using all the influence which his station put in his power to secure his re-election. Every man holding office under the government, however insignificant that office, was ruthily proscribed, if he dared to utter sentiments in opposition to the measures of Andrew Jackson. This course raised up a host of hungry expectants, who were perpetually on the watch to note and report any delinquency from the true faith. General Jackson dismissed more men from office during the first year of his term than all the Presidents before him. This will appear to be an immense number of power, when it is known that the President under his patronage, directly and indirectly, 40,000 men in cases of various kinds. To these add their families and dependents and others looking for offices, and the number is swelled to more than 100,000.

March, p. 135.—How does any clergyman or any body else know that there are 80,000, or even 8000, in the city of New York, no avow their disbelief in the Bible?

May, p. 147.—The statement that ninety-six banks have led in the last few months is very erroneous. The list is evidence of all that have failed since the erection of the present government. Some four or five banks stopped payment last spring, but they resumed business again, with the exception, I think, of two or three. It is the statement correct that the United States Bank first extended its discounts, and then contracted them, to embarrass the government. It did not contract to the amount of the deposits retained; and just before I left the country (July 15), the directors called to the resolution to extend their discounts ten millions. If any one were wanting of the confidence of the people in the soundness of the bank, it may be found in the fact, that when Jackson received the deposits the stock fell to 103 and 104; but by a New York paper which I saw at Glasgow, up to September 15, it is quoted at 110; thus showing that the bank is regaining the confidence of the public.

June, pp. 153, 154.—The simple act of removing the debts from one bank to others being followed by such consequences, will cease to excite surprise when the illegal manner in which it is done is taken into account. Nor is it a proof of the instability of the monied institutions. What bank in Great Britain would have come out of the contest unscathed, if so rudely and bitterly assailed by those in power?

Frightful accounts have been received of the consequences of repeated eruptions of Mount Vesuvius, which took place on the 27th, 28th, and 29th August. The sands of families were seen flying from their native haunts, old and young dragging through heavy masses of heated cinders. Fifteen hundred houses, palaces, and other buildings, and 2500 acres of cultivated land, have been destroyed by the fire. The eruption had been previously expected from the drying up of the fountains. The first explosion destroyed the great cone situated on the top of the mountain. The abundance of inflamed matter produced flashes which darted through the mountain's flanks. A new crater burst open at the top of the great cone, and inundated the plain with torrents of lava. The king and the ministers hastened to the seat of the catastrophe, to console the unfortunate victims. The village of St Felix, where they first took repose, had already been abandoned. The lava soon poured down upon this place, and in the course of an hour, houses, churches, and palaces, were all destroyed. Four villages, some detached houses, country villas, vines, beautiful groves and gardens, which a few instants before presented a magnificent spectacle, now resembled a sea of fire. On 10th September, nothing but stones and cinders were ejected, and every prospect existed of the eruption being so at a close. The palace of the Prince of Attayano and 300 acres of his land are utterly destroyed. The cinderell during an entire night over Naples; and if the lava had taken that direction, there would have been an end to that city. The great subject of alarm was the risk one ashes or lava setting fire to the powder magazine, the explosion of which would have produced most calamitous results. The habitations of 180 families have been swallowed up, and 800 individuals bereft of an asylum.

A letter from Italy, dated September, in the Edinburgh Correspondent of the 17th October, gives the following account of a dreadful storm which ravaged all the countries in the immediate vicinity of the Alps:—"It is quite customary and expected (says this writer) after a very hot summer, the streams and rivulets, swollen by the melting glaciers, should occasion considerable damage, but now, from the Gulf of Genoa to the Adriatic," along the chain of the Appenines and Alps, a total solution seems to have wished to transform the aspect of all those countries, and probably it has rarely been known that so many instances of far-spread desolation have occurred at the same time. The St Gotthard route suffered less, but the Bernardino so much the more. Several valleys are fearfully ravaged, and the beautiful spot Roveredo, above Bellinzona, scarcely exists except in name. The grand bridge across the via Mala and that part of the road is ruined. The old bathing-house of Andeeho and other dwellings were rinsed away. The village Campo Dolcino is buried beneath rocks, gravel, and sand. Isola is under water. The Serio and other rivers have driven the inhabitants of Bergamo to their feet. Padua is converted into a wilderness. The villages which fell there were generally one kilometre in weight, and some were found weighing from five to four kilogrammes (8 pounds). Simultaneously sulphurous vapours rose from the ground, so that the wretched inhabitants were beset on all sides. On the 15th August, a thunder-storm broke out at Rome, the like of which has not been within the memory of man. The air appeared filled with clouds of dust. The thermometer rose to 32 degrees Reaumur (104 F.), a strong wind blowing from the south. Many people grew sick, and several died suddenly. There are who insist on connecting these phenomena with the dreadful eruption of Vesuvius, which also took place on the same day."

A letter from Rome (says the Quotidienne) announces that the Pope has presented to Marshal Bismarck a country seat, with 600,000 francs, out of gratitude for the service done the church by the destruction of the piracy (Algers).

IRELAND.

MR COBBETT has been delivering lectures in Dublin elsewhere on political economy, especially on subjects more immediately concerning the welfare of Ireland. In Dublin he lectured three nights, but appears to have been very cautious in expressing his opinions on all subjects but the poor-laws, a proper system of which he advocated as the grand panacea for all the ills of Ireland—in this respect differing totò cœlo from Mr O'Connell. The hon. lecturer seems to have made a considerable sum by his prolusions, his receipts amounting to L.150, and expenses of house-room only L.20. Mr Cobbett having left Dublin, made an attempt to lecture in Kilkenny. About one hundred tickets were sold at a shilling each; but a crowd of ardent patriots flocked into the room, forgetting to leave their money at the door; and this caused so much squabbling, that Mr Cobbett would not appear. The unlucky ticket-holders clamoured for their money, which was not given back; and the police had at length to be sent to clear away all parties. Mr Cobbett then hastened to Waterford; but the mayor refused the use of the Town-hall, unless the receipts were sent to suitable institutions—a condition to which the hon. lecturer would not agree. We have not traced his farther progress, but, from lucubrations in his Register, it is evident that he has been scanning the condition of society with an observant eye. The contrast between the wretched state of the working classes in Ireland, and the comparatively luxurious condition of their brethren in England, is so homely and graphic, and unfortunately, we fear, so true, that we are induced to transfer a portion of one of his lectures from Dublin (to John Marshall, a labourer on Mr Cobbett's farm at Surrey) to our limited pages:—"I have this morning seen more than one thousand of working persons, men and women, boys and girls, all in rags, and all the clothes upon the bodies of all of whom were worth so much as the smockfrock you go to work in, and you have a wife and eight children, seven of whom are too young to go to work. I have seen the food and the cooking of the food, in a large house where food is prepared for a part of these wretched people. Cast-iron coppers, three or four times as big as our largest brewing coppers, are employed to boil oatmeal (that is, ground oats) in water, or butter-milk, or skim-milk; and this is the food given to these poor creatures. The white cabbages, the barleymeal, the potatoes, the whey, and the butter-milk, which George buys daily for our little pigs and their mothers, is a deal to obtain a mouthful of which thousands of these people would go on their knees. Marshall, you know who I scolded Tom Denman and little Barrat, and my own son Dick, on the Saturday before I came here, for not sweeping the sleeping place of the yard—how clean, and what a strict charge I gave George to get out the old bed, and to give them a bed of fresh straw every Saturday. Oh, how happy would thousands upon thousands in this city be if they could be lodged in a place like that roughest hog-bed! It is the case of whole streets as long as the main streets of London and Farnham. Your pigsty, and Turvill's pigsty, and the sties of other labouring men, are made by themselves, with posts, and poles, and rods, and rails, and your supply of straw is very scanty, and compels you to resort to fern and dead grass from the bog; but, and now mind what I say, I saw Turvill's pigsty the day before I came off, and solemnly declare, in the face of England and of Ireland, that Turvill's two hogs were better lodged, and far better fed, and far more clean in their skins, than are thousands upon thousands of the human beings in this city, which as to streets, squares, and buildings, is as filthy as almost any in the world."

The provincial journals furnish the usual melancholy details of murders and assaults, starvation, distress for rent and tithe, &c. A number of Irish landlords have taken upon themselves the payment of tithe due from the tenants, by raising the rent on the latter—others have been endeavouring to extirpate their Catholic tenants, and supplant them with Protestants; but neither of these projects appears likely to succeed. The tenants, whether Catholic or Protestant, are alike disinclined to pay the increased demand, either in shape of rent to the landlord or tithe to the clergyman. On the other hand, the clergy appear to become more and more resolute in the determination to enforce "their rights." Societies are being formed and funds collected to defray the legal expenses of recovering their tithes, and frequent meetings of the Conservative Society of Ireland have been held and resolutions adopted for "promoting the cause of Protestantism." Against these meetings and their proceedings, Mr O'Connell is now directing his thunders in his letters to the "People of Ireland."

The recent law appointments, too, consequent on the death of Justice Jebb, furnish another theme for the honourable gentleman's wrath—the parties promoted being from the ranks of those entirely independent of his control. He now explains that his late avowal of being a "ministerialist" was under certain reservations, and for two reasons; the first of which latter was, that he pays "very little attention to any thing Lord Brougham says," as "he makes more foolish speeches than any other man of the present generation," and that he will "start him ten to one, ay fifty to one, in talking nonsense, and flatly contradicting himself in one dozen of off-hand discourses, against any other man now living." The second and the better reason is, "that it is the duty of the popular party in Ireland not to give the ministry any excuse for continuing their unjust partiality to the Orange faction, or their unjust oppression of Ireland."

A large agricultural dinner, held in Waterford on Monday, October 6, has attracted no little attention from certain expressions which fell from Lord Ebrington, who presided, in reference to the corn-laws. According to the report of the Globe (ministerial paper), he "begged the gentlemen of the county not to be alarmed at the fears expressed by Mr Barron, that there was a probability of the corn-laws being repealed. There was no likelihood of such repeal; it was not, he believed, the intention of the present government to do away with the corn-laws. Besides, the manner in which the subject was received when introduced into the House of Commons, afforded no grounds that those laws were likely to be repealed. He agreed with Mr Milward that the depreciation in the price of corn was chiefly owing to the abundant harvest in this country and in England, but particularly in England."

The monks of La Trappe, established on a wild tract of land at New Melleray, county of Waterford, have already brought into profitable cultivation upwards of one thousand acres of ground, which plough or spade had never before touched. They have planted thirty thousand young trees on the mountain, and their garden has this year produced cabbages, potatoes, turnips, cauliflowers, and other vegetables. They have six hundred acres of mountain in their possession.

The Innisfail steam-boat, a splendid vessel which plies between Dublin and Cork, caught fire while at anchor at the latter town, on September 29, and before it could be extinguished, L.5000 worth of the cargo was destroyed. The damage to the vessel itself was estimated at L.600.

ENGLAND.

DESTRUCTION OF BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT BY FIRE.

A CASUALTY of a most unwonted nature occurred in the metropolis on the evening of Thursday, Oct. 16, being nothing less than the complete destruction, by fire, of the two ancient houses in which the British Parliament has for ages assembled! The historical relics and associations of centuries swept away in a few hours! It was first discovered about seven o'clock, near the lower end of the House of Lords, and seemed to rage fiercely, embracing all that quarter of the building, as it were, simultaneously; and the deep ruddy glow emitted, shone far and fearfully perceptible even through a strong twilight. It had scarcely been noticed, when the flames were seen bursting through every window of the facade of the Upper House, and the wind unfortunately blowing strong from the south-west, greatly accelerated the conflagration. The spot, also, where the fire commenced was so central as equally to endanger every building around—Westminster Hall, particularly, was in most imminent danger, and Westminster Abbey, too, stood fronting the blazing pile so close as to be lit up to its highest pinnacles. With such speed did the flames spread, that before eight o'clock the whole structure, from the portico by which the peers enter, to the corner where it communicates with the committee-rooms of the House of Commons, was in one blaze. The House of Commons was soon almost entirely destroyed. From its situation, and the unlucky circumstance of the tide being at the lowest ebb, there was a very scanty supply of water, and the application of only one or two engines, disadvantageously placed, could be brought to bear upon it. The destruction of the House of Lords was not so speedy. The fire had proceeded to the body of that house, taking within its range the several official apartments over the piazza, and which faced Palace Yard; thence proceeding to the Painted Chamber, and extending to the library, which was originally most valuable, and has recently been much enlarged; yet although all these were eventually destroyed, it was not till late in the night; and even at one o'clock the flames were continuing. The library, which was a modern, large, and beautiful building, was soon completely destroyed, the roof falling in with a tremendous crash. The octagonal tower near the pier, which faces Abingdon Street, was a remarkable object in the progress of the conflagration. The lower room of this tower, and which is over the peers' entrance, is the Lord Chancellor's retiring or robing-room. Curiously enough, though the fire raged on all sides and above, this room was spared at least till one o'clock. Beyond the library is the new gallery with its beautiful scagliola-compo columns, and elaborately tasteful cupola, along which the King used to proceed to the Painted Chamber, and thence to the robing-room, previously to his opening Parliament. It was the work of Sir J. Soane. That gallery and the staircase are preserved; an escape that is attributed to the fact of a thick party-wall separating it from the library, &c. That end of it which was near to the (late) Painted Chamber did not escape scorching. While this horrible destruction was proceeding without hope of arrest, all exertions possible were made to save Westminster Hall, and an account of the beginning, progress, and eventual success of these exertions, cannot but be interesting. At a little after seven, it appears, on going to the front of the hall, its strong iron-railed gate was found closed fast, but the inner door was open; and through the great southern window at the end, volumes of flame were seen rolling through three windows opposite and immediately near it. There was no one in the hall—it seemed as if it were deserted, and abandoned to the approaching fire. It was in vain to think of breaking the iron fence. Some gentlemen then, it appears, who felt the nature of the emergency, returned to the scene in Palace Yard, and succeeded in persuading a party of firemen to break open the small postern which, from that side, leads into the hall. This was done by great exertion, and an entrance effected. Here a short passage, of some ten paces in length, alone used to intervene (it intervenes no longer now) between the great window of the hall and the three from which the triumphant flame rolled. The imminent danger, therefore, may be conceived. But two engines having been introduced into the body of the building, the one to convey water to the other, which worked against the formidable enemy from the scaffolding in the hall; ladders also having been quickly placed against the great window, the firemen, ascending to its base, found ample room to play upon the blazing element, which thence confronted them. Their exertions were all that could be expected from zeal and manliness. Several bodies of the guards now came down; and Earl Munster, Lord Melbourne, Sir John Cam Hobhouse, and many other persons connected with government, besides several officers of the guards, appeared on the scene of action in the hall. There was zealous interference now on all sides, but a great want of a commander-in-chief. Between ten and eleven two great masses of the frontage of the House of Lords fell in, but in consequence of the heaviness of its timbers, and probably its numerous mural subdivisions, it still continued to burn most fiercely. The House of Commons had at this time fallen. The flames were attacking with great force both flanks of the hall—the committee-rooms on the one hand, and on the other certain private apartments and passages communicating with the Commons and the Speaker's house. By this time, however, the greatest danger to the hall had passed. The engines had so successfully opposed the fire, that although it had consumed all but the beams and walls of the building in which it raged, it had made no further impression on the hall than by causing extensive fractures of the glass of the window. While they were thus employed, a partial attempt was made to save some papers from one of the offices of the Parliament building, to the lower part of which the fire had not as yet reached. With the distraction consequent on this, the fire was, however, again allowed to near the hall through a by-passage, and for a time it was again in great danger. The destruction without presented at this time to those within the hall, a scene of singular impressiveness. The flames at each side showed ominously through the upper line of Gothic casements, flaring against the old oak timbers, through some of the larger lower windows on the middle line; and on the eastern side, next the Speaker's house, the fire seemed to glow through the lath and plaster with which they have been screened up; while in one place, where there has been a private door, the wooden framework blazed round an orifice, which seemed like the mouth of one of the potteries. Here the hall was, in truth, on fire. Before the great window, at the same time, there was a deep dull red, in the midst of which the ribs of the burnt building stood, but occasionally veiled by thick volumes of smoke, or a fall of burning particles. On the floor of the hall, and amid piles of brick, newly-hewn stone, timbers, and all manner of obstructions, were the two engines worked by their respective companies' labourers, the firemen shouting their directions from above to those below.

An interference more useful than any at last came. The wind shifted more to the west, and, with the exception of the flames at the committee-room corner, turned the fire riverward, and from the hall. From that moment its destruction could no longer be dreaded. Various graphic accounts are given in the different journals of the imposing aspect of the fire at different points. As viewed from the river above Westminster Bridge, it was particularly grand. From the new pile of buildings, in which are the Parliament offices, down to the end of the Speaker's house, the flames were shooting fast and furious through every window. The roof of Mr Ley's house, of the House of Commons, and of the Speaker's house, had already fallen in, and, as far as they were concerned, it was quite evident that the conflagration had done its worst. The tower between these buildings and Jerusalem Chamber was a light on every floor. The roof had partially fallen in, but had not yet broken clean through the floors. The rafters, however, were all blazing, and from the volume of flame which they vomited forth through the broken casements, great fears were entertained for the safety of the other tenements in Cotton Garden. The fire, crackling and rustling with prodigious noise as it went along, soon devoured all the interior of this tower, which contained, we believe, the library of the House of Commons. By eleven o'clock it was reduced to a mere shell, illuminated, however, from its base to its summit in the most bright and glowing tints of flame. The two oriel windows which fronted the river, appeared to have their frameworks fringed with innumerable sparkles of lighted gas, and as those frameworks yielded before the violence of the fire, seemed to open a clear passage right through the edifice for the destructive element. Above the upper window was a strong beam of wood burning fiercely from end to end. It was evidently the main support of the upper part of the building, and as the beam was certain to be reduced in a short time to ashes, apprehensions were entertained of the speedy fall of the whole edifice. At this time the voices of the firemen were distinctly heard preaching caution, and their shapes were indistinctly seen in the lurid light flitting about in the most dangerous situations. Simultaneously were heard in other parts of the frontage of the river, the smashing of windows, the battering down of wooden partitions, and the heavy clatter of falling bricks, all evidently displaced for the purpose of stopping the advance of the flames. The engines ceased to play on the premises whose destruction was inevitable, and poured their discharges upon the neighbouring houses which were yet unscathed. A little after twelve o'clock, the library tower fell inwards with a dreadful crash, and shortly afterwards the flame, as if it had received fresh aliment, darted up in one startling blaze, which was almost immediately quenched in a dense column of the blackest smoke. During the whole of the fire there was no disturbance; yet the streets were very densely crowded. Within less than half an hour after the fire broke out, it became impossible to approach nearer to the scene of the disaster than the foot of Westminster Bridge on the Surrey side of the river, or the end of Parliament Street on the other. Many of the records and state papers were, it appears, saved by the exertions of Lord Melbourne, by whose direction waggons, hackney-coaches, cabs, &c., were hired, and a large number of the military were employed in removing the ancient records that were deposited in the remaining apartments of the House of Lords. These waggons, when filled, were driven to the newly-erected State Paper Office in Downing Street, under an escort of soldiers. The state papers were removed from the Parliament Office into the gardens, and those which are of ancient date were undisturbed in their usual fireproof vaults under the Painted Chamber, very near the spot where the Guy Faux combustibles were discovered. The splendid mace of the Speaker, worth £400, was saved by two firemen, who ascended a ladder while the premises were burning, and entered the second floor window. The Chancellor's papers are amongst others which were saved, but several of the smaller papers and parchments were strewn about the road fronting the portico. Lord Auckland dispatched a messenger to Deptford, who brought an immense tarpaulin, which was thrown over the books and papers in the garden, to prevent the sparks firing them. During all this, Lord Duncannon especially distinguished himself. He ascended the roof of the House of Commons, to watch and superintend the play of the engines, and, owing to the rapid spread of the fire, his lordship was in considerable danger, especially as he gallantly refused to leave the roof till all the firemen and soldiers who were with him had first descended. Lord Frederick Fitzclarence, and some policemen and soldiers who were with him, were at one time in great danger, being in one of the top rooms of the turret at the western corner while it was burning below. A fireman's ladder was, however, placed against the top, by which they descended one by one, Lord Fitzclarence being the last, and he had scarcely reached the ground when the turret fell. Lord Munster, too, had a very narrow escape, for, about three o'clock, his lordship was about to enter one of the libraries at the eastern wing of the Commons, urging the men to rescue the valuable works therein deposited, when part of the rafters of the ceiling fell in, and a labourer seized his lordship by the collar, and dragged him from the apartment, the ceiling of which immediately afterwards fell in, and the man's shoulder was dislocated by the rafters. When the roof of the House of Commons fell in, some firemen were buried in the ruins, but were got out without being much hurt.

On Friday the ruins continued smoking, and engines were kept playing on them the whole day. The Speaker's house was quite gutted. St Margaret's church was literally crammed with papers, furniture, and boxes of every description. Various rumours were of course abroad as to the cause of the fire, but nothing can yet be depended upon. Of the House of Commons nothing remains but the walls; all else is gone; so are all the rooms and offices between that and the House of Lords; but in that the fire seems to have had the greatest scope. Nothing at all of it is left saving the back wall. The walls in front of Old Palace Yard have all tumbled down, and the place presents all the appearance of a complete ruin. Great destruction had taken place in the Speaker's house by the removal of the furniture, and breakage of the plated glass in the windows. The furniture was all placed in the garden; so also were the books which formed his splendid library. We are glad to say that the greater number are saved, and were being taken into rooms in the house, which were untouched, when the Speaker (who had been sent for by express to Brighton) arrived about twelve o'clock. He seemed glad that the matter was no worse. Lady Sutton's jewels and wardrobe were also saved, and a valuable marble chimney-piece, worth £200.

There is at least one great subject of congratulation connected with this conflagration—the preservation of the contents of the two libraries. Very few of those of the Lords were destroyed, and all the Commons books were saved. Mr Hume is said to have been particularly active in assisting in their removal, as also Lords Melbourne, Althorp, Auckland, Sir John Hobhouse, Lord Hill, and others. Lord Althorp's chief anxiety, however, was for the preservation of Westminster Hall, as appears from his exclamation upon being told of the inevitable destruction of the House of Commons, "D—n the House of Commons, let it blaze away!—but save—oh! save the hall!"

The amount of damage done cannot yet of course be ascertained, but the following official account of what was known to be destroyed, was on the following day issued by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests:—

House of Peers.—The house, robing-rooms, committee-rooms in the west front, and the rooms of the resident officers, as far as the octagon tower at the south end of the building—totally destroyed. The Painted Chamber—totally destroyed. The north end of the royal gallery abutting on the Painted Chamber—destroyed from the door leading into the Painted Chamber, as far as the first compartment of columns. The library and the adjoining rooms, which are now undergoing alterations, as well as the Parliament offices and the offices of the Lord Great Chamberlain, together with the committee-rooms, housekeeper's apartments, &c. in this part of the building, are saved.

House of Commons.—The house, libraries, committee-rooms, housekeeper's apartments, &c. are totally destroyed (excepting the committee-rooms Nos. 11, 12, 13, and 14, which are capable of being repaired). The official residence of Mr Ley (clerk of the house)—this building is totally destroyed. The official residence of the Speaker; the state dining-room under the House of Commons is much damaged, but capable of restoration. All the rooms from the oriel window to the south side of the House of Commons are destroyed. The levee-rooms and other parts of the building, together with the public galleries, and part of the cloisters, very much damaged.

The Courts of Law.—These buildings will require some restoration.

Westminster Hall.—No damage has been done to this building.

The furniture, fixtures, and fittings, to both the Houses of Lords and Commons, with the committee-rooms belonging thereto, are with few exceptions destroyed. The public furniture of the Speaker is in great part destroyed. The furniture generally of the Courts of Law has sustained considerable damage.

Soon after the breaking out of the conflagration, a messenger was sent off to the King at Windsor; and his Majesty immediately made an offer of Pinlicko palace to the nation, but no determination seems yet to have been come to by Ministers on the subject.

After the strictest inquiry, it seems to be satisfactorily ascertained that this tremendous conflagration was purely accidental; and it is attributed to the overheating of the flues of the House of Lords, by the incautiously overfeeding the stoves with the old wooden tallies of the Exchequer Court, which had been appropriated lately as fuel. Comparatively few accidents occurred, and none (as far as known) fatal, notwithstanding the immense multitudes, and confusion arising from the driving of coaches, waggons, fire-engines, &c.

It deserves to be recorded, that, notwithstanding the appalling nature of the spectacle, a general feeling of meriment seemed to pervade the spectators, if we may judge from the many "good things" picked up by the newspaper reporters. One artisan was heard to exclaim, "Well, I'm blessed if ever I thought the two houses would go so near to set the Thames on fire!" Another, in allusion to Mr Hume's motion some time ago for a new House of Commons, exclaimed, "Mr Hume's motion is carried by fire, without a division!" Some even hinted (of course jocularly) at the probability of the hon. member being the incendiary. There were many witticisms elicited by the seeming difficulty of the fire in making its way through the Court of Chancery; and the anticipated consumption of several recent acts and motions amongst the Commons' records was hailed with such cries as, "There goes a bit of the poor-law bill!"—"the evidence of the temperance committee!" &c. &c. A poor sweep was in high glee at the thought of their new "hact" being destroyed, and commenced roaring "Sweep!" most lustily: he was corrected, however, by a brother in the same calling, who assured him that "master had a copy of the hact at home." "But," rejoined the other, "he'll not be such a fool as to let the Parliament chaps know that." Some, it is said, went so far as to express regret that the members of both houses were not sitting at the time. In short, we are told that the sense of the property of respectable private individuals being endangered, and the lives of many brave and honest men in jeopardy, alone restrained an universal disposition to laughter!

DESCRIPTION AND HISTORY OF THE OLD HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

House of Lords.—This house was originally the Old Court of Requests, in which the masters of the court received the petitions of the subjects to the king. The court or hall was fitted up in its recent manner on the occasion of the union of Great Britain and Ireland. The throne was new on the accession of his late Majesty George IV. It was a very handsome, if not a splendid room, of an oblong description, rather smaller than that of the Commons. In the front next to Abingdon Street it was decorated with pinnacles. The celebrated tapestry of the House of Lords, representing the defeat of the Spanish Armada, after being taken down and cleaned, was used to decorate the walls of the one which has fallen a prey to fire. The tapestry was greatly admired. It was divided into compartments by frames of brown-stained wood, each compartment containing a portion of the story. The heads which formed the border to these compartments were portraits of the several gallant officers who commanded in the English fleet on that memorable occasion. Between the House of Lords and Commons was the Painted Chamber, where all the conferences between the two houses were held. The room is said to have been Edward the Confessor's bedchamber. The mass of buildings in the Old and New Palace Yards, which constituted the ancient palace of the monarchs of England, erected by Edward the Confessor, were mostly consumed by fire in the year 12; the court afterwards removed to Whitehall at St James's.

House of Commons.—The house was originally a chapel, built by King Stephen, and dedicated to St Stephen; hence the name of St Stephen's Chapel so frequently applied to this building. It was rebuilt in 1347 by Edward III., and erected by that monarch into a collegiate church, under the government of a dean and twelve secular priests. Being surrendered to Edward VI., he gave it to the Commons for their sittings, and it had been applied to that use ever since.

The old House of Commons was formed within a chapel, chiefly by a floor raised above the pavement, and an inner roof, considerably below the ancient one. On the union with Ireland, the house was enlarged by taking down the entire side-walls, except the buttresses which supported the original roofs, and erecting others beyond, so as to give one seat in each of the recesses thus formed, by throwing back part of the walls. A gallery ran along the west end, and the north and south sides were supported by slender pillars, crowned with gilt Corinthian capitals. The whole house was lined with oak. The Speaker's chair stood at some distance from the wall, towards the upper end of the room; it was slightly ornamented with gilding, having the king's arms at the top. Before the Speaker's chair, with a small interval, was a table, at which three clerks of the house sat, when Parliament was sitting, their business being to read minutes of the proceedings, to read the bills, motions, &c. On the table the Speaker's mace was placed, unless when the house was in committee. In that case it was put under the table, and the Speaker then left the chair. Between the table and the wall was an area, in which a temporary bar was placed, where witnesses were examined. There were five rows of seats on each side and at both ends, upon which members sat. The seat on the floor on the Speaker's right hand was called the treasury bench, on which the chief members of the administration sat; and the opposite seat was occupied by the leading members of the opposition. The gallery on each side was appropriated also for the members, and the front gallery for strangers—the last seat being devoted to reporters.

The chapel, as finished by Edward III., is represented as being of such beauty, that antiquaries have again and again regretted it should have undergone any alteration to form it into a House of Commons. When the inner walls were unmasked at the peace of the union with Ireland, by removing the wicket to make the alterations, a great part of the decorations remained. The interior of the walls and roof of the chapel were curiously wrought and ornamented with a profusion of gildings and paintings. It appears to have been divided into compartments of Gothic shapes, each having a border of small gilt roses. At the east end, including about a third of the length of the whole chapel, which part was most likely erected for the altar, the entire walls and roof were covered with gildings and paintings, and presented in the mutilated state in which they were seen during the alterations above alluded to, a superb and beautiful remnant of the fine arts as they existed in the reign of Edward III. This, however, as respected the paintings, could not be very advanced, for, according to the authority of Lord Orford, no mean writer upon the subject of the fine arts, in his highly entertaining work, "Anecdotes of Painting," the arts had made but little progress in this country at that remote period. The gilding was remarkably solid and highly burnished, and the colour of the paintings vivid, the being nearly as fresh as when they were executed. One of the paintings is represented as possessing merit even in the composition; the subject was the "Adoration of the Shepherds." The Virgin was not devoid of beauty or dignity. The west front of the chapel was to be seen until the recent destruction, and it had a fine Gothic window.

Beneath the house, in passages of apartment appropriated to various uses, were to be seen considerable remains, in great perfection, of an under-chapel of curious workmanship and the entire side of a cloister, the roof being of great beauty. A small court of the palace was not disturbed at the Union; and it, with other buildings, formed part of the dwelling of the Speaker. Between the house and the Thames the Speaker's garden is situated. Within the house were a great many rooms for the officers of state, clerks, &c. besides numerous committee-rooms. In the year 1816 the floor was newly laid.

DREADFUL SHIPWRECK.

By the most recent papers from New York (dated Oct. 2.), intelligence of a most distressing calamity has been received. It is contained in the following letter from Pictou, dated Sept. 11:—"We have just received accounts of the loss of the ship Sybil of Liverpool, from Cromarty to Quebec, with 316 passengers, all of whom perished. Six of the crew saved themselves in the boat. Can nothing be done to erect a lighthouse on that fatal island? Surely such a shipwreck should be adopted, if possible, to prevent such shipwrecks."

side of popularity seems to be flowing in as from some quarters upon the late Premier's law, as in others it appears to be ebbing (as in our last) from Lord Chancellor Brougham. The whole nation, indeed, may be said to be watched with intense interest the respective of these great political magnets, ever since given to Earl Grey at Edinburgh, when Durham was supposed, in some expressions of speech, to have intended a reproof to the Chancellor, on the same occasion, for deliberation and caution in proceeding to further reforms in the. One consequence of Lord Durham's appearance at that occasion, we believe, was the invitation he immediately thereafter received to a dinner at Glasgow, which he accepted, and festival, fixed for the 29th October, will have place before the publication of this sheet. Great preparations are in progress: a pavilion, similar to the Calton Hill, Edinburgh, and capable of fifteen hundred persons, is erected; and such general anxiety to be present, according to the papers, that the whole tickets were disposed of the 17th October; and it was even contemplated the plan of the structure enlarged for the accommodation of more. Mr Oswald, M.P. for Glasgow, to take the chair. The necessity of our going to press will prevent our giving any account of dinner until our next number.

The meantime, Lord Durham has been visiting of his friends in Perthshire and Forfarshire, and received several flattering testimonies of popular regard. After sojourning successively a few days with the Marquis of Breadalbane at Taymouth, Lord Kinross at Rossie Priory, and Earl Camperdown at Camperdown House, Lord Durham, accompanied by the Earl of Argyll, visited Dundee on Saturday, October 4. On his entry into the town, the streets were taken from the carriage, and it was drawn, amidst the cheers of the multitude, to the Town House, the site of which hustings had been erected, and where an immense multitude were congregated. Provost Wemyss, as had been previously arranged, presented Lord Durham with a Burgess ticket, after a few preliminary remarks; after which, Bailie Christie, as presiding, presented a complimentary address from the Dundee Union of Dundee, prefacing it with some gratifying observations on his lordship's speech at Earl Grey's dinner. The address, after expressing regret at the defection of many persons from the principles and opinions they formerly professed, and thanking Lord Durham for his continued staunch and uncompromising advocacy of the rights of mankind, and especially for his assistance in preparing and defending the Reform bill (although most of the members of the House were yet excluded from its privileges), proceeded to say, that, in the way of reform, much yet remained to be done. The reform bill itself had to be amended: the streams of knowledge were wickedly dried up; the people were oppressed with monarchical taxation was enormous, and unequally distributed; law was a mockery of justice; the established Church was nests of sinecures; in short, concluded the address, "our whole institutions still swarm with corruption." On the conclusion of the address, Lord Durham came forward amidst great cheering, and addressed the multitude. In honouring him, he said, they were only honouring the cause of reform. He would not deny that to him was entrusted the preparation of the reform bill, which, although mutilated, conferred on the nation more liberty than it ever possessed. Having adverted to Provost Kay's address, he next noticed that of the Political Union, and said, that, if he believed all that was stated in it, he would despair of the prosperity of the country. "I know," he continued, "remains to be done, and with your assistance, it shall be done: but I do not believe that all is so bad and rotten in our institutions as is set forth in this address. My object is not to destroy and reconstruct, but to ameliorate and improve. There is much that is good and valuable in our institutions, if it were fairly drawn out; but much that is good in our institutions has, through Tory influence, been perverted to other purposes. But I hold that our form of government by King, Lords, and Commons, there will be found a greater degree of liberty than ever existed in any other country of the world, and as much rational liberty as any people under the sun can or ought to enjoy. Gentlemen, having frankly stated that I will not go the length of the address read by my honourable friend Bailie Christie, I may be allowed to state, that I am a advocate for the most determined and speedy correction of all abuses; and that, wherever any abuse is pointed out, it ought to be immediately reformed. Gentlemen, we have been told that there is a danger of going too fast, and of acting without due deliberation. Now, while I admit that every measure ought to be well considered, since due consideration is effectual, I cannot see why time should be lost in deliberating. I cannot, for the soul of me, why, instead of immediately deliberating, we stop in our progress. Should any person from the north be here, he would doubtless come by the steamer; and would ask what he would have said if the man who had called out, when they were in the middle of the Tay, 'Stop her!' (Laughter.) He would have arrived at Dundee. He would have been in the middle of a romantic and handsome river, no doubt; but this would not have satisfied him for not getting to the end of his journey. Therefore he would say, that the man at the helm of the state should not stop his course, but guide his vessel speedily and safely to port." (Great cheers.) As at Edinburgh, his lordship declined entering on the subject of Ireland, but cordially agreed that something was necessary to be done to alleviate her miseries. Lord Durham then withdrew; after which, three cheers, and one cheer more, were given for him, and three cheers each for Lords Camperdown, Panmure, and Kinnaid, and Provost Kay. The party partook of some refreshments provided by the magistrates in the hall, where, the Dundee Chronicle says, there was some good-humoured skirmishing between Lord Camperdown and Bailie Christie; Lady Camperdown and many other ladies were present. After leaving the hall, his lordship and party visited and examined the Dundee steam-ship, and then withdrew to his yacht, which was decorated with flags and pennons. The steamer also saluted his lordship with several guns.

By the English journals, we perceive that Lord Brougham, since his return from the north, has been visiting some of the English provinces, and sojourning with Lord Radnor at his seat near Salisbury. He went to Portsmouth on October 6, where he visited his Majesty's ship Victory, and, amongst other tokens of respect, was saluted at his departure with fifteen guns. Next day he went in the steam-boat to the Isle of Wight, and thence returned to Lord Radnor's. On October 10, he visited Salisbury, and, in reply to a complimentary address presented to him unanimously by the inhabitants, he made a few observations, which seem generally reckoned as a retaliation upon Lord Durham for what fell from that nobleman both at Edinburgh and Dundee. He observed, that, while no man was more determined to resist every effort of a destructive nature, and to avoid all changes that may expose their safety to hazard, no man was more ready to exert himself in correcting any real abuse—(cheers)—and in actively and unflinchingly applying all needful, all wholesome remedies. "A more groundless charge against the government could not be preferred than that which accuses us of delaying to begin our work of improvement. It has, you all know, been begun—(cheers)—the preparatory proceedings have long since not only been begun, but carried on, and are now nearly completed. Not one moment of time—I will not say months, which the objectors speak of—but no minute has been suffered to pass unemployed in maturing the requisite measures of amendment. But we shall not be hurried on by those unthinking persons; we shall go our own pace; we shall act for the good of all, as our duty requires, to the best of our abilities; neither driven to the right hand nor to the left by any interruption; neither going farther nor faster than sound principles and practical wisdom, the result of reflection and experience, will fully warrant; and we will throw ourselves fearlessly and confidently upon the judgment of our fellow-countrymen for their approval, without the shadow of a doubt that their verdict will be pronounced in our favour." The Lord Chancellor was received throughout his address with immense applause.

While Lord Brougham was at Lord Radnor's, the managers of the Philosophical Institution at Fareham expected that he would have delivered a lecture on some learned subject to their body, and appointed a deputation to request his attendance. But, according to the following amusing account in a Southampton paper, his lordship gave them the slip several times; and when the deputation caught him at last, he was in no humour to gratify them:—

"While the officers of the Institution were arranging the terms of the address, the Chancellor arrived at Portsmouth. The deputation posted after his lordship, who on their arrival had retired to rest. The following day (Tuesday, Oct. 7), the Chancellor, with his accustomed celerity, was on board the Victory before the deputation had recovered from the fatigues of their previous day's chase; and when they were again in pursuit, lo! his lordship was steaming it to the Isle of Wight. The Fareham deputation, nothing daunted by previous disappointment, followed in the afternoon steamer, and at last came upon the track of the Chancellor towards Shanklin, but upon their arrival found his indefatigable lordship had already lionised, and had early retired to repose. His lordship, it seems, had desired, if an expected courier with dispatches should arrive, that he should be immediately apprised. On the arrival of the Fareham philosophers, therefore, who in breathless anxiety inquired if his lordship had really sought repose, mine host at Shanklin, with unfortunate precipitation, replied that he had done so, in fact, some time, but had left orders for their immediate reception. The astonished deputation endeavoured in vain to elicit a knowledge of the prescience of the Chancellor. In the meantime, his lordship was roused from his slumbers; and hastily putting on his gown and slippers, he stepped into the room where the deputation of the Scientific and Philosophical Institution of Fareham awaited his appearance. His astonishment and chagrin, upon their errand being made known, may be readily conceived: for once, and we think with perfect reason, his lordship lost his equanimity of temper. Drawing his apology for a wig nearly down his nose, the Chancellor made a precipitate retreat; which example was speedily followed by our Fareham friends."

We observe that some of the more liberal journalists are anticipating a curious comment by Lord Durham, at the Glasgow dinner, upon Lord Brougham's observations at Salisbury; and the probability of this seems much strengthened by some contingent circumstances. In the 121st number of the Edinburgh Review, published about the middle of October (considerably before its regular period of issue, and as is alleged by Lord Durham's friends, at the instigation of Lord Brougham, and expressly with the view of throwing cold water on the Glasgow dinner), there appeared a long article, professing to be a sketch of the proceedings and conduct of Lord Grey's administration, especially as regarded the concoction of the reform bill. With the purport of this article Lord Durham has felt himself so much aggrieved, that he has addressed the following letter to the publisher of the periodical in question:—

Lambton Castle, Oct. 18, 1834.

SIR—In the October number of the Edinburgh Review, which I have this morning received, I find an article in which my name has been most unfairly introduced. It professes to give an account of transactions in Lord Grey's administration respecting the preparation of the reform bill.

If that statement came directly or indirectly from a member of that government, he has been guilty of gross misrepresentation, and of a suppression of the truth.

If it did not, I have a right to complain of your having published charges against my public character, founded on assumed facts and circumstances, which could only be correctly known or stated from official authority.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

DURHAM.

To the Publisher of the Edinburgh Review.

CASES OF THEFT AND EMBEZZLEMENT.

Two painful cases of theft and dishonesty in the more respectable circles of society have lately occurred, and which, although taking place at opposite sides of the kingdom, became connected with each other by a strange enough coincidence. The discovery and apprehension of the criminals, too, affords a singular, as we hope it will be a salutary, proof of the vigilance and activity of our modern police corps.—On Oct. 1, Mr Thomas Rae, a confidential clerk in the large mercantile establishment of Alston and Co., Glasgow, absconded with money to the amount, it is said, of L.1200. Notice was immediately transmitted to all the police establishments, describing his person, and a reward of L.50 offered for his apprehension. While search was making for him, the attention of the London police was attracted to another robbery of a more singular nature, which occurred almost on the same day with the preceding. Sir Charles Forbes happened to have a large party at his house in London on Sunday, Sept. 28, when a number of very valuable articles, including a chronometer, a repeater, a snuff-box presented to Sir Charles by the late king, and a musical seal, disappeared in a mysterious manner from his dressing-room table. Suspicion fell upon a discharged servant, who was apprehended and examined, but no proof of his guilt appeared; and Sir Charles became at length painfully convinced that the theft must have been perpetrated by one of his own guests! The suspected culprit was a Mr Charles Adam Corbyn, a midshipman, highly respectably connected, the prospective heir of large family estates, and who, moreover, it is said, lies under great personal obligations to Sir Charles. Notice was forthwith sent to the police, and on the evening of Monday, October 6, one of the officers received notice that an individual answering to his appearance was in the boxes of the English Opera House. Upon proceeding there he observed, not Corbyn, but a person whom, from the description in the handbills, he concluded to be Rae, and watched him accordingly. The latter, on leaving the house, drove off in a cab with two females, and the officer followed in another to a house of ill fame in Waterloo Bridge Road, where he was shown into the room where they were sitting. He immediately said, "Your name is Rae?" to which the other replied, "You are mistaken; my name is Captain Walker." The officer bowed and retired, but slipped out "Captain Walker's" hat with him, and seeing by the lining that it was manufactured in Glasgow, his suspicions were confirmed. He immediately sent off for assistance, and had the prisoner conveyed to the office, where he at once confessed his guilt, and said he would make all the restitution in his power. On searching him, there was found on his person a brace of pistols loaded, a powder-flask, a gold watch, chain, and seals, with about L.27 in gold, silver, and notes. He subsequently took the officers into the Waterloo Bridge Road, and, having opened a portmanteau, took out a cash-box, containing nearly L.800, which he stated to have got at Messrs Coutts's bank for bills that he had brought up with him. About L.100 of the money consisted of bank notes, and the rest was all in sovereigns. Notice of his apprehension was of course immediately sent off to his late employers.

Corbyn's apprehension, which took place two days afterwards, was also dexterously accomplished. One of the officers, while sauntering about the streets, observed a fashionable young man pass, whose person and looks answered to the description of Sir Charles Forbes's guest. He accordingly followed him, and asked if he knew Sir Charles, to which the other replied that he did, and, at the policeman's request, at once agreed to go to that gentleman's house. When the door was opened, Corbyn walked straight into the drawing-room, and before the officer could interfere, pulled a phial of laudanum from his pocket, swallowed the contents, and dropped down on the floor. A surgeon being sent for, he administered an emetic, which relieved the unhappy man, who was then sent to the police office. When he arrived, other charges of breach of honesty and hospitality awaited him. A Mr Rose, with whom the prisoner had that very day been dining, had missed some spoons and other silver articles, and called at the office to give notice of the theft, when he was thunderstruck to behold the name of his young friend posted up as the robber of Sir Charles Forbes! Mr Rose's goods were found on Corbyn's person. It has since appeared that he performed the same trick at the house of Miss Laing, niece of the magistrate, where he had dined a few days previous; and a fourth robbery of the same unprincipled nature has also been brought home to him. He has been fully committed for trial.

Sept. 27. A man sold his wife in Nottingham market for 2s. 6d.—[Can it be possible that the law authorises such transactions as these? If it does not, why is our nation permitted to be disgraced, and the feelings of the public outraged, by the frequent accounts in the English papers of similar infamous exhibitions, without any attempt ever being made, apparently, either to prevent them, or to punish the brutal actors?]

—29. Mr Alderman Winchester, citizen and cutler, was elected Lord Mayor of the city of London for the year ensuing.

Oct. 1. The new post-office regulations for the transmission of newspapers took effect. By these, stamped newspapers, without covers or in covers open at the sides, may be transmitted to the colonies by packet-boats free of postage. In like manner, colonial newspapers may be received postage free in England; if brought in private ships, a postage of threepence will be charged on each paper, as heretofore. Stamped newspapers will be transmitted to foreign parts on payment of a postage of twopence, if forwarded within seven days of the date of their publication, wrapped in the usual manner; but liable to a treble letter postage if containing anything written except the direction. This rule applies to all newspapers. Foreign newspapers, if printed in the language of the country in which they are published, and not otherwise, will be delivered in any part of Great Britain and Ireland, on payment of twopence, in addition to the postage charged by the foreign post-office.

—9. An alarming fire broke out in the extensive premises of Messrs Thomas, Dover, and Co. Launcelot's Quay, Liverpool, which ended in the total destruction of the premises, about eight or ten stories high. The upper rooms were filled with cotton, and the lower one with hogsheads of sugar, while in the cellars there were about two hundred hogsheads of rum. The property destroyed is estimated, on a rough calculation, at L.80,000. The goods and building are said to be fully insured.

The revenue accounts up to October 10 present a decrease on the quarter, as compared with the corresponding one of last year, of L.330,064. The decrease on the Excise is L.846,524; on the Stamps, L.22,718; on the Taxes, L.143,415; on the Post-office, L.5,000; Miscellaneous, L.2682; but then there is a large increase in the Customs of L.678,051, as a set-off against these deficiencies. The result for the year exhibits an increase of L.313,448, as compared with the previous one. This arises principally from the Customs, in which the increase is L.985,254. The Taxes also show an increase of L.102,355. The decrease for the year is on the Excise, L.596,609; on the Stamps, L.259,985; on the Post-office, L.38,000; on the Miscellaneous, L.19,298. The effects of the repeal of the house-tax have not yet begun to be felt.

Of the present bench of bishops, 12 have not been translated at all, 13 have been translated once, and one only has been translated twice; and the average time during which the present possessors have held their sees is eight years and eight months. Since the Restoration, there have been, exclusive of the present bench, 242 bishops; of whom 148 were never translated, 71 were translated once, 22 twice, and one three times. The average holding of a see for that period is something above ten years.

The Morning Chronicle states that the sale of unstamped newspapers in London is computed on good grounds to amount to 300,000 in the week. This is within 50,000 of the number of papers issued weekly by the whole metropolitan press! "Formerly," says our contemporary, "these papers were published with some little show of concealment and disguise; but now they are regularly sold at stated intervals without the least let or hindrance, just the same as the established newspapers. Several of those which formerly appeared in the form of a pamphlet, now assume the appearance of a regular newspaper; and a person, at a cursory glance, could not ascertain the difference. Some are five-column papers, the front page composed of advertisements taken at a low rate, but which of course yield a great profit to the proprietors, as no stamp-duty is paid by them; and the other pages are regularly filled up with the ordinary routine of news, leaders, &c.; in fact, they combine every essential of a newspaper." It is plain, under such circumstances, that if government is no longer able to protect the legal newspapers from the competition of their illicit rivals, it ought, in justice to the former, to reduce their burdens. Even admitting the Chronicle's statement to be considerably exaggerated, no one can deny that the law must either be better enforced, or it must be altered.—Scotsman.

It is said that the result of the Leeds registration of voters this year gives the Tories a gain of 274 votes; 511 Whig votes were struck off by the barrister, and 243 Tory ones.

Considerable amusement has been excited by the fact of Lord Althorp having been deprived of his vote for the current year, in consequence of an informality in his designation, having subscribed himself "Viscount Althorp," instead of giving his Christian and family names.

The necessity for some amendment in the laws regarding imprisonment for debt, has been painfully manifested in two recent cases in point, published in the newspapers—one being a notice of the death of a man in Carlisle jail, where he has been imprisoned for the last eighteen years; the other, an application for discharge in the debtor's court, London, by a man who has been imprisoned fourteen months for a debt of eleven shillings.

The requisite notices have been given of an intention to apply to the legislature for powers to enlarge the East India docks, to improve Smithfield market, and to erect a new bridge across the Thames at Lambeth, from near the Old Church to the Horseferry at Millbank. The funds for the last are to be furnished by a joint-stock company.

Sinecures are in a fair way of being completely abolished in Britain. According to the report of the select Commons' committee, the present amount of sinecures is L.97,803; but there is a prospective abolition of these to the extent of L.81,984; so that less than L.17,000 per annum is the whole amount of sinecures, for the ultimate abolition of which there is not yet, but probably will soon be, some legislative enactment.

Mr Campbell the poet has gone to visit the new French colony at Algiers, where he arrived on the 27th September.

At a large public meeting lately held at York, it was resolved immediately to form a company to lay a railway betwixt London and that place.

The receipts of the Birmingham musical festival, held on the 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th October, amounted to L.14,000. There were two hundred and seventeen instrumental, and fourteen principal vocal performers. The organ built for the occasion has sixty stops, and is said to be next to that of York, the largest in the kingdom. The festival was held in the Town Hall, lately erected, which is described as a most magnificent structure, sixty feet wide, one hundred and forty feet long, and sixty-five feet high. The net profits amounted to L.7000, and are appropriated to the support of the infirmary.

The report of the fifth half-yearly meeting of the company of the Manchester and Liverpool railway has been published, from which it appears that, compared with the corresponding six months of the previous year, the increase in merchandise conveyed along the line has been 7727 tons, and in passengers 29,255 persons, and that a profit on the half year's business has accrued of L.34,691, 16s. 4d., which enables the company to declare a dividend for that period of L.4, 10s. per L.100 share, leaving a reserved fund of upwards of L.4000 to meet contingencies. The total expenditure on the construction of the railway and works is stated at L.1,132,075, and the net profit between July 1833 and July 1834 at L.75,575, being at the rate of L.6, 13s. 6d. per cent. per annum.

A short time since, a tradesman in Retford was both surprised and alarmed at receiving, postage-free, a large, portentous, and official-looking letter, with "Municipal Corporation Commission" printed on it in large characters. With a heart palpitating with anxiety, the ample seal was broken; when lo! the inclosure proved to be nothing more than a London silversmith's circular, soliciting orders.—Lincolnshire Chronicle.

The morbid predisposition of ignorant minds for the horrible has been disgustingly displayed in the case of the wretch Steinberg, at London, detailed in our last. The house that was the scene of the massacre and suicide has, it seems, been rented by certain individuals on a speculation for showing it to the public. To render the sight more attractive, the effigies of the victims in waxwork, dressed in the clothes (for which, it is said, L.25 were given) in which they died, are placed just as they were found lying when the murder was discovered; and a bloody knife, with which it is pretended the deed was perpetrated, is exhibited (the relic itself is in the possession of the parish constable), with the accompaniments of real blood, and all other accessories of assassination necessary to give effect to the scene. Such was the popular interest in this horrible display, that no less than L.50 are said to have been drawn on the first day of exhibition! But what seems still more unaccountable, the papers state that two parish constables were present to preserve order, so that it would appear the brutal affair is sanctioned by the local authorities!

The inhabitants of Sheffield have resolved to erect a monument to—the cholera. This erection, says the Sheffield Mercury, will be a credit and ornament to the neighbourhood.

Mr Slater, of Carlton, a few days ago, in yawning, overstretching the ligaments of his jaw, and was unable to close his mouth. He had to come open-mouthed to Lincoln (a curious sight), when a surgeon soon put him to rights, and enabled him to eat once more, but cautioned him against yawning.—Stamford News.

Though Lord William Bentinck is looked upon as a man of simple habits and manners, his baggage, when moving on a progress as governor-general of India, is described as being carried by 103 elephants, 1300 camels, and 800 waggons drawn by bullocks, and these escorted by two regiments, one of cavalry, the other of infantry.

John Davies, a juvenile member of the honourable society of chimney-sweepers, limped into Marlborough Street office about ten days ago, and, having made his salaam to Mr Chambers, said, "Vants a varrant, or a summons, or a summons, please your honourable vorseph, agin my master."—Mr Chambers: What for, my little man?—Boy: 'Cause he von't let me have my banker's book, so 'at I can't draw no money votsumsoever.—Mr Chambers: Why, who is your banker, and how much money have you got?—Boy: Vy, upwards of seven-and-twenty shillins, vot I've been saving up vile I vos master's 'prentice, and now I'm out of my time I vants the blunt.—Mr Chambers: How did you contrive to save that sum?—Boy: Oh, werry easy. The Dublin mail packet, Thetis, caught fire on Tuesday morning, Oct. 7, while lying in the M. opposite Tranmere. Having been run ashore like a magazine, in which there was a barrel of gunpowder, took fire, and the gunpowder exploded with so much violence as to rock the buildings on the river-side like an earthquake. The side-timbers of the vessel were forced out, and, with the windows, were scattered in all directions; but no one was seriously injured. The mainmast rolled overboard, and there was nothing left but to scuttle and sink the vessel, which was done. The Thetis cost L.17,000, and was hired out, owned, by the post-office. About L.700 worth of cargo was in the cabin when the explosion occurred; it is all lost. The fire is supposed to have originated in the caboose (place for cooking).

On Thursday evening, September 25, about nine o'clock, the village of Breadlow, Buckingham, was visited by a most dreadful storm. A post-chaise (the road was turned quite round, and the rider thro' of the horse a considerable distance. Chimneys and trees were blown down; a poor man, who was milking a cow in a shed, was forced against the wall with such violence as to fracture his ribs, and a large vent stack was taken off the frame and carried into a paddock, an orchard on the road leading to Ivinghoe was damaged; about thirty of the trees were torn by the roots, and, falling across the road, rendered for some time impassable. About six o'clock the wind became still more terrific, and raged for about twenty minutes. Houses were totally dismantled, chimneys were blown down, barns thrown over, and trees a century torn from the earth. A barn consisted of three bays, belonging to Mr Rackstraw, was carried away, and the floor, weighing upwards of two tons, wrested from its fastenings, and forced into a reversed position. Mr Rackstraw's son was at the time lying in a cow-shed, when the wind completely carried the shed a distance of nearly thirty yards, leaving the lad and cows uninjured. Two barns, belonging to Mr Williams and Mr Cooting, were also wrested from their fastenings, and carried some distance. A last school was struck by a branch of a tree, which had come 100 yards, with such violence as to fracture his thigh. The loss sustained in the village of Ivinghoe is estimated at from L.1100 to L.1200, independent of any calculation in respect of the timber and fruit-trees destroyed.—Herts County Press.

There is now living at Dordrecht, in Holland, a doctor named Conrad Vancouver, who, on the 20th of last month, had attained the age of 135 years. This is assuredly the oldest man in existence in Europe.—Galignani's Messenger.

A curious operation is now in progress near the Mont de Santé, at Montmartre, near Paris. It is the removal of a windmill entire from the ground whereon it stood to another eminence at some distance. The removal is effected by means of strong ropes worked by a cat in front, while it is propelled behind by a windlass, as is employed for removing large masses of stones. The mill has already advanced about eighty yards in two days, and will arrive at its destination in two days more.

An excellent device has been adopted at Paris, which is well worthy of imitation on this side of the Channel—viz. inscribing the streets' names on the glass of the lamps that light them. Some such plan as this has long been a desideratum in large and populous cities.

There are now in the state of New York alone thirty-seven railway companies, all incorporated since the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester railway, and united capitals make nearly thirty millions of dollars, about six millions sterling.

SCOTLAND.

RESULTS OF THE HERRING FISHERY—SEASON 34. The annual supply of herrings for the whole of Scotland—that is, in moderately prosperous seasons—is computed at from three hundred and fifty to four hundred thousand barrels; and if to this we add the quantities of fish consumed in a fresh state, of which account is ever kept, the total will approximate to one hundred and fifty thousand barrels, and the value to half a million of money. Nor is this our only harvest of fish. The late Mr Little of Annan calculated our salmon fisheries at L.200,000 annually; and although this estimate may have been fully high, there are few who object to the more moderate computation of L.170,000 sterling. The managing clerk of a London fishmonger, with whom we are acquainted, has repeatedly, during the heat of the season, boxes were arriving from all quarters, sold L.100 worth of iced salmon before breakfast; and the reader

recollect, that it was stated in a Perth paper in 1830, that the same commodity, to the value of £10,000, had been put on board of a steamer in one of the Tay boats, and dispatched by that conveyance from the Tay to the Thames. The Scottish Fishery Board, which was constituted in 1809, perfected its arrangements in 1810, and from the annual printed returns, we learn the trade of fishing, in the different departments of the coast, curing, and packing, gives employment to 10,000 persons. In addition to this, several thousand sailors are employed in navigating the numerous vessels that transport salt to the stations, and away the produce to almost every part of the country. The staves required for barrels enable landmen to sell their wood to greater advantage; and money thus widely diffused, in connection with the modes of industry, feeds and clothes, on the coast and among the islands, an almost countless number of families, from the rich proprietor of the salt-works in Cheshire, to the peasant in his bothy, even to the lonely Uist. With these general observations, we proceed to give the results of the herring fishery, season 1834, from sources which we deem next to certain.

The herring fishery is prosecuted at three great stations—the east coast of Scotland, the west, and the north of Man. The first stretches from Thurso to the Orkneys, and includes the Orkney and Shetland Islands; the second extends from Cape Wrath to the Mull of Kintyre, and comprises we know not how many ramifications of lochs, friths, estuaries, and creeks; while Man, as Virgil said of Britain, is a kingdom within itself, divided from all the world beside. The east coast, which is by far the greatest general station, operations commenced on or about the 20th of September. Salt and barrels were provided in abundance; and nets and nettage there was no lack; contractors were ready to make advances, and the spirits of the fisherman were high; and yet day after day, and week after week, elapsed, without bringing tidings of the fish. Tedium ensued, and its usual concomitants; speculators fought shy; the banks became empty; and sought advice from head-quarters; and in Wick especially, was the general distress, the neighbouring farmers were forced to watch their potatoes to prevent them from being carried off, and eaten in a half-ripe state. Oatmeal was retailed at a time; and before all was over, many fishermen, who had come far and fared meanly, were compelled to pawn their nets, as security for the price of their lodgings. At this point, the fish, in place of 200, barely netted 30 crans per net. Sarclet, Falligo, Clyth, Lybster, Leatherminster, and Dunbeath, did still worse—the averages were little more than from 7 to 10 crans. In Ross-shire the failure was equally conspicuous; and even at Stromness the aggregate fishing hardly exceeded 12 crans for each distinct crew. At Ballintore the result was equally disheartening, and the same applies to Cromarty, Broughhead, Findhorn, and Wick. The Banff, Fraserburgh, and Peterhead fishmen, were more fortunate; but although they did not compare with others, the take was far under the average fishing. In Orkney, the crews by dint of perseverance obtained about 50 crans each. In the north, where the herring fishery is of recent origin, the take was greater than was ever known before, and the people generally are so well pleased with their luck, that they intend to redouble their exertions next season. Upon the whole, however, the east coast, the herrings cured will not exceed a third of the usual quantity—a failure to be deplored under any circumstances, and the more so when we consider how many hearths the binn and the barrel would have gladdened.

On the west coast, indented as it is with lochs, estuaries, and bays, the fishing proved any thing but ungenerous concern. In the early part of the season a modicum of fish was caught at Scalpa and Poo; but latterly, all engaged in the traffic were lost in the sad predicament of those who let down their nets into empty wells, and spend their days in waiting for no water. Many vessels that were out three weeks have returned with empty casks, or perhaps a very few of them filled. In the Frith of Clyde the catches were rather better. In July and August the catches were considerable; but the quantities then taken were either run fresh or salted, and sold so cheaply that they are now out of the market. Indeed, the general scarcity of West Highland fish is best indicated by the price they bear—which in a few weeks rose from 20s. to 50s. per barrel. From Ayr to the Mull of Annan, such persons as engage in the herring trade send out vessels and buy from the boatmen; and that is rather odd, most of them have returned bumper cargoes, and bring good accounts of such of their neighbours as still lingered at the different stations.

In the Isle of Man, the herrings were so late and in such showing themselves, that some of the curers were in despair. But they came at last, and after shoals than have been witnessed since the year 1823. In Man, the winged tribes are the fisher-pioneers; and the moment they gave the signal, was the bustle and the booty caught. What a scene may be we are unable to state; but in the Mull of Annan, about 21,000 barrels were cured at and round the coast, independently of 12,000 ditto being consumed on the spot, or run fresh to Liverpool without the slightest deterioration of quality.

The estimated value, bounty included, amounted to £50,000 sterling—a mighty item, certainly, as compared with the limits and population of Man, and which, from the peculiar channels in which it flowed, may be described as money lost by no one—and yet found.—Dumfries Courier.

Sept. 26. The first general meeting of the Eskdale and Liddesdale Agricultural Society was held at Langholm. After the business of the day was over, upwards of three hundred farmers sat down to dinner, the Duke of Buccleuch in the chair. When his grace's health was drunk, he delivered an eloquent and most appropriate speech, professing his readiness to allow his tenantry a fair return for their labour, instead of grasping all he could wring from them for himself. He enlarged also upon the agricultural improvements of the district, and upon the useful tendency of agricultural societies, which were, he said, doing for particular parts of the country what their parent, the Highland Society, had done for Scotland generally; and he hoped they would be encouraged and promoted in all quarters.

—29. The first tea imported direct into Scotland was brought by the ship Mountstuart Elphinstone into Port-Glasgow. It was addressed to John Fleming, Esq. of Claremont, owner of the vessel. The tea, however, was but a small part of the cargo, besides coming by way of Bombay; but a few days afterwards, the Camden, a large India-built ship, arrived at Greenock direct from Canton, entirely laden with tea and other Chinese produce. The teas are precisely those which, under a continuation of the East India monopoly, would have passed to us through Leadenhall Street in June 1836. On coming to anchor in the stream, off the Steamboat Quay, the crew assembled on the quarter-deck, and gave three cheers, which were immediately responded to by the people assembled on the quay. As a good deal of curiosity has and will be evinced as to the quality of the tea brought by this vessel, we subjoin the following list, which may be relied on as correct:—

Oct. 1. About a hundred and fifty gentlemen of the counties of Lanark, Stirling, and Dumfries, gave a grand dinner at Cumbernauld to Admiral Fleming, M.P., previous to his departure to take the command at the Nile.

—3. The Highland Agricultural Society held their annual meeting at Aberdeen. The principal persons present were the Dukes of Gordon and Buccleuch, the Marquis of Tweeddale, the Earl of Aberdeen, Sir Thomas Brisbane, Mr Fox Maule, Sir Alexander Bannerman, &c. A number of prizes were distributed to the owners of the best specimens of cattle, roots, seeds, and implements. After the business of the day was over, the society dined together, or rather in three separate rooms: the Duke of Buccleuch and Gordon, and the Marquis of Tweeddale, each residing in one of them. Much amusement was excited by the Duke of Gordon proposing the health of his Grace of Wellington as a peculiarly appropriate toast—he being the best driller in the empire.

—13. The contiguous workshops of Messrs Small, Bruce, and Company, and Messrs Wood and Company, organ builders, North Back of Canongate, Edinburgh, destroyed by fire early this morning. Origin of accident unknown. The Messrs Wood and Company insured.

—17. A public dinner given to Sir George Murray, K. C. B., at Perth, at which about 700 gentlemen and farmers were present. The chairman, Lord Stormont, was supported on the right by Sir George Murray, the Hon. Geo. Murray, son of Lord Glenlyon, Sir Neil Menzies, Sir Robert Dick, Dr Thomson, &c.; and on his left by Sir John Oswald, Colonel Gilmore, Sir Patrick Murray, Sir J. S. Forbes, Mr Forbes of Callendar, Sir J. Mansell, &c. The croquiers were, Mr Home Drummond, Mr Graham Stirling of Airth, Mr Watson of Keilor, Mr Wood of Balgaly, and Mr Stewart of the Bank of Scotland, Perth. Among the company were observed Captain Hay of Mugdrum, Admiral Drummond, Mr Balfour of Fernie, Colonel Webster, Mr Mercer of Gorthy, &c. When Sir George Murray's health was proposed, he entered, in replying, into a long explanation of his political views and opinions, as well as his parliamentary conduct. The chief point in the latter was in reference to the vote he gave against Mr Wood's motion for admitting dissenters into the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, after having, at the time of the last election, stated his readiness to support a measure for that purpose. He stated that he voted against Mr Wood's bill on account of the manner in which it was concocted. It was unintelligible even to Mr Wood himself; he was not able to explain his own meaning, and it was so contradictory in many of its clauses, that both Lord Althorp and Mr Stanley, who voted for the second reading, declared it was impossible to pass it in the shape in which it was presented. "When it next appeared, after having been before the committee," continued Sir George, "it was divested of its absurdities and contradictions, and I gave it no further opposition. (Cheers.) With regard to the measure itself, it is not so easy a matter to legislate as might be supposed. The first difficulty is from the students being domiciled in colleges, where there is a necessity that they should be supplied with religious instruction, and consequently; and also religious instruction, according to a part of the regulations of the Church of England, is communicated to those educated in these great seminaries." Sir George also noticed another difficulty—viz. the degrees, connected with which the power and patronage of the Church of England was involved. He indignantly repelled the charge of having broken a pledge. He knew and could know nothing of Mr Wood's bill at the time of his election; besides, he appealed to the meeting whether the terms upon which he agreed with his constituents to go to Parliament, were not that he was to be left free and unfettered to judge and vote on all questions according to his conscience. "In addressing the electors during the canvass, I drew," said he, "this strong, and as I think clear distinction; I said, I ask you to send me to Parliament, not as a pledged delegate, but as a free representative; I will explain my general principles in politics, but I cannot consent to become pledged to particular questions. I have always been the sincere and warm friend, and frequently the advocate, of toleration; but though the friends of toleration, it does not follow that I am to accompany Lord John Russell in his flirtation with the English dissenters, any more than that, because I voted with the Catholic relief bill, I am to become one of O'Connell's tail, or a partner in the intrigues which Lord Althorp and Mr Littleton carried on with that dangerous agitator. I entertain too high a sense of what is due to my own character, and too high a sense of what is due to the county I represent, to act such an absurd part in the House of Commons." Sir George concluded a long speech, during which he was greatly cheered, by proposing the "Constitution of Perthshire." Amongst many other toasts, the healths of the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel appeared to have been vehemently cheered. Sir George returning thanks for both as being his personal friends. Much enthusiasm upon the whole seems to have prevailed throughout the evening.

—18. An interesting process took place at Craigleith quarry, a mile north of Edinburgh, on the Queensferry road, being the blasting of stone upon a new and more powerful system, by which it was expected that fully twenty thousand tons of rock would be disjoined from its native bed. The depth of the bore was sixty feet, and seven and a half inches diameter at top, and six at the bottom, and it was charged with five hundred pounds of Sir Henry Bridge's double-strength blasting powder, value about £17 sterling. After the match was lighted, in two minutes the explosion took place. The report was not so loud as from a small piece of ordnance, and but one splinter flew a distance of thirty yards; but the effect produced completely fulfilled the expectations that had been conceived by the projector. At the moment of the explosion, the great mass of rock appeared to those at a short distance to be forced upward, and then to rend in large and deep fissures. It is calculated that upward of twenty thousand tons of solid rock have been displaced by this experiment. The plan seems to be perfectly safe and practicable, and was projected and carried through by Mr Millar, who, in 1824, after the great fire in the Parliament Close, suggested and carried into effect the blowing down of the gable of the high land which overlooked the Cowgate. Among the scientific gentlemen who were present were Mr Jardine, Mr Playfair, Professor Wallace, Professor Forbes, Mr Stevenson, Mr Buchanan, and Mr Grainger.

Mr Alexander Maclean, hairdresser and perfumer, Frederick Street, who died a few weeks ago, has bequeathed to the ministers and elders of St Andrew's parish, Edinburgh, £1000, for the purpose of founding and endowing a school within that parish, upon a plan similar to the parish schools of St George's and St Mary's, for the benefit of the poorer class of the community.

A new institution for the education of young ladies has just been announced as about to be established in Edinburgh. It is to embrace a regular and systematic course of education, comprehending elocution and composition; history and geography; writing, arithmetic, and book-keeping; theory of music and the piano-forte; drawing and perspective; mathematics, astronomy, and mathematical geography; French language and literature; Italian language and literature; and German language and literature; under the care of particular masters; besides lectures on natural philosophy, chemistry, natural history, and ancient and modern history: the whole at the amazingly low charge of twenty guineas per annum. The institution is to be under the personal superintendence of a lady.

Mr Liston, surgeon, Edinburgh, has, upon earnest solicitation, accepted the situation of surgeon to the North London Hospital. He leaves Edinburgh early in December.

It is stated that the presentation of a clergyman by a patron to the parish of West Calder has been rendered of none effect by the refusal of the parishioners to sign the document formally necessary for moderation in the call by the Presbytery.

A few days ago, a boatman from the Highlands had laid his wherry alongside of the quay at Greenock, and exposed for sale a large cargo of eggs, when a drunken vagabond took it into his head to board the wherry, with what intention it did not appear; but in jumping into the boat, he missed the place for which he aimed, and went right into the midst of the eggs, where he sunk to the middle. The Highlander, rendered motionless by his astonishment, was unable to make any effort to seize the offender, till he had, at the expense of some hundreds more of the eggs, worked himself out of the puddle in which he had nearly stuck, and gained the quay. By this time the Highlander had recovered from his stupor, and set off in pursuit of the culprit, who, with his legs and body shining yellow, made his way through various closes and streets, till at last all trace was lost not only of the man, but of the savoury traces he had left in his flight.—Greenock Paper.

Cholera.—This disease still prevails to a fatal degree in several places of Scotland, particularly at Beith, Paisley, Irvine, and Inverness. Amongst many distressing cases at Irvine, we are told that a young couple and the bride's sister, who had been "kirked" in their gayest attire on Sunday, October 12, were next Sunday (19) all laid in their graves. The Inverness Journal of Friday, October 17, represents the epidemic as fatally on the increase, the cases for several days having averaged from ten to fourteen per day.

The average of the price of wheat in England during the last week of September was 43s. 2d. per quarter; being about 20 per cent. below what it was at the same period in 1833, and two shillings and sevenpence below the price fifty-four years ago. This extreme cheapness is said to be partly occasioned by the large importations from Canada and Ireland, which pay comparatively no taxes, and can therefore afford to raise and sell corn at a lower rate than in England.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE LEE-PENNY.

The most celebrated antiquity which we have to mention is the Lee-penny. This is a small triangular stone, of what kind, a lapidary, to whom it was shown, confessed himself unable to determine. In size it is about half an inch on each side, and is set in a piece of silver coin, which, from the traces of a cross still discernible, is supposed to be a shilling of Edward I. The traditional history of this gem is as follows:—King Robert Bruce had ordered, that after his death his heart should be carried to the Holy Land; and one of those who joined the expedition appointed to carry the royal wish into effect, was Sir Simon Lockard of Lee. To defray his expenses, he borrowed a sum of money from Sir William de Lindsay, prior of Ayre, to whom he granted a bond of annuity for L. 10 upon his estate of Lee. This bond, bearing date 1323, is still preserved amongst the family papers. As a memorial of his services upon this occasion, the family name of Lockard was changed into Lockheart or Lockhart, and he obtained for arms a heart within a lock, with the motto, Corda serata pando. Sir Simon is said in this journey to have taken prisoner a Saracen chief, for whose liberty his lady offered a large sum of money. In counting it out, she happened to drop the gem from her purse, and showed such eagerness in recovering it as drew the knight's attention, and raised his curiosity to learn what it was. Being told of its remarkable virtues, he refused to liberate the husband unless it were added to the ransom. With this demand the lady unwillingly complied, and thus the talisman came into the possession of the family, with whom it has ever since remained. Formerly it bore a very high and extensive celebrity for extraordinary medicinal properties. Water in which it had been but dipt was supposed to be an effectual remedy for all diseases of cattle, and has been sent for as far as the northern counties of England. It was also considered to be a specific against hydrophobia. The most remarkable instance of its alleged efficacy in that distemper, was the cure of a Lady Baird of Saughtonhall, near Edinburgh, who, by using draughts and baths of it, recovered from the bite of a mad dog, after, it is said, hydrophobia had actually begun. When the plague was last at Newcastle, the inhabitants borrowed the Lee-penny, giving a large sum in trust for the loan; and so convinced were they of its good effects, that they were willing to forfeit the deposit and retain possession.—New Statistical Account of Scotland—parish of Lanark.

A DREAM VERIFIED.

Many of our readers will recollect that a few years ago a gentleman of respectable family and connections in this country was unfortunately drowned in the Caledonian Canal, after just landing on its banks from a Glasgow vessel. He had lent his arm to a female passenger; the night was dark, and by a false step both were precipitated into the water, where they perished. Very early in life, whilst residing in the East Indies, this gentleman dreamt that he was engaged in company with several persons in seeking for the body of a drowned man; they toiled long and anxiously, with lights, boats, and grappling irons, but in vain. At length, when they were about to abandon the fruitless search, something was seen to rise slowly out of the water; it assumed the form of a human head, and to his horror he saw that the countenance was his own! He awoke in great agitation, and had some difficulty in shaking off the vivid impression left by this phantom of the night. Years afterwards, the same circumstance occurred to him in the West Indies. The dream, with all its appalling accompaniments of seeming reality, haunted his couch and terrified his imagination. His duties afterwards led him to return home, and he hoped he had for ever parted with the unwelcome vision. In this, however, he was destined to be disappointed; a third time did the same scene appear before him, as clearly and as indelibly imprinted on his mind as on the former occasions. He talked of the singular circumstance among his friends, and many must yet remember the frequency and solemnity with which he spoke of the dream. At last it was realised in his own melancholy fate. He was drowned, as described above; lights were procured, and the body was searched for, though in vain. But just as the party were about to leave the spot, the head of the unfortunate gentleman rose up, and every feature was distinctly visible in the torchlight above the water. A very near relative of the deceased instantly exclaimed, "Ah, now Edward's dream is verified."—Inverness Courier.

MACHINERY IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr W. Pares, at a public meeting lately, at Birmingham, stated, in proof of the increase of the powers of production by the improvement of machinery, that in 1792 the machinery in existence was equal to the labour of ten millions of labourers; in 1827, to two hundred millions; in 1833, to four hundred millions. In the cotton trade, spindles that used to revolve fifty times in a minute, now revolve in some cases eight thousand times a minute. At one mill at Manchester there are 136,000 spindles at work, spinning one million two hundred thousand miles of cotton thread per week. Mr Owen, at New Lanark, with 2500 people, daily produces as much cotton yarn as will go round the earth twice and a half. The total machinery in the kingdom is calculated now to be equal to the work of four hundred millions, and might be increased to an incalculable extent under proper arrangement.

WASTE OF MENTAL ENERGY IN POLITICS.

It does not seem to have ever occurred to any public writer, that the waste of mental energy in politics is one of the most remarkable features in our social condition. The quantity of time, labour, and soul devoted in Britain to the discussion and adjustment of national affairs, is prodigious, and, if applied to any purpose producing an immediate return, would certainly add greatly to our wealth. It is to be conceded, perhaps, that the national affairs can never be in such a condition that a considerable portion of vigilance will not be required from the governed, to keep them governing at their duty. Yet it is equally clear that there are periods when the lieges are apt to have their attention more absorbed by politics than at other times—as at present, when all our old institutions seem to be undergoing a process of moulting. It is also very certain that the energy and time thus absorbed are in a great measure lost. Publications containing the politics of the day, are, it may be said, a kind of evil: at the very best, they are a defence against evil, and have in them little direct good. Were all our institutions consonant to reason, and our population instructed to judge and act reasonably, their occupation would be gone. They live, like the learned faculties, only upon the misfortunes and imperfections of mankind; and it would be a far happier world if we could do without them. The amount, then, to which the nation is mulcted for the inadequacy of its institutions to satisfy itself, or its own unreasonableness in expecting and demanding more than what its institutions can give, is tremendous: and the subject seems worthy of a little attention.

That this time and energy should be applied to increase our ordinary business, is not to be desired, and could never altogether be effected. It is not altogether taken from business, and it could not altogether return to it. Much of what we give to politics may be said to belong to a stock of spare energy which we are constantly spending in some speculative way or other, by way of amusement, or, it might almost be said, relaxation—for the one kind of hard work can be relieved by another, is an established fact. We conceive that, if, for any reason, the nation should cease to be so much engrossed by politics, a very great part of the mind now scattered thereon would be sent into channels equally speculative, but much more certainly and directly tending to the public benefit. The great business of actual improvement would probably gain five-sixths of it; while the small remainder would be divided among fanaticisms of various kinds. If men were satisfied that the taxes were no more than what was justly required for the actual business of the country, and if no class of persons, religious or otherwise, had any longer occasion to repine at what they deemed undue privileges of others; or if it were possible to give the liberty of complaining of such matters were taken away entirely, as in some continental states, it could not be doubted, whatever may be the opinion entertained of the propriety or possibility of either of the classes of proceeding, that the surplus activity of the British mind would instantly find new modes of displaying itself, perhaps infinitely more brilliant than all that it has done in behalf of political liberty, in the days of Elizabeth. If the Germans, under the better order of circumstances, which cannot be supposed the most favourable, are distinguishing themselves by literary labours and scientific investigations unexampled, the British might surely be expected to distinguish themselves as highly.

The views here taken may appear to refer to too great a change to be entitled to that attention which is generally conceded to what are called practical subjects. But that the people of this country are prevented by political discussions from following out many social reforms that promise direct advantage, is unquestionable; and if the whole point be not conceded to us, we are quite willing to take a part. Put out of the way the question of pensions and sinecures, and we should have some hope to see chemistry become a general subject of study; settle the question of the corn-laws and restrictions upon trade, and men might be expected, ere long, to take measures for the universal diffusion of education; free them from the question of the church, and they might in time become religious. We are willing to break down the subject into as many small parts as may be agreeable, and to take the blessed change in the least possible instalments. All we insist on is, that the people of all parties should contemplate and convince themselves of the advantage there would be in laying down every now and then a settled political abstraction, and taking up some social reform of direct importance and avail in its place.

LOW PRICE OF GRAIN.

THROUGH the influence of a series of abundant harvests, grain is now so cheap, that, even without any restriction upon importation, the prices could not be greatly, if at all, lowered. The average of wheat at Mark Lane, during the first week of November 1834, was 43s. per quarter, being less than the price in the good old times before the war. While the community are thus for the present exempted from all direct disadvantage on the score of the corn-laws, it is lamentable to reflect on the distresses which are suffered, through that channel, by the very classes whom the corn-laws were designed most immediately to benefit—the landlords and their tenants. The miscalculation in which those laws originated seems at length about to be proved to their authors by an argument assuming the stern form of a punishment. From all quarters we now hear of the depression of the farmers. They suffer under rents, which, at the time of their being fixed, had a regard to medium harvests and what may be called naturally high prices; as a class, they are in a state of the severest adversity, deeply indebted in general to their landlords; and, consequently, like all debtors, deprived of their dearest privilege, their independence. The landlords, on the other hand, though invested with a painful mastery over their tenants, are unable to realise from them rents so disproportioned to existing prices, and, for their own sake, are glad to make large reductions and allowances, which of course must materially diminish their revenues. Nature has laughed to scorn all the calculations so presumptuously grounded upon her mysterious course, and literally spread calamity over the land—not by destroying the grain, as of old, but by producing it in unwonted abundance. The sin is so clearly to be read in the punishment, that our ancestors, had such an event taken place in their day, could not have failed to pronounce it a "judgment."

In reality, the distress which the corn-laws have brought upon those who first framed and supported them, is nothing more than the natural result of an undue attempt at profit. There are bounds of justice beyond which classes and interests cannot safely go in seeking their own advantage, any more than individuals; and when these are transgressed, the consequences are likely to prove, sooner or later, pretty much the same as what attend a breach of common honesty among simple traffickers. We sincerely believe that the fault committed in this case, liable though it may be to the most solemn censure, as a tampering with the gifts of providence and the interests of nations, sprung more from erroneous judgment than from selfishness; in proof of which it may be pointed out, that many, who have no personal interest in the restrictive regulations, still argue in favour of their expediency. But whatever might be the motive or originating cause, the result is clear—the violation, to so great an extent, of natural laws, has been followed by suffering equally extensive. Those who framed the restrictive enactments did not consider the principles upon which the material and moral world are constituted, and that an attempt to turn the course of nature is above the province of man. They accordingly gave those principles a shock, which, after impinging upon the interests of their fellow-creatures for a long series of years, has at last brought a harsher and severer mischief upon themselves.

It might no doubt appear a very great hardship at the conclusion of the war, that all at once the high prices of the preceding period should fall under the competition of foreign corn-growers. Such an event, however, was in the natural course of things, and ought to have been submitted to, as the least of possible or probable evils. The high war prices were simply an accident, and no one should have ever thought of keeping them up during peace. The landlords and farmers ought to have been contented with the good fortune which they had temporarily enjoyed, and only been on that account the more able and willing to fall back to something like the original state of things. The contrary conduct was a flagrant, though perhaps a natural error; and what have been the consequences? That the landlords have now to reduce their style of living, when, owing to the advance of the mercantile classes, to reduce it is more difficult than it formerly was, and attended with greater moral hardship. Also, that the reduction has been put off to a time when sons can no longer be provided for, as formerly, by government appointments, and when, consequently, greater demands are made upon the resources of almost every landed gentleman—those resources being less than when no such demands were made. All the distresses that this class can suffer, while a competence is still left, appear to many, we are aware, as visionary, and accordingly little sympathy is felt for them. But the hardship of retrenchment, of assuming a meaner style of living before the eyes of persons who have seen us in better days, and some of whom are rising as fast as we are falling, is in reality one of the severest of all hardships, and only so much the more so that it affects the mind rather than the body. The distresses, then, of the landed interest, are unquestionable. The case of the farmers is even more pitiable. During the whole twenty years of the unnatural system, they have made nothing. All they have been enabled to do by a system apparently protecting their interests, has been the payment of higher rents than they ought to have paid. Their former gains are now exhausted, and whole straths of them are in a condition of physical and moral trouble unexampled in the agricultural history of the country. In the southern parts of the island, they are engaged in a kind of war between two sets of antagonists—the landlords on the one hand, who drain their resources to every point short of what would be alike inconvenient for both, utter extinction—and the working-people on the other, by reducing whose wages they vainly endeavour to relieve themselves, thereby provoking a system of incendiarism which can only be accounted as another of the evils resulting from the corn-laws, and will never be remedied till the natural course of things is resumed.

Among the worst hardships of the farmers must be reckoned that political bondage under which debt has laid them, and which is so inconsistent with the spirit of every interpretation of our constitution. The legislature, in the year 1748, abolished the tenure of ward-holdings, by which the Scottish landlord could cause his tenant to come out with horse and man, and fight with him in whatever private or public war he chose to wage. But that degrading and pernicious servitude has been followed by one equally revolting, since Whig and Tory landlords have been enabled to calculate, with more or less certainty, upon as many votes for their respective friends as they may have farms. That a man of honourable feelings should be liable to the compulsion of a Whig landlord one year, and perhaps a Tory the next—supposing a sale of the estate—is a state of things very little better than what lately obtained in the West Indies. Such a man may have been accustomed to consider himself as a free-born Briton; but before he calls himself so, he must now reflect how his account stands with the factor, and what were the last prices at Haddington.

Such is the hardship, humiliation, and slavery, which have sprung from the corn-laws, even to the classes for whose benefit they were intended, if they were ever intended for the peculiar benefit of any. Strange to say, while these distresses are experienced by their authors and supporters, the class whom they were originally calculated to oppress are scatheless of them. The people at large do not now suffer in the least from the restrictions upon the importation of foreign corn; for, through the fortunate bounty of Nature, corn is raised almost as cheaply in our own as in any other country. Nor is it very probable that the abolition of the laws in question would be of any direct advantage to any of the existing community: all that is to be expected from such a step is an increase of our manufactures and of the numbers of our population—a very great and desirable result, however, though of little consequence to those now living. But it is the agriculturists themselves who are most interested in the removal of the restrictions. The farmers should demand this, if they wish to escape from exhausted purses and an ignominious thralldom: the landlords should demand it, if they wish to regain with any degree of peace and comfort their proper and natural position. Far better to put matters straight while prices are too low for importation, and when no immediate diminution of prices could ensue, than wait till perhaps another scarce year shall arrive, and the people make the demand on their own account, when the agriculturists would, beyond question, have to submit at once to thin stackyards, and prices perhaps still lower than the present.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

THE dissensions and difficulties which we have for some months past noticed as besetting the French government, have terminated in its total dissolution. Marshal Gerard, being unable to obtain an amnesty for political offences from Louis Philip, resigned in the last week of October, and on November 3, MM. Thiers, Guizot, Humann, De Rigny, and Duchatel, went in a body to the Tuileries, and gave in their resignations, without any previous intimation of their intention. In fact, they had been transacting business as usual with the king only an hour or two before, and their conduct, therefore, caused him the greater astonishment. M. Persil, Minister of Justice, and Admiral Jacob, Minister of Marine, were the only two who retained their places. The cause of this sudden break-up is attributed to the factious jealousy of the parties respecting the selection of a successor to Gerard in the Presidency of the Council. This appears to have been no easy matter to decide upon, as the characters of almost all the leading statesmen in France are represented as being so low in public estimation, even on the score of common honesty, that it was next to impossible to find one possessed of weight and influence necessary for that high station. The king, however, lost no time in availing himself of such materials as he possessed for supplying the vacancies in his cabinet, with the recent occupants of which he is said to have been much exasperated; and in a few hours, notwithstanding the efforts made to thwart him by these personages, he contrived to organise an administration consisting of the following individuals:—

M. Persil remains Minister of Justice.

M. Bresson, Ambassador at Berlin, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Lieutenant-General Baron Bernard, Minister of War, who will also fill the functions of Minister for Foreign Affairs until the arrival of M. Bresson.

Baron Charles Dupin, Deputy, Minister of Marine.

M. Teste, Deputy, Minister of Commerce, who will be Minister of Public Instruction ad interim.

M. Passy, Deputy, Minister of Finance.

M. Sauzet, a distinguished advocate of Lyons, was to have been offered the Ministry of Public Instruction, but it was uncertain whether he would accept it. Such was the ministry which Louis Philip, with the assistance of Bassano, contrived so expeditiously to organise; but it was doomed to as speedy a termination. On the Thursday following—that is to say, on the third day of its existence—it expired, Messrs Passy, Teste, Bassano, Bernard, and Charles Dupin, having given in their resignations, which were immediately accepted. The insisting of some of the cabinet that the twenty-five millions of indemnity to the Americans should become a ministerial question in the Chamber, is considered by some as the immediate cause. M. Humann was sent for subsequent to the resignations of Friday morning; and the general opinion was, that Thiers, Guizot—Doctrinaires and non-Doctrinaires—would come in again. They had instructions to offer place in the new arrangement to M. Passy. Nevertheless, the journals put forward Messrs Thiers and Mole as the framers of the future cabinet.

The time for the assembling of the Chambers is altered from the 29th to the 1st of December. It is said that an effort to gain popularity is to be made by proposing a legislative amnesty for political offences. Dupin, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, in return for the nomination of his brother to the Ministry of Marine, has promised, according to report, to give the new cabinet the aid of his oratorical talents.

SPAIN.

THE Spanish ministry seems to be in as confused and disorganised a condition as that of France. Martinez de la Rosa has retired, and Toreno has been empowered to form a new administration.

Something like a definitive decision has at last been come to by the Cortes respecting the national debt. After the subject had been bandied backwards and forwards, like a shuttlecock, betwixt the Proceres and Procuradores, changing its character at each rebound, and giving rise only to increased disputes and vacillation of purpose, it was at length agreed to refer the matter to a mixed committee of the two houses. This committee, after much consideration, reported in favour of the resolution of the Proceres, for the acknowledgment of the whole debt—excepting their inclusion of the Guebard loan—and for making the passive part of it active by twelve annual instalments. On November 8, however, the Procuradores, upon further deliberation, agreed to recognise the Guebard loan also; so that the resolutions of the Proceres have been wholly adopted. It is considered that the true reason for coming to this agreement originates in the imminent necessity felt in common for obtaining an immediate loan, which it was found in vain to apply for, should they attempt to disown any part of the national debt, even although contracted under a regime held as unconstitutional by the present legislature. But it seems doubtful, after all, whether this sacrifice of inclination to policy will attain them their object. The treasury is said to be empty; and certainly Toreno's report of an inevitable excess of expenditure over the income for the ensuing year (noticed in our last) offers but small inducement to capitalists to advance the required four millions.

Besides what we have stated, the news from the seat of war has for some time been unfavourable to the queen's cause. It is not true, as stated in our last (upon the authorities which we are necessarily obliged to trust to), that the Carlists have taken Bilbao; but they have elsewhere obtained advantages of no small importance. On the 27th October, Zumalacarraguy contrived to outmanoeuvre General O'Doyle, who, with the aid of General Osma, had got him enclosed in the valley near Salvatierra. By getting up a sham fight between two bodies of his troops, in which the smaller body, supposed by O'Doyle to be the queen's soldiers, appeared to be losing, the latter moved from his stronghold to their assistance, when he was instantly attacked, and his whole division, amounting to 1400 men, were either slain or made prisoners. The general, his brother, and other officers taken, were immediately shot. Zumalacarraguy did not attempt to follow up his success by an attack upon Salvatierra, or any other fortified place, but retreated to the mountains, carrying his prisoners with the 1400 muskets with him. This step would seem to imply a sense of weakness. The intelligence, however, excited so much displeasure and alarm at Madrid, that although the people did not, like the Turks upon occasions of such reverses, behead or bowstring any member of the executive, they exhibited a similar spirit of revenge, by demanding the dismissal of the minister of war, Zarco del Valle, who has accordingly been supplanted in office by General Valdez. It is even reckoned likely that the unfortunate mistake of O'Doyle, for which he suffered so severely, may occasion a total dissolution of the ministry. Seventy-eight members of the Commons have taken the opportunity it has afforded of declaring, in an address to the queen regent, that they felt themselves compelled to refuse all support to the government, if its system were not changed; and every thing at present in Madrid bears a very excited aspect. What turn they may take, it is impossible yet to guess at. It will depend probably on the news from the army of Mina, who has now taken the field in re-established health, after ten years of exile and suffering, as the commander-in-chief of the whole army of the north. At first, and until within the last few weeks, his authority was restricted to the province of Navarre. He arrived at Pampeluna about the beginning of November, and published two addresses—one of encouragement to his troops, and another to the people of Navarre, offering a general amnesty to all insurgents who will lay down their arms and return home, or else enlist under his banners; but denouncing the utmost extremities against those who shall persist in their opposition to the queen. His address concludes with intimating that "any individual who shall be found at a distance from the public highways between the setting and rising of the sun, and who shall not be able to furnish a satisfactory and legitimate reason for his presence, shall be put to death." The hopes of the queen's party now seem to be wholly centred on Mina's exertions.

Nothing is known precisely of late respecting the movements of Don Carlos. Zea Bermudez, the late minister, is at present in Paris, and has been repeatedly closeted with Louis Philip. The object of these conferences excites much rumour and speculation. A decree has been issued, confiscating the property of the Carlists, and suspending the pensions of those members of the royal family who refuse to recognise the queen.

UNITED STATES.

THE United States papers are filled with details respecting the general election, which appears to have been disgraced with scenes of the most outrageous description in various quarters. The principal scene of riot was Philadelphia, in which the "Whig" or Jackson party were triumphant, having returned their members by a majority of 1800. In the count they were unsuccessful. The polling days exhibit a continued series of personal conflicts between the contending factions. This was more especially the case in the district of Moyamensing, where several houses were burnt to the ground, the furniture scattered through the streets, and broken into fragments with savage fury. Eighteen persons are said to have been shot, several of them mortally. The correspondent of a New York paper, who personally witnessed part of the riots, thus describes what took place. "After the clearing of the polls, between ten and eleven o'clock, a party of fifteen or twenty individuals appeared opposite the Whig head-quarters in Southwark, and commenced throwing brickbats and stones amongst a collection of Whigs, who immediately, in self-defence, resented the assault, and drove them from the ground. The Whigs then cut down a hickory-tree in front of a tent where the Jackson headquarters were held, and destroyed the tent. The Jackson party in the meantime were reinforced, and returned 500 strong, and commenced stoning, and succeeded in driving the Whigs into their quarters. A gun was then fired from the upper story of the house, which contained nothing but a blank cartridge, and was supposed to have been discharged by the owner of the house, in hopes of intimidating the mob and protecting his property. This was immediately returned, and fifty or twenty shots were exchanged, by which six or eight were wounded, but none killed. The guns, we are assured, were loaded only with shot. After the Whigs were driven from the house, the furniture was taken by the Jackson party, placed around the liberty pole, and burnt. They then commenced destroying the house, and finally set it on fire, when it was completely destroyed, along with three others adjoining. The firemen, who were prompt in arriving for the purpose of extinguishing the fire, were driven from the ground by the Tory party, and several were injured seriously in endeavouring to do their duty as good citizens. The Jacksonmen kept possession till the work of destruction was completely finished." Both parties seem to have been equally violent. The New York Advertiser (Oct. 16) states that it was quite impossible to get the aged and infirm to get to the poll, and that the young and strong who attempted to exercise the right of suffrage, did so at the risk of having their clothes torn from their backs, and their limbs dislocated. They were compelled to make their way to the window over the heads of the hundreds wedged together in a close mass in front of it; and after having attained the window, stood nine chances to one of being torn from it before they were able to deposit their votes. For many, therefore, the right of suffrage was utterly destroyed.

The unpopularity of General Jackson seems to arise from various causes. One of these is the supposed intention of government to go to war with France to recover the 25,000,000 of francs promised by the De Broglie as an indemnity to the American merchants, but which the Chambers refused to vote. Another accusation is the stopping of the Whig journals at the post-office, on their way to subscribers. The opposition of Jackson, too, to the United States Bank, seems to be occasioning great dissatisfaction among certain of the more respectable and wealthy classes therewith connected. The Times (London) says—"According to the best private accounts from New York, there is little prospect of the quarrel between the United States Bank and the government being adjusted, and another charter obtained during the approaching sitting of Congress. Nothing so compulsory would, it is well known, induce General Jackson to assent to any such measure; and on the new elections, the bank, it is said, is losing ground, not obtaining more than one-third of the votes of some of the states. It was thought that the policy of the government at Washington, and also of that of the separate states, would be to abstain from granting charters or exclusive privileges to banks of any description, leaving the trade in money open to all. It is supposed, also, that all notes of small value will be put out of circulation in the United States in the course of the next spring. The proceeding is gress altogether are likely to possess more interest in Europe than has been the case for several preceding sessions."

PORTUGAL.

THERE is no news of any importance from Portugal. The proceedings of the Cortes are entirely destitute of general interest, and their time seems to be taken up with little else than the angry squabbles of rival factions. The Duke of Leuchtenberg was daily expected at Lisbon, and it is stated that the young queen explicitly informed her council of her determination to confer her hand on that prince. There are no recent accounts respecting the movements of Miguel.

BELGIUM.

THE Belgian Chambers were opened by King Leopold in person, on the 11th November. His speech contains nothing worthy of notice, conveying only the usual congratulations on internal prosperity, happy understanding with foreign powers, and so forth. It intimates, however, an intended reduction of the standing army, "as far as is convenient with safety," and the establishment of a defensive line towards the north.

GREECE.

MR OTHO intends, it appears, to remove the seat of government to Athens, the Parthenon of which is about to restore. He arrived there with his council in the beginning of September, and laid the foundation-stone of the projected edifice with great pomp. He is described as being enthusiastically received. New squares, streets, and public erections, already planned out on a magnificent scale.

WEST INDIES.

THE latest accounts from the West India colonies are of a most disastrous nature in many respects. On the night of the 20th September, a terrific hurricane passed over several of the islands, and in some of them the consequences were most calamitous. The island of Dominica is represented as being reduced in one day, from a fertile and luxuriant colony, to a perfect desert. In the town, the left side of Government House was blown down, and the other parts of the building partially damaged. The office of the Auxiliary Commissioners of Compensation, adjoining those offices, was materially injured, and a great many of their original documents destroyed. The new post-office building, the customhouse, the court-house, markethouse, the jail, and the Protestant church, and almost every other building in town, suffered considerable injury from the effects of the hurricane. The mercantile houses of Messrs Thomas and Co., Messrs James Garraway and Co., and Messrs W. Doyle, Esq., on account of their proximity to the sea, also experienced most heavy losses. Less than one hundred human beings, according to the information obtained on September 30, in one day perished.

The damage done to the town is nothing to what sustained in the country. Some notion of the calamity may be obtained from the following letter from a merchant to a London merchant, of date September 23: "From the letter we have addressed, your firm will be aware of a few of the particulars of the effects of the hurricane on this island experienced on the night of the 20th, and the morning of the 21st inst., which, instead of exaggeration, conveys but a faint idea of the dreadful ravages committed by the elements—the works on one of the principal sugar estates levelled to the ground, the canes blown flat on the earth, in many places buried in the mud and blown from the soil; the description of provisions above ground completely swept away, and the face of the country, which exhibited the utmost luxuriance of vegetation on the day last, changed to the appearance of a general desolation having passed over it. The little coffee plantation on the trees, of course, is lost; but that would be a trifling loss were not the greater part of the trees torn up by the roots; in fact, every step we take in inquiry brings us to a more melancholy scene, if possible, than the former. God only knows what will become of this devoted island; more ruin cannot be conceived; without a positive assistance of liberal assistance, few estates will think of establishing their works; and how our people are to be fed after the few ripe provisions which may be exhausted, one knows not; the prospects before us at present are indeed dreary; and although not of that gloomy and desponding class of mind as to despair, I must confess our losses appear irreparable."

These distressing details are not the only painful ones that have been received lately from our West India colonies. As was anticipated by all who had used the means of judging accurately of the real state of matters there, the emancipation act of the 1st of August seems likely to prove a complete failure towards its expected benefits, either to master or to slave. The negroes cannot be made to understand the notion of "fettered freedom." They believe, or at least profess to believe, that they have been completely liberated from all thralldom by his Britannic Majesty, and that their masters and the local government are illegally exercising authority over them in compelling them to work. In Jamaica, they have been particularly unruly, and manifest the utmost contempt for the laws. The negroes have very generally refused to work. One of the principal planters in the parish of St Anne writes to the Kingston Chronicle—"Our apprentices are daily becoming more insolent and lazy; so much so, that a great change, for the better or worse, must soon take place. They are not earning fivepence per diem. This the master cannot long stand." Similar accounts from other parts of the island are published in the Jamaica newspapers. But the negroes do not content themselves with refusing to work. In many places they have proceeded to the most daring outrages, setting fire to the works, rescuing prisoners, and bidding defiance to the magistrates, whose hands are said to be so tied up by instructions from the Colonial Office, that they find it impossible to perform their duty. More than one-half of them are already dead from fatigue and anxiety; and this was only what might have been expected by those acquainted with the climate and the face of the country. It is stated that the Marquis of Sligo, whose exertions to maintain order appear to have been most energetic and praiseworthy, has written home for more extended powers, and for fifty additional magistrates.

Mr Everard, an old lieutenant in the navy, proceeded at the head of a body of local police to one of the estates, in order to bring the negroes on it to a sense of their duty. The negroes retired to an eminence, and assailed the magistrate and his followers with a volley of stones; but his instructions would not allow him to put down a black as a white mob would have been quelled in England or in Ireland. Subsequent to this affair, Mr Everard died of fatigue and anxiety of mind. Dr Madden (well known as an author), Mr Lloyd, and Mr Norcott, have, it is said, resigned in disgust.

It seems to be generally thought that some entirely new plan for carrying emancipation into effect must be adopted, as there is reason to fear that the apprenticeship scheme would only render it necessary to postpone the day of freedom. In the meantime, immediate ruin is impending over the planters from the non-cultivation of their estates.

We observe that fresh disturbances broke out at Port of Spain, in Trinidad, in the beginning of October, in consequence of the punishment of a rioter; and that the governor was compelled to call out the military, in order to disperse the negroes, who congregated to the number of a thousand, and attempted to break open the jail. No lives, however, were lost.

A most distressing occurrence took place in the latter end of September, in the city of Toronto (late York), in Upper Canada. The mayor had convened a meeting in Market Square to consider some public matters, which was very numerously attended. A large multitude got up on the gallery which surrounds the inner part of the Market House, and in the course of an hour it was so crowded that the timbers gave way, and nearly one hundred persons were precipitated to the ground. Two or three stuck upon the iron hooks on which the butchers hang their meat, and a fine young lad, son of Colonel Fitzgibbon, died in a few minutes afterwards; two or three others shared the same fate, and men were to be seen immediately afterwards carried in all directions, some in carts, some in waggons and gigs, and others on litters of various kinds, some in a state of insensibility, and to all appearance in the jaws of death; others borne up by friends and able to walk slowly, covered with blood, and the clothes torn off their backs. Altogether the scene was most shocking. Among the sufferers seriously injured, the Toronto Courier mentions the names of Colonel Fitzgibbon, Mr Gurnett, publisher of the Courier, Dr Lithgow, Mr H. Morrison, tavern-keeper, R. Meighan, Messrs Starks, booksellers, father and son, Capt. Dennison, Mr Francis Hood, since dead, Mr Dutton, watchmaker, since dead. The full extent of the fatality, however, could not of course be for some time ascertained.

IRELAND.

ON the 30th October, an immense assembly of the Protestants in the county of Down was held near Hillsborough. The meeting was convened by the high-sheriff of the county, Lord Hillsborough, and considerable exertion seems to have been made to procure a numerous assemblage. The numbers congregated have been most discrepantly stated—the Roman Catholic journals bringing them down so low as 10,000, while some of the Protestant papers calculate them at 150,000. From an estimate recently made upon the extent of ground occupied by the meeting, it would appear that 23,000 is the most probable amount. It is certain, at all events, that the assemblage was almost unprecedented both for numbers and respectability. The tenantry of the different estates processed to the ground in divisions, headed by their landlords; those of Lord Roden alone amounted to 15,000. A large platform was erected, on which were several ladies, including the Countesses of Roden and Clanwilliam, Lady Elizabeth Jocelyn, Lady Mandeville, Lady Bateson, &c. The principal gentlemen were the Marquises of Donegal, Downshire, and Londonderry; Lords Roden, Dufferin, Clanwilliam, and Castlereagh; Sir Robert Bateson, Colonel Forde, Dr Cooke, late moderator of the Ulster Presbyterian Synod, and between twenty and thirty gentlemen and clergymen of the county. Lord Hillsborough took the chair. The resolutions were proposed and seconded by the Marquises of Downshire and Londonderry, Lord Roden, Lord Castlereagh, Lord Arthur Hill, Colonel Forde, Lord Clanwilliam, Lord Dufferin, Dr Cooke, Sir Robert Bateson, the Rev. Holt Waring, and Mr David Ker. They were to this effect—that the state of the country was very alarming; that evil-disposed men were plotting to sever the British connection; that seditious and dangerous leaders of the Catholic population exercised a palpable influence over ministers; that the consequence of this was, the emigration of peaceful subjects, and the spread of crime; that an union of Protestants in all parts of the country was now necessary to maintain the integrity of the Protestant church; and that an address to the King, and petitions to both Houses of Parliament, embodying the sentiments of these resolutions, should be prepared and signed.

Most of the speeches were distinguished by their length and vehemence, particularly those of the Marquis of Londonderry, Lord Roden, and Dr Cooke; the conduct of government for its encouragement and patronage of the Catholics, and its oppression of the Protestants, being the chief theme of reprobation. The speech of the Rev. Doctor Cooke seems particularly to have attracted attention from its eloquence and ability; but our limits will not allow our attempting any abridgement of it.

The Belfast Northern Whig asserts that most of the tenantry present were driven to the ground like sheep by agents and bailiffs; but this is positively contradicted by at least equally credible authorities, who state that these officials were simply employed to give notice of the intended meeting to the tenantry. The affair appears to have excited a great sensation throughout Ireland, and called forth the violent denunciations of the Catholic and repeal parties. Some of their leaders (amongst others Mr Shiel) have demanded the dismissal of Marquis Downshire from the lord-lieutenancy of the county, for the part he took in the proceedings; but the government does not seem to have taken any notice of their complaints.

Great apprehensions of a turbulent winter are generally entertained, from the determined spirit of opposition to the payment of tithes, whether to clergymen or landlords, which seems to prevail almost universally amongst the Catholic population. The clergy and proprietors appear to be no less determined to enforce their right; and the former, indeed, are placed in such a predicament as almost to leave them no alternative. Our readers will recollect that a million sterling was voted in the last session of Parliament to go towards indemnifying the Protestant clergy in Ireland for the deficiency in their incomes, caused by the impossibility of collecting the full amount of the tithes. This loan was to be repaid by the clergy in instalments, the first of which fell due on November 1; and Mr Littleton, some time ago, in answer to an application from one of the reverend gentlemen, intimated the determination of government to exact it. In consequence of this notice, the Archbishop of Armagh (the primate), with the other Irish prelates, have transmitted a representation of the case of the clergy to the Irish government; stating that the exaction of the repayment must "involve the clergy in extreme difficulties and embarrassment." The Lord Lieutenant, in his answer, which follows, takes an evident pleasure in referring to the Parliamentary measure, which, if not defeated, would have so effectually relieved the clergy:—

"Phoenix Park, 4th November 1834.

"MY LORD PRIMATE—Your grace may be assured that I have received the representations of the archbishops and bishops transmitted by your grace, with every sentiment of respect which so high an authority demands from me.

"His Majesty's government has not been insensible to the difficulties and embarrassments in which the clergy of Ireland must be involved at this period of time, unless some arrangement had previously been made by law for the final settlement of the question of tithe. Accordingly, after having provided for the immediate relief of the clergy by a temporary loan of one million sterling, a bill was introduced into Parliament under the direction of government, for the permanent relief of that body; by which, in the first place, such of the clergy as had availed themselves of the temporary loan of one million sterling were absolved altogether from their debt to the crown, accruing on the 1st of November 1834.

"The payment of the first instalment was charged on the landowners, but was postponed by that bill until the 1st of November 1835.

"The unappropriated surplus of one million, which was calculated to amount to £300,000, was rendered applicable to the payment of arrears of tithe or composition still due to the clergy for the years 1831, 2, and 3; and such of the clergy as might take relief from this source were to be in the same manner absolved from repayment to the crown; and the debt was to be charged on the owners of the first estates of inheritance in the land.

"The crown was then charged with the collection both of rent charges and instalments; and ample security was given to the clergy throughout Ireland for receiving £7.7, 10s. per cent. on the amount of the composition due to each.

"Your grace will observe that, under this plan, an arrangement was contemplated for the final settlement of a loan of a million advanced to the clergy, without any further pressure for repayment. Thus his Majesty's government has manifested the most sincere desire not only to relieve the clergy of Ireland from all immediate distress, but to provide effectually for the interests of that body, by an equitable and permanent arrangement.

"The failure of this arrangement for the present has produced all the difficulties which were foreseen, and which have been most deeply lamented by his Majesty's government, more especially because those ombarrassments are now beyond the reach of any immediate remedy."

The marquis goes on to state, that the time and mode of requiring payment of the money advanced to the clergy is under consideration, but that he knows of no immediate remedy for the present disastrous state of affairs. Next session he hopes that all parties will unite dispassionately to bring about a settlement of this question.

A letter from Lord Duncannon to Lord Wellesley, in reference to the same subject, is not calculated to afford comfort to the unfortunate gentlemen. Lord Duncannon says—

"MY LORD—I have had the honour to receive a letter from the chief secretary for Ireland, by your excellency's directions, conveying to me the resolutions of the prelates of Ireland; and I can only observe, that, however anxious his Majesty's government may be for the best interests of the church, and however deeply they may feel for the distress and embarrassment of a portion of the clergy, they cannot reproach themselves, if the expectations under which the prelates state the loan to have been accepted have not been realised; his Majesty's government having in the last session unsuccessfully proposed to Parliament a bill, which, in their opinion, tended to the restoration of order and obedience to the laws, which would have made an equitable arrangement for the composition of tithes, and have relieved the clergy from the repayment of the loan. I can only refer your excellency to the provisions of the act of Parliament (3d and 4th William IV. cap. 100, sec. 19), which rendered the demand of repayment, on the part of the Treasury, imperative."

From the preceding extracts, our readers will be able to form a correct notion of the lamentable prospect in view equally to the churchmen and the tithe-payers of Ireland.

Mr O'Connell has accepted an invitation to a public dinner from the citizens of Cork, to be held on Nov. 17; any account of which, from our going so early to press, we will be prevented from giving, at least in a part of our impression. It is said that the O'Connell tribute this year far exceeds the average amount, the consequence, as is alleged, of the vituperative condemnation of this exaction by the leading London journals. The abuse of enemies seems in the eyes of the Irish people to be quite as great a recommendation of the honourable gentleman as the praise of friends. £1,300 was collected the first Sunday at the chapel doors in Dublin.

ENGLAND.

CHANGE OF MINISTRY.

THE death of Earl Spencer, November 10, and the consequent impossibility of his son, Lord Althorp, any longer holding the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, led to a dissolution of the Whig Ministry on the 13th. Lord Melbourne, the Premier, on that day paid a visit to the King at Brighton, to inform his Majesty of the detriment which the cabinet had sustained by the accession of Lord Althorp to the peerage; to which his Majesty is said to have answered, that he considered the event as tantamount to a dissolution of the ministry, and he held the ministry to be dissolved accordingly. That the conversation between his Majesty and the ex-Premier was of an amicable character, and that Lord Melbourne felt as strongly as his sovereign the necessity of new arrangements, seems to be rendered likely by the circumstance of his lordship being employed, at his return to London next day, to convey a message by which the Duke of Wellington was called into the royal presence. The Standard also avers, that, after his lordship's departure, the King was heard to say, "Of all the men I ever met, Lord Melbourne is one of the most honest, most straightforward, and most to be loved, I ever knew. If he has any enemies, and he can have none but political enemies, they must allow this." A report was circulated, attributing the change of Ministry to the influence of the Queen; in reference to which the Standard alleges that her Majesty did not know what had taken place till Saturday, when the Duke of Wellington arrived at the palace.

The facts of the dismissal of the ministry, and that the duke had been sent for, were made known by the morning papers of Saturday, Nov. 15, and excited an extraordinary sensation both in London and in the provinces. On Sunday, a private meeting of the council of the Political Union was held in London, to take into consideration what ought to be done in the existing emergency. Several speeches were made, powerfully expressive of the state of public feeling; after which the council came to the resolution—"That the removal of the late ministry was indicative of a determination to put a stop to the progress of all farther reform, and that they would therefore form themselves into a PERMANENT COMMITTEE, to watch the course of events, and to take such steps as would advance the cause of good government."

The construction of a new cabinet appears to have been embarrassed considerably by the absence, in Italy, of Sir Robert Peel, to whom the Duke of Wellington sent off a despatch on the night of the 15th. On Monday the 17th, the King arrived at St James's Palace, where he received the resignations of the retiring ministers, and was waited on by the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Rosslyn, Lord Lyndhurst, Mr Goulburn, and other individuals connected with the former cabinet. The appointment of the duke on this occasion to be one of his Majesty's principal secretaries of state, was gazetted next day.

Being under the necessity of completing our columns on the 21st of November, we are unable to present any further intelligence respecting the ministerial arrangements. It is not expected, however, that the cabinet can be definitely arranged till the return of Sir Robert Peel, which is not expected till the first week of December. Should any arrangements of importance take place between the date of the present writing and the day on which we publish, we must hope that the public will make allowance for the inability under which we lie of chronicling it.

In the meantime, movements of considerable importance are taking place throughout the country, for the purpose of expressing dissatisfaction with the proposed new ministry. We hear of preparations for meetings on a great scale in the metropolis, in Glasgow, and other cities. On Tuesday, November 18, the Town Council of Edinburgh, with only three dissentient Tory voices, voted an address to his Majesty, deploring his Majesty's "having been pleased to dispense with the services" of the late ministry, and hoping that, should his Majesty find it necessary to do so, he will call to his counsels only such men as will follow up the course of their predecessors. On Friday, the 21st, a public meeting took place in the open air in the Grassmarket, where the principal friends of the late ministry, connected with Edinburgh, in conjunction with a portion of the Radical party, addressed a large though not very surprisingly numerous or enthusiastic body of people, in favour of certain resolutions to the same effect as the above address. A series of counter-resolutions, including a petition for triennial parliaments, vote by ballot, and household suffrage, was moved by Mr Aytoun, as an amendment; and on a show of hands, a nearly equal number declared for each. The chairman, the Lord Provost Spittal, pronounced the original resolutions to be carried.

The only other circumstances which we are able to state at this opportunity, are, that the funds have continued firm, or even experienced a slight rise (Consols on Nov. 18 having been 91½), while the Times and Courier newspapers have taken a favourable view of the new administration, on the supposition that the Duke of Wellington will grant such reforms as will gain a majority in the House of Commons, and satisfy the country.

LORD DURHAM.

ON the 24th October, Mr Macevay Napier, the editor of the Edinburgh Review, addressed a letter to the newspapers, which is intended for a defence of the article in the October number of that publication, and a reply to Lord Durham's letter, asserting it to contain "gross falsehood and misrepresentation" (given in our last). The first part of the letter contains some remarks on the impropriety of which Lord Durham has been guilty in addressing his letter of contradiction to the publisher instead of the editor of the Review. Mr Napier then endeavours to show that the disclosures in the Review were mere repetitions of what Lords Grey, Brougham, and Durham himself, had said elsewhere. The pith of his letter is contained in the following passage:—

"The fact that the franchise originally fixed upon by the framers of the reform bill was a twenty-pound franchise, has been more than once alluded to in the House of Lords. It was particularly mentioned both by Earl Grey and by the Lord Chancellor on the 7th of October 1831. And the fact that Lord Durham was a member of the cabinet committee who framed the scheme embracing that franchise, was disclosed, about a year ago, by Lord Durham himself, at a public dinner at Newcastle; he having then spoken of the bill as framed by him, with the assistance of a small committee of his colleagues. In as far as I know, the public was not till then aware of there having been a cabinet committee appointed to digest this scheme, or of Lord Durham's share in it. If this be true, as to the best of my knowledge and belief it is, Lord Durham must be viewed as the primary divulger of this piece of cabinet procedure. Now, I would have taken leave to ask his lordship whether the facts just specified, joined with those of a public nature, regarding Lord Chandos's amendments, the freemen's franchise, and the restriction of borough votes, are not the whole facts upon which the charge brought against him in the Review is founded; and whether, if this be true, there was any good ground for the allegation that those facts were 'assumed' without any authority."

Lord Durham's rejoinder to this letter, as well as on all the points of controversy, was given in his speech at the Glasgow dinner, Oct. 29, to which we refer our readers.

Lord Durham, since his return from Scotland, has received invitations to public dinners from Belfast, Manchester, and Newcastle, and some of the metropolitan districts. The two first he has declined attending, on the score of ill health; the invitation from Newcastle he has accepted—day fixed, Nov. 19; and it is supposed that the intentions of the last named will not be persevered in, as arrangements are now in progress for a grand metropolitan festival, to be given his lordship on the eve of the meeting of Parliament.

WOODEN TALLIES.

In a recent number of Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, prepared before the burning of the Houses of Parliament, the mode of keeping accounts by tally was described as the remains of a very ancient custom, and the chequered cloth of the English treasury stated to be a modification of the Roman abacus. A more minute description of the tallies will greatly increase the wonder that is naturally felt at such a ridiculously awkward and antiquated custom being retained till the present year in the highest arithmetical business of the country, the keeping of the national account of monies. A tally is a wooden staff or stick upon which the notches have been cut, it is cloven or split in two, in the direction of the grain lengthways, and through the notches. Each of these pieces would of course bear the like number of notches, and each would therefore record the weight, number, or value of any thing the notches signified. For instance, before the general use of writing, two persons doing business together were accustomed to cut a tally between them. The quantity of goods sold, or the sum of money, was entered upon a stick with a knife, instead of into a book with a pen; and the stick upon which the entry was made in notches having been split and divided, one-half was kept by one contracting party, and the other half by the other party.

The Dumfries Courier says—"A friend, who was for many years in a government office in London, assures us that he has seen as many tallies as would have filled an ordinary room, and as he was merely conversant with the department, the quantity altogether must have been quite immense. When the Stamp Office made a payment to the Exchequer—say of £1,000,000 sterling—they received a receipt written in Norman-French, and at the same time a bundle of split tallies, expressive of the amount, in notches, duplicates of which were kept at head-quarters, to be compared or fitted when balance-time came round. The same practice obtained with all the other government offices, and it is even said that the other and his assistants, with the supplies needed of particular kind of thick willows, cost the country £1,000 per annum."

THE NEW COLONY OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

IN pursuance of the act of Parliament, which authorises the crown "to erect South Australia as a British province, and to provide for the colonisation and government thereof," a board of commissioners has been appointed, consisting of the gentlemen whose names follow—Mr Whitmore, Mr Grote, Mr Wade Norman, Mr H. G. Ward, Colonel Torrens, Mr D. Hill, and Mr Walbanke Childers. The functions of the commission, as defined by the South Australian act, are, to make rules, orders, and regulations for the disposal of public lands in the new province to employ the money paid for such lands in conveying labourers to the colony; and to raise funds for the expenses of its government, by the issue of bonds, bearing colonial interest, and secured on the revenue and lands of the colony. It may be expected that the commissioners (all of whom were members of the South Australian Association, by which the plan of this colony was formed) will immediately publish a statement of the mode in which their own principles of colonisation are to be carried into effect. Such a statement, under the name of orders or regulations, will have the authority of law. In this way, whatever relates to the two elements of colonisation—the disposal of land and the management of emigration—will be defined with precision, and placed on a permanent footing; an immense advantage, as all will allow, who know any thing of the evils which in other colonies result from the vague character and short duration of such laws as most deeply affect the interests of the colonists. The Morning Chronicle has well explained, that the duties of these commissioners are purely ministerial; that they have no personal interest in promoting emigration to this colony, or in selling the land, or in raising the revenue; that their situation with respect to the colonists, differs altogether from that of the directors of a joint-stock company, who, by embarking personally in a speculation, lend their names to it, entice others to join in it, and incur personal responsibility towards the shareholders. But though all this be true and obvious, there is a kind of emicement which the commissioners will surely practise, if they legislate as such men are expected to do. If the sort of code of colonisation which it is their duty to frame should carry out the principles of the law under which they act, this will be the most attractive of British colonies. On their regulations show that in this colony there will never be any lack of hired labour, where capitalists and persons of almost every class will embark in the undertaking. The execution of orders made by the commissioners for the disposal of public lands, and the reception of labouring emigrants, must necessarily devolve upon persons resident in the colony. The head of these will be a "colonial commissioner." It is understood that this office will be filled by Captain John Kennedy, of the Royal Engineers, an officer of high reputation for scientific acquirements, and so, as government engineer of Cephalonia, has had rich practical experience of the sort of duties he will be required to perform. So far with respect to colonisation, the civil and military government of the province is entrusted to Colonel Charles James Napier, who as lieutenant-governor of Cephalonia under the lord commissioners Sir Thomas Maitland and Sir Frederick Adam. He intends (so the Chronicle informs us) to become colonist himself, like William Penn, though an absolute sovereign in power, had the strongest personal interest in the well-being of those who were placed under his authority. According to the proposal originally made to government by the South Australian Association, the power of making laws for the colony would have been vested in the commissioners until the population of the province had amounted 50,000 souls, and would then have been transferred the colonists themselves. Mr Stanley objected to is old-fashioned mode of proceeding; or did not now, perhaps, that it was recommended by the example of all the colonies which Englishmen have founded in North America. Be that as it may, the 10th Australian act only promises that the province all have a local legislative assembly as soon as it all contain 50,000 inhabitants. Meanwhile, the laws are to be made by "the King in Council."—Bridged from the Spectator.

SPORTING.

Great Steeple Chase.—This desperate but exciting kind racing has of late years become so popular in the vicinity of the metropolis, that the Cockney sportsmen look regularly for them in the winter as they do for Ascot d Epsom in the summer. It was with no small delight, therefore, that they read the announcement of the Buckinghamshire steeple chase; the more so, as the distance from town (forty miles) was such as to keep away the rabble, who on occasions of this sort contrive to do a great deal of mischief to the farmers. The time fixed for the event was the 12th November, and the place the village of Aylesbury, a spot peculiarly adapted for the purpose, as, independent of some galloping ground, it is bounded by fences—none of the light sort of jumps so frequently selected out of compliment to the white-kidney class of equestrians, but regular rasps, accessible only by good cattle and resolute riders. For an accommodation of those who lacked either the "appearance" or the disposition to "go with them," the line country was taken as near to the turnpike-road as possible, so that a good view of the race was afforded for the greater part of the distance. Before entering into particulars of the race, we should state that it was for a sweepstakes of fifteen sovereigns each, p.p., with a fifty pence's cup added, the distance four miles, and the paces H. Peyton and J. Fielding, Esqrs., two gentlemen well known in all the sporting circles for their experience on the turf and in the field. The ground chosen by them on the Bicester road, and was remarkable for its severity; it is barely possible, indeed, that a more trying four miles could have been selected. The starting point was Wadson Mill, about four miles from Aylesbury, the winning flags being planted in the field, close to the town, belonging to Mr Brookes. There were no other flags, the riders having the privilege of taking their own line, with the church steeple as a very conspicuous and appropriate beacon. Nearly the whole of the ground was grass land, and it included (besides several rises, some double fences, with ditches, two miles, and plenty of general fencing) a brook about a mile and a half from one start, and a river of nearly eight miles wide within a mile from home.

The Marquis of Waterford's br. h. Lancet (rode by owner), Mr Geary's br. g. Pickle (owner), Countess's b. g. Ace of Trumps (a lad), Mr Bainbridge's m. Laurestina (Mr Allnut), Captain Fairlie's b. m. Norna (Mr Powell), Mr Solloway's br. g. Enterprise (owner), Mr Cowper's b. g. Harlequin (owner), Captain Madden's ch. g. Phipps (owner), Captain Lamb's b. g. Norna (Mr Beecher), Mr Tibbory's ch. h. Prosperer (Mr J. Mason), Captain Clitheroe's br. g. Fingal (owner), Mr Elmore's g. g. Grimaldi (Mr Bean), Mr Bean's b. g. Madnought (Mr Cardale), Mr Anderson's w. g. the Ter (Mr Weston), Mr Anderson's b. g. the Poet (Mr Lee), Mr Weston's ch. g. Cottager (Mr F. Nicholson), Mr Yeasley's ch. g. (a lad), Mr Smith's b. g. (a lad), Mr Brown's g. m. Confidence (owner), Mr Scotland's b. g. Gartney (Mr Cartwright).

The odds were 4 to 1 agst Vivian; 6 to 1 agst the Ter; 7 to 1 agst Grimaldi; 7 to 1 agst the Flyer; and 8 to 1 agst Cottager. The start took place at the time mentioned above. All got off fairly, but in a wide straggling manner, especially Lord Waterford, who took his place to the left of his competitors, and quite distinct from them, which course his lordship observed throughout. Mr Yeasley's horse took the lead at a slashing pace, followed by Norna, Phipps, Vivian, Pickle, Laurestina, the Poet, Grimaldi, Prosperer, and one or two others lying up. In the course of the first mile and a half there were several falls: Phipps's bridle broke, and two or three changes took place in the position of the horses. At this point there was a spinney; the first to get through it were Vivian, Mr Yeasley's horse, and Norna, and Prosperer and the rest being close at their heels. Prosperer was the first out of the brook, and Vivian a moment after; but in charging a gate in the next field (where two or three others received falls), he got a complete somerser. His intrepid rider, however, in spite of bruises and scratches, was remounted in an instant, and went well up with his horses at the river. No one attempted to leap this; but all that were up (Vivian, Norna, Laurestina, the Poet, Lancet, Glenartney, Mr Yeasley's horse, and Confidence) dashed boldly into it. Laurestina was first landed on the other side, then Vivian, and after him Prosperer, Norna, and Yeasley's horse; but all dead beat except the first two. Laurestina was leading till they came to a lane which was enclosed between two tremendous fences, at one of which Norna got another fall. Mr Beecher, up in an instant, with great patience, drew gradually upon the mare, and brought her in the last field but one, took the last fence and head with her, and then broke away, winning cleverly by three or four lengths, and completing the distance under fourteen minutes. Prosperer was Norna fourth, and Yeasley's fifth. Of the others we give no positive account; some cooled themselves in the river till they were dragged out, and others, finding the inutilty of any further struggle, got into the turnpike-road and came home at their leisure, not one having died without one or more falls. Altogether it was a most spirited and best conducted steeple chase that has been seen within fifty miles of town.

Oct. 21. A public dinner given at Ramsgate by about one hundred and fifty gentlemen to the Duke of Wellington, as Warden of the Cinque Ports. His grace was most enthusiastically received. A great number of military officers were present.—The people at Sandgate were alarmed by what they supposed to be a great fire at Folkestone, but on hastening to that town, they discovered it to proceed from a cliff overhanging the sea, on the road from Folkestone to Sandgate, which presented a most beautiful sight; the long, bunchy, dry grass that covers it, was in one immense blaze for about two miles. All attempts to extinguish it were perfectly useless, and it was not till Wednesday morning that it was stopped by a shower of rain. So intense was the heat, that some stones and bricks that were within its range were completely vitrified.

—24. A great dinner was held at Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire, to celebrate the return of Mr C. W. Coddington (a Tory) to Parliament. Lord Ellenborough was the principal speaker of the evening.

—26. A dreadful catastrophe occurred at Ebenezer chapel, Guernsey. The congregation assembled as usual at six o'clock in the evening, and was rather larger than on ordinary occasions—probably about 1000 persons. It was perceived, shortly after the commencement of the service, that the gas-lights waved and fluctuated up and down. The service, however, which was unusually solemn, proceeded without any inconvenience from this cause. Just as the congregation were about to rise for the purpose of singing, the gas suddenly commenced waving and fluctuating as it had done at the commencement of the service, only considerably more than before, the lights at one moment being up, at the next all but totally out. At the second descent, several of the lights went out, and at the next several more. All this took place in the space of a few seconds. A few doors were then heard to open, and one or two ladies shrieked. The smashing of the windows, which many took for explosions from the burners, was heard in various directions, accompanied by the cry of fire! This was enough—the shrieks of the females became overwhelming—"Save himself who can," even among men, appeared to be the prevalent feeling among the panic-stricken portion of the congregation, and all efforts to dispel the horror that had laid hold of them were absolutely fruitless. The sacrifice of life has been great; no less than seven persons have fallen victims to this groundless panic.

Nov. 6. A live turtle—the first ever found in that part—was picked up on the coast of Cumberland, near Whitehaven. A labouring mechanic observing a strange object floating upon the water, waded up to it, and found it to be an enormous turtle, apparently dead. He mounted upon it for the purpose of piloting it to land, when the monster showed vitality enough to put its fins in motion, and the adventurous navigator found himself sailing out to sea like another Arion. In this extraordinary predicament he dismounted "in all reasonable haste," and luckily reached the shore, where he got further assistance, and with the help of a rope towed it ashore, and lodged it safe on dry land. It turned out to be a turtle of the edible species, and weighing no less than three hundredweight and a quarter.—At five o'clock, one of the largest gasometers at the Ratcliffe gasworks, in St George's in the East, Liverpool, burst, carrying away the outside case or vat, in which the gasometer was placed, besides forcing down a brick wall several feet in thickness, the materials of which were scattered in all directions. The gasometer contained at the time of the accident no less than 16,000 feet of gas, and owing to the chime hoop which binds the bottom of the tank giving way, the pressure became so great on the other parts of the gasometer, that it gave way and sunk with a tremendous crash on one side, forcing the gas out of the top, and splitting the massive timbers which composed the case, and the large upright beams that supported the whole fabric. The tank contained about 20,000 barrels of water, which, on being thus set free, forced itself across the street into some gardens opposite. The damage is estimated at L.20,000. No lives were lost.

—10. The inauguration of the Lord Mayor (Winchester) took place with great pomp, notwithstanding very unpropitious weather. A splendid dinner was given at the Mansion-House in the evening, at which were present Lords Mulgrave, Melbourne, Brougham, Palmerston, the Duke of Richmond, Sir John Campbell, Sir James Scarlett, Mr Cutlar Fergusson, several of the metropolitan members, and the Turkish, Brazilian, and Mexican ambassadors. The first toast was "Church and King," and was received with loud cheers; the next, "the Queen, the Princess Victoria, and the rest of the Royal Family." Then came "the Duke of Wellington and the Army," which is described as being enthusiastically cheered. The Lord Mayor then gave "the Lord Chancellor." This toast, according to the account given in the Chronicle, was received with very general applause; but the Herald, Post, and other papers, state that there was also a good deal of hissing. His lordship acknowledged the honour done him in brief terms—remarking, en passant, that his principles still continued unalterably the same as those which had first recommended him to their notice. The toast of "the Duke of Richmond and the House of Lords" was received with emphatic and reiterated plaudits. The other toasts and speeches during the night do not require notice.—The heads of colleges and halls in the university of Oxford agreed to propose in convocation a repeal of the university statute requiring every member above sixteen years of age to subscribe his assent to the thirty-nine articles of the church. If this proposal be carried into effect, it will virtually throw the university open to the admission of dissenters.

—18. Two boats crowded with blacklegs and other persons of the same description, who had been attending a prize-fight at Bromborough, on the Cheshire side of the Mersey, were swamped when returning to Liverpool; and it is supposed that at least twenty individuals perished, although it was impossible to ascertain exactly.

The result of the investigations of the Privy Council respecting the origin of the fire that destroyed both Houses of Parliament, is now made known by the published report of their labours. They have unanimously come to the conclusion that the conflagration arose from accident, and repudiate the idea of incendiarism. Respecting the extraordinary testimony of Mr Cooper, who, as stated in the postscript to our last, persisted in asserting that he had heard in Dudley, from the lips of a stranger, intelligence of the fire at the very time it was burning, the report says—"In considering attentively the evidence with reference to Mr Cooper's statement, we have no hesitation in declaring that we wholly disbelieve his story. We are willing to believe that Mr Cooper has been mistaken, and that he did not intend in his evidence to deviate from the truth; but we consider his testimony to have been satisfactorily met by other evidence, and disproved. We have concluded that the fire was accidental—was caused as we have related it, and was wholly attributable to carelessness and negligence. Indeed it would be very difficult to point out a case of fire which could be more clearly traced than this has been to its cause, without suspicion of evil design."

It now appears, unfortunately, that the losses of the Commons' library are more extensive than were at first apprehended. It consisted of two floors. It was thought that all of those books on the lower floor, where members used to sit to read and to consult the works, were saved, although it was known that all those on the upper story were destroyed; it is now apprehended that between 4000 and 5000 volumes are lost. It may be remembered that an interchange of Parliamentary works recently took place between the Chambers of France and those of England; out of upwards of 1500 volumes forwarded to the Commons, handsomely bound, very few are preserved. The rest are known to have been burnt; those sent to the Lords are safe. It appears that the Melbourne administration have directed a building to be erected upon the site of the late houses, for the temporary accommodation of Parliament, the expense of which is estimated at L.30,000. This resolution has caused very general and natural surprise, not only on account of such a needless outlay of the public money, while there were many public buildings in which the members might have been accommodated, but also because it is understood to be resolved on that the future houses of Parliament are to be built upon the very same ground occupied by the previous ones.

The financial agency of the United States will be wholly undertaken by Messrs N. M. Rothschild and Co. on and after the 1st of January next. Messrs Baring and Co. are the present agents. Some disputes of no great importance are said to have led to this change.—Herald.

By the books at Lloyd's, it appears, that, in consequence of the severe gales during the last week of Oct., fifty-six vessels have been totally wrecked or run ashore on the coasts of England and Holland. The loss of life has also been considerable.

The Parliamentary costs of passing the act for the Southampton railway, appear, by a published account, to have amounted to nearly L.20,000.

There are 1750 applications by midshipmen of the royal navy to be appointed to the rank of lieutenant.—Globe.

Government have agreed to grant to Mr Brunel a sum of L.250,000, bearing an interest of three and a half per cent., for the completion of the Thames tunnel.

The emoluments of the governor of Sierra Leone are estimated at L.2500 per annum. The late ill-fated governor, Mr Octavius Temple, had only received three-quarters' salary when he fell a victim to the pestilential climate. The gallant officer who has accepted the appointment, Major Dundas Campbell, has been taken from the half-pay unattached list of 1825.

The Isle of Man newspapers, though unstamped, circulate free of postage through Great Britain and Ireland, as well as the colonies.

Admiral Napier, who has lately returned to England, is to retain his rank and half-pay in the service of Donna Maria; and the Portuguese government is to give him L.30,000, besides his share of prize-money, which is estimated at L.15,000.

Within the last twelve months, four bill-broking firms have failed in London, whose aggregate liabilities amount to not less than a million sterling.

About two months ago, a man who used to sell fruit, &c. in the new English Opera-house, was bitten by a cat, which he was endeavouring to drive out of the theatre. After a little inflammation, the wound, which was very slight apparently, healed; but on Sunday, Oct. 19, he was attacked with symptoms of hydrophobia, and was carried the next day to the Charing Cross Hospital, and died on the following Wednesday, after taking several powerful medicines and receiving unremitting attention.

The rural population of Sussex have been lately manifesting great discontent and disposition to violence, in consequence of the great reduction of wages, rendered inevitable by the ruinous low price of grain. Wheat has declined so low that the farmers are absolutely unable to pay the labourers their usual wages; and the feeling seems to be universal, that the reduction of rents is the only means of remedying the evil, and must speedily be adopted. Incendiary fires, no doubt originating in the same cause, have of late become frightfully prevalent in Kent, Norfolk, Berkshire, Oxfordshire, and other counties.

At a recent meeting of butchers at R—, after discussing reform and the corn-laws, the subject of railroads was brought forward, when one of the orators spoke enthusiastically in praise of the improvement. "Among other advantages," said he, "look at that which affects the pigs brought to market! They will be saved the fatigues of their journey, poor things! They will not, as now, run down all their flesh, poor things! They will not, as now, run down all their taste and flavour, poor things!"

Four hundred and fifty-five ships have carried from the port of Liverpool alone, in less than seventeen months, nearly 31,000 emigrants. As emigration is so rapidly on the increase, an act of Parliament authorising an accredited government agent to insist upon the proper equipment, sea-worthiness, and victualling of all vessels carrying emigrant passengers to any part of the world, is absolutely necessary. The late colonial secretary, Mr Stanley, contemplated bringing forward some measure connected with this subject. His successor, we hope, will lose no time in following up that intention.—Liverpool Standard.

The bodies of two dead infants crammed into a reticule, just as they were born, were lately found at Camborne, near Falmouth, but the heartless mother remains undiscovered.

It is said a great literary curiosity has recently been discovered. The identical copy of "Junius's letters," in two volumes, bound in vellum, by Mr Woodfall, the publisher, at the express wish of the author, which copy is particularly alluded to in the variorum edition of these letters, published by George Woodfall, Esq. a few years ago.

A hitherto unrecorded instance of the patronage which George IV. occasionally afforded to genius has just come forth in the memoir of the late N. T. Carrington, the author of the poem of "Dartmoor." When it first appeared in 1826, the monarch ordered his opinion of the poem to be transmitted to the author in the shape of a present of fifty guineas.

A Carlisle paper says it is in contemplation to take down one of the most interesting portions of Carlisle Castle, the tower in which were the apartments occupied by the unfortunate Mary Queen of Scots when a prisoner there. There is a serious rent in the walls, which renders the removal necessary.

In a recent gale of wind, a puncheon of rum was thrown on shore near Castlegregory, in Bandon Bay, Kerry; it was immediately surrounded by the country people, who drank to such excess that one man (John Mahony) died actually of suffocation, and five others are so dangerously ill that little hope is entertained of their recovery.

SCOTLAND.

Oct. 29. A splendid dinner to the Hon. Captain Gordon, M.P. for Aberdeenshire, was given in the large hall of the County Rooms, Aberdeen. Upwards of seven hundred sat down, and many who wished to attend were unable to obtain tickets. Among the company were the Marquis of Aberdeen; Earl of Abeyone; Earl of Aberdeen; Viscount Arbuthnot; Lord Forbes; Lord Saltoun; Hon. General Arbuthnot; Hon. General James Ramsay; Right Hon. Sir Robert Gordon, K.C.B.; Hon. Walter Forbes of Brux; Hon. Captain John Gordon, R.N.; Sir John Stuart Forbes, Bart.; Sir John Hay, Bart. M.P.; Sir Robert D. H. Elphinstone, Bart.; Sir Alexander Leith of Freefield, K.C.B.; Major Cumming Bruce of Roseisle, M.P.; Colonel McKenzie Fraser of Castle Fraser; Colonel Leith; Colonel Byers, &c. &c. His Grace the Duke of Gordon took the chair amidst loud cheering. The toast of the evening, proposed by his grace, was received (say the newspaper reports) with tremendous and long-continued cheering, and Captain Gordon returned thanks in a speech of considerable length. He had represented the county for fourteen years, and he was still determined to adhere to those principles which had procured him their support. The health of the Duke of Wellington, proposed from the chair, is likewise stated to have been most enthusiastically cheered; and the Earl of Aberdeen, upon his own health being proposed, took the opportunity of saying that he valued the friendship of the Duke of Wellington more than all the honours the crown could bestow, and that the satisfaction of communicating with him had been with himself (Earl of Aberdeen) one great reason of his retaining office so long. The "Stability of the Church of Scotland," the health of Sir Robert Peel, and the memories of Pitt and Sir Walter Scott, were amongst the other toasts that seemed to make the deepest impression on the meeting. Considerable amusement was excited, when, upon the "Lord Provost and Magistrates of Aberdeen, and prosperity to the Burgh," being toasted, it was found that there was not one of that official body present to return thanks. The chairman, therefore, as a Burgess of the town, discharged that duty himself—observing, amid cheers and laughter, that had any of the magistracy been present, they would most cordially have joined in the kind wishes expressed towards themselves at all events.—Right Hon. Viscount Arbuthnot re-elected rector of King's College, Aberdeen.

31. The first sale of free imported tea into Scotland from China took place at Glasgow. Thirty-one chests and about four hundred boxes were exposed, and the whole was sold at the following rates:—Flowers Pekoe, 3s. to 3s. 7d.—duty, 3s.; Orange Pekoe, 2s. 6d. to 2s. 8½d.—duty, 2s. 2d.; Twanky, 1s. 8d. to 1s. 9½d.—duty, 2s. 2d.; Hyson, 2s. 7d. to 3s. 6d.—duty, 2s.; and Congou, 1s. 10d.—duty, 2s. 2d. per lb. The chests contain from 50 to 70 lbs., and the boxes from 6 lbs. to 10 lbs. each.

Nov. 2. A dinner given in Melrose in honour of Mr Douglas of Adderstone, for his services as a friend of reform, by the new constituency of the Melrose district. Above two hundred freeholders and other friends were present, Sir David Erskine of Dryburgh in the chair. The meeting acquired much interest from the arrival of Lord Durham, on his return from Glasgow, just as the company were sitting down to dinner; and his lordship being on the instant invited to join the party, most courteously accepted the invitation, and spent some hours with the Border Reformers.

6. A dinner held by the members of the association for improving the representation of the people, and promoting the extension of the franchise. Including friends, about three hundred sat down to dinner, Robert Wallace, Esq. of Kelly, M.P. in the chair, supported on the right by Councillor Russell, Mr Short, Mr Grant, surgeon, Mr R. Millar, &c. and on the left by Mr Knox, Mr Spittal, Mr T. Smith, Mr Field, Mr Thomas Johnston, &c. Mr William Tait officiated as croupier. The chairman, in introducing the health of Lord Durham, alluded to the splendid reception with which his lordship had been honoured in Glasgow, and said that for the first time in his life he now acknowledged a political leader, and that leader was Lord Durham, in whom he placed every confidence, and had no doubt that his lordship would not disappoint the expectations placed in him by the people. He now filled a high destiny in the eyes of Europe and the civilised world. He had more in his power than ever man had to advance the cause of civil and religious liberty; and he (the chairman) sincerely but confidently hoped that that illustrious individual would go calmly, deliberately, but earnestly forward, until he obtained these great ends. Among other toasts, the health of Mr O'Connell was proposed by Councillor Jameson, who pronounced a high eulogium on his public character. The meeting separated about one o'clock in the morning.

7. Mr David Tod, wine-merchant, Leith, and Mr Francis Howden, farmer, Kilmerrig Main, near Dunee, were drowned in attempting to cross a ford of the Whitadder at its junction with the Blackadder, in a gig. The bodies of the unfortunate gentlemen were both discovered at Gainslaw Bridge, a distance of twelve or thirteen miles from the place where they were thrown into the water. Mr Howden's body was found first, on Monday (Nov. 10), and Mr Tod's on Wednesday (12). They were lying within thirty or forty yards of each other.

12. The Court of Session re-assembled for the winter. Mr Skene, the new Solicitor-General, attended: and his predecessor, Mr Cockburn (in room of Lord Cringletie resigned), took his seat on the bench as Lord Cockburn.

14. A destructive fire broke out in the storehouses belonging to the Edinburgh Incorporation of Bakers, and from the age and dryness of the materials, no stop could be put to the conflagration until the flour mill and four lofts, containing 100 bolls of grain, were consumed. Nothing was saved but the water-wheel.

An editorial duel was luckily prevented taking place this morning at Glasgow. The circumstances, as we find them stated in the newspapers, are these:—In the Glasgow Chronicle of Wednesday the 5th November, a letter appeared, signed John Douglas; and in the number of the same journal, published on Friday the 7th, another letter followed it, bearing the same signature. In both of these letters the editor of the Glasgow Argus was held up to the public as a hireling utterly devoid of principle, and engaged in devising and circulating calumnious falsehoods against all whom his paymasters disliked. In the Glasgow Argus of Monday the 10th, Mr Weir, the editor of that journal, published a letter declaring that he was the only person responsible for what appeared in its columns, and that, in the event of Mr Douglas's persisting in such language as he had been using, he (Mr Weir) should consider it personal to himself. In the Chronicle of Wednesday the 12th, Mr Douglas inserted a third letter, repeating and aggravating the insults contained in the two first. In consequence of this, a correspondence took place between Mr Lang, on the part of Mr Weir, and Mr James Christie, on the part of Mr Douglas, when it was agreed that the parties should meet near Tollcross at seven o'clock this morning. Mr Weir and two friends were at the appointed place at the time agreed on, and waited upwards of an hour for the arrival of Mr Douglas, but that gentleman did not come, and it was soon after ascertained that he had been bound over on Thursday night to keep the peace. In the course of this day, the civil authorities traced out Mr Weir, and he also entered into the required recognisances.

15. Sir Robert Peel having declined an invitation to stand for the rectorship of Glasgow College, and the Earl of Durham and Lord Stanley being subsequently nominated as candidates for that honour, the latter was this day elected by large majorities in all the four nations.

There have been several numerous and respectable meetings during the past month, of the supporters of the Established Church of Scotland, for the purpose of taking steps to defend it against the attempts made to supplant it with the system of "Voluntary Preaching." In July 1834, there was instituted the "Edinburgh Young Men's Association for promoting the interests of the Church of Scotland," the first quarterly meeting of which was held in St Andrew's church, Edinburgh, on the evening of Nov. 7, when every part of the building was crowded. The Rev. Mr Cunningham, of College church, Edinburgh, president of the society, took the chair, and a platform erected for the purpose was filled with an array of clergymen, proprietors, advocates, and other respectable individuals. The most remarkable part of his speech was one in which he denounced the Secession Church as "perjured and apostate," and classed Voluntary Church Men with Atheists, Infidels, and Papists. After he had explained the objects of the society, the secretary read a statement by the committee, of the proceedings of the society since its first foundation in July last, which also contained a proposal for approval of the meeting of certain alterations on its laws, with a view to connecting itself with auxiliary parochial associations throughout the country, and the resolution of the committee to have a series of lectures, delivered on the subject of religious establishments in general, and the peculiar claim of the Church of Scotland, in the course of the ensuing winter. The Rev. Mr Candlish (St George's) then moved a resolution founded on the committee's statement, after a speech of considerable length, during which he stated his belief that the question at issue between them and their opponents was of the most vital importance, not only to the Church of Scotland, but also the cause of the Christian religion all over the world. The resolution being seconded by Mr Shaw Stewart, advocate, Mr McCrie, after observing, that although not a member of the established church, he and other Seceders were always ready to defend the principle of establishments, moved an amendment, but withdrew it after a few remarks from the chairman. The Rev. Mr Willis, of the Original Seceders, Glasgow, next moved "That the efforts and influence employed by the members of a national established religion render it the duty of all the friends of the Church of Scotland to come forward and defend her, and to give publicity and efficiency to their opinions." The reverend gentleman remarked, that he had himself given a practical proof of his assent to this proposition, by having come more than forty miles that day to attend the meeting. He remarked, it was strange that the defenders of voluntary principles could not number on their side one single church. There was not a single Presbyterian body in the kingdom who had yet come to the conclusion that the principle of establishments was unjust, unscriptural, or inexpedient. The reverend gentleman, in a long and eloquent speech, among other arguments, deduced from the general principles of the Old and New Testaments the Scriptural authority for establishments, which was carried unanimously, the Rev. Mr Begg of Paisley proposed the third resolution, "That, notwithstanding all the endeavours of the enemies of the Church of Scotland, there were at present many encouraging circumstances, which warranted the hope that the church would become not only more stable, but also purer and more efficacious than ever." In advertising the "Voluntary communion" principle, he unhesitatingly declared his belief that the independence of ministers on their hearers was the best way to secure sound religion. To destroy the church, was to destroy a machine which had from a thousand fountain-heads diffused the waters of life. Nevertheless, the controversy had done good, if it had done nothing more than to bring fifty congregations of the Original Seceders back to their bosom. Nor was this all: 400,000 were anxious to join them in the sister island, and to become united with the church. They had besides a committee of the General Assembly for church accommodation, and also thirty-six new churches now in Scotland in connection with the establishment. Charles Fergusson, Esq. younger of Kilkerran, in seconding the motion, alluded to the fact of more than £20,000 being lately raised in Glasgow by private subscription for building new churches. The meeting separated after voting thanks to the chairman, and also the Rev. Messrs Willis and Begg. A very numerous meeting of the friends of the Church of Scotland was also recently held at Greenock, when an association was formed for the purpose of promoting its ever-ancient stability. The principal speaker was Sir David M. Sandford, who delivered a long and eloquent address on the efficacy of establishments.

Mr Silk Buckingham, M.P. has been lecturing in Edinburgh for some time back, on the subjects of "Intemperance," "History and Description of the Holy Land," "Institutions of Society," &c. &c. Mr Buckingham has met with much applause from his auditors, who have been of the most respectable classes, but generally few in numbers.

At a late meeting of the Governors of Heriot's Hospital, it was moved that the salary of the treasurer, which is now £500, should be reduced to £350; but upon that gentleman offering to do the duties for £420, the proposition was acceded to.

The trustee on the bankrupt estate of Kinnear and Company, bankers, Edinburgh, has offered a composition of 11s. a pound with security, which has been accepted by the creditors. The composition is to be forthwith paid.

In consequence of the enormous and unchecked sale of unstamped newspapers in Glasgow, a joint representation from the tax-paying press of all classes, Tory, Whig, Radical, and non-descript, lately gave notice to the authorities, that, if no protection was extended to them by a certain day, they would simultaneously issue their publications on blank paper. So confident of impunity have the printers of these illegal sheets become, that one of them, upon the day after the above resolution was agreed to, noticed it under the title of "Horrid Conspiracy of the Stamped Press!"

The importation of fat cattle from Ireland into the Clyde is now carried on to a great extent. Scarcely a steamer arrives but is crowded with cattle. This new branch of trade has been opened up by the drainage occasioned by the exportation which has been for a long time continually increasing, of fat beasts and sheep, from the north to London in the large steamers.

The melancholy account of the loss of the Cybele of Liverpool, from Cromarty, bound to Quebec, with three hundred and sixteen emigrants on board, mentioned in our last, upon the authority of a letter in the American papers, turns out, by a letter since received from Picquet, to be untrue, and to have had its origin in the report of a boy, who, in order to obtain charity, represented himself as belonging to the vessel in question. On the 10th October 1834, there was a reduction of the imports of flax at Dundee to no less an extent than 4002 tons, or about one-third of the total quantity, as compared with a similar period of the year 1833: and of hemp a reduction of 150 tons.

The late Thomas Telford, Esq. has left to the minute of Langholm and Wester Kirk L.1000 sterling each, in trust for the libraries of the above town and parish; the interest is to be annually expended in purchasing books. This celebrated engineer was a native of Westerkirk.

10. At Althorp Park, Northamptonshire, the venerable Earl Spencer. His lordship had not, for a considerable period, been an active part in politics, though deeply immersed in them during the revolutionary war. For many years he was a munificent patron of the arts, and in him the lovers of bibliography will find a most valuable and tasteful patron.—Courier.

24. At his house, Prince's Street, Blackfriars, London, after a few hours' illness, Thomas Mounsey Cunningham, Esq. and son of the late John Cunningham, land-steward on the estate of Dalswinton, and author of some of the most admired contributions to the Scots Magazine, and other periodicals.

Lately, at his seat, Knowsley Park, the Earl of Derby. The earldom is the second in the British peerage. His lordship was born in the year 1752, and for forty years held the high office of Lord Lieutenant of the County Palatine of Lancaster. His event, Mr Stanley, formerly Colonial Secretary, becomes thus a third Lord Stanley.

Lately, in the 86th year of his age, the well-known Swedish historiographer and antiquarian, M. Jonas Hallenberg.

Lately, at Shipham, Somerset, aged 73, Mr James Glove, miner. He was noted for discovering springs, &c. by the haziness of the air.

At Ballymena, Ireland, at the advanced age of 114 years, Miss Boyd, a pauper.

Lately, at Toronto, Upper Canada, of cholera, Mr Robert Heron, printer. On his being taken to the hospital, an interesting young woman, to whom he was about to be married, applied for permission to see him, declaring she was his sister. She was admitted, and kissed the dying youth, showing great affection for him. Three hours afterwards she was brought to the same hospital far gone of cholera, and died soon after.

HISTORY OF STEAM NAVIGATION.

Steam navigation, which has made such gigantic progress in the western hemisphere, is only in infancy with us. A continental journal says that preparations are making for its introduction into the Mediterranean and the Adriatic, on a scale more stupendous than hitherto contemplated, with the view of connecting the states which border on these hugeland seas, with the fertile colonies of the East, through the Red Sea and the Gulf of Arabia. And when, in future ages, by this accelerating means of communication, the remote corners of the earth shall have been drawn together, the search of the curious will be directed with the same intensity towards the inventors of steam navigation, as it has been in bygone ages the inventors of glass, gunpowder, fire-arms, and the mariner's compass. A greater blessing art or skill as yet not conferred on man. It therefore behoves us, to record every authentic particular within our knowledge which refers to it. The Marquis of Worcester, who lived in the seventeenth century, evidently points to the practicability of steam navigation, in his History of Inventions; and we have seen a drawing of a steam-vessel of Jonathan Hulls, with which an experiment was made about the year 1739, although a and inefficient manner; but the merit of applying steam, as presently in use for the purposes of navigation, belongs to the family of a Scotchman, the ingenious discoverer himself having some years since the debt of nature. Indeed, all mechanics are agreed that the suggestions of the marquis, and the experiments of Hullah, could lead to no practical result, owing to the then imperfect condition of the steam-engine—it could not produce a rotatory motion of sufficient force to be useful in canals, far less in stormy tempestuous seas.

The merit of the first successful application of steam navigation has been claimed for Fulton, the American, who in 1807 launched a vessel on the Hudson, propelled by the power of steam; but we have the indubitable evidence that he borrowed his design from a vessel constructed under the control of the inventor in question, which vessel, Fulton, accompanied by Henry Bell, of Helensburgh, another original claimant to the invention, visited and anxiously inspected at Lock Sixteen, on the Forth and Clyde Canal, where she was laid up, after several successful experiments had been made—the proprietors of the canal being apprehensive of danger to the banks, by the unusual agitation of the waters in her progress. We have seen affidavits to the fact of Fulton's visit, which took place several years before the appearance of his first steam-boat on the Hudson, and it is singular that Bell, the first successful experimentalist on the Forth, accompanied him upon that visit. There is evidence, therefore, amounting to a moral certainty, that neither of these individuals belongs any merit to the invention, whatever adroitness they may have shown in appropriating that of others.

It was on the 14th day of October 1788 that the first steam-boat on the present plan was launched on the Forth of water at Dalswinton, in Dumfriesshire, under the superintendence of Mr James Taylor, the inventor, a native of Leadhills, and a person of considerable scientific attainments. The experiment was several times repeated with uniform success, the vessel (though only a model) having attained a velocity in the water of five miles an hour, the machinery working effectually, without any accident or inconvenience. The same construction of machinery, with very little variation, is continued in use to the present day—a remarkable instance of a complete and entire experience in the original. The larger vessel already alluded to was constructed on the Forth in the summer of 1800, and every expectation realised; the cylinder engine was eighteen inches in diameter, and she attained a velocity of seven miles an hour, when the boards, being of weak construction, gave way. The next experiment, however, on 26th December of the same year, took place in presence of Lord Dundas and several scientific persons, and was complete in all respects. Of these facts there cannot be a doubt, and they are now embodied in a narrative drawn up by Robert Chambers of this city, from the original documents in possession of the family of Mr Taylor, himself (1824), a short time before his death, and attested a memorial of his case to Sir Henry Parnell. Whatever is due to Mr Taylor as the original inventor, not less is due to the munificent patron of the steamery, the late Patrick Miller, Esq. of Dalswinton, whose expense, in whose employment, and in concert with whom, indeed, Mr Taylor was enabled to put his invention. Mr Miller, originally a banker in Edinburgh, though then retired to his estate, was a man of cultivated mind, enlarged information, and great ability, particularly in mechanics; and he nearly all his leisure time towards useful science, and the introduction of beneficial improvements in practical affairs of life. In 1785, when Mr Taylor came tutor to his sons, on the recommendation of his father of the present Mr Fergusson of Craigie, Mr Miller was endeavouring to apply wheels to the steam power to the propelling of vessels; and being dissatisfied with the power obtained, and the great exhaustion of his labourers, for which he was unable to procure compensation, he applied to Mr Taylor, who he valued for his mechanical genius (which was a fact one of the principal reasons for his employing him in his family), to suggest a substitute; and on his consideration, Mr T. mentioned the steam-engine. Various objections being stated and overruled, he adopted, as already mentioned [Mr Taylor having the necessary drawings and calculations]; and he, to the families of those two ingenious men, the world indebted for the grand invention which characterises the present in future ages. It may be remarked as an instance how science is advanced, that, but for an accident, the navigation of the Forth by steam, recently introduced, would have anticipated by nearly forty years. Mr Cutlarson, then a young man upon his travels, having, in his correspondence with his father, the late Mr Fergusson, ready to submit a memorial on the subject to the Emperor at Vienna, when the war of the revolution broke out with such unexampled animosity as to banish the thought of every peaceful art. We have the Appendix to the Narrative drawn up by Mr Taylor, that Mr Fergusson, with that promptitude of decision which have characterised him through his life, prepared himself, by a series of queries and answers, to push the new invention where it was needed, whatever might have been his success in the phlegmatic Germans.—Edinburgh Observer.

PARISIAN WALKING.

Even the mode of walking in France has more than one relation to vanity—not merely because the rise on the toes, the writhing of the figure, and the paralytic shake of every member, are inspired by that sentiment, but because being, from a curious and accidental circumstance, the very worst mode of walking, it is vainly vaunted as the most graceful; while the women of France reprobate the natural walk of those of England as masculine or military, because in progression the foot is thrown directly forward, instead of being curiously drawn upward, &c. &c. This being a point of some interest to ladies, I beg to illustrate it at some length. Having been acquainted with an old French gentleman in England, and being afterwards on a visit to Paris, I one day thought I saw him approaching the hotel where I happened to reside. A certain gait and air, which I had not hitherto analysed, convinced me I was right; and I expressed my satisfaction on this account to the friend who was beside me at the time, and who similarly recognised and expected him. We were disappointed, however, as he did not call. This disappointment occurred again and again, until we began to suspect, and at last actually discovered, that there were several old gentlemen in Paris who had a similar gait and air. This struck me as odd enough; but still no reason occurred to me. Going, however, one day to a considerable distance through the streets of Paris, to see some troops arriving from Spain, and walking, as the British generally walk, without much regard to the inequalities of the pavement, I found on my return that I was unaccountably fatigued. A little reflection led me to the cause of this, in the extraordinary irregularity of the Parisian pavement; for the stones being large, worn away on every side, and prominent in the middle, every step I had taken, falling sometimes high and sometimes low, had shaken me in such a way, that though I did not much observe it at the time, its effects were very perceptible. I now began to imagine that all this might have something to do with the peculiar walk and air of my old friend; and on looking more closely, I thought I could see that almost all old gentlemen, as well as old ladies, and even many young ones, had some degree of the very same peculiarity. This I now suspected to result from some contrivance on their part to obviate the inconveniences arising from the irregularity of the pavement. Observing, now, with additional care, I at once found my suspicion completely verified, and was able to detect the contrivance employed. This commences by picking the steps. In order to do this in the best manner, it is necessary to pick only with one foot, that is, to advance always the same foot, and let the other follow it up. If one attempts, on the contrary, to pick with both feet, it causes a considerable rotating of the body, which, in a long walk so performed, becomes fatiguing. The Parisians accordingly pick with the stronger—the right foot. A little reflection will show, that, in thus picking with one foot, they must not only turn the right toe proportionally in, but must turn the whole of the right side proportionally forward, and in some measure advance laterally. Even this, however, is not enough: as the hollows between the projecting centres of the stones are considerable, and as these are generally filled with mud, it is necessary to avoid bespattering oneself. This the Parisians effect by holding the knee and ankle joints slightly bent, but rather stiff, while they spring, slightly sideways, from one stone to another. Nothing can be more amusing than this mode of progression, when one is once prepared to observe it. The reader may easily figure to himself a party setting out in this way—all having the right leg advancing, the right toe turned in, and the right side turned forward—all having the knee and ankle joints slightly bent, but rather stiff, and in a sort of springy state, and all advancing, in some measure, sideways, but, owing to the different length of limb, some seeming to hop, and others to hobble along. It is really a good deal like the walking of birds.—Walker's Physiognomy, founded on Physiology.

THE ALBATROSS AND ITS FLIGHT.

To watch the flight of these birds, used to afford me much amusement; commencing with the difficulty experienced by them in elevating themselves from the water. To effect this object, they spread their long pinions to the utmost, giving them repeated impulses as they run along the surface of the water for some distance. Having, by these exertions, raised themselves above the wave, they ascend and descend, and cleave the atmosphere in various directions, without any apparent muscular exertion. How, then, it may be asked, do these birds execute such movements? The whole surface of the body in this, as well as, I believe, most if not all the oceanic tribes, is covered by numerous air-cells, capable of a voluntary inflation or diminution, by means of a beautiful muscular apparatus. By this power the birds can raise or depress themselves at will, and the tail and great length of the wing enable them to steer in any direction. Indeed, without some provision of this kind to save muscular exertion, it would be impossible for these birds to undergo such long flights without repose, as they have been known to do; for the muscles appertaining to the organs of flight, although large in these birds, are evidently inadequate in power to the long distances they have been known to fly, and the immense length of time they remain on the wing without scarcely a moment's cessation. When several species of the albatross, as well as petrels and other oceanic birds, are about the ship at the same time, no combats have been seen to take place between them; but on the death of one, the others soon fall upon and devour it. When one of this tribe of birds is captured and brought upon the deck, it appears to be a very muscular bird, judging from its external form. This deception is occasioned by the quantity of down and feathers, with a very dense integument, and the air-cells being often inflated in a slight degree. When these are removed, the body of the bird is found to be of a smaller size than would have been supposed, and, comparatively speaking, does not possess the muscular power which from its long flights our ideas might lead us to suppose. I remarked that the albatross would lower himself even to the water's edge, and elevate himself again without any apparent impulse; nor could I observe any percussion of the wings when the flight was directed against the wind; but then, of course, its progress was tardy. Many, however, have differed with me in considering that the birds never fly "dead against the wind," but in that manner which sailors term "close to the wind;" and thus make progress, aided by, when seemingly flying against, the wind.—Bennet's Wanderings in New South Wales.

PLEASURES OF A COUNTRY HOUSE.

Who has not known the monotony of a country house? Who has not known that the more comfortable, the more happy it may be, the fewer events there will be to relate? But, alas! who has not known its dullness? Who has not known the long morning—the expectation of hearing one o'clock strike, and finding it only twelve? Who has not known the sight of the interminable piece of work, regularly brought down by the lady of the house—the paucity of ideas conveyed with the work. The question, "What shall we do to-day?—do you like a drive?—I am afraid it is rather cold!" shows you that the hope suggested by the offer is not to be realised—that you are expected not to wish to drive. "You will prefer walking, I dare say—I should like to show you my poultry-house." It is unluckily a cold dull day; there has been a copious fall of rain; the leafless trees are dripping; pools of water are standing in the walks; and you must think with delight of the sight of dripping bantams and dirty poultry-houses. But you are saved: the yawning soberness of your morning talk is likely to have no end, for lo! another shower. "Ah, it rains, I see: we shall not stir to-day. There is nothing so comfortable as sitting in-doors at one's work all the morning." How does the interminableness of that all morning strike on your fancy! You are very cold: you look at the fireplace—comfort there, at least, you think: but the fire is scarcely blazing. The lady of the house sees you cast a longing look towards the grate—she obligingly hopes you are not too warm. "I don't think we have too much fire, have we? It was so hot this morning, I ordered them not to make such large fires;" and you resign yourself to the knowledge that the care all day will be to keep the room at freezing-point. Oh! who has not known all this, and many more of the charms of a long day in a country house!—Anne Grey, a novel just published.

Postscript.

Edinburgh, Nov. 25.

The King, Nov. 21, delivered the great seal to Lord Lyndhurst, who for the present is to perform the functions both of Lord Chancellor and Lord Chief Baron. In place of the Marquis Wellesley, recalled, three Lords Justices have been appointed to administer the government of Ireland; namely, the Archbishop of Armagh, the Commander-in-Chief, and the Chief Justice of the King's Bench. The Lord Chancellor Plunkett, and the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General (Blackburn and O'Loughlin), have resigned their offices. Meetings continue to be held in London to express dissatisfaction with the ministerial changes. The Glasgow meeting took place on the Green, Nov. 22, and was attended by a very large multitude, the numerations of which range between 20,000 and 60,000.

The Duke of Devonshire has resigned his office of Chamberlain, and the Earl of Errol and Viscount Falkland, sons-in-law to the King, have also resigned their situations in the household.

The dinner to Earl Durham at Newcastle took place, Wednesday, Nov. 19, in the Assembly Room, and was attended by four hundred guests, Mr W. Ord, M.P., in the chair. In replying to the toast of his health, Lord Durham (who was in bad health) explained what he aimed at in household suffrage to be—a right of voting in all inhabitant householders, bona fide rated to church or poor, or assessed to or paying direct taxes for six months previous to the first day of election, not having received parochial relief. Mr Fox, who, with other friends of freedom, had advocated this privilege many years ago, described it as the best and most advisable plan of reform, because it was a recurrence to the first known and recorded principles of the constitution. In the course of his speech, Lord Durham made several allusions to the ministerial changes, and called on the people to enter every where into associations, free of party differences, for resisting the re-imposition of a Tory government, and obtaining all further necessary reforms. "The fact is," said his lordship, "that for a long period of time in former days, in the days of George the Third and George the Fourth, the sovereign of this country was entirely in the hands of a faction. He was in fact a mere puppet, to be moved according to their wishes; and all power and all honours were wielded entirely for the benefit of the faction itself. The reform bill, they saw, gave them a death-blow; and now they are about to try a last struggle to endeavour to regain that power which it wrested from them. After we had destroyed their strongholds, after their fortresses had fallen successively, they have pitched upon a great military commander, who is to come forward and arrest the progress of that reform under whose exterminating hand the corporation abuses, the church abuses, and all other abuses in the institutions of the country, were about to be swept away. I confess to you that this great military commander whom they have selected will find it to have been much easier to take Badajoz and Ciudad Rodrigo than to retake the liberties and independence of the people. (Cheers.) I say that, in my opinion, he will fail in such an attempt." In reference to associations, his lordship said—"How have the Tories succeeded in supplanting the reform ministers, but by union and combination. Let us take a lesson out of their book. Let us show them that the people of England not only possess feelings and principles which were thought sufficient, but that they also possess a fixed determination to maintain their own rights and the constitution of the country. It is as clear to me as the sun at noonday, that a dissolution of Parliament must take place—that the last card in their desperate game must be played by the Tories, if they are determined to see the game out. They probably reckon upon securing majorities in the counties, in consequence of the unfortunate fifty-pound tenant-at-will clause. I know also that some of the schedule B towns, in consequence of the non-payment of rates and other circumstances, have become little better than rotten boroughs. They now possibly reckon upon majorities there. I will grant to them the utmost extent of support that they may thus obtain in a new House of Commons, and yet we shall be able to beat them. Their hopes of success, founded on the ridiculous idea of a reaction, will prove utterly fallacious. We certainly have great odds opposed to us. We have against us the Court and the Peers, but we have for us the Commons and the people. (Immense cheering.) Whenever the struggle shall take place between two such opposing powers, it requires little foresight to see upon what side success will attend. I call upon my countrymen, from one end of the kingdom to the other, to express, with one voice, their fixed determination never to rest satisfied until their liberties are secured, and all those reforms which the reform bill—itsself only a means to an end—promised, shall have been accomplished. Still preserving all loyalty to the king, let us show him at the same time, that if he be disposed to place confidence in a particular party and class of politicians, we, on the other hand, shall exercise our right of expressing our disapproval of such men and their measures, and our determination to oppose them to the utmost of our power. (Cheers.) I will only say, in conclusion, that my humble services may be commanded by you and my country at all times, and that I shall be always happy to co-operate with you in the ranks, or in any situation in which I may be considered to be capable of producing benefit. (Cheers.) No feelings that I may entertain with regard to any individual, in any set of men, shall prevent me from doing that which it is my determination to do—namely, to join you heart and soul in the assertion of your rights." (Immense cheers.)

It may be worth while to state, that the sons and daughters of the King, with the exception, perhaps, of Lord Munster and Lady Sidney, are decided Whigs. Lady Errol, Lord Falkland, Lady Mary Fox, Lady Kennedy Erskine, and Lords Frederick and Adolphus Frederick Fitzclarence, are openly attached to the party of the late administration.—Times.

It is universally believed in Dublin that the machinations of the court party, and the return of the Tories to power, have for their object the preservation of the Irish church, and the corporations, with all their glaring and admitted abuses, and that the sword will be employed to silence remonstrance. The struggle is regarded not as a contest between the Whig and the Tory for office, but a desperate effort to restore the old system of misgovernment—to perpetuate tithes—to stifle the Church Commission Inquiry—in fact, to defeat all the legitimate objects of the reformers, and, if not to deprive the reform bill of its most valuable provisions, to control the popular voice at elections; and by means of terror and intimidation to neutralise the influence of the people in the House of Commons. I have taken some pains to ascertain the state of public feeling at this critical juncture. I find that reformers of all shades—Liberals, Radicals, and Repealers—have completely abandoned their differences, and are ready to unite as cordially and determinedly as they did on the occasion of Lord Grey's resignation in 1831, against the common enemy.—Dublin correspondent of the Globe.

A NEW PORT FOR EDINBURGH.

MANY of our readers are aware that a vast deal of money has been expended within the last twenty years upon what is termed the improvement of the harbour and pier of Leith. The great object in view has been to make the harbour of Leith answerable for the admission of large war and merchant vessels at the height of the tides, and vessels of inferior sizes at all states of the water. To accomplish this desirable object, many, many thousands of pounds have been expended by government and other parties. That which has chiefly been done is the extension of the old pier to a great length into the sea; but after this, and every thing else which human ingenuity could suggest, has been effected, the harbour remains much the same as before. At all events, as the case stands, none of the numerous steam-vessels which sail in the Firth of Forth can make a practice of coming into Leith. It has been discovered, after an enormous loss of money, what might have been known at first, that the extension of piers cannot bring in or retain deep water. The sea retires as usual, and, therefore, behold a long line of pier, cold and cheerless, crossing the expanse of brown sand, and upon which it would be dangerous to walk in boisterous weather! Well, seeing that all this has done no good, persons connected with the Leith and Edinburgh trade have worried government to stir in order to put things to rights, and government lately commissioned a Mr Cubitt to visit Leith, to see what could be done to create deep water for the sailing in-shore of the shipping. This gentleman, having examined the ground, has given it as his opinion, in a report on the subject, that there should be a port of entry to Leith harbour made at Newhaven, the expense of which will be £125,000, which, of course, the government is expected to pay. We cannot permit this new project about a harbour for Edinburgh and Leith to go forth without calling upon the merchants of Edinburgh and Glasgow to institute a rigorous scrutiny into its practicability. Our opinion, which may or may not be correct, is, that this scheme of Mr Cubitt is about as preposterous as that which suggested the extension of the old pier. That which is wanted is a commodious pier and naturally deep harbour, at which there will be deep water at all times of the tide; and the question ought to be, where can this want be best supplied? Mr Cubitt's plan does not lose sight of this idea, but he associates with it the carrying of vessels into Leith docks, and in such a way as to place almost insurmountable obstacles in the way of getting a pier accessible to all vessels, and at all times of the night and day. Strip the plan of this vain endeavour to carry vessels into Leith, and it falls far below, in point of excellence, those plans for having good harbours and piers at spots considerably to the west, where the water is deeper at all times, where the descent of the shore is more rapid, and the ground more firm and less likely to be drifted with the tides. Such being, or at least appearing to be, the case, we would admonish the mercantile—indeed all—class in Edinburgh and Glasgow interested in the steam-vessel trade of Edinburgh and London, as well as those concerned in the intercourse betwixt Mid-Lothian and Fife, to allow no rash scheme of this kind to be entered into without pointing out to the government the danger which is run of the project proving ultimately useless. It appears to us that the present accommodations at Leith answer all the purposes of general trade; and that the grand aim ought solely to be, to have a small harbour and pier, at any given spot where the water is at all times such as will allow perfect freedom to the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers and goods in connection with steam-vessels. It behoves parties concerned to point out where this best spot is, and let the public and the government judge.

DISASTERS BY SEA.

Hearing of disasters by sea, the greater number of the who sit securely on land, feel but a passing emotion of regret for the sufferers, and, after a few solemn thoughts respecting the decrees of providence, pass to some other subject of meditation, or proceed about the ordinary business. It is known to very few, by far the greater part of the calamities of this which take place, might be avoided by human if circumstances were favourable for its development. To make this clear, a very few sentences will

While there are errors in the formation of the vessels of most maritime countries, one error of incalculable mischief is fostered in our own, by the mode in which we measure vessels for what is called tonnage. To make this intelligible, it must be mentioned that, immediately after vessels are constructed at our ship-building yards, they are registered at a certain tonnage, and upon the amount of their tonnage depend a number of dues which they have thenceforth to pay for harbourage, lighthouses, &c. If this is called the tonnage of a vessel were the exact amount of its contents, no fault could be found with the system; in that case, vessels would be built according to the best lights of science, and no one could have any advantage over another, except in point of scientific construction. But, unfortunately, in the legislative enactment which directs measurement for tonnage (13 Geo. III. c. 74), a mode is assumed by which it is possible, at the expense of safety, to get a great amount of actual space within a much less amount of registered tonnage. Instead of simply dictating that vessels should be gauged, which in former times was thought too difficult a process for the persons to be employed in the operation, it was directed that three-fifths of the breadth at the beam should be deducted from the length of the keel, that the remainder should be multiplied by the breadth, and this again by the breadth, and the product divided by 94, the result of which to be the registered tonnage—a mode which would perhaps come near the mark, if vessels were in the first place built as they ought to be, but which, in reality, holds out the strongest possible temptation to build vessels as they ought not to be, in as far as it entirely overlooks that material element of the calculation—the depth. Ships, by this plan, may be as much as the owner pleases; they might be one hundred, two hundred, or any number of feet deep, and yet would only be registered at the same amount as if they were of the proper depth. In general, men are not disposed entirely to overlook safety and swiftness of sailing, and there is accordingly, in a few cases, an advantage taken of the enactment than what might be expected. But still so much advantage is taken of it, that, on the average, every 100 tons of actual burden in the mercantile navy does not register at above 70 tons; and in the same degree is there a general dereliction in form from what a scientific consideration of safety would demand.

To come to particulars:—Vessels for which safety and swiftness of movement are the main objects in view—the king's ships, the yachts built for pleasure, the boats, and the long-boats carried by all vessels—are saved of the crew in case of accidents—are usually constructed of a longish shape, comparatively shallow, with a pointed stem for cutting the water, and a lateral bulge all along from stem to stern in order that, if they should be so unfortunate as to be ashore, the side may have the resistance of the water against being stove in. By following these and other proper rules, the usual dangers of navigation might indeed be obviated to an extent almost beyond belief, as is fully proved by the rarity of accidents in those vessels where the registry principle has not affected the build. But how stands the fact in the mercantile navy? Why, the length being taken "along the rabbet of the keel, from the back of the main sternpost to a perpendicular line from the fore part of the main stem under the bowsprit," the stems of vessels are consequently made bluff, as it is called, so as to present something like a broad block to the waves, instead of that narrowness of entrance and run which would enable them to move quickly. The breadth being taken at "the broadest part of the ship," without any allowance for narrower parts, they are mostly built all of one breadth, or nearly so, like chests; so that, when laid on shore, they are easily stove in, and consequently lost. No notice whatever being taken of depth, they are deepened accordingly to cheat the registry, till they stand so high in the water, that a comparatively slight mischance lays them over on their sides, and exposes all on board to destruction.

The principles chiefly lost sight of in order thus to evade the registry, are buoyancy, steadiness, and alacrity of motion. The erroneously constructed vessel lies in the water like a huge ungainly box, and can neither bear the open sea so well, nor recover herself from a leewardly tendency with so much promptitude, as a scientifically built ship. Such vessels generally find it necessary to seek shelter near land from a strong gale blowing from that quarter; and when the wind changes to the opposite direction, as it sometimes does with surprising suddenness, then have we the shore strewn with wrecks, and newspapers filled with heart-rending casualties; all in consequence of a blundering act of the legislature. In two months of the year 1833, one hundred thousand tons of British shipping were reported to have been lost: now, as there are about forty men for every thousand tons of shipping, here were the lives of four thousand men (exclusive of passengers) put in jeopardy, of which probably one-half were lost. Indeed, since the abolition of slavery, we do not know of any system connected with our national institutions which humanity has so much occasion to execrate, and so much reason to desire to see altered, as that of which we are speaking.

It may perhaps occur to some as an objection, that, notwithstanding the temptation held out by the registry measurement for constructing vessels on false principles, the owners of such property must be greatly checked in their disposition to yield to the temptation, by a dread of frequent loss, and of the difficulty of getting sailors to man such vessels, and also by a desire to consult swiftness of sailing to a certain extent, as a saving of capital and wages. The last consideration is in reality the only one that operates; and that it does not operate sufficiently, is proved by the facts of the case. As for the dread of loss, it is entirely obviated by the insurance-brokers, who, so far from desiring to see vessels safely constructed, find it for the interest of their trade to encourage insufficiency by all possible means. The difficulty of getting sailors is a merely imaginary objection. Let no man trust his life at sea upon the mere security of the sailors also trusting theirs. The fact is, that no hope was ever so forlorn but men could be found to risk their lives upon it. In the business of navigation, as in all others, there are usually more hands than there is good employment for, and, consequently, no difficulty is ever experienced in obtaining men for the most obviously dangerous voyages. Whatever be the danger, still a wide chance of safety is left, and the uncertain evil is naturally preferred to the actual distresses that attend the want of work.

Monstrous as we have shown this evil to be, the reader would be surprised to learn how difficult it is of correction. The owners of all existing vessels have unfortunately an interest in keeping up the present system, as any other one would enable newly constructed vessels to have a great advantage over theirs. Parliamentary committees have accordingly been sitting since the year 1821, collecting information, devising new plans, and so forth, and yet the only fair and accurate principle, that of gauging, seems as far from being adopted as ever. What with the threatened injury to the shipping interest, and what with the imaginary difficulty of hitting upon a better and equally simple principle as that which now exists, the time when science shall take full effect upon mercantile ship-building seems still remote. The grand stumbling-block is the supposed necessity of a mode which ignorant people may practise; as if it were impossible to have a few officers in the pay of government, who upon call might attend at the building-yards, and apply correct mathematical principles to all the new vessels which might be ready to go from the stocks.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

WE mentioned in our December number the dissolution of the Duke of Bassano's administration on Nov. 13, three days after it had supplanted that of M. Thiers. The king immediately had recourse again to his former ministers, amongst whom, it will be recollected, the principal subject of dissension respected the choice of a president. This difficulty was at last got over by their agreeing to the appointment of Marshal Mortier, now Duke de Treviso, to that post, and in two days, that is, on Nov. 15, the ministry was reformed, with the exception of a Minister of Marine. Admiral Duperre was subsequently appointed to the latter office, and the new administration, therefore, stands as follows:—Duke de Treviso (Marshal Mortier), President of the Council and Minister of War; Admiral de Rigny, Foreign Affairs; M. Thiers, Interior; M. Guizot, Public Instruction; M. Duchatel, Commerce; M. Persil, Justice; M. Humann, Finance; Admiral Duperre, Marine.

The session of the French Chambers was opened Dec. 1, not by the king in person, but only by addresses, explaining the intended policy of the government, which were read by the respective presidents. A hot debate on the terms of the answer to the address was maintained for two days in the Chamber of Deputies, which ultimately terminated favourably to the ministry in the adoption of the following resolution by a majority of 184 to 117:—"The Chamber, satisfied with the explanations of the government respecting its policy, and finding nothing therein that is not conformable to the principles laid down in the address, passes to the order of the day." M. Thiers is said to have particularly distinguished himself in the debate. He explicitly declared that the policy of the government would be "resistance to the Movement;" and his eloquence is supposed to have gained to the conservative party the adhesion of many who had previously inclined to the more liberal side, or "Tiers parti," as it is termed. Dupin mentioned that he had of late repeatedly refused a seat in the cabinet, owing to the president not being allowed to exercise his official functions—alluding of course to the continual interference of Louis Philip with the administration.

The usual attention of the French to the proceedings of the Chambers is said to be completely absorbed in the interest excited by the change of ministry in England. The only incident connected with the legislature since its assembling, which seems to have created much stir, is another instance of that system of persecution against the press which has distinguished in a remarkable degree the reign of Louis Philip. On Tuesday, Dec. 16, M. Rouen, responsible editor of the National newspaper, was tried before the Chamber of Peers, for a libel on that body, and was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of 10,000 francs. M. Carrel, the former editor of the National (and who is supposed to have been the real author of the libel), was brought from prison, where he has been confined for some months for a previous libel in the same paper, to defend M. Rouen. His speech was uncommonly bold, and he was repeatedly interrupted for making reference to the "butchered Marshal Ney," some of whose condemnations were sitting in judgment on himself. 138 peers voted the condemnation of the National, and only 15 its acquittal; 121 peers voted for 10,000 francs' fine, the rest for smaller sums; 98 for two years' prison, and 50 for a month.

A subscription has been opened to pay the fine imposed by the Chamber of Peers on the National. It is called, "A subscription, in the light of a protest, against the assassination of Marshal Ney by the Chamber of Peers." During the first twenty-four hours, more than 2000 out of 10,000 francs were subscribed and paid. It was headed by Beranger, the poet and songster.

GERMANY.

At a recent meeting of the Germanic diet, it was agreed to establish a tribunal for determining all disputes which may arise betwixt the several sovereigns connected with the diet and their respective legislative chambers. If the following description of the character of this court of arbitration, which we find in a well-informed London paper, be correct, it will effectually destroy whatever pretensions to independence the legislative bodies of Germany now boast:—

"By it the authority of all the legislative chambers in Germany is virtually abrogated. The tribunal is to be appointed by the diet or by the government, and controlled by the same authority, and it establishes a power supreme over the legislative chambers. It will be like a court of justice, and not a very impartial one, over contending suitors; and instead, therefore, of the legislative bodies of the different states of Germany having henceforth an independent existence, even in name, they must submit all matters in dispute betwixt them and their sovereigns to the decision of this tribunal. They will henceforward assume their proper character of mere creatures of the diet, and of the congress of Vienna, and not the independent representatives of the people. The sovereigns, according to M. Munch Bellinghausen, have entered into an 'examination into the most efficient means of ulteriorly maintaining the constitution of the German confederacy, such as it is settled by the federal covenant and the final act of Vienna; and the adoption of measures for the security of the sovereign authority, which is guaranteed by those fundamental laws;' and 'after a calm and conscientious discussion and a sincere exchange of ideas,' the sovereigns have resolved to establish this court of arbitration. Even if it were not a complete usurpation of supreme authority over the legislatures, the origin of the scheme is quite sufficient to make its character apparent. It will be observed, that 'the refusal of the means necessary (on the part of the legislature) to a government which wishes to fulfil its federal engagements,' is one of the prominent subjects which this new tribunal is to decide. In other words, whenever the independent legislatures wish to protect the pockets of the people against the demands of the sovereign, as in the late cases of Hesse Darmstadt and Hesse Cassel, this tribunal is to overrule their decision. It is therefore merely another scheme for conquering the repugnance of the people to submit to exorbitant and unnecessary taxation."

SPAIN.

THE loan of four millions, required by the Spanish government, and sanctioned by the Cortes, has been effected at Madrid with Messrs Ardonin and Ricardo. Llander about the same time acceded to the office of War Minister. The joint operation of these auspicious circumstances seems to have given energy to the government forces under Mina, who, at Carascal, on the 12th December, defeated the three battalions of Eras, while Lopez and Oras on the same day gained a signal victory over Zumalacarreay on the road from Pampeluna to Logrons, 7000 men being engaged on each side. The retirement of Martinez de la Rosa from the ministry remains uncertain.

PORTUGAL.

THE young Queen of Portugal has at length been married to the Duke of Leuchtenberg—by proxy. This ceremony was performed on 1st December, the Duke of Terceira acting as the representative of the absent bridegroom. There were great demonstrations of joy amongst the inhabitants of Lisbon on the occasion. It is said that the Emperor of Austria has at length expressed his concurrence in the match. The budget of the finance minister (Carvalho) exhibits a deficit of L.700,000, which sum it is purposed supplying by the sale of church lands.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

GREAT military preparations are said to be making both in Holland and Belgium, in consequence, as is alleged, of the late change of ministry in England. The exchequer of King Leopold is apparently in a very inadequate state for any extra demands upon it at present. The half of the "ways and means" of the kingdom for the year 1835 will be required for the support of the army alone, which has been fixed at 110,000 men. It is said that the total expense of the army, since the last separation of Belgium from Holland, has amounted to ten millions sterling. The Belgians are represented as being in an extremely dissatisfied condition.

UNITED STATES.

THE general election has, contrary to expectation, terminated in favour of the Jackson party. This result is considered fatal to the United States Bank, to the renewal of whose charter (which will shortly expire) the President has long declared the most decided opposition.

WEST INDIES.

VERY unfavourable news has again been received from several of the West Indian colonies, and it now seems proved beyond a doubt that the emancipation act must either be altogether repealed, or most materially altered. At Demerara, the governor had been obliged to execute publicly one of the negroes. At Trinidad, the disturbances were serious. At St Kitt's, the proclamation of the governor had been misunderstood, and riots succeeded, all the men-of-war on the station being obliged to go there. Private letters from Grenada, dated November 5, mention that several young men of colour had been exciting the negroes there to attack the white population, and had publicly insulted some of the magistrates. In Jamaica, the cultivation of the estates seems, generally speaking, to be at a complete stand-still, the negroes positively refusing to work even during the hours prescribed by law. A committee of the House of Assembly had been appointed to investigate into the causes of discontent, which led to a proposition by one of the members, which, although at variance with the spirit of the emancipation act, would appear from the statement of the mover, Mr Barclay, to be almost indispensable. He observed, that any committee appointed to bring in a bill could not, according to the usage and custom of the house, take evidence which was most essential to the object he had in view, in showing beyond all doubt that the negroes were not working, and would not work, any part of their own time, for any wages that could be afforded to them; that two-thirds of the pimento crop (the only one that had yet come in) had been lost; that the attempt at sugar-making, where it had been tried, had been almost an entire failure; and, in short, that the country was positively ruined and lost, unless some regulations were provided to compel the negroes to work some reasonable portion of their own time for fair and reasonable wages. In this course he saw nothing repugnant to the British act: it was taking away nothing from the negroes that had been given to them, but simply saying they must work for their own benefit.

The absurdity of sending out from this country magistrates and constables altogether unacquainted with the character of the negroes, uninured to the climate, and unable to undergo the necessary duties of efficient police corps, from the mountainous and inaccessible nature of the country, has now been made sufficiently manifest. Had the framers of the emancipation act asked the advice of those personally acquainted with the island of Jamaica, or even turned to the history of the Maroon war, they would have known that it would be much more reasonable to appoint a posse of land-police in each man-of-war, to capture and bring down such mutineers as might betake themselves to the rigging, than send newly-imported European constables to penetrate into the fastnesses to which the insurgent negroes betake themselves. The Creoles themselves are the only police that can be efficient for the intended purpose in the interior (and there are enough of Maroons at Trelawney Town and the other settlements of these privileged natives to answer the purpose), and these acting under the direction of magistrates selected from the resident population. We see by the London papers that the latter step is about to be taken at the suggestion of the Duke of Wellington, acting upon the information of Mr Burge, the Jamaica agent; and this will probably do much towards restoring the quiet of the colonies.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

HIS Majesty's store-ship Buffalo, under the command of Mr F. W. R. Sadler, arrived at Devonport on December 8, from New Zealand. The Buffalo has made a most interesting voyage. She embarked with female convicts at Portsmouth, in May 1833, and taking on board Captain Sir R. and Lady Spencer, with a family of nine children and twelve servants, she sailed on the 12th of that month with the party and complete stock for a new colony in Western Australia. September 18, the party was landed all safe in King George's Sound, which affords good and safe anchorage, especially Princess Royal Harbour, which is situated at the head of the Sound. The scenery of the country is magnificent, but the shores are bounded by sands, nor is any good land to be met with for many miles in the interior. When the Buffalo arrived, the European inhabitants were only thirty-two in number, including an officer and twelve privates of the 63d regiment, and those few had rations, and had been so for several weeks, and having on hand only twelve days' supply even at this scanty rate, so that the ship's arrival was most fortunate, the commander supplying them with everything the vessel could part with. The colonists had a few miserable huts, and five acres of ground, called the Government Gardens, which, with a small cottage, also called Government House, about twenty feet square, half roofed, and divided into several apartments by canvass screens, about three feet high, was the real extent of the colony. The Buffalo proceeded from hence to Sydney, where she landed her convicts, all in perfect health; and on the 10th November 33, sailed to her destination, New Zealand, to procure a cargo of Kowri topmasts, in which she has completely succeeded, having brought to England the finest ever imported, loaded partly at Keahou, entrance to the river Thames, and part at Wangaroa, notorious for the horrid murder of Captain Thompson and the crew of the Boyd merchant ship, in 1809. Mr Madril, who appears to have made himself acquainted with that part of the country, describes the natives as sly and good natured, though beyond all doubt cannibals. She sailed from New Zealand on the 26th June and Rio Janeiro on the 11th September.

In 1833, there were 46 railroads completed in America, and 137 in contemplation. Pennsylvania has the greatest number of both, having 15 completed and 7 in contemplation; the next state to it in both respects is New York, which has 6 completed and 25 in contemplation; Massachusetts comes next after these, and has 12 in projection, but none completed.

Since the invention of Toplis's "pacificator," a French agriculturist of the name of Billot, in the district of Poissy, who has assiduously cultivated the mechanics, has invented a machine, which will discharge two thousand balls, each eight ounces in weight, per minute or 120,000 in an hour, and this without the slightest emission. The action of this formidable machine is not arrested or continued at will; the balls are discharged from four different muzzles, which may be directed upon objects at a less or greater distance from each other, or they may be brought to bear simultaneously on those and the same point. Billot's machine, however, not capable of carrying such balls a greater distance than 100 metres (about 110 yards); but he asserts, that having so far succeeded in his first essays, he can improve it, as to impel the same balls a distance of 450 yards, with a velocity scarcely inferior to that imparted by gunpowder.

In this case, he adds that he will be obliged to increase its weight from eighty to three hundred and ten pounds. He does not employ either air, spring, or combustible matter in this new projectile; and his name is of more note among French mechanics as the inventor of twelve levers, which are to be seen in the collection of the Société d'Encouragement at Paris.—United Service Journal.

It appears from the criminal statistics of the Danish states, just published at Copenhagen, that in the last years there has been condemned to death in Denmark only one in 76,000 individuals, and in the Duchy of Sleswick and Holstein only one in 156,000; in the Duchy of Lauenburg there has not been a single capital condemnation since 1829. Of sixty-three individuals condemned to death in Denmark during the last year but eleven were actually executed; and of ten similarly condemned in the two other Duchies, only one suffered the extreme punishment of the law.

Some idea may be formed of the inferiority of the stature of a Frenchman compared with an Englishman by this fact, that out of 1,033,422 men summoned before the council of revision in 1826, there were 380,213 rejected being under the height of four feet eleven inches, five feet three and a half English. This inferior stature is doubtless, in a great measure, attributable to the vast sacrifice of human life during the wars. The tallest men are those usually drafted for the army, and as in modern times the cannon and the musket have superseded the battle-axe and the buckler, the largest and strongest men, who formerly possessed an advantage, and who hence were more likely to escape destruction, are now the most exposed to fall in action.

IRELAND.

A PUBLIC dinner, at which about 200 were present, was given to Mr O'Connell at Cork, on 17th November. Amongst the company were a number of Tories who attended with the view of hearing Mr O'Connell's remarks on the recent change of ministry, the effects of which had arrived that morning. In returning thanks for his health being proposed, he almost immediately adverted to the subject, and remarked that it was indifferent what changes of administration took place if the wrongs of Ireland remained. "What," he told, "said he, 'that the Whigs did much good for Ireland, and intended for us still more. Oh, ye were coerced them into some matters of mere secondary utility; but whom have we to thank for it? No, thank you, but our determination to right Ireland, and the vigilance and activity which enables us to turn their imbecility—their hypocrisy—to account; for, believe me, if their necessities, their anxiety to keep themselves in place, had not wrung it from them, like their Tory predecessors, they intended nothing good for Ireland but the good old system of legislation, by which we are to have now? The hero of Waterloo perhaps! Oh, we beat him before, and we are about to beat him again.'" He then urged the people to agitate and petition for repeal until they obtained they wanted. At a subsequent public meeting, held in the Dublin Corn Exchange on November 21 (at which twelve Irish members of Parliament were present), Mr O'Connell changed his tactics, advised that the question of repeal should be sunk till the next election was over. He then proposed resolutions, the first of which was, "that the exigencies of the possible formation of a Tory administration has created in the minds of the people of Ireland sentiments of indignation and disgust, and it is the duty of all honest and sincere reformers to try in oblivion all differences between themselves, to combine in one simultaneous and continued action to avert so awful a calamity as the restoration of a party devoted to oligarchy and monopoly, and gorged with the plunder of the church and state." It was also resolved to form an "anti-Tory" association. This project was subsequently carried into effect, and its first public meeting was held in the Corn Exchange on November 28, when Sir W. Brackenbury, Lord Teynham, and one or two other gentlemen, were admitted members. Mr O'Connell, on this and the succeeding day, went over a long list of the committee appointed to collect information relative to the present and prospective state of Irish representation, discussing the character and political principles of the members for the various constituencies, one by one. Mr O'Connell concluded moving resolutions in pursuance with the recommendations of his speech; one of which was, that members of all persuasions should be admitted members of the association gratuitously. All the resolutions passed nem. con. The members of this association continue to meet almost daily. Thirty-five members of Parliament are enrolled in its ranks. Mr O'Connell proposes establishing an anti-Tory rent, to defray the expenses of the liberal candidates at coming elections. Similar anti-Tory associations have been established in various places. Meetings at Cork, Tralee, Galway, Belfast, &c. &c., were held during the latter end of November, protesting against the formation of a Tory ministry. An address of the same purport, signed by 140 noblemen and gentlemen, the head of whom are the Duke of Leinster and Lord Charles Montagu, was sent off from Dublin on December 9. On the other hand, an address, vindicating his Majesty's right in choosing his counsellors, was transmitted from Belfast, having 200 signatures attached to it. A few other addresses of the same nature have been sent from different places in Ireland.

The London Courier says that Messrs O'Connell and Ruthven will be opposed by two candidates at the election for Dublin. "The sitting members have been denounced both Conservatives and Whigs as the most gross and offensive, and their chief reliance is on the Repealers, whose number and influence are fast decreasing."

A public dinner was given to Mr Cobbett on 17th November, General Cockburn in the chair. Mr Cobbett made a long speech, in return for his health being drunk, which he concluded with the following allusion to the late change of ministry:—"I shall now sit down, hoping that you will lose nothing by the recent change in the ministry. (Loud cheers and laughter.) That awful circumstance will not, I hope, prevent the pigs from growing, nor the pigs from fattening. I trust that they were not the breath in our nostrils; I really believe that you will do as well without them as with them. (Cheers and laughter.) I have to congratulate you that they have got their dismissal from the King."

The affrays, murders, and other scenes of violence, still continue to prevail. On Monday, November 24, an attempt was made to collect arrears of tithes in Armagh county, to the amount of L.25, due to the Rev. James S. Blacker. The assistance of a large body of police, under the command of Chief Constable Hill, was procured; and several seizures were effected. The peasantry, armed with sticks, stones, pitchforks, attempted a rescue. The rector, who was also a magistrate, went out on the occasion to collect his own tithes. A conflict took place, and one of the peasantry, who attempted a rescue, was killed, six of the police severely wounded. On the same day, a large party of infantry was marched from Limerick to Adare (the property of Lord Dunraven, estimated at L.32,000 a-year), where they were met by a strong force of the county police; and under their protection a seizure was formally made of corn, and potatoes, belonging to all the tithe debtors on his lordship's estate—that is to say, all his tenants. These were taken from their yards and sent, under the very windows of his lordship's mansion, and conveyed, by the aid of sixteen cars and sledges, belonging to the noble earl (for none other could he obtain for love or money), to a guarded depot, without any opposition. All the cattle were either driven up or driven away. The tenants said that the tithes, corn, and hay, were intended to pay the noble earl's rents, and to feed his labourers; and that, by taking these away by soldiers and police, why, he knew his own interest. The soldiers were exceedingly averse to their employment; and so strongly were their feelings excited, that rather than take away the widow's potatoes, they paid the amount of her tithes out of their own pockets. The commandant of the force also paid a poor man's tithe out of his own pocket rather than be obliged to seize his little property. On Monday, December 15, the Rev. W. Ryder, supported by a large party of military and police, and accompanied by another clergyman, his brother, made a sudden and unexpected attack upon the parish of Gurthroe, near Cork. The peasantry lost no time in housing their cattle and removing other property, but seizures were nevertheless made at various farms. A man, in endeavouring to prevent the entrance of a party, received a dangerous bayonet wound under the armpit, which was expected to prove fatal. At another place, several women were severely wounded and hurt by the soldiers. Here, a door presenting some resistance to the party, one of the clergymen took a large stone, and, hurling it against the timbers, made entrance for the assailants. Another tithe campaign, as these affairs are called, took place in the neighbouring parish of Bartholomy on the 18th, and was attended with consequences much more distressing. A large party of military and police, headed by Captain Begley, Captain Collis, and the Rev. Archdeacon Ryder, entered the parish at noon-day, and were received by a large party of the peasantry in battle array. According to a letter from the spot, the former were "drawn up in a file four deep in a borehen at the entrance of a haggard; the country people were on the ditches—they (the country people) say that they wanted not to let the soldiers take the butts that stopped the haggard gaps out of the way, and that the only missile thrown was a cabbage stump. Captain Bagley read the riot-act; Captain Collis said, 'Fire away to the devil, fire!' The four first men fired and made a breach, four of the countrymen falling; their place was again supplied by countrymen, who were shot again in their turn; and the matter did not end there, for even some of the country people were shot at in the act of running away. Two of the magistrates, Ryder and Collis, had a direct interest in going forward. Ryder is the new incumbent, and there are due to him only the tithes that accrued due since May till November last past; the tithes due up to May last belong to Collis as next heir to Archdeacon Collis, who died about May last. It was this Ryder, as I think, appeared in the Cork Reporter, that wanted the government to billet the soldiers on the people in 1832, to thus coerce them to pay tithes."—The result of this engagement was afterwards ascertained to be eleven of the country people killed, and more than double that number wounded.

A man in the employment of Crosby Moore, Esq., of Moorsfort, when coming into Tipperary, lately, to attend the sessions, to which he had summoned several persons for assault, was attacked and murdered in the street in open daylight, the murderers escaping without any effort being made to stop them!

Mr Dancer, the son of Sir Amyrd Dancer, and a magistrate of Tipperary county, residing near Nenagh, was lately arrested on a charge of being implicated in a conspiracy to burn down Castle Otway, the residence of Mr Otway Cave, and subsequent investigations have so strongly confirmed the suspicions against him, that he has been required to find bail in L.500, and himself in L.200, to take his trial at the next assizes.

ENGLAND.

CHANGE OF MINISTERS.

[THE brief notice of the dismissal of the Whig ministry, which was given in our last number, having been unavoidably imperfect, and in some small particulars erroneous, we judge it necessary, in the present, to recapitulate the whole of the circumstances attending this remarkable event, so far as they have hitherto been ascertained.]

On the removal of Lord Althorp to the House of Lords, in consequence of the death of his father, Lord Melbourne (November 13) visited the King at Brighton, in order to take his Majesty's pleasure respecting the supply of the deficiency; when the King at once informed his lordship that he would save the existing ministry all trouble on that account, as he intended to resort to other counsellors. The Duke of Wellington was then sent for, and arrangements made for placing his grace at the head of a provisional ministry, while a request should be sent to Italy for the aid of Sir Robert Peel, who was travelling in that country. The communication of this intelligence in the metropolis, and throughout the country generally, caused very great astonishment, but, to all appearance, no alarm, as the stocks were not in the least affected by it. It was at first surmised that the change was the result of a conspiracy carried on at court by the Tory party, with the aid of the Queen; but it has since been ascertained that the Queen and the Conservative chiefs were fully as much surprised by the resolution of the King as any part of the community, and that no preparation whatever had been made for the event.

On Monday, the 17th November, the King came to London, when the majority of his late ministers delivered up the seals of office; and upon the subsequent day, the Duke of Wellington was announced in the Gazette as having been sworn in "one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State." No other appointment took place until Friday, November 21, when Lord Lyndhurst was sworn into office as Lord Chancellor, and the Duke of Wellington was entrusted with the discharge, pro tempore, of all the other functions of the state, being at once First Lord of the Treasury, Secretary of the Home, Foreign, and Colonial Departments, First Lord of the Admiralty, President of the Board of Control, Secretary at War, and First Commissioner of the Woods and Forests. This unprecedented state of matters, which was hailed at as a dictatorship, and as pregnant with every public evil, served very greatly to increase the excitement of the public mind. It would almost fill our whole sheet to enumerate the various public meetings held throughout England, at which resolutions and addresses to the King, deprecating the dissolution of the Whig ministry, and the appointment of a Tory one, more especially a government headed by the Duke of Wellington, were proposed and carried. Many of these, as well as of the speeches delivered in proposing them, were couched in very strong language, almost all agreeing in one identical position, viz. that the Duke of Wellington, or any ministry formed under his auspices, must necessarily be opposed to all reform. Ten of the members for the metropolitan districts—viz. Messrs Wood, Grote, Crawford (city); Mr Clay and Dr Lushington (Tower Hamlets); Messrs Hawes and Tennyson (Lambeth); Messrs Brougham and Humphrey (Southwark); and Mr Duncombe (Finsbury)—jointly published an address to their constituents, in which they declared "we can expect no prosecution of the legitimate consequences of the reform bill from those who in every stage denounced and opposed it. We can anticipate no correction of social or political abuses from those whose voice has uniformly been raised in their defence. From such men reformers have nothing to hope; and not only nothing to hope, but, in our opinion, every thing to fear." The Lord Mayor (Winchester) having refused repeated applications to call what is termed a "Common Hall," for the purpose of taking into consideration the recent important political events, the Common Council voted an address to his Majesty, deprecating in very strong language the recent change of ministry, and declaring that they "can expect no correction of abuses in our social and political institutions from those whose voice has uniformly been raised in the defence of those abuses." On Tuesday, December 2, the Lord Mayor, accompanied by Alderman Harmer and about sixty-two common councilmen, along with the recorder, sheriffs, chamberlain, under-sheriffs, and several other city officers, proceeded to St James's Palace, and presented the address, which was read by the recorder. When it was finished, the Duke of Wellington handed the written answer to his Majesty, who read it in a tone of reproof (according to the Globe), laying particular emphasis on the words "I" and "my." It was as follows:—"It has been, and ever will be, the object of my earnest solicitude to correct abuses, and to improve the condition of the country. I trust that the ministers I may appoint will, by the successful prosecution of this the first wish of my heart, justify my confidence, and obtain that of my people." On Friday, December 12, the Common Council again met, when much contention arose, as to whether the King's reply to the address should be entered in the minutes of the court simply as his "Majesty's answer," or, as his "Majesty's gracious answer." The latter was carried by a majority of 46 to 38; and ultimately "his Majesty's most gracious answer" was carried by a show of hands. On Thursday, Dec. 11, the reformers of the Tower Hamlets assembled, and passed a series of anti-Tory resolutions, and an address to the King, founded on them. After the ostensible business of the meeting had been dispatched, Dr Lushington rose to address his constituents, by whom he was received with mingled cheers and hisses. He then entered into a vindication of his political conduct, and asked to be tried by it, as the Tories were tried. "When I hear people say," he continued, "'Oh, for God's sake, trust the duke! for heaven's sake listen kindly to Sir Robert Peel, who carried Catholic emancipation!' I cannot help exclaiming against such folly and absurdity. The man who patiently listens to such stuff is an idiot; the man who avows his belief in them is a traitor. How do men act in private life? Do you confide in those you know to be convicted swindlers? If you seek a woman to be your companion for life, do you take as a wife, or as a mother to your families, a prostitute from the streets? If, then, men are governed in private life by such feelings, should they not feel equally jealous of the character of those who govern them? The present struggle is not to be treated with neglect or indifference. You have, in the first place, against you the King. It is utter folly—it is false delicacy—it is altogether absurd to say, that by discussing these matters we are infringing on the prerogatives of the crown. (Loud cheers.) The people have also their prerogatives; and be it recollected that the king was made for the people. If he chooses to appoint ministers whom the people will not trust, the people can make him change them again. If he pursues such a course as to lead the country into danger, the people must stop him in his career. What is now the state of our country? For ten years we had a monarch who was insane; for ten years more we had for his successor a cold-blooded and heartless voluptuary; a change came, and we have now one who, after exciting the hopes and expectations of the people, is prepared to disappoint them. But are the hopes of the people to be now blasted? I would warn the friends of monarchy, that if such a course is to be pursued, monarchy itself is in danger." (That part of Dr Lushington's speech given in italics called forth a demand for explanation from Sir R. Peel; to which the Doctor replied, that the report of it was incorrect; that he only spoke of the Tories generally, and meant nothing personally disrespectful to Sir R. Peel.) In various places, resolutions and addresses against the appointment of a Tory ministry were adopted, but without expressing regret for the dismissal of the Whigs; nay, in some places their dismissal was approved of. At a great meeting, held at Manchester on November 27, Mr Mark Phillips moved a resolution expressive of regret at the removal of the Whigs from office, which was met by a counter-resolution by Mr Fielden, member for Oldham, expressing the utmost indignation and contempt at the conduct of the ex-ministry, and thanking the King for their dismissal; which amendment was carried by an overwhelming majority. Another resolution, however, was moved and carried, declaring the utmost distrust in any Tory ministry.

In Ireland the public excitement seems to have been much greater, though less general, than in England, it being believed that a Tory government would resist all attempts to obtain a reformation in the Irish church establishment. (See article Ireland.)

In Scotland the demonstrations of public feeling against the dismissal of the Whig ministry seem to have been more unanimous than even in England and Ireland, and equally opposed to the return of the Tories to power. We noticed in our December number the meeting held in the Grassmarket, Edinburgh, on Nov. 18, at which various strong anti-Tory resolutions were passed. On the 22d, a very large meeting was held on the Green at Glasgow, to the number (as variously stated) of from 20,000 to 60,000, carrying black flags, on which deaths' heads, cross bones, swords, daggers, axes, &c., were depicted. The resolutions expressed regret and indignation at the re-accession of the Duke of Wellington to office, and asserted that all the great interests of the country had improved since his retirement. In addition to these meetings, similar ones were held in Leith, Cupar, Dumfries, Dundee—in short, in about eighty different towns and villages in Scotland. At a meeting of the Dundee Political Union, November 28, it was resolved, "that the Duke of Wellington's principles are arbitrary, and his inclination is to rule by means of the sword. He has twice been driven from power amidst the execrations of the people; and there is no reason to suppose that he now deserves a better fate; and it is matter of astonishment and indignation that the King should have so far swerved from the principles of reform, as to recall to his counsels a man so obnoxious to the people, whom they justly detest as the organ and leader of an unprincipled faction, who have too long swayed the destinies of this great nation, and by whom it has been brought almost to the brink of ruin!" Another public meeting was held in Magdalen Yard, Dundee, Dec. 3, at which about 8000 were present. One flag had a dead duck (Scottish, Duck), dressed in scarlet, and with a small sword tied to its neck, dangling from it, with the words, "So perish the Duke, and all such." Another flag bore the words, "No King!" in large letters; but the provost, who presided, refused to proceed until the latter was removed. The sheriff-substitute afterwards instituted investigations respecting the authors of it; but the man who bore it could not be got hold of.

While these demonstrations of opposition to the formation of a Tory government were taking place, addresses and resolutions of a very different character emanated from almost every quarter of the kingdom, although no doubt inferior in number to those of an opposite description, and in no well-authenticated case voted in open public meetings, as the others were. One address from Glasgow received 3000 signatures in the course of two days; another from Edinburgh received 2500 in the same space of time. Besides these, addresses were transmitted from Leith, Inverness, Cupar-Fife, Perth, Banff, Jedburgh, Aberdeen, Peterhead, Kelso, Haddington, &c. &c. The principal feature in these addresses was an expression of determination to support the King in exercising his prerogative of choosing his own counsellors, and praying him to appoint those who would support the constitution. They were in general very moderately expressed. Addresses of the same nature, and many of them expressing warm gratitude for the recent exercise of the royal prerogative, were sent from almost every district in England; but here also the important sanction of open meetings was wanting. A dinner was held at Ashford on Nov. 20, at which upwards of two hundred of the nobility, gentry, and principal inhabitants of East Kent, were present, who all subscribed an address of the above import, the names of Lords Winchester and Strangford being first. A meeting of the South Lancashire Conservative Association met, and voted a similar address, at Liverpool, on Nov. 21. Upwards of four thousand were present, including a deputation from the Conservative Society of Ireland. Dinners, and meetings, and addresses to the same effect, were also got up at Bristol, Norwich, Bury, Wellingborough, Colchester, Ipswich, Birmingham, Gloucester, Worcester, Harwich, Tewksbury, Falmouth, Kendal, Lewes, Brecon, Merthyr-Tydvil, Aylesbury, Poole, Tamworth, Wells, Rugley, Havering, Lymington, &c. &c.

On Tuesday, November 21, Lord Melbourne, ex-Premier, was presented with an address by the inhabitants of Melbourne, congratulating him upon his return to his native seat. In replying, his lordship said, in reference to the circumstances attending his dismissal, that "he did not feel himself in the slightest degree personally aggrieved by any thing that had taken place." He spoke cautiously on the subject of the reforms which his cabinet was prepared to bring forward; only stating that they had intended to do "as much as was sufficient—as much as would have remedied the most pressing evils—as much as could have been digested and matured—as much as in all circumstances it could be considered safe, prudent, and practicable to effect." On Monday, December 1, another address was presented to his lordship by some of the inhabitants of Derby, approving of the conduct of the Whig ministry, and regretting its unexpected dissolution. His lordship said, in reply, that the death of Earl Spencer having deprived the government of his services in the Lower House of Parliament, it became his (Lord Melbourne's) duty to take the pleasure of his Majesty, and make the requisite arrangements for filling up the deficiency. "It was sufficient to say, that, in taking these steps, his Majesty intimated to him that he would not impose upon him that task, but that he intended to resort for that purpose to other counsellors. In saying this, however, he (Lord Melbourne) did not mean to have it inferred that he had any just cause to feel personally aggrieved by his gracious master; the question was a great public one; the King could not be guided by personal motives, and his decision was in no sense to be found fault with. He could not help saying, notwithstanding, that the dissolution of the cabinet had occurred abruptly, and at a time when the public mind was in a state of especial calm and quiet." He contradicted the rumour of differences in the cabinet. Nothing of this sort would at all have led to its breaking up, if the King had not dissolved it. "I beg," said his lordship, "to give a clear, distinct, and emphatic denial to this assumption. That some shades of difference on important measures did exist, and would always exist, might be the case; but that any such variation in sentiment has caused the event, is erroneous and untrue." These declarations of Lord Melbourne contain what may be termed the only official account of the immediate cause of the breaking up of his ministry, yet given to the public, and would imply that his Majesty had dismissed them, without assigning any reason for so doing. It would be a waste of time to advert to the innumerable rumours and conjectures on this subject; but the following seems worthy of notice:—It was confidently and repeatedly asserted in some of the leading Tory papers that the real cause of the dismissal of the Whig ministry was in consequence of Lord Melbourne laying before the King a plan of Irish church reform, embracing in its provisions "a partial extinction of Protestantism;" to which, it was said, his Majesty replied, "I will die first!" It was also stated that this measure had been prepared by Lord John Russell. At a dinner given to his lordship by his constituents at Totness, on Tuesday, December 2, he adverted to this report—"Gentlemen, it has been said that some plan was in preparation upon the Irish church, with regard to which ministers differed; and it has been stated—nay, assertion has even gone so far as this—that I had prepared a plan which was of such a nature, that Lord Lansdowne and Mr Spring Rice, and, I think, Lord Auckland, could not agree to it. Gentlemen, this statement is altogether false. I had prepared no plan upon the subject. There was a plan, which had not been submitted to the cabinet, which had not been matured; and I can say this further, that although no cabinet had been held in which a plan for the Irish church reform had been discussed and settled, yet there was every prospect that the cabinet would have come to an unanimous decision upon such a plan."

While these movements were going on, the utmost anxiety was manifested for the return of Sir Robert Peel, to whom a King's messenger, Mr Hudson, had been dispatched from Brighton on November 15, with a letter from the Duke of Wellington, the substance of which was given out by the Times to be as follows:—"I have received our sovereign's commands to form a new administration, which I have promptly obeyed. My opinion has long been, and still is, that the office of Premier should be held by a member of the House of Commons, and not of the House of Lords. I candidly admit that no one is so proper as yourself to hold that situation, therefore beg your immediate return, and that you will accept that office. In respect to myself, I have no wish for office at all; but if I can be of any use to my sovereign and my country, and if it shall be your wish, I will fill any office under your administration that you may point out." Mr Hudson's journey was performed with extraordinary rapidity. He arrived in Rome, where he found Sir Robert, on November 25; set out on his return next day at half-past one p.m.; arrived at Paris at half-past one on Wednesday, Dec. 3, where he was detained until five o'clock, to repair the breakages of his carriage; arrived at Boulogne at a quarter past twelve next day; left at three-quarters past twelve, in an open boat; arrived at Dover at a quarter past six, and at Apsley House at a quarter past one, on Friday morning, December 5; thus performing the journey in the space of nineteen days. Sir Robert Peel arrived in London at eight a.m., on Tuesday, Dec. 9, and was immediately waited on by the Duke of Wellington. After a long consultation, Sir Robert and his grace went to St James's Palace, to attend his Majesty, with whom they were closeted for a great length of time. In the course of the forenoon, the Right Hon. Bart. was sworn into office as First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer; and his grace was at the same time sworn in as Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. All other appointments were deferred until answers were received from Sir James Graham and Lord Stanley, to whom overtures to join the new administration were dispatched. Answers were received from both on Friday, Dec. 12, the nature of which has not transpired farther, so that they declined accepting office. It is very positively asserted, however, that Lord Stanley expressed his confidence that the government to be formed by Sir Robert Peel would act to the satisfaction of his country. Negotiations were therefore opened with other parties, and with the appointments subsequently made, the new administration at present stands thus:

Sir Robert Peel,	First Lord of Treasury.
Duke of Wellington,	Chancellor of Exchequer.
Mr Goulburn,	Secretary for Foreign Affairs.
Earl of Aberdeen,	Secretary for the Home Department.

With reference to the chance which the new administration might have, of the support of the present House of Commons, the Spectator published a list in which it assumed that 443 would, under any circumstances, oppose the government, and 157 support, while 48 were doubtful; and 10 seats were vacant.

PRINCIPLES OF THE NEW ADMINISTRATION.

In the London newspapers of December 18, appeared an address "to the Electors of the Borough of Tamworth" by the new Premier, Sir Robert Peel, which has been generally accepted as an exposition of the principles upon which the recently-formed administration mean to act in regard to the great national questions at present in agitation. Our limits will only permit our giving a concise abstract of the more important passages.

After alluding to the long and friendly intercourse between himself and his former constituents, Sir Robert stated, that his being called to the premiership was no act of his own. The King required his services in a crisis of great difficulty, and the question he had to decide with himself was, whether the reform bill placed him under an irremediable moral disqualification for entering into the civil service of the crown. Ought he to assume that measure so fettered the prerogative of the crown, that the King of England should ever afterwards be constrained to "select his ministers from one section, or one section only, of public men?" Sir Robert then went on to say that he would not accept power by apostatizing from the principles on which he had hitherto acted; that he never would admit that he had been, either before or after the reform act, a supporter of abuses; and he appealed to his active exertions in regard to the current question—the criminal code—trial by jury—and every other vital question of civil jurisprudence, whether he was disposed to acquiesce in acknowledged evils, either from the mere superstitious reverence for ancient usage, or from the dread of labour or responsibility in the application of a remedy. With regard to the reform bill, he said, "I repeat now the declaration which I made when I entered the House of Commons as a member of the reformed Parliament, that I consider the reform bill a final and irrevocable settlement of a great constitutional question, a settlement which no friend to the peace and welfare of this country would attempt to disturb, either by direct or by insidious means. Then, as to the spirit of the reform bill, if it be meant that we are to live in a perpetual vortex of agitation, that public men can only support themselves in public estimation by adopting every popular impression of the day; by promising the instant redress of any thing which any body may call an abuse by abandoning altogether that great aid of government more powerful than law or reason, the respect for ancient rights and the deference to prescriptive authority—if that the spirit of the reform bill, I will not undertake to do it. But if the spirit of the reform bill implies a careful review of the institutions, civil and ecclesiastical, undertaken in a friendly temper, combining with firm maintenance of established rights, the correction of abuses and the redress of real grievances—in that I can, for myself and colleagues, undertake to act in a spirit, and with such intentions." Sir Robert then turned to the more immediate and important topics of agitation—and, in the first place, to the inquiry on with the view of reforming the English municipalities. He said, "It was not his intention to advise the crown to interrupt the progress of that inquiry, or to transfer the conduct of it from those to whom it was committed by the late government. For himself, he had the best proof that he was not unfriendly to the principle of inquiry, by consenting to be a member of a committee of the House of Commons on which it was originally devolved;" but until a report by the committee was made, he could not be expected to give, as part of the government, any other pledge than that they will bestow on the suggestions it may contain, the evidence on which they may be founded, a full and unprejudiced consideration.

With regard to the questions affecting the dissenters, Sir Robert referred to the course he had taken when out of power. He supported the measure brought forward by Lord Althorp, the object of which was to exempt all dissenters from the payment of church rates, applying in lieu of, out of a branch of the revenue, a certain sum for building and repair of churches. He never expressed or entertained the slightest objection to the principle of John Russell's bill to relieve the conscientious scruples of dissenters, in respect to the ceremony of marriage. He could give no opinion now on the particular measures proposed. These measures were proposed by ministers in whom the dissenters had confidence; and it was not for his (Sir Robert's) present purpose to state, or to support the principle of them. He opposed the admission of dissenters as a claim of right into the universities; but he expressly declared, if regulations enacted by public authorities superintending the profession of law and medicine, and the studies connected with it, had the effect of conferring advantages of the nature of civil privileges on one class of the King's subjects, which another class was excluded, those regulations should undergo modification, with the view of placing the King's subjects, whatever their religious creed, upon a footing of perfect equality in respect to any civil privilege. (Sir Robert) appealed to the course he had pursued on several questions when office must have been in contemplation, whether he was actuated by any ill-will or intolerant spirit towards the dissenting body, or by unwillingness to consider fairly the redress of any real grievances? Sir Robert next adverted to the pension question which question (although he had resisted, and would resist, any retrospective inquiry into pensions granted by the crown at a time when the discretion of the crown was neither fettered by law nor by the expression of any opinion on the part of the House of Commons) he had voted for the resolution moved by Lord Althorp, that pensions on the civil list ought for the future to be confined to such persons only as have just claims to the royal beneficence, or are entitled to consideration on account either of their personal services to the crown, or of the performance of duties to the public, of their scientific or literary eminence.

On the question of "church reform," he explicitly said he would not give his consent to the alienation of church property in any part of the United Kingdom from strictly ecclesiastical purposes. "But I repeat now the opinions I have already expressed in Parliament in regard to church establishment in Ireland; that if, by an improved distribution of the revenues of the church, its just influence can be extended, and the true interests of the established religion promoted, all other considerations should be made subordinate to the advancement of objects of such paramount importance. As to church property in this country, no person has expressed a more ardent wish than I have done that the question of tithe, so complicated and difficult as I acknowledge it to be, if possible, be satisfactorily settled by means of a mutation, founded upon just principles, and proposed after mature deliberation. With regard to alterations in the laws which govern our ecclesiastical establishment, I have had no recent opportunity of giving that consideration to a subject of the deepest interest, which could alone justify me in making any public declaration of opinion. It is a subject which must undergo the most careful deliberation, and into that deliberation the government will enter with the sincerest desire to remove any abuse that can impair the efficiency of the establishment, to extend the sphere of its usefulness, and to then and confirm its just claims upon the respect and affections of the people." Sir Robert concluded his remarks by saying that the great leading objects of his government would be "the maintenance of peace; the faithful and honourable fulfilment, without reference to original policy, of all existing engagements with foreign powers; the support of public credit; the enforcement of strict economy; and the just and impartial consideration of what is due to all interests, agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial."

LORD BROUGHAM.

HARRY to the belief, real or affected, expressed in different quarters, Lord Brougham retired from both in his judicial and political capacity, along with his colleagues in the late administration. His determination to do so he announced in the Court of Exchequer, on Monday, November 17. "Let me take this opportunity of stating thus publicly," he observed, "in the most positive terms I can use, my full determination to resign office. I will give up my judicial office. I repeat again—(here his lordship spoke with much vehemence)—I repeat again, I WILL give up my seals, and no earthly power can alter my resolution. I mention this now, for the purpose of removing any doubt, if it be possible that a moment's doubt should have been entertained by any individual on the subject. I myself have no doubt—indeed, I am quite certain, that the seals will pass from my hands, the instant what little remains of official business, or I might say of official ceremonies, are complied with. I have felt more amazement, astonishment, and indignation, than I can find words to express, at finding that any person or persons should have presumed to doubt that such was my fixed and unalterable determination. There is no part of my public life which affords any excuse or palliation to any individual who dares slander my reputation, by venturing to express a doubt or hesitate for one single moment in the course to pursue; and I once more repeat, that I shall instantly give up the great seal." On Friday, November 21, he took leave of the court in a short address, during which, we are told, he was affected even to tears. He said he had the satisfaction of reflecting that he had disposed of every case which had come before him, and that the court, which was represented by its enemies as the temple of discord, delay, and expense, had been twice closed within five months. He paid some high compliments to the Vice-Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls, as well as to the bar, but cut his speech short from the apparent excitement of his feelings. He was loudly cheered as he passed to his carriage and drove off. In a few days afterwards his lordship set off for Paris; but previous to his departure, he wrote to his successor in office, Lord Lyndhurst, offering to accept the office of Chief Baron of the Exchequer, under the new administration, upon payment merely of his expenses (estimated at between £1,000 and £2,000), in addition to his retiring salary, as Chancellor, of £5,000; thus saving the country the amount of the Chief Baron's officiating salary, which is £5,000 per annum. In reply, Lord Lyndhurst briefly stated that it was not intended to fill up any of the vacant offices until Sir Robert Peel's return from Italy; that his lordship's letter should be communicated to Sir Robert on his return; and that it would depend on Sir Robert, if Prime Minister, and on the individual who might then hold the seals, whether his lordship's offer should or should not be accepted. On arriving at Paris, Lord Brougham again wrote to Lord Lyndhurst recalling the offer he had made; explaining, that his object in making it was solely with the view of "saving a large sum to the public, and completing the reform of the Court of Chancery, by abolishing the office of Vice-Chancellor;" but that some communications he had since received "from persons in whom he entirely confided," gave him reason to think that his accepting office "would interfere with his Parliamentary duties." And so terminated this negotiation; Lord Brougham's conduct in which appeared to excite the utmost astonishment in all parties, and the deepest regret and mortification in his political friends and supporters.

Lord Brougham arrived at Paris on November 28. His first visit was to M. Dupin, and the first invitation to dinner which he accepted was from the Duke de Broglie. On the evening of the 28th he was at the English ambassador's (Lord Granville), when there were 1500 of the most distinguished persons in Paris at the party. The Duke of Orleans and many ministers and ambassadors were present at this brilliant assembly. Lord Brougham, it is said, was heard to express himself very plainly respecting the Wellington administration, which he declared he thought must fall before the Parliament. On Sunday the 30th November, he attended a meeting of the Society of Political Sciences, and carried on a long conversation in French on the subjects discussed, alluding, at the same time, to the French books on the topics therewith connected which he had translated into English. When handed the book of signatures to sign his name, he subscribed himself "Brougham, avocat et homme des lettres." During the rest of the week he went much into society, but it was remarked that he received no notice from the court or those in power; and it was not till Saturday, December 6, that he was favoured with an interview by Louis Philip, with whom he was closeted nearly an hour. On Monday, December 8, his lordship attended, in company with M. Dupin, the opening meeting of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, when M. Beranger read an analysis of "The History of the English Constitution," by Hallam. After which, M. Dupin congratulated the meeting that the analysis had been read "in presence of one of the most brilliant organs of the government of Great Britain; and who," he said, "has lost nothing in our eyes of his personal value in separating himself from the power and the honours with which he was invested." Lord Brougham merely bowed, looking much gratified at M. Dupin's compliment.

On the 3d December, Lord Brougham addressed a letter from Paris to Mr E. Lytton Bulwer, M.P. in answer to certain strictures upon his political conduct by that gentleman, in a recently published pamphlet, entitled a "Letter to a late Cabinet Minister." In exculpating himself, Lord Brougham took a retrospect of his Parliamentary career since his elevation to the woolsack, and asserted that, "unless that he opposed universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and annual Parliaments," there would be no distinction betwixt himself and the "stoutest and most unsparing reformer." In particular, he took credit to himself as having, almost by his own undivided exertions, brought in and carried through Parliament the "Scotch Burgh Reform Bill." Mr Bulwer having appended his lordship's letter to a subsequent edition of his pamphlet, an Edinburgh correspondent of the London Courier (whose letter bore strong internal evidence of perfect acquaintance with his subject) not only positively contradicted Lord Brougham's claim to the merit of originating and passing the Scotch burgh reform bill, but asserted that his lordship did all in his power to stop its progress through Parliament; and that it was only by the persevering exertions of Mr Jeffrey, Mr Abercromby, and other Scotch members, it was passed into an act.

TRIAL FOR LIBEL—TAIT'S MAGAZINE.

AN action for damages was (December 20) brought before the Court of Exchequer, by one Richmond, against Messrs Simpkin and Marshall, the London publishers of Tait's Magazine, for an alleged libel in the number for May 1833, representing Mr Richmond as having acted in 1816 as a government spy, and applying to him much opprobrious language. Mr Richmond stated that, being a hand-loom weaver in Lanarkshire, he had taken part in a strike to raise wages, for which he fell under the cognizance of the law-officers in Scotland, and, after trial, suffered one month's imprisonment. Afterwards, in 1817, while in a state of destitution, he was applied to by Mr Kirkman Finlay, a magistrate in Glasgow, to give information respecting a conspiracy against government, which was then understood to be in progress among the weavers, and undertook to obtain information respecting it, as the best means of saving the lives of his infatuated fellow-workmen. He stipulated that, should he fail to persuade the people to abandon their course of proceedings, such of them as might have been taken into custody in consequence of information furnished by himself, should be secure from punishment, let their offence have been as clear as possible. He further also stipulated that the most profound secrecy should be observed, and that he should hold no communication with the government. Unluckily, however, this last condition was not adhered to by all the parties concerned. In consequence of the stipulation in question not being strictly enforced, it led to the premature apprehension of several persons connected with this secret confederacy, and they were brought to trial, but, for the want of proper evidence, were acquitted. He had not been arrested; and if the men had been convicted, he should have had no hesitation in laying the whole of the facts before the public; but, as it was, he was prevented from so doing; and he ultimately suffered the greatest misery, and a very great pecuniary sacrifice. He had been advised by some of his friends to quit the country, and they offered him their assistance to do so. Messrs Cockburn and Jeffrey said, "No; Mr Richmond has been ruined by his exertions to keep the peace of the country, and the government are bound to indemnify him." In consequence of this, a representation was made to government, and a sum of money was given in full of all demands upon government. He declared that the whole of the charges brought against him were false, and added, that if the motives of a man were looked upon as the test of good actions and of good and upright intentions, then was that the most virtuous act of his life for performing which he had been so grossly calumniated and traduced in the libels in question. The plaintiff concluded a speech of nearly four hours' duration, by stating that the spirits and nerves of most men would have given way under the series of attacks which had been heaped upon him, and sat down, after expressing his thanks to the court and to the jury for the patient attention they had extended to him.

Mr Sergeant Telford addressed the court for the defence, and in the first place represented it as strange that the plaintiff should not have brought the charge against the principal party interested in the magazine, and in Scotland, where all the circumstances were best known—also that the charge was brought so late. The article in Tait's Magazine was only a review of a work published a twelvemonth earlier, in which the same facts were stated. Mr Richmond had himself published books in which he admitted nearly the same facts—particularly that he had given money to a person who undertook to be his assistant in breaking up the conspiracy. He would maintain that there was not a single charge against Mr R. but what was made out by that unfortunate admission. Mr Telford also spoke four hours, and his eloquence was cheered by the assemblage.

On Monday, Dec. 22, to which day the case was adjourned, after several weavers of Glasgow had been called, whose evidence went into the disturbances of 1816, and certain portions of the plaintiff's own work had been put in as evidence, and extracts read at the suggestions of either party,

Richmond said that he was at a loss how to proceed. He was taken by surprise by the evidence which had been brought against him, and he was not then prepared to rebut it. But if he could not rebut it, he never would hold up his head in society.

Mr Baron Park thought, that as the plaintiff was not prepared now with evidence to rebut the very strong evidence which had been brought against him, there was only this alternative—he must either let the case go to the jury as it was, or submit to a nonsuit.

Richmond, having consulted with his attorney, said that it appeared to be his wisest course to submit to a nonsuit.

Mr Baron Park said—I think that is the wisest course.

The plaintiff was then called in court in the usual form, and as he did not answer, a nonsuit was entered.

BURNING OF THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

THE following whimsical parody upon the prolix report of the Privy Council relative to the cause of the conflagration of the late Houses of Legislature, appears not the worst of the many "good things" to which that event has given rise:—

Brief summary of a late interesting "report."

This is the house that Josh burnt.

These are the sticks that heated the bricks that set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is Mr Milne, who advised a kiln, for burning the sticks, that heated the bricks, that set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is Mr Phipps, who allowed the chips, to be burnt in the flues, but never told the news, to Mr Milne, who suggested a kiln, for burning the sticks, that heated the bricks, and set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is Mr Weobly, who heard but feebly, what was said by Phipps, who allowed the chips, to be burnt in the flues, and never told the news, to Mr Milne, who suggested a kiln, for burning the sticks, that heated the bricks, that set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is Josh Cross, who continued to toss in too many sticks, and was full of his sauce, though cautioned by Weobly, who'd heard very feebly, what was said by Phipps, when he suffered the chips, to be burnt in the flues, yet never told the news, to Mr Milne, who preferred a kiln, for burning the sticks, which heated the bricks, and set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is Mrs Wright, who was all in a fright, and sent to Josh Cross, so full of his sauce, though cautioned by Weobly, who heard so feebly, the words of Phipps, who suffered the chips, to be burnt in the flues, and never told the news, to Mr Milne, who had ordered a kiln, for burning the sticks, that heated the bricks, and set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is Dick Reynolds, who saw that night, the flues and the furnaces blazing bright, stuff'd full of sticks to three-fourths of their height, when sent by Mrs Wright, who was all in a fright, to scold Josh Cross, so full of his sauce, though rebuked by Weobly, who heard so feebly, the orders of Phipps, who allowed the chips, to be burned in the flues, and never told the news, to Commissioner Milne, who advised a kiln, for burning the sticks, that heated the bricks, and set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is John Snell, who found out by the smell, and the smoke and the heat, that came through to his feet, when he sat himself down in the Black Rod's seat, that Dick Reynolds was right, when he said that night, that the flues and the stoves were blazing too bright, when dispatched by Dame Wright, in her hurry and fright, to scold Josh Cross, so full of his sauce, though warned by Weobly, who heard very feebly, what was said by Phipps, who permitted the chips, to be burnt in the flues, and never told the news, to Mr Milne, who had talked of a kiln, for burning the sticks, that heated the bricks, and set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is Mr Cooper of Drury Lane, who went down to Dudley and back again, and heard a man say, the very same day, that the house was a-blazing, a fact more amazing, than that of John Snell, who knew very well, by the smoke and the smell, and the very great heat, that came through to his feet, when he sat himself down in the Black Rod's seat, that Reynolds was right, when he said that night, that the stoves and the flues were burning too bright, stuff'd full of sticks to three-fourths of their height, when Mistress Wright sent him off in a fright, to blow up Josh Cross, so full of his sauce, for not minding Weobly, who heard so feebly, the directions of Phipps, respecting the chips, being burnt in the flues, without telling the news, to Commissioner Milne, who ordered a kiln, for burning the sticks, that heated the bricks, and set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is John Riddle, who only cried "Fiddle!" when asked if Cooper of Drury Lane, had been down to Dudley and back again, and had heard a man say, at the Bush that day, that the house was a-blazing, a thing more amazing, than the fact of John Snell, finding out by the smell, and the smoke and the heat, coming through to his feet, when he sat with his boots on in Black Rod's seat, that Dick Reynolds was right, when he said that night, that the fire in the stoves was a great deal too bright, stuff'd up with sticks to three-fourths of their height, when sent in her fright, by poor Mistress Wright, to admonish Josh Cross, so full of his sauce, though rebuked by Weobly, who heard so feebly, the words of Phipps, who allowed the chips, to be burnt in the flues, but never told the news, to Mr Milne, who had said that a kiln, was the place for the sticks, that heated the bricks, and set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is Whitbread the waiter, who added his negatur, to that of John Riddle, who only cried "Fiddle!" when they told him that Cooper of Drury Lane, had been down to Dudley and back again, and had heard that day some travellers say, that the house was a-blazing, a thing most amazing, to even John Snell, who had found by the smell, and the smoke and the heat, that was scorching his feet, as he sat in his boots in the Black Rod's seat, that Dick Reynolds was right, when he said that night, that the fire in the stoves were alarmingly bright, stuff'd up with sticks to three-fourths of their height, when Mistress Wright, being really in a fright, sent off to Josh Cross, so full of his sauce, to Surveyor Weobly, who'd heard so feebly, the orders of Phipps, who permitted the chips, to be burnt in the flues, without carrying the news, to Commissioner Milne, who had told him a kiln, was the place for the sticks, that heated the bricks, and set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

This is the Peer, who in town being resident, signed the report for the absent Lord President, and said that the history, was cleared of its mystery, by Whitbread the waiter, adding his negatur, to that of John Riddle, who laugh'd and said "Fiddle!" when told Mr Cooper of Drury Lane, had been down to Dudley and back again, and had heard the same day, a bagman say, that the house was a-blazing, a thing quite amazing, even to John Snell, who knew very well, by the smoke and the heat, that was broiling his feet, through his great thick boots in the Black Rod's seat, that Dick Reynolds was right, that the fires were too bright, heaped up to such an unconscionable height, in spite of the fright they gave poor Mistress Wright, when she sent to Josh Cross, so full of his sauce, both to her and to Weobly, who'd heard so feebly, the directions of Phipps, when he told him the chips, might be burnt in the flues, yet never sent the news, as he ought to Milne, who'd have burn'd in a kiln, these confounded old sticks, and not heated the bricks, nor set fire to the house that Josh burnt.

Nov. 30. The Duke of Gloucester died this evening at Bagshot, at twenty minutes to seven o'clock. His royal highness succeeded his father, who was brother of George III., in 1805. He married, in 1816, his first cousin, the Princess Mary, a sister of his Majesty. By his death, Cambridge loses its Chancellor, and the Scots Fusilier Guards their Colonel. A Grand Cross of the Guelphic Order, and a Field Marshal's baton, return into the hands of the King. The funeral took place on Thursday night, December 4. The deep regret exhibited by all classes, but the poorer more especially, was highly honourable to the memory of the duke. He seems to have been universally beloved by his tenants and neighbours; and the hearse moved off from the Park towards Windsor amidst the tears and sobs of many of the poor. The children of a charity school supported by the duke sang a hymn as the procession went along. There are many discrepant reports as to the wealth left by his royal highness, and its disposal. It need only be mentioned, for his own credit as well as the satisfaction of the country, that he left no debt behind him. Sir James Scarlett is said to be the sole executor.

Dec. 10. A true bill was found by the Grand Jury of Surrey, against the Bishop of Winchester and nine others, among whom are three clergymen and two magistrates, on indictment, for an assault committed upon the Rev. Cornelius Griffin, at a public meeting, recently held at Epsom, on behalf of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

—18. Parliament was formally prorogued on Thursday, to Thursday the 15th of January. The Lord Chancellor (Lyndhurst) and the Earls of Rosslyn and Jersey acted as commissioners. A laughable electioneering faux pas took place at Newcastle. Mr Aytoun, advocate, Edinburgh, having accepted of a numerous signed requisition to stand as candidate in that town, in the Radical interest, was expected to arrive this day. Great multitudes were accordingly on the outlook, and when a carriage was seen rapidly advancing, the signal was given, the bells were set a-ringing, and amid the acclamations of exulting thousands, the carriage drove into town, containing—Sir George Clerk, the Conservative candidate for Mid-Lothian, and member of the Conservative government!

The Sun newspaper says, "Opposed as our political opinions may be to those of the Duke of Wellington, we are happy to relate a most disinterested act which has just come to our knowledge. A young man (whose father is a clergyman with a very limited income, and eight children to provide for) lately canvassed for a public situation, but was unsuccessful. He was complaining to a friend of the disappointment, and stated his intention of burning all the testimonials of moral conduct, &c. with which he had been honoured. 'You had much better enclose them to his Grace of Wellington, and solicit his patronage,' said his friend in a jocular manner, little dreaming his advice would ever be acted upon. Nevertheless, the hint was taken; the certificates, testimonials, &c. were enclosed, together with a plain statement of facts. Inquiries were made, and being found satisfactory, the young man was presented with a clerkship. Such a deed requires no comment."

By the late elevation of Sir E. Sugden and Sir C. Pepps, a practice of upwards of £20,000 per annum, it is said, will devolve on the Equity bar.

The Madras Gazette of June 14 announces the arrival of the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay, member of the Supreme Council of India.

Talleyrand is not to return to England, but is appointed ambassador to Vienna.

A successful resistance has been made at Birmingham against another imposition of church-rates. The total majority against the rate amounted to nearly 5000.

Ardassee Dunjeeshah Bahadar of Surat has transmitted to England £25 towards erecting the intended monument to the memory of Sir John Malcolm.

A bet of a thousand pounds was laid by a nobleman well known in the political and sporting world, that the Whigs would not hold office four years. He has been singularly enough lost; the division upon the civil list took place on Monday night, or, as the umpires say, on Tuesday morning, the 16th of November 1830; on Wednesday, a few hours later, the duke resigned. Lord Melbourne's ministry was, to all intents and purposes, at an end to before twelve on the 14th November 1830; but the King being at Brighton, the ministers had no opportunity of giving up the seals until Monday the 18th. This is close running; and if the spirit of the wager, rather than the letter, had been consulted, the "back-out" would have been the winner. We mention the circumstance merely to exhibit the coincidence of date.—Morning Post.

The quantity of silk imported into Great Britain for home consumption in 1833 amounted to 4,758,455 lbs., being an increase of three and a quarter per cent. on the year preceding. The value of the exports gives an increase of not less than forty per cent. According to the Rev. Mr Westwood, who submitted a paper on this subject at the last meeting of the Entomological Society, there are probably at present about 700,000 persons employed in the silk trade.

The Salopian Journal says—We give the following anecdote from a private source of undoubted authority. Her Majesty, a few days ago, remarked to one of her ladies in attendance, that if a thunderbolt had fallen at her feet she could not have been more astonished than she was when the King announced to her a change of ministers. His Majesty said that he hoped she would be well enough to come down to dine with them, as the Duke of Wellington would be of the party that day. "The Duke of Wellington!" answered the Queen with surprise. "Yes," replied his Majesty, "I have changed my ministers."

A Sheffield manufacturer has just produced a very useful appendage to a lady's work-box. It is a net-threader—so simple in its design, and so delicately made, that an elderly lady, with its assistance, may thread the smallest needle without glasses.

One day lately, the attention of the persons residing opposite St Mary's Church, Oxford, was attracted by the extraordinary appearance of a lad, who, as he was crossing the road, suddenly burst out into flames. Several members of the university ran to his assistance, and succeeded in extinguishing him. The origin of the conflagration was found to be phosphorus in his breeches-pocket.

A traveller lately played off a singular trick upon the landlord of an inn near Rochdale. Having taken a dinner and a bottle of wine, he fell into conversation with the landlord, and said he could teach him how to win threepenny and the best ale out of the same cask. Confidence was of course desirous to learn so profitable art; and the parties descended into the cellar, tang with them a large gimlet. The traveller bored a hole in one end of an eighteen gallon cask of beer, and requested the landlord to place his finger upon the hole; he then bored a hole in the other end of the cask, and requested the landlord to place his finger upon that. He then thrust the cellar under pretence of fetching his apparatus, and decamped, leaving the landlord with his fingers fully employed in taking care of his beer, and minus dinner and a bottle of wine. When the landlord's patience was exhausted in waiting, he called for assistance, got the less in the cask stopped, and in future will be satisfied to draw one sort of beer out of one cask.

The new regulations by which British subjects may visit and reside in India, are as follow:—Any natural born subject of his Majesty may proceed by sea to any place possessing a custom-house establishment within the Company's territories, as they were on the 1st of January 1830, or in any part of the Carnatic ceded by the British in Cuttack, Singapore, and Malacca, to reside therein without any licence, provided all not natives shall on arrival, make known their names, destination, and object of pursuit in India, to the chief officer of the customs. None except the servants of the Company, and those legally authorised, can enter these territories by land, or proceed to any place not named, without the licence of the Board of Commissioners, the Court of Directors, the Governor-General, or the Governor of one of the presidencies. The Governor-General is empowered, with the consent of the directors, to declare any place within the territories open to all his Majesty's natural-born subjects, to proceed to, reside in, or pass through. The Governor-General is directed to make such laws as may be deemed necessary to punish illicit entrance, &c., and to guard against any mischiefs from the removal of restrictions on European intercourse, by making such laws and regulations as will protect the persons, religion, and opinions of the natives from insult. Any natural-born subject may, for any term of years, if authorised to reside in the territories, possess lands in any part of the territory he is authorised to reside in. No native natural-born subject of his Majesty, residing within the territories, shall, by reason of his religion, place of birth, descent, colour, or any of these, be disabled from holding any place of office or employ under the said Company.

SCOTLAND.

VOLUNTARY CHURCH MEETING.

On the 17th December, the annual meeting of the Edinburgh Voluntary Church Society was held in Broughton Place chapel; the chair being occupied first by Mr Douglas of Cavers, and then by the Rev. Dr Brown. The large crowd assembled conducted themselves with remarkable propriety. Mr Douglas, in opening his proceedings, remarked, "that he would desire no better defence of the Voluntary principle than was to be found in the writings of those who defended the establishment, particularly those of Bishop Warburton and Paley. The church and state, as Bishop Warburton had observed, were different in their nature and in their end. The state consisted merely in power persons and property—religion had for its object the salvation of souls. The means of the state were diverse; the only means religion could use were the means of truth. The text of the state in all instances was expediency; religion had nothing to do with expediency, except that expediency which is founded on the word of God, and consequently infallible truth. An establishment, he contended, could only assist the strong, and must in its very nature oppress the weak—and that, indeed, it was called not only to oppress the weak, but to weaken the strong. Where, he asked, was Popery thriving more than in any other part?—why, but where it was necessary—and where was it weakest but in the totality of establishments on the Continent. After the report of the committee had been read, Dr Wardlaw, in moving its approval, said that he found the voluntary principle in his Bible, and his desertion of the thought, must be synonymous with his relinquishment of that volume of eternal truth. He added to the attempts which had been made to throw upon the Voluntary Church Associations, by saying that they were in connection with infidels. He surely not over-generous in those whose principles had given rise to the unseemly and unholy alliance, which, from its twofold aspect, necessarily enfeebled politicians and Christians (he begged pardon for distinguishing them) in pursuing one object on their respective grounds, to taunt them bitterly, and add them up to vulgar execration as the associates of infidels, when it was their own anti-scriptural system that had thrown them into the dilemma of either exposing themselves to the false charge of being an union, or of relinquishing their own conscientious convictions on the religious view of the connection, and failing in their incumbent duty to the church of God. (Cheers.) But there were, he added, infidel politicians on both sides. There were infidel politicians who pled for the continuance of the connection, as well as infidel politicians who pleaded for its dissolution. The cause of establishments was defended by infidel abettors as well as infidel opponents. Then, were the dissenters to be branded and rebuked on account of a coalition which existed on one side as well as on the other? Lord Stanley. The two parties, he affirmed, were therefore on a very same ground. There was a perfect parallelism. "We," said the Rev. Doctor, "aim at the separation of church and state on religious principles; and cannot help it if irreligious infidel men pursue the same end on political grounds. (Cheers.) They do not defend themselves on religious principles for the support of the chartered church; but they cannot hinder irreligious politicians from prosecuting the same end on secular and Tory principles, without any consideration whatever about religion. And if a general peace were going to Parliament in behalf of the unbroken connection of church and state, who would interpose to examine the creed or the no-creed of those who offered themselves to sign it?" (Great applause.) Referring to the fears of the church party for the support of the church, if endowments were taken away, the Doctor said, "I beg leave to retain my opinion of the church of Scotland, in spite of the warmest admirers can say against her. She is maligned by her own supporters; she is wounded in the house of her friends. I will not believe it till I see it, that one truly evangelical and able pastor will either be thrown destitute of bread, or destitute of employment and usefulness, were the dissolution to pass to-morrow. I believe there will be a rousing up of the dormant energies of religious zeal, and an opening of the coffers of Christianity, and an union and animation of the efforts of Christian activity, and a mutual excitement of each other to love and to good works, such as we have before had the blessedness to witness. (Great applause.) Dissenters, those I mean who are now dissenting, but who should then happily lose their distinctive designation, would catch the spirit of it, and would give their gifts and their doings—would, with heart and one soul, set themselves in earnest and meritorious work of supporting all that was worthy of support, all that was pure, evangelical, and true, and adding to it all that was necessary for the complete evangelisation of every village and every valley of our happy country. (Loud cheers.) I conceive there is nothing more unfair than to deny the capabilities of the Voluntary principle, in order to the supply of religious instruction to the people, by what dissenters now actually do, and by what they could do alone were the establishment withdrawn, and all left waste that is now under its cultivation, because we cannot fancy that our brethren of the establishment mean to say, that if this were to pass, they would leave us to provide for the cultivation of the whole as we best could, and would not themselves put their hand to the work. We think so ill of them as this—we cannot think of pure spite they would leave the field to us, for no other end than to make them feel inferiority. (Laughter and cheers.) We think we could rather be brought into co-operation with them in zeal an esprit du corps that would invite the more abundant and ardent effort. Dissenters do not pretend that they are, single-handed, to do the whole of what would require to be done; but combining their own wealth and their own efforts with the wealth and the efforts of the multitudes of genuine Christians to be found within the precincts of the establishment, they have no fear, that, giving and working under the blessing of their Common Master, we should see such days as would remind us of those primitive times, when 'the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul,' when 'the word of the Lord had free course, and was glorified,' and when 'the Lord added to the church daily of those that were saved.' (Great applause.) With reference to the authority of the King in the church, the Rev. Doctor said, "I know, Sir, it is the command of God that we honour the King, and I will yield to no man in loyal and respectful regard. But it is also his command, that while we 'render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's,' we must not honour kings by giving them a place which does not belong to them. As kings, they have no place in the church of God. And unless there be grace along with greatness—unless they who wear the diadem of earthly rule, be by the power of the regenerating spirit, 'kings and priests unto God,' they can have no legitimate status in that kingdom which is not of this world—no, not even that of the meanest subjects, far less that of authority, as heads of government and appeal." (Great cheers.) After some further speeches, the meeting broke up.

Nov. 28. The Kelso Border Association, for the promotion of the agricultural interest, held its anniversary meeting and dinner at Kelso. The Duke of Buccleuch took the chair, supported by the Earl of Home, Sir David Milne, General Elliot, William Ogilvie, Esq. of Chesham, H. F. Scott, Esq. younger of Harden, Sir J. Pringle, J. Spottiswoode, Esq. of Spottiswoode, and A. Pringle, Esq. of Whybank; Lord Douglas officiated as a croupier, supported by Sir H. P. H. Campbell, George Baillie, Esq. younger of Jarviswood. Nearly two hundred and fifty gentlemen sat down to dinner.

Dec. 5. About eleven o'clock this night, a carter, named John Strachan, walked over the north-west corner of Earl Grey's Dock, Dundee. The watchmen hearing the splash, ran to his assistance, and finding the bonnet first, said to each other, that they feared the man was gone. "I'm no gane yet," cried a voice from the water; and seeing them in a bustle to get him saved, he very coolly said, "Tak time, tak time, I'm a fine swimmer."

—17. The installation of Lord Stanley, as Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, took place. His lordship, besides the Dean of the Faculty (Sir Archibald Campbell) and the Principal and Professors, was accompanied by his Grace the Duke of Hamilton, Lord Hamilton, Sir James Graham, the Hon. Mr. Stanley, Mr. Campbell of Blythswood, Mr. Ewing, Mr. P. M. Stewart, &c. After the ceremonial of the installation had been gone through, Lord Stanley addressed the students in a long and eloquent speech. He professed the high gratification, but extreme diffidence, with which he had received the honour paid him. When he looked back on the long list of his illustrious predecessors—the learning, assiduity, and genius of a Campbell (cheers)—the eloquence of a Brougham (great cheering)—the critical acumen of a Jeffrey—the philosophical research of a Mackintosh—and, in the more early history of the University, by the mighty, the all-grasping mind of a Smith and a Burke (cheers)—he felt how immeasurably short he must fall of this splendid series of great names. When he looked also to the station which the University has attained in science and literature throughout Europe, and to the last four centuries, during which so many eminent professors have adorned its halls—when he found the chairs filled by such men as Smith, and Reid, and Jardine—when the divinity chair was occupied by a Gilbert Burnet, the medical chair by a Black, the mathematical chair by a Simpson, and also, among her other sons, a Hunter, a Bailey, and a Watt, he felt the distinction to be one of such eminence, that he could not lay claim to it. He felt that it was bestowed because they concurred in the great political principles to which he adhered. (Great cheering.) In him they would ever find one ready to assist in removing all blemishes and deformities from the best and holiest institutions of the country, with the most uncompromising zeal—while at the same time he would oppose, with all his might and energy, those whose measures, whose objects, and whose intentions, are not to reform, but to destroy. (Vehement and long-continued cheering.) It was on these grounds that he felt the highest gratification to see, more especially when the period of life of those around him was taken into consideration, and when the error of a hasty judgment might be expected, that temper of moderation—and while they pressed forward to remedy existing abuses, extending a fostering care and rallying around the institutions of the country, which, in a moment of peril, might be destroyed, under the pretext of reform. (Loud cheering.) His lordship then went on to impress upon the younger students the advantages of classical study. He next spoke of the necessity of Scriptural study, remarking, that amid the disappointments they would be sure to meet with, by the thwarting of the ignorant, or the selfish; the impatience and embarrassments arising from misrepresentation and misconception of every word and every action, it will require a more soothing principle—a more exalted object than mere human ambition or human honour. (Loud cheering.) They would then have to look up to one with whom there was no misconception—no change. (Applause.) It ought to be the first duty of government to extend religious knowledge, and to see that the people, by means of establishments, had the power of obtaining instruction and religious comfort. (Cheering.) But while he said this, he was not blind to the defects which existed, and which ought to be removed, as the only means of disarming enemies, conciliating opponents, and increasing friends. But it was not our sacred institutions alone I wish to see reformed: it is the whole range of civic institutions which I desire to see amended, but not altered for the purpose of destruction. On these principles it was that I acted with the government of Earl Grey, in favour of a reform which gave, to the loyalty, the intelligence, and the wealth of Scotland, a power and an influence which they did not before possess. (Cheers.) These powers and privileges were entrusted to the people themselves, because it was known they loved the institutions of their country, and would prove their best defenders. Would to God that that great man, whose name I can never mention but with the profoundest respect and reverence, had been enabled to remain in office, to guide the helm of government by his steady and skillful hand, unmoved by the praise of his friends or the imputations of his opponents; that man was the true patriot, the strenuous defender of the privileges of the crown, the rights of the people, and the aristocracy. But no man can check the spirit of improvement, of inquiry, and investigation, that must now go on, and his would be a glorious destiny who knows how to direct and turn into the proper channel the energies of the people, and to conduct with propriety the government of this great nation. But if he should imagine himself capable of stemming and abruptly resisting its force onwards, he would be swept along with the torrent.—Lord Stanley and his friends, with a number of gentlemen from the town and the country, afterwards dined with the Principal and Professors in the Forehall of the College, and on Thursday the 18th, his lordship, with a select party, dined with Sir D. Sandford. Lord Stanley had previously refused the honour of a public dinner upon the occasion of his installation, in consequence of the present agitated state of the political world.—At a meeting of the Glasgow Town Council on the previous Monday, December 15, a motion to confer the Freedom of the city on Lord Stanley was rejected by a majority of 16 to 6. The motion was opposed by Messrs Johnston and Douglas, on account of Lord Stanley's principles regarding the Irish church; and by Mr M'Lellan, because Lord Stanley had supported negro emancipation and the reform bill.

—19. Forty-five packages, containing upwards of 2000lbs. of tea from Glasgow, were shipped at Leith, per the Royal William, steam-ship, for London. This is the first shipment of teas to the metropolis from Leith, or perhaps from Scotland.

We learn with very great pleasure, says the Scotsman—and every friend of genius, modesty, and worth, must respond to the sentiment—that Mr Tennant has been appointed Professor of Oriental Languages at St Andrew's, in room of the late Dr Scott. The office is worth about £200 per annum, and it is said there were nearly a hundred candidates for it. If the appointment proceeded from the Whigs, we believe the credit of it belongs chiefly to Lord Brougham, whose warm sympathy and genius, in all its forms, is well known. Those who have heard of Mr Tennant merely as the author of Anster Fair, only know a fraction of his merits. He has been studying the Eastern languages for twenty years from pure love of the pursuit, and his talent being equal to his industry, he is beyond comparison the first Orientalist in Scotland. To Hebrew, Syriac, and Chaldean, the stock of ordinary professors, he adds a knowledge of Arabic, Ethiopic, Persian, Hindostanee, Sanscrit, and Coptic. We say nothing of such common acquisitions as the Greek, Latin, French, and Italian; but it is important to mention, that Mr Tennant has mastered the German, and studied to a less or greater extent the Mosco-Gothic, Anglo-Saxon, and Icelandic, dialects by no means usual by their aprilis Oriental scholar. The clergy, guided as usual by their aprilis du corps, insisted that the situation should be given to one of their order, as if no one but a clergyman could teach the elements of the Hebrew language, and though there were two precedents of laymen holding the office! Mr Tennant has passed his life as a recluse and enthusiastic scholar. He had no influence political or personal, and owes the appointment entirely to his merit. The government which gave him the situation in preference to so many candidates, some of whom must have had considerable interest, has done itself great honour.

It is a singular fact, as illustrative of the progress of the cotton manufacture in Scotland, that the person who wrought the first cotton harness in this quarter of the country is still alive and in good health. His name is William Buchanan; he resides at Gockstone, near Paisley; and although now upwards of eighty years of age, he was enabled, the other day, to pay a visit, on foot, to his ingenious relative, Mr Alexander Buchanan, manufacturer, Glasgow.

The committee appointed by the public meeting in Glasgow in August 1834, for the purpose of deciding on the best mode of laying out the sums subscribed as a testimonial of public gratitude to Dr Cleland, late superintendent of public works in that city, have decided to expend the amount subscribed (upwards of £1,400) on a productive building, to be called the "Cleland Testimonial."

MISCELLANEOUS.

A FOX-HUNTER A JUMBLE OF PARADOXES.

He sets forth clean, though he comes out of a kennel, and returns home dirty. He cares not for cards, yet he strives to be always with the pack. He loves fencing, but without carte or tierce; and delights in a steeple chase, though he does not follow the church. He is any thing but litigious, yet he is fond of a certain suit, and retains Scarlet. He keeps a running account with Horse, Dog, Fox, and Co., but objects to a check. As to cards, in choosing a pack he prefers Hunt's. In theatricals, he favours Miss Somerville, because her namesake wrote the Chase, though he never read it. He is no great dancer, though he is fond of casting off twenty couple; and no great painter, though he draws covers, and seeks for a brush. He is no musician, and yet he is fond of five bars. He despises doctors, yet follows a course of bark. He professes to love his country, but is perpetually crossing it. He is fond of strong ale and beer, but dislikes any purl. He is good tempered, yet so far a Tartar as to prefer a saddle of a horse to a saddle of mutton. He is somewhat tough and bearish himself, but insists on good breeding in horses and dogs. He professes the Christian Catechism, and countenances heathen dogmas, by naming his hounds after Jupiter, Juno, Mars, and Diana. He cares not for violets, but he doats on a good scent. He says his wife is a shrew, but he objects to destroying vermin. In politics, he inclines to Pitt, and runs after Fox. He protects poultry, and preserves foxes. He follows but one business, and yet has many pursuits. He pretends to be knowing, but a dog leads him by the nose. He is as honest a man as needs be, yet his neck is oftener in danger than a thief's. He swears he can clear any thing, but is beaten by a fox. He esteems himself prosperous, and is always going to the dogs. He delights in the Hunter's Stakes, but takes care not to stake his hunter. He praises discretion, but would rather let the cat out of the bag than a fox. To conclude, he runs as long as he can, and then goes to earth, and his heir is in at the death. But his heir does not stand in his shoes, for he never wore any thing but boots.—Old newspaper.

PREVALENCE OF THE NAME ALEXANDER IN SCOTLAND.

It appears almost certain that the prevalence of the name Alexander in Scotland is to be traced remotely to a Pope; namely, to Alexander II., who sat on the pontifical throne from the year 1061 to 1073. This was the time when the church of Rome first obtained a footing in Scotland, which it mainly did through the influence of Queen Margaret (an Anglo-Saxon princess) with her husband, Malcolm III. The royal pair are very allowably conjectured by Lord Hailes to have called their fifth son Alexander, after the Pope just mentioned, though there is reason to conclude that the child was not born till two or three years after his holiness's death. This prince in time succeeded to the

LIVERPOOL PROVIDENT VISITING SOCIETY.

Among the least agreeable features of the great recent change of manners, is the sequestration of the rich from the poor. While the number of the comfortable and refined has been vastly increased, and great improvement has taken place in the moral and intellectual character of those classes, it remains to be regretted that these very circumstances have produced a condition, manifesting itself in a clustering together of the rich in particular districts of large cities, a general neglect and ignorance of the humbler members of the community. To compensate in some measure for this result of what must still be styled improvement, the unsleeping humanity of modern times has suggested various institutions, of greater efficacy, for the systematic succour of the distressed, or sending throughout the habitations of the lower classes in general, that moral light which formerly shone, by example and precept, from the members of the middle and superior ranks to his poor neighbour.

Notwithstanding all exertions of this kind, there exist, in most of our cities, vast numbers, who, though in most cases earning something by their industry, endure much misery, either through the occasional failure of such resources, or the imprudent manner in which they are accustomed to lay out their means. Means are still wanted for producing a general elevation of the moral sense of the poor, so as to protect them from improvident marriages, from improvident expenditure, and from the consequent degradation of occasional or habitual pauperism; evils which, by depressing their physical condition, react upon the moral; for, as a writer in the Encyclopædia Britannica has remarked, "nature herself forbids that we should make a wise and virtuous people out of a starving one."

All the plans which have been devised within our knowledge for improving the condition of the poor in our cities, it appears to us that one of the best is suggested by the society whose designation we have placed at the head of the present paper. This society was put into operation about five years ago, and it has far been attended with very great success. It is founded on the invaluable principle, that the poor are capable of being much benefited by personal intercourse with the wealthier and better educated classes. The leading object was to induce the working classes, when in tolerable circumstances, to make a weekly deposit in the hands of a friendly gentleman, to be laid up at interest, and subject to an advance from the bounty of the society; this to form a fund upon which the depositor might have recourse in the day of trouble. A secondary object was to afford relief to distressed persons, whether they had deposits or not, and thus to suppress mendicancy. The society was composed of respectable persons, of whom pays at least half a guinea annually towards the funds. A central office was appointed for the daily sitting of a board, who were qualified to afford relief, and to transact the general business of the society. The town being divided into twenty-two divisions, and seven members appointed to each, each division took charge of a subdivision, as near as possible to the place of his own residence, and containing about twenty-five families, of the kind which it was thought necessary to visit. The first business of the visitors was to ascertain, by civil inquiry, if the poor were disposed to allow a weekly visit for the purpose explained in a schedule of the society's obligations, where consent was obtained, to take down the names and circumstances of the family. The visitors then commenced a practice of calling at a particular hour every week, generally in the forenoon of Monday, to converse respecting the circumstances and prospects of the family, and, in all possible cases, to obtain a deposit from the earnings of the past week. It may easily be conceived that many a little sum was thus laid aside, which must have otherwise gone to the gin-shop, or at least been spent upon objects less needful than those which it obtained in the future hour of distress. The personal demand of the deposit, and the regularity with which it was made, were soon found to have a powerful influence with the individuals visited; and it was also quickly observed, that they had no sooner begun to save, than an elevation took place in their self-respect, and, consequently, in their moral condition. In the year 1833-4, the number of depositors was 5481, and the sum deposited £10,396, being an increase of two-fifths upon the preceding year. In the same space of time, 2978 families were relieved by the expenditure of £794, while in the previous year 5987 required relief, and caused an expenditure of £1959; a diminution partly attributable to the improved health of the town, and partly to the operation of the society.

The business of visiting is much easier than might be supposed, seldom occupying more than two hours every Monday morning. A clergyman, who has abundance of other duties, collects £7 from 150 scattered depositors in two hours and a half; and several ladies, who serve in this department of the society, profess to find the labour not only easy, but extremely pleasant. In Liverpool there are in all 438 visitors.

One of the most valuable practical results of the association is the doing away with all excuse for begging. There cannot now occur any case of real distress which the society does not instantly ascertain through the means of its universal ramifications, and as instantly relieve, or recommend to some other source of relief. The greatest care is taken to prevent applications being made through a desire of escaping work. When able-bodied persons apply, they receive a loaf of bread, and a ticket specifying a certain amount of labour to be performed under the eye of the parish superintendent, and which, when countersigned by him, as certifying that the work is performed, obtains the appropriate remuneration at the office of the society. The inhabitants of the town, aware of these facts, can without compunction withhold alms from beggars, and none now encourage mendicancy except through a very culpable weakness.

We have thought it proper to give this account of the Liverpool District Provident Visiting Society, with the view of suggesting the following of so good an example in other large towns. For those who may desire to obtain further information on the subject, we may mention that two small pamphlets detailing the scheme, and its operations up to May 1834, are published by E. Shaw, Liverpool. From these we shall extract the Directions for Visitors :—

"Your first duty will be to visit such families in your division as you may think likely to require your attention, and shortly to explain to them the following objects of the Society :

1st, To assist the industrious in establishing habits of frugality and carefulness.

2d, To advise with them under circumstances of difficulty or misfortune, and to befriend them in times of sickness, by securing to them the benefit of charitable institutions in the town, and by affording them temporary relief in cases of extreme necessity.

3d, To receive any small deposits which they may be enabled to make when in employment, for the provision of winter stores, clothing, or fuel; the said deposits to be returned for those purposes, with an addition of 6d. on every 10s.

4th, To assist them in providing education for their children.

Having given them this information, you will then request to know whether they are willing to receive your visits in furtherance of these objects. If they agree to this, you will proceed to fill up the form No. 2, which gives a detailed account of the state of the family. You will then inform them that you will visit them weekly, and that you hope they will communicate to you any circumstances under which you may be able to assist them.

The information which you will thus obtain, will form the basis of your further operations, and you will endeavour gradually, as you become better known to them, to acquaint yourself with their characters, to gain an insight into their habits, to encourage industry, to discountenance carelessness and vice, to improve their moral and religious condition to the utmost of your power, and to show them that your great desire is to promote their comfort and happiness: your further intercourse with them must be guided by your own discretion, in strict conformity with the principles laid down in the general rules of the society, and you must remember that it will be as much your province to detect imposition as to relieve distress.

You will keep an account of the deposits, and make monthly returns to the district committee, on the second Tuesday in every month.

You will at the same time pay over the deposits which you have received during the month to the secretary of the district committee, and communicate with him upon any subjects on which you may require the directions or assistance of the district committee. You will give no relief out of the funds of the society, but through the office."

To these may be added two paragraphs from the account of the society :—

"In order to impress upon the labouring poor the benefits of early economy, it might be well for the visitors to inform them that, from Mr Becher's tables, it is clear that 'a weekly payment of 6d., or one penny saved every working day, would assure to the labourer, from a benefit society, a weekly allowance in sickness, of 10s. bed-dying, and 5s. walking pay: an annuity of 5s. weekly, after 65, and a payment of £10 to his relations after his death.'

In order also to show what a quantity of money is wasted, and God knows worse than wasted, principally by the labouring classes, in spirits, it should be known that, from Parliamentary returns, it appears that the English and Welch alone consumed in 1830, 7,732,101 gallons of home spirits, 1,267,397 gallons of foreign, and 3,503,141 galls. of colonial spirits, in all, 12,502,639 gallons of spirits; which would probably cost to the consumer nearly 20s. a gallon; so that the people of England and Wales, amounting to 13,889,675 souls, probably spend nearly twelve millions of money a-year in spirits."

Foreign History.

UNITED STATES.

THE termination of the elections exhibited the addition of a considerable majority to the supporters of President Jackson.

Congress was opened on the 1st December, when the President delivered his usual message. This document was on various accounts looked for with no little anxiety by the Americans; but its interest is not confined to them alone. The President first of all proceeds with his threatened proposals for the destruction of the national bank. He recapitulates various weighty charges against that establishment; one of the most serious of which was its conduct in reference to the indemnity-money claimed from the French government for depredations committed by Frenchmen in their commerce between 1803 and 1817, but principally during the operation of the Berlin and Milan decrees. The secretary of the treasury had drawn a bill on the French government for the first instalment of the indemnity-money; but as the Chambers refused to fulfil the treaty by the terms of which the payment was due, the bill was protested and returned. The bank was the agent of the government in this transaction; and, notwithstanding it held a considerable amount of the public money in deposit, claimed damages and interest on the bill, which the authorities at Washington refused to pay. The bank upon this seized upon dividends, in its own hands, of the public stock, to the amount of 170,041 dollars, as amount of damages, interest, and costs; which the President contends to be a perfectly unconstitutional proceeding. He concludes by recommending that a law be passed, authorising the sale of the public stock; that the provision of the charter requiring the receipt of notes of the bank in payment of public dues, shall, in accordance with the power reserved to Congress in the 14th section of the charter, be suspended until the bank pays to the treasury the dividend withheld; and that all laws connecting the government or its officers with the bank, directly or indirectly, be repealed; and that the institution be left hereafter to its own resources and means. He wishes to make the state banks available for the conduct of the public business, and entertains no doubt that those institutions will be able to transact it as promptly and cheaply as the United States Bank.

The President next proceeds to animadvert upon the conduct of France in refusing to pay the indemnity-money already mentioned. By a treaty signed at Paris, in 1831, it was stipulated that "the French government, in order to liberate itself from the reclamations preferred against it by the citizens of the United States, for unlawful seizures, captures, sequestrations, confiscations, or destruction of their vessels, cargoes, or other property, engages to pay a sum of 25,000,000 francs to the United States, who shall distribute it among those entitled, in the manner and according to the rules it shall determine; and it was also stipulated on the part of the French government, that this 25,000,000 francs should "be paid at Paris in six annual instalments of 4,166,666 francs and 66 centimes each, into the hands of such person or persons as shall be authorised by the government of the United States to receive it." It was moreover agreed that French wines should be admitted at a reduced duty; that the French duty on all kinds of American cottons should be equalised; and that certain claims which referred to the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded, should be abandoned by France. The Americans performed their part of the treaty; but, as is well known, the French government was unable to pay the first instalment of the indemnity-money, because the Chamber of Deputies refused to vote it. General Jackson, therefore, recommends, "that a law be passed, authorising reprisals upon French property, in case provision shall not be made for the payment of the debt at the approaching session of the French Chambers." He then argues, somewhat inconsistently, that it is not intended by such a law to threaten France. "Her pride and power are too well known to expect any thing from her fears, and preclude the necessity of a declaration that nothing partaking of the character of intimidation is intended by us. She ought to look upon it as the evidence only of an inflexible determination on the part of the United States to insist on their rights. That government, by doing only what it has itself acknowledged to be just, will be able to spare the United States the necessity of taking redress into their own hands, and save the property of French citizens from that seizure and sequestration which American citizens so long endured without retaliation or redress. If she should continue to refuse that act of acknowledged justice, and in violation of the law of nations make reprisals on our part the occasion of hostilities against the United States, she would but add violence to injustice, and could not fail to expose herself to the just censure of civilised nations, and the retributive justice of heaven."

On the question of appropriating public money to internal improvements, the President is quite decided. He considers such an appropriation unconstitutional, and declares that he never will sanction any law that Congress may pass, which has for its object the expenditure of the resources of all for the benefit of any one state.

The other subjects of the message are comparatively unimportant. The North-Western or Canadian boundary is not determined; but with Great Britain, as with every other power excepting France, the most friendly relations are maintained. The President recommends the removal of the Indians to the Western regions. He recommends the election of President and Vice-President directly by the people, not as now through their representatives; intimating also, that the President should not be allowed to retain office for more than one term of four or six years. The finances of the country are stated to be in a thriving state, and the public debt was to be extinguished on the 1st of last month.

FRANCE.

THE proceedings of the French Chambers since our last have possessed nothing of general interest, with one exception. This exception is the passing of a law by the Deputies, for erecting a special court of justice, or star-chamber for the peers, in which to try, not by their equals, or by juries, but by peers named for life by Louis Philip, those republicans who in Paris, Lyons, and other places, nearly a year since, rose against the government. This motion was only carried, in a house of nearly 400 out of 459 members, by a majority of 28, of whom six were ministers. It is thought probable, from the smallness of the majority, that the measure will not be carried to the House of Peers. Twenty-nine of the political offenders have lately been released from the prison of Mont St Michael.

In consequence of the menacing terms of the American President's message, the French ministry have recalled their ambassador, M. Serrurier, from Washington, and offered Mr Livingston, the American ambassador at Paris, his passports. What the issue of this collision betwixt the French and American governments may be, is quite uncertain; but it is thought the former will ultimately succumb, and pay the money. In fact, there does not appear to be any well-grounded plea whatever for withholding it. The differences amongst the ministers do not appear to be yet settled; and it is stated that the new president, Mortier, is much disliked by the majority. There seems to be a general desire for recalling Soult to the ministry, thus opposing in political tactics to the Duke of Wellington, his former formidable rival tactician in warfare. Talleyrand still continues seriously ill, and has published, in a letter to the Moniteur, his final retirement from public life.

The budget for the year exhibits a considerable deficiency in the finances; the expenditure being estimated at L.40,076,197, and the receipts at L.39,799,436. The army is to consist of 309,000 men; the cost of maintaining which is estimated at L.9,200,000.

The subscription entered into to pay the fine imposed on the National (10,000 francs) considerably exceeded 12,000 francs in a few days.

A Paris paper mentions the arrival of Dr Lardner in the capital, by invitation of the government, on business relative to a railroad betwixt Paris and Calais, by which it is calculated a traveller may breakfast at the former, and dine in London, on the same day.

SPAIN.

THE accounts from the seat of war continue almost as obscure as ever; upon the whole, however, they are becoming more flattering to the queen's cause. By intelligence from Bayonne to the 17th December, an action was fought on the 12th, between the queen's troops commanded by General Lorenzo, and the Carlists commanded by Eraso, which ended in the total defeat and routing of the latter. This action took place at Carascal. On the following day an action was fought by another body of the queen's troops, commanded by Generals Lopez and Oraa, and the Carlist forces headed by Zumalacarre, which likewise terminated in the total defeat of the rebel forces. The reports of these two actions have been transmitted from different quarters, and, if true, are important in this particular season. Later accounts, however, represent Zumalacarre as being as active and sanguine as ever. On January 4, he published a report, in which he claims a victory, gained on the 3d, over the queen's forces, amounting to 6000, and commanded by General Carratala. On the other hand, letters from Bayonne announce advantages gained by Mina on the 6th, though it is believed that the general result is not much in favour of either side. One melancholy fact seems to be well authenticated, namely, that on each side all prisoners are put to death without mercy.

A considerable number of the Deputies at Madrid have united to procure a recognition of the independence of the South American states; and Martinez de la Rosa has announced "that negotiations have already been commenced with a view to that object." The civil list has been voted without any material reduction. Some apprehensions appear to be entertained as to the probability of the passing of that part of the proposed law for the sale and appropriation of one-seventh part of the church property, the proceeds of which are to be applied to other than religious purposes. It is said that in the Cortes, notwithstanding the general liberal character of the members of the lower house, there is an indisposition to proceed with measures of this sort, and that in the Proceres this feeling is entertained with a much greater degree of strength.

BELGIUM.

THE war-budget was adopted by the Deputies on the 27th December. The amount voted is L.1,594,000, by which 65,000 infantry, 6000 horse, and an artillery force of 136 field-pieces, are to be maintained. The whole army is said to be in first-rate order. Much jealousy seems to prevail respecting the assiduity with which the Dutch king is augmenting and disciplining his troops, suspicions being entertained of a meditated attempt by the latter to repossess himself of the Duchy of Luxembourg; but King Leopold, in reply to some congratulatory addresses at the advent of the new year, explicitly declares his confidence in a continuance of the present peaceful relations with all temporary powers.

Duelling is said to prevail to such a disgraceful extent in Belgium, especially among the officers of the army, that fatal encounters in this way are regarded with the utmost indifference by all classes; not the slightest notice being taken of them even by the government!

PORTUGAL.

THE only news from Portugal worth mentioning is an account of the prorogation of the Cortes on the 18th December, to January 2; which ceremony was performed by the young queen in person, "with great propriety," as is said. There is a rumour of a large body of Portuguese troops being about to proceed to the assistance of Mina.

WEST INDIES.

No improvement has yet taken place in the internal condition of most of our West Indian colonies. The apprentices are still resolute in their determination not to work, and the efforts of the new magistracy and police are found totally ineffectual either to compel them to their duty, or prevent continual acts of violence. In Jamaica, matters have been rendered much worse than elsewhere, by a dissension betwixt the government and the House of Assembly; the governor complaining that the planters have not co-operated heartily in carrying the new act into effect, and the latter retorting by imputing to the governor the consequences of all the disorders that may take place in the island. We stated in our last, that, in consequence of several memorials having been presented to the Colonial Assembly, representing in strong terms the condition to which the planters have been reduced by the operation of the new law, and stating the possibility of carrying on the culture of sugar, coffee, or rum, under the new system, a committee had been appointed to inquire into the state of the colony, and the result of the new law as far as it had proceeded. The committee had examined some of the most respectable managers in the island, and who had under their management between 40,000 and 50,000 negroes. The committee had presented their report to the House of Assembly. It concludes:—

"Your committee recommend as the only means of saving the colony from destruction, and giving some reasonable chance of success to the great experiment of emancipation:

"First, That a more numerous and competent magistracy, possessing local experience and knowledge, be immediately appointed to preserve order, repress crime and enforce industry.

"Secondly, That such amendments be made in the law as shall remove all ambiguity in it, by defining minutely the relative duties and rights of apprentices and masters.

"Thirdly, That regulations be provided by law to secure upon fair and equitable terms, between master and apprentices, such reasonable time of labour for the working of the sugar factories, as shall answer the safe gathering in of that great staple upon which the prosper of the colony, and the welfare of all classes, are in a great measure dependent.

"This regulation your committee deem to be of paramount necessity, in order to guide an ignorant, idle and thoughtless people, hitherto accustomed to labour by coercion, into the way for working for their own benefit, and thus prevent the danger of their sinking into a state of indolence from which it might be impossible hereafter to raise them."

The evidence upon which the report was founded was voluminous, and among other things it states, that it would be impossible to carry on the manufacture of sugar unless the negroes were compelled to work longer than provided by the abolition act, requiring eighteen hours' work for five days in the week to clear the crops of sugar. It establishes that the managers in the colony had manifested every desire to carry the new plan into operation. It is given on the evidence of one witness that the negroes had been desired by the Baptist missionaries to work over-time—for if they did so, they would never be free. It was the opinion of all the witnesses that the crop of sugar could not be manufactured in the time allowed, by the new plan; and if the laws were not changed, many of the plantations would be left for cultivation, and all injured. The negroes held some cases refused wages at the rate of 3s. 4d. per day, and to work on their own time!

The bill passed by the council for empowering magistrates to act as special commissioners in certain cases, to uphold order, had occasioned great disappointment throughout the colony. A conference had been demanded in the House of Assembly upon the following reasons:—

"That the present alarming state of the island requires that an immediate remedy should be applied to preserve the public safety.

"That by the abolition bill, all power of keeping the labouring classes of the country in due subordination having been withdrawn from their masters, and local magistracy, the authority substituted in lieu of it has been found, upon trial, to be totally inadequate.

"That since the 1st of August last, the apprentices have been gradually relaxing in their labour; and that some immediate remedy is adopted, the cultivation of not be totally abandoned, and the lives of his subjects placed in imminent danger."

The improvement of the abolition act, a bill was introduced into the Assembly, and read a second time. It appears that the Marquis of Sligo had expressed himself dissatisfied equally with the evidence and the proceedings of the Assembly; and in this state of mind it is perhaps lucky for all parties that his office has been cut short by the recent change of ministry. It has not yet transpired who is to be his successor. By a recent English paper, we observe upwards of a hundred labourers, with their families have been sent out to Jamaica in the employment of Mr. Barret, speaker of the House of Assembly. It is found that these men are able to stand labour, under the burning sun (which has already been found impossible in previous experiments), and that an effectual mode will have been discovered for bringing the negroes to a sense of their duty.

A complete insurrection of the Sisters of Charity, an order of religious who in France devote themselves to nursing the sick, took place at the great hospital of the Hotel Dieu, at Lyons, on the 31st Dec. The following details are given by the Censeur de Lyons of the 1st of January:—"It is now some time since a sister of the Hotel Dieu, found guilty of having disobeyed the orders of the directors of this establishment, was ordered to quit the house. The other sisters declared that punishment was unjust, and that they would oppose execution by every means in their power, even armed resistance. They kept their word. Yesterday, in the evening, a commissary of police, named M. Barret, appeared at the Hotel Dieu to take the refractory sister into custody, as she had refused voluntarily to leave the house. He had scarcely stated the object of his mission when he was surrounded by the sisterhood, and even assaulted by them. The warlike sisters did not stop here, but sounded the tocsin of the Hotel Dieu and called loudly for assistance. For two hours order was at its height, and the unhappy patients well have imagined that the last day was come. At length M. Barret was enabled to effect his escape, but having secured the criminal sister, and the field of battle remained in possession of the insurgents." The Censeur de Lyons contains long details concerning this insurrection. It states that although the tocsin of the sisters of charity was only sounded for a matter of two, in a very short space of time a crowd of five hundred to six hundred persons assembled on the quay of the Rhone and in the hospital square, in the midst of a fire had broken out in the building. "Happily," adds the Courier, "the doors were closed, and the fire did not spread; the voice of the porter, who assured that it was a false alarm. The disturbance which occasioned a crowd of people by night in such a scene of confusion would have occasioned, may be readily imagined."

While one part of the rebels made head against the commissary of police and his agents, and while others were dashing the tocsin, a sister named Troillona rushed into the courtyard, and occupied by the female fever patients, and cried out to all of you; your sisters are being taken; your sisters are being massacred! What must be the effect of these words on the minds of persons who were already shaken by pain and sickness! The consequence was fatal to many. Finally, the commissary was obliged to accomplish his object, and the sister sought for in her clutches, being concealed in a cupboard." The Censeur de Lyons, a legitimate journal, publishes an account of the affair, and concludes it thus:—"The sisters, proud of their success, barricaded themselves in the courtyard, lit a fire, and bivouacked till daybreak in the field of battle, ready to repel any new aggression." It is reported that two prisoners were made of the belligerent sisters, but it does not appear to be the case. It has been decided at the prefecture that the affair shall remain for the present in statu quo, until the return of the prefect.

On the 23d December, ten enormous masses of the high overhangs the village of Felsberg, in the Canton of the Grisons, fell with alarming force upon the valley, and strewn the meadows with fragments. No other injury was done, though from the many of the women and children fled almost from their beds to the bridge over the Rhine.

IRELAND.

Lord Haddington has been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. His lordship embarked at Liverpool on Monday, January 5, and arrived at London on next morning. On the same day he made his public entry into Dublin, when he appears to have been received with much respect by the inhabitants, and turned out in immense crowds on the occasion.

Blackburne has been appointed Attorney-General, and Mr. Pennefather, Solicitor-General. On January 2, a most barbarous and unprovoked murder was committed on an old and much respected man in the county of Wexford. As Mr. Lundy was walking on his own grounds at Rossbercon, near Ross, in the county of Wexford, he was murdered by a gang of miscreants, who have escaped. The Lords Justices, on receipt of the intelligence, immediately summoned a Privy Council, and they have offered a reward of five hundred pounds to any person who shall, within six months, give such information as shall lead to the conviction and conviction of all or any of the murderers. Mr. Foote was a barrister, and was upwards of sixty years of age, and was son or brother of an old Lundy Foote, whose snuff is so celebrated in the arts of the world. A desperate attempt was made to assassinate him about eighteen months ago, when he was wounded by several balls, and lost one of his eyes. He was a mild, inoffensive gentleman, and never took a leading part in politics; and the only cause which can be assigned for the savage deed is his having instituted legal proceedings about two years ago, for recovery of part of his rents! Nine men are in custody on suspicion, one of whom was found near the scene of murder with his hands covered with blood.

The coroner's inquest on the frightful transaction at Rathcormack has been brought to a close, and a verdict of "wilful murder" returned on the part of thirteen of the jury, which consisted of twenty-three. Two were for the mitigated finding of "manslaughter," and eight for "justifiable homicide." The result was received by the people with great calmness. The coroners took charge of the inquisitions, expressing their intention to act promptly upon them, notwithstanding the intimation by counsel for the accused, that it was their intention to take the sense of the Court of King's Bench on the verdict. The two magistrates who conducted the tithe exaction process, claimed to be admitted to bail, which was granted, apparently because the jury were not unanimous. They declared their determination to stand their trial, which is expected to come on at the next assizes. The testimony of the poor woman, Widow Ryan, whose son was shot, has excited universal sympathy. As a very exaggerated account of it, however, is going the round of the papers, we will abridge it from the report of the evidence. She said she had been about thirty-two years in possession of her farm, during all which time she had paid her tithes regularly; that the reason of her refusing to pay them now, was because she saw every one else doing so. Had they paid them, she would willingly have done the same. When the soldiers came, she was in the orchardfield, where she remained until about a dozen shots were fired, during which time she saw the peasantry fighting with the soldiers. As she was running away, she met her son Daniel (the other son, who was killed, was called Dick), who advised her to return to the house and pay Mr. Ryder (the clergyman) the tithes. She returned, and on getting into the yard, which was full of soldiers, and cars, and horses, the soldiers surrounded her, and said, "By G—d, they would have her body, and her daughter's body, as well as the rest of the bodies," and presented their guns at her. Witness then saw two men dead in the corner of the yard, but did not at that time see her son's body. She then clapped her hands, and screamed, and called for Mr. Ryder; she was crying for him to save her life; he was the only person to save her. He (Mr. Ryder) then rode into the yard, and asked her for his tithe; "give me my tithe, give me my tithe," said he; "when will you pay me?" witness replied, "to-day, to-morrow, or the next day;" he said, "pay me instantly; I won't leave the place till you do;" witness said, "I thought, Mr. Ryder, you would take my word for more than the tithe;" he then searched all his pockets, before and behind (she knew not for what), and went away, saying he could do nothing till he saw the captain (he meant Captain Collis); the amount of the tithe was £4, 16s., £2, 8s. to each, Captain Collis and Mr. Ryder. When Mr. Ryder was riding into the yard, he passed about eight feet from the two dead bodies, and her own son's body was in view, a rope's length away; at that time she did not see her son's body, but after Mr. Ryder left her she saw her son's body near her own door; the body was moved into her kitchen about two hours after Mr. Ryder left her; she had to spread him out and to close his eyes in the yard; Mr. Ryder nor Captain Collis never sent or asked for the tithes.

The latter statement, if it be correct, will throw a large responsibility on all concerned in this dreadful affair. At a meeting of the Anti-Tory Association in the Corn Exchange, Dublin, on Dec. 19, Mr. O'Connell referred to it as "a postscript to Sir Robert Peel's speech" at the Mansion-House, London, which he had previously been commenting on. He read a plain and simple narrative of the facts, which affected the audience most powerfully, and he himself, as stated by a correspondent of the Times, seemed not less moved; he then proceeded, in a slow, whispering voice, to describe the dreadful scenes of bloodshed, desolation, and misery, caused by the maintenance of the tithe-system; and while doing so (says the reporter), "his voice trembled with deep emotion, and often failed him altogether, while attempting to give utterance to some simple image characteristic of rustic feeling, whose force his popular auditory were so well prepared to appreciate. His countenance became convulsed as he proceeded; his whole frame was agitated; and it was evident that he commanded deep and sincere sympathy in the silent assembly that stood around, enchained by the force of a strong mind pouring forth its feelings in the natural imagery so influential on the hearts of his and their fellow-countrymen, and in conclusion, begging their pardon for having indulged in thinking aloud amongst them. I saw some of the reporters lay down their pens unconsciously, to listen to his affecting description of domestic sorrows, and beheld tears glisten in the eyes of aged men. Suddenly pausing in his portrait of the scenes of outrage and suffering he had delineated so touchingly, he exclaimed, in a voice of indignation, 'Shall these dreadful doings be repeated through the country? Must we have no respite from horrors like these? Sir Robert Peel says they shall continue for ever! For ever! Does there exist amongst the natives of this land a wretch so heartless, so lost to all sense of humanity and of shame, as to raise his voice in favour of the government who would abandon his country to the curse of tithes and of bloodshed to enforce the accursed impost for ever?' Loud cheers proclaimed the triumph of his appeal; and he now responded by fierce denunciations of 'the tithe-traitors.'" Mr. O'Connell has since made most powerful use of the sympathy excited for the unfortunate victims, in influencing the electors throughout Ireland against the supporters of the present administration, in some cases counselling such proceedings as have subjected him to the charge of directly advising assassination. On the other hand, a Dublin newspaper (the Ward), retorts upon Mr. O'Connell in the following terms, which we leave to our readers to interpret for themselves:—"How long, merciful God! are we to endure this man? And if thy thunder sleep, is there no other agency of thy justice? Is the blood which he daily and hourly causes to be shed, to cry in vain to heaven? One of his infamous scribes counsels the impalement of Protestants who shall dare to exercise their rights as citizens at a public meeting! yet he urges to wholesale assassination and murder with personal impunity: he walks the streets in safety, while his signals of blood go forth in every corner of the land, answered in the dying agonies of unoffending Protestants. The monster—the Polyphemus of Popish agitation—walks in the security with which a Christian morality invests him! But how long is this to be endured? When Brutus's dagger pierced Cæsar in the senate, Brutus became the god of Rome, for Rome had not the gospel. When Charlotte Corday struck down the monster Marat, she became the victim of the power which fell not with him: all France admired her heroism and deified her name, because France was unchristian, and acknowledged the polytheism of the passions. Brissot represented Marat 'as a man whose soul was kneaded up in blood and dirt.' Have we no parallel for this in our day and in this afflicted land? Do not the most malignant calumnies, the foulest scurrilities of language, and the most hellish incitements to continued and multiplied murders, form a rival moral compound of 'blood and dirt;' and can we be at a loss to whom we shall say, 'Thou art the man!' Yet, O'Connell, who has demoralised all of his countrymen that have yielded to his influence—this Irish Marat, could pass through the assembled thousands of Cavan, Down, Tyrone, Fermanagh, and a hair of his accursed and recreant head would not be touched; while the Protestant pastor and the Protestant landlord, all whose relations in life have been marked by Christian charity and benevolence, cannot move within the precincts of their own grounds, without the assassin of agitation lying in wait for their lives. Merciful heaven! how long is this to be endured? 'O Lord God, to whom vengeance belongeth—thou God, to whom vengeance belongeth, show thyself.'"

All this presents a dreadful picture of the excited state of public feeling in Ireland, and such as has scarcely been surpassed even in her darkest days of social disorganisation.

Another murder has ensued from the affray at Rathcormack. A party of the discomfited peasantry having accidentally met a soldier of the 43d regiment, on December 2, attacked him with desperate ferocity, knocked out his right eye, broke four of his ribs, and otherwise mangled him so dreadfully, that he is since dead.

It is now stated that Sir Robert Peel has sent positive instructions that the military in Ireland are not upon any account to interfere, directly, in the collection of tithes.

ENGLAND.

THE MINISTRY.

As the new ministry was only partially formed at the time of our last publication, we shall now give a list of the members composing the Cabinet, which we believe will be found correct:—Sir Robert Peel, First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer; Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Chancellor; Duke of Wellington, Foreign Secretary; Lord Aberdeen, Colonial Secretary; Mr. Goulburn, Home Secretary; Lord Rosslyn, President of the Council; Lord Wharfedale, Privy Seal; Lord de Grey, Admiralty; Lord Ellenborough, President of the Board of Control; Sir George Murray, Master of the Ordnance; Sir Edward Knatchbull, Paymaster of the Forces; Mr. Baring, President of the Board of Trade, and Master of the Mint; Mr. Wynn, Duchy of Lancaster; Mr. Herries, Secretary at War. The Earl of Haddington is Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; Sir Henry Hardinge, Secretary for ditto.

The names of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury are, Sir Robert Peel, First Lord; Right Hon. William Yates Peel, Earl of Lincoln, Viscount Stormont, Charles Ross, Esq., M.P., and William E. Gladstone, Esq., M.P., Junior Lords. It would be endless and useless to enumerate all the changes and appointments that have taken or are likely to take place in the royal household, public offices, &c.

Respecting the future conduct of the ministry, and the chances of their being able to carry on the government in the face of so strong an opposition as is certain to be brought against them in the new House of Commons, the most intense interest prevails amongst all classes of politicians, and speculation on these points is well-nigh exhausted. There seems a probability of a resolution being proposed in the House of Commons, immediately on the opening of the session, declaring a want of confidence in the ministry, so as to induce them at once to resign. How such a motion might be received by the house, it is of course impossible to calculate, at least until all the returns are made; but, judging from the understood principles, known character, and published professions, of those already elected to Parliament, we would be inclined to doubt if a majority could be obtained to support it; and in this view it is not likely that the motion would be made at all. Again, it has been rumoured, that, should ministers persist in retaining office, the house will resort to a privilege only employed in extreme cases, and refuse to vote the supplies.

What course the ministry may pursue in either of the cases supposed, it is of course equally impossible to guess. It has been generally rumoured that the King was determined, in the event of the House of Commons displaying a factious opposition to ministers, immediately to dissolve it, and appeal to the nation again—and again. But it is almost impossible to believe that such a resolution can have been adopted. Another, and a much more probable report, is, that ministers have fully made up their minds not to be deterred from following out their course of policy by a partial defeat on any one question; and that they have resolved upon this, from a conviction that the altered constitution of Parliament must in future change the position of every ministry in that respect. Besides, they have the conduct of their predecessors as a precedent for such a line of action. It is likewise affirmed that the King completely concurs in this mode of proceeding.

Assuming, however, that the House of Commons is willing to allow that "fair trial" to the new government for which Sir Robert Peel asks, the next subject of anxious conjecture is the nature of the measures he means to propose for the settlement of those great questions with which the public mind is at present so much agitated. The indefinite nature of Sir Robert Peel's declarations respecting most of them, leaves as much room for suspicion and vituperation to his declared opponents, as they furnish matter for hopeful anticipation to those who express a willingness to support him in a course of liberal policy. It is at all events easy to foresee that it is only by pursuing the latter course that any ministry can long expect to survive; and this the more especially, seeing that some of the members of the last cabinet have taken the opportunity of the elections (see that head) to state the nature of the measures intended to have been brought forward by them. The Times and Standard persist in affirming that a measure of Irish church reform, on a plan much more extensive, as well as equitable, than could have been expected from the last ministry, will be submitted to Parliament. It is likewise confidently asserted that a committee of bishops has been appointed to consider of a plan of English church reform, including a commutation of tithes, which ministers intend to propose to Parliament. Against these indications of a liberal policy, however, the argument is still adduced, How can extensive measures of reform such as are now called for, be expected from men who have all their lives been opposed to such a course? This is a question not very easy to be answered, unless upon the supposition that the altered circumstances of the nation may justify in the eyes of these individuals a departure from the principles upon which they have hitherto acted. At the same time, it would appear that it is less to Sir Robert Peel himself than the known principles of many of his colleagues, that the doubt is generally applied. One of the last rumours, indeed, is, that there are already differences in the cabinet, owing to one portion of it being much too liberal for the other. It is even alleged that the Duke of Wellington insists upon more extensive reforms than at all meet the approbation of Sir Robert Peel!

Since the preceding remarks were written, we observe the following announcement in the London Record, the high church journal of the kingdom, and a credible authority in all church matters:—"We learn that a measure of large, and we trust of enlightened church reform, is to be immediately brought forward by Sir Robert Peel on the opening of Parliament. We are also informed that the Rev. Dr Pye Smith and the Rev. John Clayton have had an interview with the Premier, by his desire, with the view of making some arrangements as to what are called dissenters' grievances. We believe Sir R. Peel is disposed to go as far as any reasonable non-conformist ought to desire, in removing the remaining civil disabilities of the dissenters."

THE GENERAL ELECTION.

In the London Gazette of Tuesday, December 30, appeared two proclamations, one of them dissolving the Parliament, and directing the issue of writs for a new one, returnable on Thursday the 19th of February inst.; and the other, charging the Peers of Scotland to meet in Holyrood House on Tuesday the 10th of February, in order to elect the sixteen Peers to serve for Scotland in the said Parliament.

The propriety of dissolving Parliament at this crisis of public affairs has been much canvassed, and has met, of course, the approbation and reprobation of the respective political parties. The opponents of ministers denounce it as a measure involving the country, unnecessarily, in much trouble and expense, seeing that there is no chance of the new house allowing a Tory government to retain power; while their supporters hold it out as a proof of the determination of ministers, by thus appealing to the nation, to stand or fall by its decision. It would appear that there was much doubt even among ministers themselves, whether or not such a step should be adopted. We noticed in our last, however, that preparations were every where making throughout the kingdom for such an event. In fact, canvassing commenced in almost every constituency simultaneously with the appointment of the new ministry, and we may safely say that at no former period of our history did a more energetic struggle take place. Parties were now much more equally balanced than at the last general election; the public excitement which then prevailed was much cooled down, and freer scope was thus given to the expression of contending opinions. Many of those who had most ardently supported the reform bill, satisfied with the power given them by their franchise, and fearing that the Melbourne administration were inclined to adopt measures which might endanger the institutions of the country, were now inclined to support a government more decidedly conservative. Others, again, apprehending that a Tory government would labour to frustrate the intentions of the reform act, if they did not procure its repeal altogether, preferred joining with those of more extreme reforming principles than themselves. Every where the most strenuous endeavours were made by the Whigs to effect a reunion with the Radical party (with whom they had been for some time at variance), under the common name of "reformers," as opposed to the Tories or Conservatives—and in most instances succeeded.

With our limited space it is impossible for us to attempt even the most abridged outline of the proceedings at the various elections; and in addition to the list of returns given elsewhere (with as much correctness as our materials would allow), we are restricted to a notice of only a few of the more remarkable and important contests.

The metropolis was of course the great centre of observation. The polling commenced on Tuesday, January 6, and as all parties had made the most energetic preparations for the contest, the bustle and interest excited was extreme. There were seven candidates in all; four in the Liberal or Reform, and three in the Conservative interest. The hopes of the latter were at first very high, but the superior strength of their opponents was soon manifested. They took the lead from the first; and when the books were closed, the poll stood thus:—

Wood . . .	4977	Lyll . . .	3734
Pattison . .	4709	Ward . . .	3734
Crawford . .	4663	Wilson . . .	3655
Grote . . .	4654

Clear majority for the Reformers, 920.

The polling of the second day was started and continued in the same spirit, and its results stated to be, at the final close, as follow:—

Wood . . .	6418	Ward . . .	4559
Pattison . .	6050	Lyll . . .	4599
Crawford . .	5961	Wilson . . .	4414
Grote . . .	5955

On Thursday the poll was officially declared by the sheriffs, amounting to a majority for the Reformers, taking the highest candidates, of 1819. Alderman Wood, in returning thanks, made loud complaints of bribery and intimidation on the part of his opponents.

On Thursday, January 8, the election for Westminster took place, the candidates being the former members, Colonel Evans and Sir Francis Burdett; Sir Thomas Cochrane (a relative of Lord Dundonald) appearing in the Tory interest. The latter gentleman, at his appearance on the hustings on the day of nomination, was assailed with an unceasing shower of cabbage-stalks, mud, and dirt, and was forced to retire. At the final close of the poll on Friday, January 9, the returns stood thus—Burdett, 2630; Evans, 2709; Cochrane, 1614. In Marylebone, Sir Samuel Whalley and Mr H. L. Bulwer were returned by great majorities over their Conservative opponents, Sir W. Horne and Mr Young, on Thursday, January 8; the poll at the close standing thus—Whalley, 2963; Bulwer, 2812; Horne, 1851; Young, 379. In Southwark, the two reform candidates were returned without any opposition. In the Tower Hamlets, a Conservative, Captain Burton, R.N., who opposed Mr Clay and Dr Lushington, was obliged to retire on the first day's poll. In short, in all the other districts the Liberal party carried every thing before them; and including Messrs Byng and Hume, who were elected for the county of Middlesex, the metropolis at once gave twenty members to the opponents of ministers. Great doubts, however, were at one time entertained of Mr Hume's success, and it is alleged to have taken place solely from mismanagement on the part of his opponents. The candidates were Mr Byng, Mr Hume, and Mr Wood, the latter a Conservative. The supporters of the latter, it is said, being too secure of success, and anxious to exclude Mr Hume altogether, 1300 of them split their votes between Mr Wood and Mr Byng. The numbers at the close of the poll, on Friday, Jan. 16, were—for Mr Byng, 3461; Mr Hume, 3115; Mr Wood, 2677; majority for Mr Hume, 438.

On January 12, Lord Stanley and Mr Patten (a moderate Tory) were re-elected for the north division of Lancashire, without opposition. Lord Stanley took an opportunity of explaining and defending his Parliamentary conduct, and his refusal to join Sir Robert Peel's administration. He did not explain the terms of the offer made to him, but said, "it was like every thing he had ever seen in Sir Robert Peel's public conduct—frank, open, and manly." He did not, however, coalesce in no scheme for overthrowing the present government. "I will not admit of those who class themselves under the general name of Reformers, that their principles or that their objects are the same with mine or the same with the administration of Lord Grey; and I will join in no effort for the overthrow of any government, unless I see a fair and legitimate prospect of the construction of another government which will more readily carry into effect the principles to which I am attached. From me, therefore, gentlemen, at least, the present ministry will meet no contentious opposition, though I cannot promise to vote them any pledge of support. I cannot say, then, looking at the composition of the present government—looking at the individuals of whom it is composed—I see reasonable ground of confidence in them on the part of those who entertain the liberal opinions which I profess. But if I see those liberal opinions fairly and honestly carried into effect, it will be my duty as an honest man, even if I oppose the measure, or even if I could not place confidence in the men to support the measures which are brought forward." In alluding to the absolute necessity of ecclesiastical reform, he said he would never consent to abstract one farthing from the revenues of the clergy (English).

Sir James Graham and Mr Blamire were re-elected without opposition on Monday, January 12, to the seats for Cumberland. Sir James took occasion to refer to his seceding from his late colleagues, and said that only on one subject, a fatal one, they differed—the Irish church. Mr Ward proposed certain resolutions, which embodied the sort of reform which was contemplated for the abuses of the Irish church. The first was, that the state—the House of Commons—had the right to settle the distribution of ecclesiastical property. To this, as an abstract proposition, he could have no objection. The second went farther—that the revenues of the Irish church were less than required by her spiritual wants. To this he could not assent, that such surplus should be applied to secular purposes. Upon this point he differed from his colleagues. He complained of the commission of inquiry which had been instituted by Lord Grey. The object of that commission was to ascertain the number of Catholics and Protestants in particular places. He protested against this. The existence of the established church should never, by his consent, be tested by the rule of three. With regard to his refusal to join Sir R. Peel's ministry, he said that he had drawn up and placed in the hands of a friend a written statement of reasons why he would not accept any offer of the kind, if made to him, on the 6th of December. Sir Robert Peel's offer did not reach him till December 11. He said the present ministry did not command his confidence: it was impossible to be composed of worse materials. The whole lives of the persons who compose that ministry had been devoted to oppose good government, and to uphold bad. He believed, however, that no government ever did maintain itself in defiance of public opinion. If those measures should, contrary to all expectation, be proposed by the new ministers, he was not prepared to refuse them.

At Bristol, the Reformers brought forward Sir John Hobhouse and a Mr Baillie, but were signally defeated; two Conservatives being returned triumphantly. The Liberal candidates retired after the day's poll. Sir John Hobhouse afterwards stooped to Nottingham, where he met with a better reception. On the day of nomination (the return has not yet reached us) he made a long speech, in which he detailed the various measures intended to have been brought forward by the late ministry. His statement has therefore excited no little interest. He said he had intended to bring in a bill for an entire reformation of the Irish church. The next bill was one to amend the Irish coercion bill—the nature of which, however, he did not state. It was only, however, upon this understanding that he (Sir John) and Mr Duncannon joined Lord Melbourne's ministry. My first question," said Sir John, "was, 'Is the coercion bill to be passed?' Lord Melbourne answered 'No.' My next question was as to the Irish church establishment, and the appropriation of its revenues; as I never could consent to the amendment proposed, that the means designed for the maintenance of a national establishment, in places where the functions were not exercised, should not be appropriated to the service of the people. It is true that some influential gentlemen differed from me, but in the late administration; they were all agreed that this should be the principle and basis on which our government was to be formed—that we should not come to the determination, that, where the revenues were not wanted, they should not be retained. I was also intended by the late cabinet to give notice of a bill for adjusting the English church establishment, and for a commutation of tithes. We also intended to bring in measures of redress for all practical grievances under which the dissenters are labouring, and that the causes of real complaint might be completely removed."

ved. We, however, did not rest here: we went er; we proposed to do for England what had dy been done for Scotland, by introducing into country great and salutary municipal reforms." John denied that there was the slightest dis-in the last cabinet, and predicted that the next ld be much more liberal and decided than what the was.
r John Tyrell and Mr A. Baring (both Conserva-
s, and the last President of the Board of Trade) elected without opposition for the northern din of Essex. Mr Baring, in his speech, denied the bench of bishops had objected to the commun of tithes, and that the farmers, and not the had objected to the proposed measure. He said church rate must be done away with. "But who ted to its settlement? Was it the Conservative?
gentlemen, it was the dissenters themselves, who
d to the government, distinctly and unequivocally, they disapproved of the settlement which was osed."

Monday, January 12, Lord Norreys, Mr Haret, and Mr Weyland, were re-elected for the ty of Oxford without opposition. The first has been a professed Conservative. The two latter emen voted for the reform bill, and on the precasion professed their adherence to Sir Robert 's manifesto.

Cobbett and Mr Fielden were both re-elected ldham without opposition. The account of this ion by the former honourable gentleman is very teristic. It is dated January 7. "The election (half-past eleven o'clock) in an hour and three-rters in the whole! And, any thing so well, so bly, so every way nicely conducted, I never saw e." The returning officer, James Lees, Esq. just lite and amiable-looking a young man as can be ined. Mr Fielden was proposed by Mr Joshua e, and seconded by Mr John Travers. I was sed by Mr Alexander Taylor, and seconded by ague. Here was sense. We had no placards; ad no address; we asked no man for a vote, and ot ask the collective body. We had nothing of se of any sort, even for our own personal enter-ment. Here was no nonsense; no flattery; no ng; no bombast; nor was there any nonsense stopping the supplies (alluding to Sir John abbell's speech at Edinburgh, noticed in a later of this article). We told our constituents that s their duty to feel grateful to the King for what ad done, and that it would be our duty to take to avoid any thing tending to thwart his servants, ey appeared to be disposed to act in conformity e good of his people; and that nothing, we were ed, should induce us to give our countenance to ctious proceedings, having for their object to les-e constitutional weight or authority of the King the Lords. In all which, we had the hearty rrance of our constituents."

I Finsbury, Mr Wakley (editor of the Lancet)
r Duncombe (one of the former members) were ed in opposition to Sergeant Spankie (the other member, who has lately made himself conspiby his denunciations against the conduct of the ministry, whom he formerly supported), and obhouse (brother of Sir John Hobhouse), formerly a moderate Whig, but who on this occasion professed the most extreme Radical doctrines. Mr Hobhouse retired after the first day's poll, and the final returns were—Duncombe, 4447; Wakley, 3339; Spankie, 2310.

In East Surrey, the Conservatives obtained a victory which was not generally expected, by the return of Messrs Alsager and Beauchamp.

At Liverpool, a very severe contest has been terminated by the election of the old members, Lord Sandon and Mr Ewart. The Tory candidates, San-don and Sir Howard Douglas, were far ahead up to the middle of the first day. Ewart and Morris then steadily gained upon them, but at the close of the poll they were announced as follows:—Sandon, 4361; Ewart, 4052; Douglas, 3831; Morris, 3633.

Respecting the Scottish elections, we need only allude to a very few. Those for the counties of Edinburgh and Perth naturally attracted great attention and interest, on account of two of the candidates being members of the new administration, and one of them (Sir George Murray) M. P. for his native county in the last Parliament. The nomination of candidates for the county of Edinburgh took place on Tuesday, January 13, when Sir George Clerk was nominated by Sir John Hope (convener of the county), and seconded by Mr George Combe, farmer, Redheughs.
Mr W. Gibson-Craig, advocate (son of Sir James Gibson-Craig of Riccarton), was nominated by the late county member, Sir John Dalrymple, and seconded by Mr Finnie, farmer, Swanston. As nearly 500 out of about 1400 of the constituency had signed and published a requisition to Sir George Clerk to come forward as candidate, his election was reckoned secure by his friends; but it soon appeared, from the exertions made by Mr G. Craig's friends, that the issue was likely to be doubtful. There has scarcely, perhaps, been an instance in the three kingdoms, where greater exertions were made by both parties, and more interest excited in the result. At the final close of the poll on Friday, January 16, Sir George Clerk was declared the successful candidate by a majority of 31.

The Perthshire election took a most unexpected turn. It was at first understood that Sir Geo. Murray was not to be opposed, and Mr Fox Maule (son of Lord Panmure) declined opposing him, professedly from his inability to pay the expenses of the election.
A subscription was, however, entered into by Mr Maule's friends to defray his expenses, and, to the astonishment of all, he was returned by a majority of 82! In Haddingtonshire, a very keen contest took place betwixt the friends of Mr Fergusson of Raith and Mr Hope, which terminated in favour of the former gentleman by a majority of 37. In Roxburghshire, Lord John Scott beat his opponent, Captain Elliot, by a majority of 76; the gross number polled being 1438. In Leith, Mr J. A. Murray, late Lord Advocate, was returned without opposition.

In the city of Edinburgh, Mr Abercromby and Sir John Campbell were re-elected. It was at first supposed that there was to be no opposition, but upon Monday, December 29, a meeting was held in the Hopetoun Rooms by the Conservative party, when Lord Ramsay (son of Lord Dalhousie) and Mr Lear-month, the former candidate for the city, were selected to come forward in that interest. Lord Ramsay's speech on this occasion, and his subsequent appearances, tended to raise him very high in the esteem both of his supporters and opponents. In one of his electioneering speeches, Sir John Campbell distinctly avowed, that, if the new ministry should attempt to retain office against the votes of the House of Commons, he conceived it would be proper to stop the supplies; a declaration which excited much interest in the metropolis, and gave rise to some keen remarks from both parties. The result of the two days' polling showed—

For the Right Hon. James Abercromby	2963
Sir John Campbell	2858
Lord Ramsay	1716
Mr Learmonth	1608

For Glasgow, the candidates were the former members, Mr Ewing, a moderate Tory, Mr Oswald, an ultra-reformer, with Mr Dunlop, whose politics were of the same complexion with those of Mr Oswald.
The result was—

For Mr Oswald	3832
Mr Dunlop	3267
Mr Ewing	2297

In England, the elections have generally been conducted without much disturbance; but in Scotland and Ireland, where the popular party is less accustomed to the exercise of the franchise, and greater political enthusiasm prevails amongst all parties, the proceedings have in some instances been less orderly.
Complaints respecting the means taken by the Tories to create fictitious votes, and to intimidate and coerce farmers and shopkeepers in the exercise of their privilege of voting, have been very general in Scotland, and the feeling thus engendered has broken out in some places in acts of frightful violence. A Conservative voter at Crieff had his carriage destroyed; another was encountered on his return to Glasgow from the Stirlingshire election, and severely maltreated.
Great disturbances also took place at the elections for Roxburghshire and Forfarshire, in the former of which instances the soldiery were called in. It is needless to point out that all undue expedients taken to sway the consciences of voters, and all violences manifested by the populace at and after elections, are equally reprehensible.

At the time when this part of our monthly intelligence is composed, the elections are near a conclusion, and show, upon the whole, a large gain to the Conservative party—the Standard says (Jan. 21) no less than 93 members. The utmost strength of this party in the last House of Commons is stated to have been from 140 to 150, whereas it is already above 230. Much difficulty, however, has been experienced in reckoning up the strength of the various parties, as many who are tried advocates of reform, and were attached to the last ministry, are expected to support the present in liberal measures. It seems fair in the meantime to state the numbers of those who will oppose and use every endeavour to overthrow the ministry as not greater than those who will as unscrupulously support it, while an almost equally large party remain undecided as to either course, and may to a certain extent be calculated upon by the ministry, in the event of their measures giving satisfaction, or by the Opposition, in the contrary event.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL AND THE BISHOPS.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL having stated at a meeting with his constituents at Totness (since the dissolution of the Melbourne administration), that the bishops had opposed a plan of English church reform proposed to them by Earl Grey, the statement was flatly contradicted, by letter, by the Bishop of Exeter. A correspondence ensued betwixt the reverend prelate and his lordship, from which it appears that the latter was in error, in so far as the proposed reform (whatever it was) had only been submitted to the opinion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who expressed his disapprobation of it—and the measure was thereupon abandoned by Earl Grey.

SIR ROBERT PEELE AND THE DISSENTERS.

At a meeting of a committee of dissenting clergymen and others, calling themselves the "Dissenting Deputies," held at Birmingham on the 26th December, to consider the manifesto put forth by Sir Robert Peel, various resolutions were passed, strongly condemnatory of his assumption of power, and which were transmitted to him by the chairman of the meeting, the Rev. Timothy East. These, with Sir Robert Peel's reply, have since been published, and the spirit of both may be learned from the following extracts:—

"Resolved—That this meeting views the manifesto as a crafty manoeuvre to conciliate the good opinions of the dissenters, by holding out promises of relief, but in a form so vague and Jesuitical, that we feel the demand for, 'a fair trial' ought to be refused to this wily politician, because he has been tried already, and found in opposition to our just and reasonable claims, and because he avows that he 'has not accepted power on the condition of declaring himself an apostate to the principles on which he has heretofore acted.'"

Sir Robert Peel replies—

"I cannot believe that either the sentiments embodied in the resolutions of that meeting, or the language in which those sentiments are conveyed, will meet with the concurrence and approbation of the general body of the dissenters of this country. Neither those sentiments nor those expressions will affect the course which it is my intention to pursue, nor abate in the slightest degree my desire to consider, in a spirit of conciliation and peace, the redress of any real grievance of which the dissenters may have just ground to complain."

Dec. 18. A most extraordinary accident and escape from death occurred at Pontefract. A workman, and a boy about fourteen years of age, an apprentice to Mr Bevvitt, ironfounder, were engaged in making some alterations in a pump, in a well newly made, about twenty-three yards deep. The boy was holding a candle, and looking up to the mouth of the well at the moment that a pair of smith's tongs fell from the top. The tongs were as usual of iron, and one of the handles perforated the leather peak of the boy's cap, and entered just above the eyebrows, passing through the socket and the palate bone into the mouth, opposite the second molar tooth, slightly wounding the tongue through the muscles and skin; the iron appearing three inches below the under jaw, having just reached the sternum. In this situation was the poor boy (with the tongs standing two feet above his head), until the arrival of two medical men, several attempts having been made, in the interim, by the workmen to withdraw the tongs, but without effect. In the presence of the medical men, and by an immense force, they were extracted, and the lad appeared quite relieved. He afterwards walked nimbly up stairs to bed, and the proper dressings were applied, and since that time no untoward symptom has appeared. The eye seems to have sustained little injury.

—30. The signatures to the Conservative address, agreed on at the public meeting in London on December 23 (noticed in our last), amounted to nearly 6000, and occupied yesterday twenty-four columns of the Times newspaper. The Times this day stated the price of insertion to have been two hundred and forty guineas!

Jan. 7. As some persons were amusing themselves by throwing stones down a coal-pit, in the neighbourhood of Sneyd Green, they were startled by the voice of a man issuing from a pit, exclaiming, "Oh! don't, I have suffered enough!" They immediately gave the alarm, and means were resorted to to release him from his miserable condition. On his being drawn up from the pit, he presented a shocking spectacle, his head being out in a most severe manner. He is at present in a very dangerous state. It seems that the unhappy sufferer, whose name is William Harrison, had been drinking at the Bull's Head, in Sneyd Green, the preceding night, and being intoxicated on leaving the house, stumbled into the pit, twenty-five yards deep, only partially covered over, and remained there the whole of the night; and had it not been for the circumstance of the boys throwing stones into the pit, would probably have perished in that dreadful situation. —North Staffordshire Mercury.

—14. An incident, at once ludicrous and alarming, occurred at the village of Thorndon Heath, between Croydon and Streatham, which caused great alarm, and was nearly attended with fatal consequences. A postilion, who was returning from the nomination of the candidates for East Surrey at Croydon, with two post-horses, rode them into the large pond in the centre of the village, opposite the Plough Inn, and had not proceeded far before the horses stuck fast in the soft mud at the bottom of the pond. The animals in endeavouring to extricate themselves, only sunk deeper; and all the efforts of the postilion to release them by using the whip and spur were in vain. In this dilemma, a rope was thrown to the man, which he made fast to the horse he was riding; but owing to the awkwardness of the villagers, they pulled the animal over into the pond, and both horse and rider were nearly drowned. The people, however, still continued pulling as hard as they were able, and dragged both horse and man through the water to the shore. The postilion was in a state of complete insensibility, and it was some time before he showed any signs of animation. The other horse, which had been left sticking in the mud, was after some delay dragged out in the same manner.

The following elevations to the peerage have taken place since the accession of the present ministry:—Lord Fitzgerald, by the title of Baron Fitzgerald of Desmond; Sir James Scarlett, as Baron Abinger, of Abinger in the county of Surrey, and of the city of Norwich; Sir Philip Sydney, as Baron De L'Isle and Dudley, of Penshurst; and the Earl of Brecknock, otherwise Mr George Pratt, as Lord Camden.

The Times newspaper lately published the following

epistle, which is certainly curious, as illustrative of the sense which modern functionaries of the highest station entertain respecting the importance of the newspaper press. The date shows the note to have been written shortly after the Times commenced its fulminations against the ex-Chancellor. The verity of the document has never been officially contradicted. It is thus faced:—"From the subjoined document, it will be seen that the question of peace or war with the Times is other words a vindictive attempt to damage proper, and to strike a blow at the independence of the press, was proposed by the leader of the House of Commons, commonly called 'honest Lord Althorp,' to the first judicial authority of the realm, the Lord Chancellor of England! Having submitted the fact, we shall leave the public to ponder on it. The intimation of the subjoined note is short, but it signifies a world of malpractice:—"My dear Brougham, the subject I want to talk to you about is the state of the press, and whether it should declare open war with the Times, or attempt to make peace. Yours most truly, ALTHORP.—Dowling Street, June 11."

A ludicrous instance of bad grammatical construction occurs in a recent number of a daily London paper, which notices the appointment to office of "Mr Fek Sheridan, grandson of the late R. B. Sheridan, Esq., and brother of the accomplished Mrs Norton, who accompanied Lord Mulgrave to Jamaica in the capacity of private secretary."

The expense of registering in 1832 and 1833 for Great Britain and Ireland, was £83,364. The amount of the returning officers' charges for England and Wales at the last election was £51,808, and there were two hundred and fifty contested elections.

The abstract of the revenue from 5th January 1834 to 5th January 1835, shows an increase on the year of £1,07,031, but a decrease on the last quarter, as compared with that of 1834, of £297,964. The latter circumstance is said to have arisen from the abolition of the house-tax having just come into operation.

There has recently been erected at the extensive soap and chemical works of Messrs J. and T. Johnson of Rye, a circular brick chimney, of immense magnitude, surmounted by a capital of hewn stonework, the whole forming a column of surpassing height and beauty, probably exceeding in height any structure in the world upon the same base. Its dimensions are as follow: the diameter at the base 30 feet, height 272 feet. It contains upwards of half a million of bricks, and is estimated to weigh about 2000 tons. This beautiful column, erected under the superintendence of Mr Livingstone, of Newcastle, is nine feet higher than the celebrated chimney of Mr Clapham of that town; forty-five feet higher than far-famed chimney of Mr Muspratt, at Liverpool; seventy feet higher than the Monument in London. An occurrence has recently transpired in the vicinity of Liverpool, which is the topic of very general conversation in that neighbourhood, and has caused much astonishment and many painful feelings in a respectable circle of society at Dalton. A few months ago, an aged gentleman named Pemberton, who had neither wife nor child, died, and left behind a considerable property. Shortly afterwards, the Rev. Mr Stainton, clergyman of the parish, produced a will, under which he claimed as sole legatee. Before he could take possession of the property, it was necessary to produce a deed of surrender; and Mr Stainton brought forward a document at one of the Manorial courts, which had the appearance of a regular deed. On inspection, however, it was found that, in fact, the writing purported to have been executed previous to the manufacture of the stamp. The consequence was an investigation before the magistrates, and Mr Stainton was committed to Lancaster gaol, to take his trial.—Herald.

According to a decision of the council of the Russian Empire, the administration of the department of the publications has authorised the Imperial Academy of the Arts to educate, at the expense of the government, young men, who, after having finished their studies, are obliged to serve in the first administration in quality of architect for a certain number of years.

The population of Munich, which has now 95,000 inhabitants, has been greatly increased by the number of illegitimate children born during the last year, as appears from the returns, in which of course the public institutions, hospitals, infirmaries, &c. are included. The number of legitimate children has far exceeded in that year (by one-third) by that of the illegitimate.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CEREMONIAL OF THE EUROPEAN POWERS.

One of the many ridiculous usages and pompous ceremonies, of which such a number have arisen in Europe, is the subject of this article; which has given rise to much war and confusion, and thrown many obstacles in the way of peace. No independent state can really have precedence of another; but as the weaker seek the protection and friendship of the more powerful, there arises a priority of rank. This has occasioned the gradual establishment of dignities, ranks, and orders of respect, to states, their rulers, and representatives, by which means (in contradistinction to the actual etiquette of a state) an international ceremonial has been formed, to the observance of which far more consideration is often paid than to the fulfilment of the most sacred contracts. Louis XIV. carried this further, perhaps, than any one before or after him. To this international ceremonial belong the titles of rulers. Accident made the imperial titles the highest, and thus conferred advantage apart from the power of the princes. After the empire, the Roman emperors were considered the sovereigns of Christendom, maintained the highest rank, and even asserted the dependence of the kings on themselves. For this reason, several kings, in the middle ages, to demonstrate their independence, gave their crowns the title of imperial. England, for example, in all its public acts, is styled the imperial crown. The kings of France received from the Turks and Africans the title empereur de France. As time passed, the kings were less willing to condescend to the imperial title, of itself, superiority to the Acknowledgment of the titles and rank of rulers. Formerly, the popes and emperors arrogated the right of granting these dignities; but the principle was afterwards established, that every people could grant titles to its rulers, at pleasure, a title, the recognition of which rests on the pleasure of other powers, and on which some states were therefore never recognised, or not till after the lapse of considerable time. This was the case with the royal title of Prussia, the imperial title of Russia, the new titles of German kings, &c.

Marks of respect conformable to the rank and dignity of sovereigns. To the royal prerogatives, so far as (which, however, were conceded to various states which were neither kingdoms nor empires, such as the Netherlands, Switzerland, the electorates, pertained the right of sending ambassadors of the first class, &c. In connection with this, there is a much contested point, viz. that of precedence or priority of rank, i. e. of the right of assuming the honourable station on any occasion, either personally, at meetings of the princes themselves, or of ambassadors, at formal assemblies, &c., or by signature, as in the form and signature of state papers. There is never a want of grounds for supporting a claim to precedence. As the councils, in the middle ages, afforded the most frequent occasion of such controversies, the popes often interfered. Of the several elements of the rank of the European powers, the principal emanated from the popes, the principal is the promulgated in 1504, by Julius II., through his master of ceremonies, Paris de Crassis, in which the European nations followed in this order:—1. the Roman emperor (emperor of Germany); 2. the king of Rome; 3. the king of France; 4. the king of Spain; 5. of Arragon; 6. of Portugal; 7. of England; 8. of Sicily; 9. of Scotland; 10. of Hungary; 11. of Navarre; 12. of Cyprus; 13. of Bohemia; 14. of Poland; 15. of Denmark; 16. republic of Venice; 17. duke of Bretagne; 18. duke of Burgundy; 19. elector of Bavaria; 20. of Saxony; 21. of Brandenburg; 22. archduke of Austria; 23. duke of Savoy; 24. grand-duke of Florence; 25. duke of Milan; 26. duke of Bavaria; 27. of Lorraine. This order of rank was not indeed universally received; but it contained a fruitful germ of future quarrels; some states, which were benefited by the arrangement, insisting upon its adoption, and others, from opposite reasons, refusing to acknowledge it. To support their claims for precedence, the candidates sometimes relied on the length of time which had elapsed since their families became independent, or since the introduction of Christianity into their dominions; sometimes on the form of government, the number of crowns, the titles, achievements, extent of possessions, &c., pertaining to each. But no definite rules have been established, by which states are designated as being of the first, second, third, fourth, &c. rank. At the congress of Vienna, a discussion took place respecting the settling of the rank of the European powers, and its inseparable consequences; and the commission appointed for the purpose by the eight powers who signed the peace of Paris, made in their scheme a division of the powers into three classes. But as opinions were by no means unanimous on the subject, most of the plenipotentiaries voting for three classes, Portugal and Spain for two, and Lord Castlereagh entirely rejecting the principle of classification, as the source of constant difficulties, the question respecting the rank of the powers was suffered to rest, and the ambassadors of the crowned heads were merely divided into three classes. Rulers of equal dignity, when they make visits, concede to each other the precedence at home; in other cases where the precedence is not settled, they or their ambassadors take turns, till a compromise is effected in some way.

Many states claim not a precedence, but merely an equality. But if neither can be obtained, there are several means of avoiding the scandalous scenes that formerly so often occurred. The ruler either comes incognito, or sends an ambassador of different rank from his with whom he contests the precedence; or the rulers or their ambassadors do not appear on public occasions; or if they do, it is with a reservation respecting their dignity. In treaties between two powers, two copies are made, and each is signed by only one party; or if both sign, each party receives the copy in which it holds the place of honour. According to the above-mentioned resolution respecting the relative rank of ambassadors, which forms the seventeenth article to the final act of the congress of Vienna, the order to be observed by the ambassadors in signing public treaties between powers, in respect to which the rule of alternate precedence exists, shall be decided by lot. In Britain and France, far less ceremonial is observed in the official style than in Germany, where forms and titles are carried to an absurd extent, and the ceremonial words, which extend even to the pronouns by which the princes are designated, it is not possible to translate. Emperors and kings mutually style each other brother, while they call princes of less degree cousin. The German emperors formerly used the term thou in addressing other princes. The we, by which monarchs style themselves, is used either from an assumption of state, or from a feeling of modesty, on the supposition that I would sound despotical, while we seems to include the whole administration, &c.; but the first reason is the more probable.—Conversations-Lexicon.

WHIG AND TORY ADMINISTRATIONS.

The power which the House of Commons possesses of granting or withholding subsidies or grants to the crown or executive power, and the indispensable assent of each branch of the British legislature in the enactment of laws which govern the courts of law, and bind the people, confer an influence on that body which obliges the crown to compromise with majorities, by conferring on them the ministerial direction of the government. Hence, as these parties vacillate, changes of administration take place. Again, as the restoration in 1660 was the act of the people or their leaders, and as the revolution in 1688 was also the act of the people or their leaders, so the crown, by policy and habit, yields to this influence, and changes of administration are evidences of the fluctuating ascendancy of parties. Since those periods, therefore, the changes have been numerous. The two parties in the aristocracy are the Whig and Tory—those who would foster or curb the power of the people. The first administration of Charles II. was a conciliating mixture of respectable republicans and his personal adherents while abroad, under Clarendon; it lasted till 1663. The second was formed under the influence of the Duke of York, a zealous Catholic, and lasted till 1670. The third was called the "Cabal," from the initials of their names, Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale. Public crime and unprincipled policy was now at its height, and no man's life or honour was secure. King James, in 1685, continued, with some additions, the administration of his brother. King William, in 1689, established the first decided Whig administration; in 1690 he admitted Tories; and in 1693 the Whigs were restored. Queen Anne, in 1702, chose a Whig administration till 1710, consisting of Lord Godolphin, Lord Somers, the Duke of Marlborough, &c. The Tories succeeded, under Harley, Bolingbroke, and the Clarendons. George I., in 1714, chose a Whig administration, and the Tories were prosecuted. George II. continued the Whigs in power; but a reforming party, led by Windham, Shippen, Hungerford, and Pitt, now appeared in Parliament. At this time Whigs and Tories were considered as alienated from the interests of the people. In 1739, the Walpole administration yielded to a more popular Whig party; and in 1744, other Whigs came into power. In 1745, a mixed administration was formed under the Duke of Newcastle; but in 1756, a change took place in favour of the Whigs, and the first Pitt became minister.—George III. in 1760, ejected the Whigs and formed a Tory administration under Bute and Jenkinson. In 1763, Grenville succeeded Bute; and his prosecutions of Wilkes, and plans of taxing America, changed the fortunes of the empire. In 1765, the Whigs came into power under the Marquis of Rockingham; and in 1766, a change of men took place, and Mr Pitt returned to office. In 1771, the Tory administration of Lord North was formed, and continued through the American war, till 1782, when the Whigs, under the Marquis of Rockingham, came into power. The marquis occasioned a division of the Whigs, and a coalition of Mr Fox, at the head of one division of the Whigs, with Lord North at the head of the Tories, in 1783. Late in that year the administration of the second Pitt was formed, and it continued on Tory principles till the French war in 1801. In 1801, another Tory administration was formed under Addington. In the year 1804, the Pitt administration was restored. Early in 1806, Pitt died, and a Whig administration succeeded, under Mr Fox; but he dying in September, a Tory administration, under Mr Perceval and Lord Eldon, succeeded, in the February following. Perceval was shot in 1812; but the same administration was continued by George IV. under Liverpool, till Liverpool's death in 1827. A mixed administration succeeded of Whigs and Tories, under Canning, who died in the same year; he was succeeded by Lord Goderich and a Tory party, and replaced in 1823 by the Duke of Wellington, who, in 1830, was succeeded by Earl Grey and the Whig party, and by Lord Melbourne in 1834; and since by a Tory administration under Sir Robert Peel.

IMPORTANCE OF BRITISH AMERICA.

Whether I regard our North American colonies as enabling us to preserve the balance of power against the United States in the Old World as well as in the New—as affording vast fields of fertile land for the employment of a numerous starving population, which, with an insanity never perhaps before equalled, are driven, by low wages and unremitting labour, to hopeless wretchedness—as rendering us independent of the jealous European states of those supplies of timber, &c. on which our maritime power is built—as offering to us a granary for an inexhaustible supply of food in exchange for British manufactures—as tendering for our military and commercial navy a constant supply of hardy seamen, trained in the dangerous northern voyages, and as fishers on the shores of the St Lawrence and the banks of Newfoundland; whether, I repeat, I view our North American colonies in these, or in any other of the numerous important aspects in which they instantly present themselves, I am at a loss whether to admire most the bounteous blessings providence has conferred on this small island, or to regret more the apathy of the public, and the almost traitorous language held by public men as to the worthlessness of those invaluable sections of the empire. Artful and selfish individuals, professing to instruct their fellow-subjects in the mysteries of political economy, have declared our colonies to be a burthen on the Home Exchequer. I deny that assertion; every colony in North America has a revenue adequate to all its wants, and, under a system now in progress, provides a permanent civil list for the chief officers of the government. It is therefore high time that the destinies of England ceased to be confided to theorists, false economists, and political mountebanks, who have made every possible effort within the last few years to destroy our colonial commerce; at one moment threatening to annihilate the Canada timber trade, at another the Cape of Good Hope wine trade, and passively looking on, or pretending to consult crown lawyers, when the French vessels of war were expelling by force peaceful British fishermen from the coast of their own island of Newfoundland. If the empire of Britain be destined to crumble into fragments, it will not be by fraud or force from without, but by treachery and cowardice from within. The finest portion of the North American continent is still an integral part of that empire; its people affectionately attached to the parent state, and daily strengthening and consolidating our national resources and power. If we act justly towards those colonists, we have nothing to apprehend from the increasing maritime power of the United States, or the augmenting territorial acquisitions of our Gallic neighbour; on the contrary, by a wise course we may place our northern colonists in a position to become the invaders, and not, as before, the invaded, should the United States continue threatening, as they now do, hostilities—while we may have a good prospect of getting back some of the fertile territory which the ignorance of English diplomatists allowed our crafty neighbours to seize.—M. Martin's Hist. British Colonies.

RAILROAD ACROSS THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.

The project for this very desirable undertaking has been lately revived by the government of New Grenada, to which state the Isthmus of Panama belongs. We understand that an agent has recently arrived in England for the purpose of obtaining contractors for the work, according to the terms of the decree of that republic of the 27th May 1834. From a perusal of this decree, we find that the passage in question is to consist either of a common road for carriages and waggons, or an iron railroad, as contractors may be found. The principal inducement held out to speculators consists in a grant of 20,000 fanegadas, or about 24,000 acres, of waste land upon the isthmus, with a free possession of the products from the road for a term of years which shall not be less than ten, nor exceed fifty years. The state toll-dues, a list of which is appended to the decree, are, however, to commence with the opening of the road. Upon the waste land to be granted, colonies of foreigners may be settled, and these are to be exempted, for twenty years, from taxation, military service, and the like. Failing in contractors from abroad, it is said that Santander, the President of New Grenada, is himself sanguine enough to commence the undertaking, with the resources of the state, believing that a sum of L.350,000 would be sufficient for the completion of the work. If this has reference to an iron railway, our readers will perceive that such a sum is totally, and even absurdly, insufficient for the completion of an undertaking in a country where labour is so scarce, and for which the whole of the machinery, iron work, and mechanical ability, must be brought from Great Britain or some other of the European states. The distance from the Atlantic to the Pacific is certainly very short, from Panama to Porto Bello being only a distance of thirty-seven miles; but then this narrow isthmus is covered with an almost uninterrupted range of mountains, of a height so stupendous as to have always been considered an insuperable bar to the junction, by a canal, of the waters of the two seas. Hitherto the projects for a canal have all been laid down as passing by the very circuitous route of the lake of Nicaragua. No particular route is specified, however, in the decree of the 27th of May last. If properly executed and protected, there can exist no doubt of the very extraordinary consequences which would arise to the world from thus cutting off a navigation of two thousand miles round Cape Horn, to all the countries on the great Southern Ocean. Much as we should rejoice in seeing so truly noble an undertaking brought into a practicable shape, we fear, however, that, in the present condition of the states of South America, the time for its proper and profitable accomplishment is really not yet come. Still we have thought it interesting to the public to be informed of the present state and probabilities of a project, which at a future day will become of such extensive importance to the world.—Athenæum.

SCOTLAND.

Dec. 26. As Mr Hume, farmer, Comiston, near Edinburgh, was proceeding homewards on horseback from his farm at Colinton, in taking the sharp turn of the road leading to Redford, his horse fell, in consequence of the road being slippery by an intense frost, and threw Mr Hume with great violence on the ground, by which he received a severe contusion on the head and chest. He expired on Sunday 29, greatly regretted by a very numerous circle of friends.

31. As the Kilmun, steamer, was passing Dunglass, on her way to the Broomielaw, she was approached by the ferry-boat with sixteen passengers on board. On getting alongside, the captain of the steamer, finding her driving on the dyke, hastily cried to the boat to put off, at the same moment ordering the steam to be let on. Ere the boat could get far enough away, the surge of the paddles caused her to swamp, when no less than twelve of the passengers were drowned.

Jan. 1. The St Patrick Roman Catholic Chapel, Bristo Street, Edinburgh, was opened with great pomp and solemnity, and the music performed on the occasion was unusually grand and imposing. The organ, built by Messrs Small, Bruce, and Company, for the chapel, is on a very splendid scale.—A child nearly five years of age was sent by its father, who resides in Keith, to a shop at the distance of about a quarter of a mile from his house. As the child did not return, he commenced a search, assisted by his neighbours, but without success. The search was renewed upon Friday, but the child was not discovered till Saturday at noon, when it was found with its stockings and shoes under its arm, lying upon its face between two hillocks of heather, about four miles from home. Wonderful to say, it was still living, after having been exposed during two days and nights to intense frost, without nourishment of any description. It is now recovering, and its only complaint was of pain in the ears and feet.—The Dalry Mills, near Coltbridge, Edinburgh, were accidentally burnt.

4. The first baptism, after a lapse of 132 years, took place at Chapelhall Kirk, Logiealmond. The last register of baptism is dated 1702.

5. A public meeting was held in the Town Hall, Kirkcaldy, when resolutions were passed unanimously in favour of establishing an association in this district similar to that which was instituted for about four years in Edinburgh, for the purpose of procuring lectures on natural science.

13. A most alarming and destructive fire occurred at Dundee, in a warehouse belonging to Mr James Watt jun., which happened to be chock-full of hemp and codilla, with upwards of two hundred barrels of tar in the cellars underneath. The swelling of the hemp burst the walls and the gables, the latter of which, falling suddenly, buried seven persons in the ruins, only two of whom were rescued alive. The unfortunate men who perished were labourers. Luckily the fire was prevented communicating with the tar.

19. A terrific hurricane of wind and snow was experienced in and around Edinburgh, which lasted from noon till midnight. Many distressing accounts of disasters at sea along the east coast of Scotland have been received, accompanied by loss of life.—Mr Peat, bookseller, Ranelagh Street, Edinburgh, and Mr Ramsay, a working jeweller in Edinburgh, were unfortunately drowned in Duddingston Loch, while skating, by the ice giving way.

Temperance.—A letter from Philadelphia to a gentleman in Edinburgh, states that spirituous liquor is entirely excluded there from the tables at hotels, steam-boats, and all respectable families. The consumption of wine is greatly lessened, and many of the citizens drink nothing but water, of which there is an abundant supply of excellent quality. According to the American Almanac, the number of temperance societies in the United States now exceeds 7000, with more than 1,250,000 members; and more than 1000 American vessels are now sailing on the ocean in which ardent spirits are not used.

The Right Hon. the Lord Advocate has appointed the following gentlemen his deputies, viz. Patrick Robertson, Robert Wigham, Adam Urquhart, and David Milne, Esquires, advocates. The Solicitor-Generalship has been conferred on Duncan McNeill, Esq. advocate, sheriff of Perthshire. Adam Anderson, Esq. advocate, succeeds Mr McNeill as sheriff of Perthshire.

Postscript.

January 27.

By the latest accounts in the London Conservative newspapers, the gain of that party in the general election amounts to 103; according to the Liberal journals, there are 271 "Tories" against 372 "Reformers." This brings the returns to within fifteen of the whole number.

A report of a speech delivered by Sir Robert Peel, on the 16th January, to his constituents at Tamworth, has been published, and contains some interesting information. Sir Robert mentioned that, so far from any arrangement having been made by him or his friends for obtaining office on the present occasion, he had left the country for Italy without one word of communication with the Duke of Wellington, respecting either the place of his destination or the period of his absence. He had accepted office in obedience to the command of the King, and if in doing so he had incurred any responsibility, he was willing to abide by it. He denied that the men who had taken office with him were odious to the people; many of them were the representatives of large constituencies. He also denied the right assumed by every particular class of politicians to call themselves "the people." The nobility, gentry, clergy, and magistracy of England, had as good a right to be considered as a part of the people, as any other part of the community; and these, he was convinced, were willing to allow a fair trial to the King's government. He then endeavoured to prove, by reference to his past conduct, that he was at least a variety of the species of Reformers, and might therefore, without incurring a charge of apostasy, bring forward such measures of improvement as might enable him to carry along with him a majority in the House of Commons. He particularly alluded to a reform of the church, and the redress of the grievances of the dissenters. Finally, the Right Hon. Baronet expressed a confident hope that he would succeed in maintaining the government which the King had been pleased to appoint.

The Standard and Times have given a brief outline of a plan of church reform which is said to be at present under the serious consideration of government, and which they mean to offer in greater detail to the deliberation of Parliament. Its leading features are to abolish pluralism; to enforce residence; to reduce the higher Episcopal revenues; to augment the poorer livings, and pay the working clergy better; to endow additional churches, where they may be found necessary, out of funds that may be realised partly from the surplus of the bishops' reduced incomes, partly from the surplus revenues of deans and chapters, and partly from the reversion that may arise from the general equalised redistribution of church funds. The Morning Chronicle professes to be satisfied with this measure, which, it says, goes far beyond what it could have expected from a Tory ministry. The plan is to have the full concurrence of the Episcopal bench.

It is now generally expected that the attack upon the ministers in Parliament will commence with an opposition to the re-appointment of Sir C. Manners Sutton as Speaker.

Recent Scottish returns are—Mr C. Grant for Inverness-shire, by a majority of 7 (260-253), against the Tory candidate, Macleod, who has protested; Lord James Stuart for the Ayr burghs, by a majority of 16 (334-318), against Mr Johnston; Captain Wemyss for Fifeshire, by a majority of 467 (1051-584), against the Tory candidate, Colonel Lindsay, who has protested, on the allegation that the rioting at Kirkcaldy prevented some of his friends from polling.

We have this week the melancholy office of recording the death of Mr Charles Lamb, the author of John Woodvil, of the Elia, and of other works both in verse and prose, the most truly delightful which the age has produced. It is the sad duty of the kind we have ever been called on to perform; and it is with difficulty we can force on ourselves the persuasion that event which compels us to it is real. Mr Lamb's genius, pure and delicate as it was, so intimately associated itself with household thoughts, so closely intermingled with the customary enjoyments of daily life, making what was already dear, yet dearer, touch the secret springs of social pleasure with a quickening art, bringing out so delightfully the latent affinities of familiar life, that our obstinate regard insists on the impossibility of its being taken from us. But it is so! Mr Lamb died on Saturday, 27th of December, at Edmonton, in the sixty-first year of his life, after an illness of a few days, during which we have the consolation to believe that he suffered but little, and to know that his untimely departure was the result of a disposition never, for an instant, faltering.—Examiner.

FUTURE STATE OF SOCIETY.

The notion that, in consequence of the social changes now in operation, distinctions of ranks will be abolished, and the highly gifted in intellect and moral sentiment reduced to a level with the ignorant and the rude, is not grounded on correct views of human nature. Mental distinctions are as deeply founded in nature, as differences in qualities purely physical; brains and temperaments differ, and minds therefore differ. All differences in social institutions, which rest on the basis of nature, must partake of her immutability. While, however, fine qualities of mind and talent confer on the possessor an inherent superiority, which cannot be destroyed, over beings less happily constituted, all institutions which aim at conferring superiority by means purely artificial, apart from, or in direct opposition to, natural qualities, must be viewed in a different light; and the inquiry presents itself, in what respects do any of the purely artificial distinctions of ranks, now existing, impede the changes which the welfare of the community at large may hereafter demand? The existence of hereditary titles and honours, by conferring consequence, precedence, and political power on individuals who may not possess natural superiority, is at variance with reason, and cannot, therefore, if the world is constituted on sound principles, be ultimately productive of good; but it does not follow that they should be immediately or violently abolished. The chief evil of them consists in this, that the modes of life, opinions, tastes, and feelings of an artificial class, are presented as the highest standards to engage the ambition of all the other orders of society; and just because nature does not bestow gradations of real greatness on individuals, in exact conformity to their artificial rank, this class is prone to invent factitious distinctions, inconsistent with and opposed to nature, and to regard consideration according to them. They cultivate the sentiment of "exclusiveness." The greater deficiency of valuable qualities in themselves, the more prominent and striking do they desire to render their conventional distinctions. A century and a half ago, when nobles and the people were equally ignorant and ill-educated, the man of rank decked himself in richly embroidered clothes and gold spangles, wore a sword, had his hair cut out, and substituted in its place a huge wig. These insignia of greatness struck the imagination of an illiterate vulgar, and maintained them in awe-stricken subjection to beings so vastly superior to themselves in external appearance. In proportion as mind has advanced, and society has become capable of appreciating moral and intellectual qualities, the nobles have found it safe and agreeable to lay aside these decorations in ordinary life. The Duke of Wellington, walking or riding in a blue frock-coat, a white silk handkerchief, blue trousers, and boots without lace, gold, or glitter, is recognised by the enlightened ranks of Britain as an object of respect, because he has manifested great military talents, and because he and they would feel himself debased, if he were presented to them habitually in the full-bottomed wig and laced coat which constituted the outward symbols of greatness in the days of Marlborough. A noble who should now resort to that costume to attract respect, would be treated with ridicule and contempt: and yet the day was, when the mere appearance of these vestments on the person, would be called forth profound reverence from thousands of the people.

The late Earl of Morton was destitute of genius and commanding qualities of mind, and was extremely proud of his rank. He instinctively felt that he had no other title to superiority. The late Earl of Hopetoun, on the contrary, was great and good by natural endowments, and his honours were meekly borne. He had a sympathy with human nature, which made him cordially recognise nobility of mind in whatever station he found it; and he was loved and admired as a man, far beyond any homage that was rendered to his coronet. In losing his artificial rank, the former would have lost all title to consideration, while the latter would have experienced no change. Wherever nature bestows superiority, well-informed men delight to render homage to its possessor, and this sincere and spontaneous reverence is the only distinction which a virtuous and educated mind can enjoy. Ignorance in the votary is as essential to the worship of artificial rank, apart from personal merit, as it is to the adoration of idols destitute of all intelligence and power. When society shall be sufficiently enlightened, we think it probable that titles will be viewed in the same light as the laced coat and full-bottomed wig—as artificial distinctions devised to give an external appearance of greatness which may or may not be actually present. The really great will not desire them, but prefer the sincere respect which their own qualities will command.

The nobles will not be left forlorn when these days shall come, because other changes will have occurred to compensate them for the loss. Dukes of the present day do not regard themselves as unhappy, because the progress of social improvement has deprived them of the power of "pit and gallows," or of torturing and hanging men, which their feudal ancestors enjoyed. The same civilisation which has abolished that privilege has brought with it so many compensating advantages to the nobles themselves, that they would shudder at the proposal to restore to them the possession of all the power, accompanied by all the ferocity, insecurity, and ignorance, of their ancestors. The higher ranks, when fired with the ambition of attaining to the true dignity of rational beings—when enjoying that high health of body, and that pleasing vigour of mind, which will accompany a life spent in accordance with the constitution of nature—will not sigh for their factitious titles, accompanied by the inanities and vexations that now darken their existence. When they shall have learned the elementary principles of physiology, and acted upon them in their marriages, and thereby established a high-born race according to Nature's patent of nobility, boasting of fine forms, fine temperaments, and finely organised minds, and have experienced the substantial and permanent advantages of such an inheritance, they will look back on the high-sounding dignities, the exclusive privileges, the disdainful pride, accompanied by the crooked spines, the diseased brains, the gouty limbs, the ignorant intellects, the paltry ambition, and empty pursuits of preceding ages, not with envy, as on glories passed away, but with pity for their ancestors, and gratitude that they themselves have lived in a more enlightened age, when men distinguished substances from shadows.

There is no danger to the nobles that their titles will be abolished before the compensating advantages of a higher civilisation are attained. While the tradesman's ambition shall be directed not to rational acquirements, but to rising in artificial consequence, the titles of nobles will rest on the same basis as the other institutions of society. There is extremely little probability of the people making irregular advances in civilisation, and destroying one or two institutions that were suited to an age of barbarism, before they have acquired intelligence and morality sufficient to supersede their utility. The power of "pit and gallows" was not taken away from the feudal lords until the administration of civil and criminal law had become so vigorous in the country as to afford them a better safeguard than they enjoyed from the exercise of their own authority. They had laid aside the practical use of their power before the law formally annulled it. In like manner, we see no reason to fear, that, so long as other rude opinions and institutions shall flourish, hereditary titles will be abolished, supposing no political conflict to hasten their dissolution. On the contrary, we think that the nobles will rest secure in possession of their privileges until a higher civilisation shall extinguish them, with their own consent, by rendering them no longer desirable.

Another apprehension entertained by some individuals belonging to the aristocracy is, that the lower orders of the people will rise en masse, and make spoil of their property and estates; but this also appears to us to be chimerical. The right to property acquired by a fair title, rests on the sentiment of justice; and it is a striking example of inconsistent and illogical deduction, emanating from fear, to conclude, that, in proportion as knowledge shall be disseminated, and the moral and intellectual faculties of the people shall be cultivated, they will desire to depart from the dictates of reason and the obligations of justice. As well might men prophesy, that, in proportion as the sun shall ascend in the hemisphere, and the clouds clear away, will the blackness of darkness increase.* Organs of moral sentiment exist in the lower as well as in the higher orders of the people, and all social institutions, consistent with justice, rest as securely on these faculties as their basis, as our houses and temples do on the solid earth; and the more highly the superior sentiments and intellect are cultivated, the firmer will become the groundwork of every beneficial institution. Property, therefore, will become more safe, in proportion to the diffusion of knowledge in the nation; and danger of its spoliation will be proportionally diminished.

There is one change, however, in regard to property, which the aristocracy may expect to experience, from an advance in civilisation on the part of the people. At present, an individual possessing an income of L.100 per annum feels himself poor, not so much on account of the want of real comforts, as because he lives in society with a neighbour enjoying L.200 a-year, who keeps a finer house, dresses more fashionably, and employs more servants; all which circumstances create a feeling of inferiority and envy in the poorer citizen. The man of L.200 a-year, again, associates with a neighbour possessing L.400 per annum, and sees himself completely eclipsed, and he also feels envious and discontented. The man of L.400 a-year sees himself overtopped by another possessing L.1000 a-year, who is overshadowed by a neighbour enjoying L.2000 a-year, who again is eclipsed by another boasting of L.10,000 a-year, who is utterly extinguished by a great noble, blazing in all the magnificence of L.100,000 per annum. Unless the contentment which springs from high moral qualities is possessed, every one of these men, except the last, feels himself poor, not on account of the want of essential comforts, but because a standard of consideration has been erected in society, tried by which he is conscious of great inferiority; and he therefore pants and toils after an increase of wealth, so that he may elevate himself to a higher point in the scale; after attaining which, however, he is as unhappy as before, because he sees other fortunes still overtopping him, and mortifying his vanity. Each stage of civilisation has its own criterion of consideration. In early times, the standard of individual excellence was muscular strength and manual dexterity. In more advanced conditions, it included courage and combative skill; in our day it is wealth; and the next step will be, to render physical health and beauty, combined with cultivated moral sentiments and enlightened intellect, the tests of individual excellence. As soon as a true philosophy shall become known to the people at large, they will perceive that this is the only real standard acknowledged by nature, and they will aim at rendering it practical. It will then be discovered that excessive inequality of fortune is adverse to the interests of society. A moderate extent of intelligence and morality is sufficient to enable an individual to accumulate wealth; and while property shall continue to form the chief ground of consideration, it will be difficult to induce the generality of men to aim at higher attainments. So long as individuals shall suffer mortification, and be excited to envy by the splendour, power, and consideration enjoyed by men of large estates, however moderate in moral and intellectual attainments, will they be stimulated by these feelings to direct their chief efforts towards augmenting their own fortunes; and so long will they pursue vanities as their chief business, instead of dedicating their powers to the cultivation of the better portions of their own nature. We do not insinuate that all men of aristocratical rank are deficient in natural qualities. On the contrary, we know well that high endowments abound among them; but our proposition is, that these gifted persons care least for their artificial distinctions. The props of the factitious standard are the meagre intellect, in moral sentiment, and in knowledge. If the great body of all ranks in Britain were supplied with the physical comforts of life, freed from immoderate care, blessed with reasonable leisure, and had their mental energies directed by the full impetus of social emulation to the development and enjoyment of their rational powers, we are enthusiastic enough to believe, that they would be greatly happier than in their present condition; and we can discover no insurmountable obstacles on the part of nature to such a social state being realised. In Paris, mental qualities confer higher claims to consideration than in London; because in that city wealth is more limited in proportion to knowledge. If the great body of the English nation were so enlightened as to give precedence to all qualities and possessions, only in proportion to their intrinsic worth, a high stimulus would be afforded to the physical, moral, and intellectual improvement of the people; but the worship of pure wealth obstructs this advancement, by withdrawing from natural qualities the consideration to which they are legitimately entitled.

* It is a fact which never can be too earnestly pressed on public attention, that a general attack by the poor upon the possessions of the rich is a thing unknown in the history of mankind: such an event has never yet taken place, and is now less likely to do so than ever.

Persons of large property will probably ask, do we recommend partition of their estates as beneficial for the nation, notwithstanding what we have just written? Certainly not. Great landholders may safely rely on the steady operation of the two principles which we have already stated; 1st, That as long as the mass of society shall continue to worship wealth as the highest enjoyment, they will not permit its spoliation, because such a practice would be at direct variance with their own favourite passion of accumulation; and 2dly, That if men shall ever become so civilised as to prefer the enjoyments springing from the cultivation of their own rational nature, to mere superfluity of physical possessions, they will have no desire to commit spoliation on the sons of Mammon, because they will not covet their wealth.

The changes in regard to property to which we allude, will be these. At present the municipal law is framed with the deliberate purpose of favouring vast accumulations in the hands of individuals, of perpetuating this wealth in their descendants, however deficient in physical, moral, and intellectual qualities, and of promoting, so far as in the power of law, the great differences of fortune, which we have stated to be adverse to the progress of morality and reason. When the people shall have become enlightened, they will insist for the abrogation of the laws which produce these effects—namely, those of entail and primogeniture; but this may be done without touching an acre of the property of those in the legal possession of estates. The effect of this repeal would be, that no individual could continue during life to hold large property without possessing judgment and morality, equal, at least, to the average of these qualities in the active and educated men of his own age. If he were foolish and inconsiderate, he would spend and lose his property, which would naturally fall into the possession of a man of higher mental qualities.

Proprietors would then be compelled to keep in line with the other members of society in the march of moral and intellectual improvement. By the present state of the law, vast territories may, and sometimes do, pass into the hands of vain, ignorant, imbecile, and immoral individuals, and are transmitted unimpaired to their posterity by the mere force of the law itself, in defiance of the greatest mental deficiencies. Individuals thus placed above the laws of their own nature are invested with the power of erecting a standard of consideration fitted to their own meagre attainments, and of obstructing to a great extent the progress of knowledge and civilisation. By repealing these laws, the power of raising a false standard, and of tempting the other members of society to measure attainments by it, would be taken away. If these laws were repealed, there would be a breaking down, in the course of a few generations, of the enormous fortunes now possessed by great families. This would remove the idols, whose existence and influence at present dazzle the imagination and captivate the ambition of the middle classes of society, and render them slaves to the pursuit of wealth, and comparatively indifferent to solid information and rational enjoyment. If the lower orders could be induced to abridge their hours of labour, and to devote the time gained to the cultivation of their mental faculties, in a few generations they would be elevated in the scale of intelligence and morality, and the two extremities of society, which are the strongholds of vice and misery, would both be improved. There would then be fewer obstacles, and more incitements, to the progress of sound principles and solid happiness in the nation at large.

Political economists fear the consequences of breaking down large properties, and prophesy that the ultimate result will be the reduction of the whole population to beggary. These philosophers appear to us to be frequently inattentive to the agency of the moral faculties in human affairs. They reason on effects which cannot be produced except by high morality and intelligence, as if they were capable of co-existing along with barbarism and ignorance. It is like speculating on the deplorable consequences which would ensue to the vegetable world, if the sun were for a whole year to give light, but no heat. While society shall be constituted, as at present, on the principle that increase in wealth is of more importance than improvement in physical, moral, and intellectual qualities, it will be impossible to abolish entails and the rights of primogeniture; because the selfish feelings of the law-makers will cling to these institutions. On the other hand, whenever society at large shall recognise the object of life to be the cultivation and enjoyment of the rational powers of man, and that wealth is given to subserve this end, a degree of self-respect, an efficiency of moral principle, a strength and vivacity of intellectual perception, together with a knowledge of real good, will be spread abroad among all ranks of the people, that will protect the world from extreme degradation, more effectually than it has hitherto been by the titled and untitled aristocracy, aided by their large estates, whether entailed or unentailed. It is absurd to fear that the lower orders, while rude and ignorant, will accomplish a repeal of these laws; because, in the first place, they will not have the power to succeed, and, in the second place, while in that condition of mind, they will be incapable of comprehending the effect of their repeal on society, or of taking an interest in consequences so remote as those to which it would lead.

These views may be shortly recapitulated.

Hereditary rank and titles will be safe as long as society at large shall continue ignorant and selfish: When men in general shall become moral and intelligent, individuals will be esteemed only for their intrinsic good qualities, and then artificial distinctions will be voluntarily laid aside, as at variance with reason and the spirit of the age. Ample compensation will be afforded to the nobles for their loss, in the superior enjoyments which an advanced civilisation will confer.

At all times property will rest safe from spoliation, because selfish men will protect it for their own sakes, and highly cultivated men will hold it sacred on the principles of justice.

Great disproportion in the wealth of individuals is injurious to morality, because it enables the rich to erect a standard of consideration separate from that of physical, moral, and intellectual excellence, whereby the ambition of ordinary minds is directed to the pursuit of wealth, in place of the improvement of their whole nature as rational beings. The proper remedy for this evil is, not to spoil the rich, but to repeal the laws favouring unequal distribution of wealth, and to frame others encouraging the moral and intellectual cultivation of the people; so that, on the one hand, no artificial props shall maintain weak and immoral persons in possession of power and consideration, and, on the other, no false standards shall mislead, and no artificial impediments obstruct, the progress of the lower orders in attaining all the enjoyments suited to their nature as rational beings.

Finally, there is no reason to fear the degradation of society from the subdivision of property, because so long as men shall continue selfish and ignorant, they will not be inclined to repeal the laws that favour unequal distribution; and whenever knowledge and morality shall be so widely diffused as to induce them to do so, the influence of high principles on enlightened minds will better support the dignity and happiness of man, than the large estates and hereditary titles of the aristocracy. In a state of free competition, there will be a more equal proportion between mental qualities and wealth, than at present.—Phrenological Journal.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

AFTER offering Mr Livingstone his passport, thus displaying an indifference to the threats of an American President, the French ministry convened the Chamber of Deputies, and laid before them a project of law for setting aside the sum of 25,000,000 francs, to be applied in execution of the treaty of indemnity entered into in 1831 with the United States. The bill was in substance the same as the one introduced and rejected last year; but it contained an additional clause, providing that no payment should take place till the intention of the United States government should become known. As a further safeguard to the national honour, the minister said that the French government desired to look upon the President's message to Congress as merely the inconsiderate act of an isolated power. After these proceedings had taken place, intelligence arrived of an amendment against the President's message having been carried in the American Senate by Mr Clay.—"That it is inexpedient at present to adopt any legislative measures in regard to the state of affairs between this country and France." "The resolution, as amended," says the Nation Intelligence, "was adopted by yeas and nays, by a unanimous vote, only one senator being absent." By this act, and by the French bill for the payment referred to a dilatory committee, the question seems to be in a fair way of falling asleep.

In the meantime, another claim of a similar nature has sprung up against France. The Emperor Nicholas, as King of Poland, claims a large sum from the French nation, in payment of claims arising out of the occupation of Poland by the French armies in 1814, that was concluded by the treaty of Tilsit. On the other hand, the French advance counter-claims. The Opposition in the Chambers aver that all these accounts were balanced in the grand settlement of 1814; but the ministers reply, that a separate treaty expressly reserved for future consideration the settlement of these Polish differences; and they colour the Chamber with the assurance that a balance should be due to France. Nicholas, however, has put forward a large sum, to be received from France, on the Russian ways and means for the year.

The Chamber of Peers has finished its preliminary review of the charges against the persons accused of treason; of whom one hundred and twenty are retained in custody to be tried on specific accusations. Whatever may be the result, it will prove disastrous to the government, who have acted sparingly with little discretion in the matter. Should the prisoners be acquitted, there rests with the ministry the odium of having inflicted much unnecessary suffering; should they be condemned, the trial will be the object almost exclusively of sympathy, and will have little or no effect, therefore, as an example. There are rumours of intended changes in the ministry. It is probable that Marshal Mortier will not resign; but whether this will occasion further changes, or who will be his successor, are matters mere conjecture.

SPAIN.

GREAT dissatisfaction has lately been felt in Spain with the conduct of General Llauder, minister of the individual whose resistance to Zea Bermudez, while in command of Catalonia, was of such importance in bringing about the downfall of that minister. Llauder, who is a favourite with the Queen Regent, has become unpopular, in consequence of his hostility to Mina, his desire of introducing the French troops, and a general suspicion of inclination to an anti-liberal policy. A military insurrection on his account, and which was attended by striking characteristic circumstances, took place on the 9th of January. In the middle of the night, a body of five hundred men, headed by a subaltern officer of the name of Cardero, attacked the post-office, of which they took possession, after having overpowered and disarmed the guard, without noise or disturbance. In the morning, General Canterac, the captain-general of the province, appeared in front of the building, and attempted to remonstrate with the insurgents. Cardero advanced; an expostulation, or rather altercation, ensued between them, when the captain-general called one of the grenadiers, and desired him to go to the different barracks, and to give orders in his name. Cardero said that he should not go. General Canterac, a spirited officer, then exclaimed, "What do you obey the captain-general?" He then drew his sword and raised his arm as if to seize the other by the brist, when Cardero retreated a few steps, and cried out to a company which was near, "Soldiers, fire!" He struck General Canterac, and, as he fell, he exclaimed "Long live Isabel II., and the liberties of our country." Two shots more were fired from the ranks, a fourth from one of the windows of the post-office, and Canterac ceased to live. The news now spread through the city. At ten o'clock, General Llauder self galloped up at the head of a column of troops, endeavoured ineffectually to treat with the insurgents. A regular engagement took place, which lasted four, but happily was attended with less bloodshed than might have been expected; the number killed was said to amount to five or six insurgents, as many officers, and about as many spectators. At length the fighting ceased, and a fresh attempt at an accommodation was made. Pardon was offered to the insurgents, accepting the actual murderers of Canterac; the battalion replied, "To all or none; for when the captain-general was shot, it could not be known who fired, there had been persons of the national guard and others present." After some delay the promise was given, and the revolutionaries marched out of the post-office, bugles blowing and drums beating, with their ranks in order, and their lieutenant-colonel placed him at their head, and led them out of the city to Almadras, a village three leagues distant. They join an army in the north, "going joyfully," as Martinez de la Rosa afterwards said in the chamber, "to Nature, to wash out the stain of yesterday with their blood."

His insurrection produced great excitement, as might be supposed, among the Procuradores. On the 19th, they declared their sittings permanent until the minister of war should attend and answer the questions which the Chamber might think proper to put to him. The minister soon after made his appearance, and a long and angry discussion followed. The opposition members bore very heavily upon Llauder, adduced against him several charges of an antipathetic tendency, to which, they said, the recent discussion was alone to be traced. Any notion of sympathy on the queen's cause they scouted. The traitors, they more than insinuated, were those whose abuse of the confidence of the regent tended to prove suspicious derogatory from her character as the representative of the liberal principles of the nation. The pressure was so great that the queen was obliged to dismiss Llauder from her counsels, leaving, however, to resume the governorship of Catalonia.

These dissensions have of course had the effect of weakening the Spanish government; yet it is now confidently asserted that means are available, fully sufficient to put down the Carlists. The Austrian government is stated to be reducing troops through confidence in the peace-preserving influence of the Duke of Wellington. It is at the same time employing very imperious language with Switzerland, in which the French government is to join—for procuring the expulsion of political refugees from that country.

PERSIA.

War was lately threatened in Persia. The son of Abbas Mirza, the eldest son of the late king, been recognised by England and Russia; but one of his brothers of his deceased father usurped the regency at Teheran, and put out the eyes of two of his nephews. The subsequent submission of this barbarian has terminated the contest.

WEST INDIES.

There are coming to a crisis in Jamaica. The different branches of the colonial government are now in open rupture. The committee of the house of assembly, a body, it is to be observed, who should be checked with much jealousy, have presented a report the most glowing sort respecting the condition of "apprentices," and recommends "a more numerous and competent magistracy, possessing local experience and knowledge, to preserve order, repress crime, and enforce industry." The assembly has in consequence requested the Marquis of Sligo to invest special commissions such a number of the local magistrates in each parish as may be sufficient to enforce order and subordination. The marquis has declined acceding to this, and strong resolutions have been passed in the house against him. In Demerara, up to the 17th December, the negroes remained in a state of idleness; every kind of produce was advancing in price, and the colony was in a very distressed state. The conduct of the lieutenant-governor was the subject of much animadversion, and a memorial on the subject had been presented and signed by upwards of eleven hundred of the colonists. The memorialists state their firm conviction that the colony can never know peace, nor enjoy benevolent intentions of his Majesty's government, until it remains under the course of policy adopted by his excellency Sir James Carmichael Smyth; they therefore solicit attention to the document accompanying the memorial, and pray that their grievances may be redressed ere the system of misgovernment shall be involved all in ruin.

EAST INDIES.

"Supplement to the London Gazette" was published Feb. 3, containing a dispatch from Lord W. P. Russell, governor-general of India; to the chair of the Court of Directors, enclosing a copy of his excellency's general order to the army on the close of the war between the government of India and the Marquis of Coorg. It is, as usual, highly complimentary to Brigadier Lindsey and the troops under his command, expressive of his entire approbation of the manner in which the military operations were conducted and brought to a speedy and successful termination, and particularly requesting that the distinguished and gallant manner in which Colonel Foulis conducted the operations of the column under his command may be brought to the particular notice of his Majesty's government.

A private letter from India states as follows:—Many officers have been refused leave to come home in consequence of war having been declared against one of the most powerful states now in India, the Rattore Rajah, by name Mann Singh, who has given offence to the British government. The place we are going against is Joudpoor, the stronghold of the above Rajah. It is not supposed there will be much fighting, as there will be so strong a force sent against him—about 10,000 men, a force fully equal to 60,000 undisciplined natives.

CHINESE TRADE.

LORD NAPIER, who lately left England as superintendent under the new system, has at the very commencement fallen out with the Chinese government. His lordship, instead of waiting, as usual, at Macao, went on the 25th of July to Canton, without the permission of the governor, who had previously, soon after the arrival of Lord Napier, issued an order to the Hong merchants, to "go in person to Macao, and ascertain clearly from the barbarian eye [by this strange name his lordship's character as a super-visor seems to be implied: it must be generally known that the Chinese look upon the British and other nations as barbarians] for what he had come to Canton province." When, in spite of this order, Lord Napier went to Canton, the governor issued another proclamation—

"On this occasion the barbarian eye, Lord Napier, has come to Canton, without having at all resided at Macao to wait for orders. Nor has he requested or received a permit from the superintendent of the customs, but has hastily come up to Canton—a great infringement of the established laws. The customhouse writers and others who presumed to admit him to enter, are sent with a communication requiring their trial. But, in tender consideration for the said barbarian eye being a new comer, and unacquainted with the laws of the Celestial Empire, I will not strictly investigate. But it is not expedient that the said barbarian eye should remain long at Canton: it must be required that when the commercial business, regarding which he has to inquire and hold jurisdiction, is finished, he immediately return to Macao; and hereafter, without having requested and obtained a permit, he cannot be allowed to come to Canton."

Still the obstinate barbarian, Lord Napier, would not move. A third order was therefore promulgated, the wording of which proves that the Chinese official had some reasoning powers.

"To sum up—the nation has its laws; it is so every where. Even England has its laws. How much more the Celestial Empire! How flaming bright are its great laws and ordinances, more terrible than the awful thunderbolt! Under this whole bright heaven none dares to disobey them. Under its shelter are the four seas. Subject to its soothing care are the ten thousand kingdoms. The said barbarian eye, having come over a sea of several myriads of miles in extent, to examine and have superintendence of affairs, must be a man thoroughly acquainted with the principles of high dignity; and in his person he sustains the duties of an officer—an 'eye.' He must necessarily in every affair act in accordance with reason. Then only can he control and restrain the barbarian merchants."

"I the governor, looking up, will embody the extreme wish of the great emperor, to cherish with tenderness the men from a distance; and assuredly I will not treat slightly the outside barbarians. But the national laws are extremely strict and close-drawn; we dare not in the least transgress. Let the said barbarian eye be very careful not to listen to the artful instigations of evil men, enticing him, until he falls of the object of the said nation's king in sending him so far."

The result of the matter was, that trade was suspended; and that Lord Napier was waiting to see what effect the arrival of two British frigates, the Andromache and the Ariadne, would have upon the Chinese functionaries.

The Queen of Portugal's marriage with the Duke of Leuchtenberg, now styled Prince Augustus of Portugal, was celebrated on the 30th of January with great rejoicings. The prince is said to be doing his best to render himself popular.

Don Miguel suddenly left Rome on the 31st of January, and it was conjectured that the return of his friends the Tories to power had emboldened him to try a descent on Spain or Portugal. He has since re-appeared at Genoa, on his way to Vienna.

After a trial which lasted eight successive days, at Brussels, the Count Duval de Beaulieu has finally obtained a sentence in his favour, with all costs and expenses, against the commune of Moortzel, on account of his lady the Countess de Toit. This extraordinary lawsuit commenced two hundred years ago, and related to the avenue of a country-seat belonging to him at Moortzel, in the arrondissement of Antwerp, which the commune claimed as a public road.

Prince Talleyrand is now no longer able to move about on his legs; his only means of locomotion are effected by the assistance of two valets, who lift him into his carriage and out of it. When M. de Talleyrand attends the king, his two servants, who constantly accompany him, are obliged to take him in their arms, and carry him into the royal cabinet. M. de Talleyrand will complete his 81st year on the 2d of February next.

The Moniteur publishes officially a list of the savings banks in the kingdom of France, which amount to seventy-nine already established. There are also fifty-two more under consideration, making a total of 131.

We are happy in being able to announce to the friends of the Earl of Dalhousie, the completion of the monument erected to Wolfe and Montcalm at Quebec, under the patronage of his lordship, and aided by his liberality to so large an amount. The inscription on the subbase has been affixed for some weeks, and on Thursday last the inscription, written by Dr Fisher, for which the prize medal was adjudged by the committee, was placed upon the sarcophagus, fronting to the basin. It is cut in what are termed block letters, on a very hard slab of marble. The scaffolding has been removed, and this beautiful monument is now seen to the best advantage, the white marble slabs bearing the inscriptions, giving an air of lightness to the whole obelisk. The names "Wolfe" and "Montcalm" have also been placed on the sides of the sarcophagus in bold relief.—Quebec Mercury.

Mr Grundy, one of the most experienced of American senators, states, that from a legal experience of upwards of thirty years, he is convinced that four-fifths of all the crimes committed in the United States may be traced to drunkenness.

The foreign ambassadors, who had been gradually withdrawn from our semi-liberalised court, are fast returning to Britain. The brother of "Lord Castlereagh" is sent on a special mission to the autocrat of Russia; Sir William A'Court (Lord Heytesbury), the Holy Alliance favourite, goes to India to suppress liberalism; while it is but the other day that the Duke of Wellington, at a Ramsgate dinner, openly proclaimed his sympathy with the despotic King of Holland and his quarrel against emancipated Belgium. These are tolerably plain proofs of what the foreign policy of the new ministry will be, and of what sort will be the relations maintained between England and the despotic powers.—Kent Herald.—[In opposition to the spirit of this paragraph, it is stated from Rome, that the ministry have declared, in a note addressed to their ambassador at Florence, that England will do her utmost to uphold the government of Donna Maria, and never suffer Miguel to return to Portugal.]

DOMESTIC POLITICS.

THE conclusion of the elections towards the end of January was followed by what may be called a "lull" in the political atmosphere. The subject which chiefly occupied attention during this interval was the canvass for the Speaker's chair. The ministry having resolved to put forward their adherent Sir C. M. Sutton, application was made by the leading Whigs to Mr Abercromby, M.P. for Edinburgh, to allow himself to be put in nomination; to which Mr Abercromby at first expressed great reluctance, but concluded, in a letter of 29th January, to Lord John Russell, by stating—"However painful it would have been to me to maintain my own opinion in opposition to that of so many of my friends, I should have adhered to it, if the approaching contest had involved only a question of personal preference. As I am now aware that the governing motive of those who wish me to alter my decision is a desire to vindicate a public principle, which they think it is their duty as members of the House of Commons to maintain, I feel that the indulgence of my own wishes would subject me to the charge of obstinacy, or of selfishness; and therefore, if the choice should fall on me, I shall be ready to perform the duties of the office to the best of my ability."

An active canvass had been for some time commenced by Sir C. M. Sutton and his friends; and the friends of Mr Abercromby (himself resolving not to ask a single vote) now commenced one equally vigorous. The journals, which in the dearth of news had no other resource, lent their aid to the respective parties, and the discussion was perhaps one of the keenest which has taken place during the late violent political contests. The ministerialists in general dwelt largely on the accomplished and courteous character of their nominee, his acquaintance with the rules of the house, the factiousness of an opposition to him, and the unmerited pension and the inexperience of his opponent. The liberal party, on the other hand, insisted upon the propriety of having a Speaker who was disposed, with heart and good-will, to give utterance to the feeling of the majority of the house—pointed warmly to the high character of Mr Abercromby—and charged the Tory candidate with gross partiality in his past conduct. Upon the last point the following allegations, presented by Mr E. L. Bulwer at his former election, have been cited:—"Of his impartiality, truth obliges us to say one word. We have noted instances in which it seemed to us more than doubtful. The leaders of a party cannot be so much aware of this error in a Speaker as the ordinary herd of members—the former are sure to be fairly balanced against each other, and to catch the Speaker's eye when it seems to them the fitting opportunity to rise; but among members in general it is otherwise. We have often and often, after an effective speech by some of the lesser of the Tory luminaries, when some six or seven of the reformers, of equal or less calibre, sprung up to reply, observed the Speaker carefully give the preference to the one least able to do it with correspondent efficiency. To the abler of the young Tory members he was invariably indulgent; to those of the Liberals pertinaciously blind. This was especially remarkable among those who belonged not to one of the great dominant parties, and who were, therefore, not so loudly called for by the house, but that they might be condemned with impunity to silence. But this partiality was still more evident in the case of Hunt, whom, as a constant thorn in the side of the poor reform bill, the Speaker invariably managed to see the instant he arose. No man, surely, ever less deserved to be heard, no man ever obtained from the Speaker's peculiar selection such prompt opportunities of delivering his sentiments."

It has been further stated that Speaker Sutton sometimes boasted to his friends of having "humbly" the reforming party, that his power of preserving order was deficient, and that he left every debatable point in greater obscurity than he found it, in consequence of the verbosity and indirectness of his expressions. The ministerialists, again, point out with much bitterness, that, when it was convenient for the liberals two years ago to re-elect this gentleman, very few presented any such objections against him.

The appointment of the Marquis of Londonderry to be ambassador to Russia was another of the events which attracted attention between the election and assembling of the new Parliament. The ultra-Tory politics of this peer, the peculiarities which mark his department, and the recollection of an unfortunate application which he made to the Earl of Liverpool, had marked him out, apparently, in the eyes of the moderate friends of the ministry, as unfit to be entrusted with this important duty; and when the project was first rumoured, it was spoken of by the Times as a sorry hoax—"in other words," they now say, "as a step so ill-judged and reprehensible on the part of the King's ministers, that it could not be seriously meditated by any man to whom the history and political character of the noble marquis was familiar." We stand," continues this paper, "by our first declaration. It is an appointment which the whole country will condemn. Nothing can reconcile the people of England to the employment of a functionary whose unfitness to represent the dignity and the civilisation of England has been already demonstrated. If, moreover, the choice of a plenipotentiary were to be determined by the congeniality of his political principles to those of the court where he is to reside, instead of to those of the government which sends him, the favour designed for the ex-ambassador to Vienna might be more easily understood. As the case is, we cannot and will not defend or palliate this unbecoming mission." "Nothing," adds the Spectator, "but the secret consciousness that he must rely on the High Church and King party alone for earnest and regular support, could have induced the Duke of Wellington to commit this egregious blunder."

ECCLIASTICAL AFFAIRS.

In the Gazette of February 3, appeared the following announcement:—"The King has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal, appointing his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury; the Right Hon. Lord Lyndhurst, Lord High Chancellor; his Grace the Archbishop of York; the Right Hon. the Earl of Harrowby; the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of London; the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Lincoln; the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Gloucester; the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart.; the Right Hon. Henry Goulburn; the Right Hon. Charles Watkin Williams Wynn; the Right Hon. Henry Hobhouse; and the Right Hon. Sir Herbert Jenner, Knt., his Majesty's Commissioners for considering the state of the several dioceses in England and Wales, with reference to the amount of their revenues, to the more equal distribution of Episcopal duties, and to the prevention of the necessity of attaching, by commendam, to bishoprics, benefices with cure of souls; also for considering the state of the several cathedral and collegiate churches within the same, with a view to the suggestion of such measures as may render them most conducive to the efficiency of the established church; and for devising the best mode of providing for the cure of souls, with special reference to the residence of the clergy on their respective benefices."

Such being the first step taken by the ministry for convincing the country of their disposition to reform, the newspapers friendly to their interests have endeavoured to give such commentaries upon it as might show its propriety. They give a scale of the incomes of nine-tenths of the livings in England and Wales, from which it appears that there are of

Livings under L.50 a-year,	294
From L.50 to L.100,	1621
From L.100 to L.150,	1591
From L.150 to L.200,	1355
From L.200 to L.300,	1964
From L.300 to L.400,	1317

"Suppose," says the Albion, "it were determined to raise the smaller benefices so that every parish in the kingdom should have a resident clergyman with an income of which the minimum should be about L.200 a-year. Suppose this were resolved upon, it is possible, that, by a judicious modification of the economy of cathedral and collegiate churches (the total available income of which is now L.273,000), and perhaps a per centage levied on the parochial incomes which exceed L.500 a-year, and if possible on the inappropriate as well as the ecclesiastical, the required revenue might ultimately be raised, from the revenues now or heretofore appropriated to the uses of the church. And, in the meanwhile, for a purpose so excellent as the promotion of moral and religious knowledge among the people, the state might very well step in to supply the deficiency, when once a method was devised by which the burden would be every year becoming less and less, until it ultimately vanished."

"The end to be proposed," says the Standard, "in any plan of church reform, must be the extension of the means of religious instruction and consolation to the whole people. The only means by which this end can be accomplished, humanly speaking, is the providing an efficient minister for every parish in the kingdom. The providing of a resident, accessible, and efficient religious teacher for every family in England and Wales, whether these families are congregated in manufacturing towns, or dispersed through agricultural districts, must be the cardinal object of every really useful church reform; and we can safely say that it is the cardinal object of the plan now under consideration with ministers."

"It is a great mistake to suppose that dissent has extended in consequence of any growing dislike to the doctrines of the establishment, or even of its discipline or order. It is the inadequacy of the present constitution of the church to afford religious instruction and consolation to all, which has swollen the number of dissenters to its present amount. In the manufacturing districts, more particularly, the population has long outgrown, in an enormous degree, the available means of church instruction. In such a town as Manchester, a generation grows up almost without the power of once during their lives setting foot within a church door! Unfortunately, persons so reared are not likely to originate of themselves a plan of religious instruction; for it is ever the case that the men who most need such teaching are most indifferent about it. Happily, however, and a happy circumstance it is, in such a case, with whatever inconveniences it may be attended—happily, the principle of dissent interposes to save this manufacturing population from being left without any religious knowledge."

"The multitudes in our manufacturing districts who receive their first religious impressions from dissenters necessarily retain them, with all their peculiarities of creed, and of notions of discipline through after-life, whithersoever they may remove; the manufacturing districts, consequently, supply a perennial fountain of dissent for the whole island. One of the leading provisions of the plan under contemplation will be directed, we have reason to believe, to affording an ample supply of religious instruction in the church, to all the manufacturing districts."

This journal concludes by repeating the hint of the Albion, that a liberal allowance from the state will be necessary to enable the church to provide for a population of fifteen millions.

The Spectator meets this doctrine respecting the causes of dissent, and the necessity of enabling the established church to hold forth accommodation for the whole population, by pointing out, that, in rural as well as in manufacturing districts, where the numbers of the people have also increased, or at least remained steady, dissent has advanced with great rapidity.

"Men who reside in the same parishes that their forefathers inhabited, do not now attend the parish-church, but the Methodist or Independent meeting-house. The church is empty and the chapel crowded. How is this? It is not because the clergyman is ignorant, inattentive, austere, or profligate. He may be, and assuredly is, in a vast majority of cases, the reverse of all this; but nevertheless, the Methodist or Independent minister carries off the mass of the villagers. One main cause of the superior popularity of the latter, originates in the absence of that education, and refinement of manner and feeling, which are generally possessed by the clergy of the church of England; who, on their part, want that sympathy for the poor which the Methodist in England, the Catholic in Ireland, and the Presbyterian minister in Scotland, find the principal tie between them and their flocks. It is plain that no increase in the number or size of churches will put the church of England clergymen on a par with their competitors in this respect."

"If these remarks are well founded in respect of the rustic population, they hold good in towns also. And the facts we believe to be corroborative of their truth in almost every populous district. It may be that in some manufacturing districts there is not sufficient church-room. Where the clergyman belongs to the class usually denominated Evangelical, it often happens that the church is crowded. Suppose, however, that his successor is a high churchman, the congregation will drop off. They will perhaps attend prayers in church, and adjourn to a Calvinistic chapel to hear the sermon. We have more than one congregation in our eye in making this observation. Here the dissenters have the advantage of churchmen: they will not choose a preacher whose services they dislike, but in the church there are thousands of Arminians who attend Calvinistic congregations."

"In manufacturing towns, as well as in the country, the middle and lower classes will attend the preachers whose ministrations in the pulpit, and in their families, they prefer. The splendid churches that were built by the million grant are in many places half empty. It is not long since one in Birmingham, wherein free seats for 1500 were provided, besides rented pews, held a congregation that a moderate-sized room would have accommodated. It may perhaps be better filled now; but we doubt."

"The fact is, that a different class of ministers is wanted to fill the churches. The highly-educated collegians are not the men to preach the gospel to the poor, and to live among them, as the Catholic priests and dissenting ministers dwell among their flocks. A powerful and wealthy establishment will not gain proselytes below a certain rank in society."

"It seems therefore a hopeless attempt to multiply churchmen by building more churches. Yet this, we are given to understand, is the aim of those who are now busy, or pretending to be busy, in measures of church reform. The dissenters are to be called upon once more to vote their money for the support of an establishment whose doctrines and discipline they quarrel with, and which is already by far the richest church in the world. This is a scheme worthy of the men who propound it. Under pretence of spreading the doctrines of the church, more livings are to be created for the favourites, shops, who of course will have the appointment of the clergymen. This is a sly way of providing for the tocracy."

"If any one should deem this imputation uncharitable, let him reflect for a moment on the characters of the men from whom the projected reform of the church proceeds, and ask if it is credible that they will act honestly by the public in this matter? Has the Ethiopian changed his skin? Were Tory ministers and bishops miraculously converted into sincere ecclesiastical reformers on the 1st of November last? Up to that day they opposed every thing in the shape of effectual church reform."

"The more that this Tory project is sifted, the more we feel assured that there is deception and treachery at the bottom of it. There is a pretence of abolishing sinecures and non-residence, to cheat the honest farmers: there is a prospect of a vote of public money for building new churches, held out to the graspers of patronage. But the Tories will not stab their party in the back by abolishing clerical sinecures: the House of Commons will not grant more money to the richest church in England—the church of only half the population. Ministers know this very well; but their end is gained, if in the discussion which the discussion of this shadowy scheme of English ecclesiastical reform occasions, other dread realities are lost sight of for a time."

There was a very large meeting at Birmingham (Jan. 28) of the friends of the established church, to promote the building of churches in the dioceses of Coventry and Lichfield, to extend religious instruction to the lower classes, and to call upon the indulgence at large to follow the example that was to be set to them. The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry was chairman; and several long speeches were delivered by his lordship, Lord Aylesford, Viscount Clarendon, the Archdeacons of Salop and Stafford, Sir J. R. St. John, and others. It appeared that L.10,000 had been subscribed towards erecting chapels in the dioceses; but in seventeen parishes only, according to the bishop, 18,000 persons wanted accommodation.

In Scotland the attacks upon the church have been met by exactly similar schemes of reform. The complaints respecting the ecclesiastical arrangements of the capital produced a scheme for building new churches. A church committee has since been formed, at the head of which stands the zealous and eloquent Chalmers, and which has already subscribed and collected a very large sum for the employment of additional pulpits. In Glasgow, where the strength of the voluntary-church body seems to be much greater than in other parts of the country, the anxiety displayed for the erection of additional churches and chapels in connection with the establishment has been proportionally great. It has been very generally represented in the liberal political prints, that it would be time enough to erect new established churches when the clergy belonging to those already in existence have succeeded in lining their pockets; and in Edinburgh, a gentleman, apparently animated by this opinion, made offer to Dr Chalmers by letter dated the 15th January, of two pews in the Canongate church, belonging to a society of his, he was treasurer, upon lower terms than the usual rate of church sittings, that they might be employed for the accommodation committee for the use of the poor. To this communication Dr Chalmers returned an answer, which, as it explains the views of the society, we shall here present to our readers:—

"We do not look for a larger attendance upon religious worship from the mere increased supply of accommodation. There must also be an increased demand for it—which last requisite can only be brought about by a more thorough and efficient pastoral superintendence."

"On this principle, I should expect that if the churches were cut down into three or four parishes, the three or four churches would be better filled, by the efforts of zealous clergymen, having each a field of management which he could overtake, than your present one church, with its unwieldy parish, ever will ever be in its present circumstances."

"This may perhaps appear a paradox to you; but I shall give you an experimental verification of it. The Water of Leith district, in the West Kirk parish, has a population of from 1400 to 1500. Yet only 150 churches have sittings any where, and 67 of them are in the establishment. Along with this there are empty churches, empty pews in the West Kirk; but had we waited until these were filled, or till the two ministers of 1,000 people had, by their assiduous week-day attentions to the Water of Leith, infused a taste and desire for going among its families, we should have waited forever. But we took another way of it. We sent a parish missionary amongst them, who can give his whole time to the work, and who, by his unwearied ministrations to the sick, and the dying, and the ignorant, and the ungodly, has created such a demand for Sabbath attendance at his preaching-hall, which holds 300, is filled to overflowing; and we feel encouraged to build a church to set about immediately in the confident hope that hundreds, who till now have been living in heathenism, will be reclaimed to the good old habits of their forefathers."

"It was on this principle that I should have reformed the church in the Cowgate, had the magistrates let me. They seem disposed to wait till the Old and New friars churches are filled, in which case also the people have to wait for ever, and the Cowgate remains a moral desert as before."

"I am happy to inform you that there are already forty such enterprises going on at present in Scotland—the one in the Water of Leith, a prospectus of which I take the liberty of sending to you. It is possible that er could have been made in several instances the additional places of worship are now building, unoccupied or pews unlet—such an offer, in fact, sir, have made to me and to my coadjutors. I am glad that if such an offer has been made, it has rested them in their undertakings, any more than opposition which you have submitted to us will arise in ours."

reference to the tithe massacre at Rathcormac, (1831) has caused the following communication to be sent to the commander of the forces in Ireland:—

"Horse Guards, Jan. 22, 1835.

—In reference to your several letters, and the which they contain relative to the melancholy at Gurthroe and Rathcormac, I have received several commanding-in-chief's directions to request you to convey to the officers and men employed on occasion referred to, the satisfaction with which he has been pleased that their conduct, under circumstances the most trying, was such as to call forth the most unqualified approbation on the part of the magistrates.

On 31st January, the Court of Session gave a decision in favour of the kirk-session of St. Andrew's church, Edinburgh, who had applied for an order to prevent the magistrates from obtaining possession of the church for other than religious purposes.

On 7th February, the Second Division of the Court of Session granted an interdict to the Rev. Mr. James Hogg, of the High Church, Paisley, for preventing the magistrates of the town from obtaining possession of the bell of that church, which, it seems, was purchased by private subscription, and was in fact used by the magistrates to convene a v. church meeting. Expenses were also granted to the magistrates. It is stated that the latter intended to erect a tower as close to the steeple as possible, which they will provide with a gong, so as to be heard in the sound of the bell.

A sum of L.1300 has been collected for the building of a new church in Greenock, in connection with the establishment, which is immediately to be provided.

On 26th, a serious riot took place at Sheffield, in consequence of some disorderly conduct on the part of a poor man entrusted with the keeping of the Eyre Street School. On this day (Sunday), the doors of the school were broken open, and, next day, on an attack by the mob, the house was gutted and looted. Further damage was prevented by the military without difficulty. [With such frequent occurrences before our eyes of the superstitious notions held by the lower orders of the people respecting the effects of the diffusion of knowledge? A satirical writer of the last century remarked, that the tree of knowledge might have been safely entrusted to the press (then existing) generation; and, for any sudden consequences that could be dreaded from the ink of the same of our own contemporaries.]

The George Canning, a ship of 400 tons burthen, employed to carry out the Euphrates expedition, from Liverpool, after being detained for some time by contrary winds. She was to be joined at Cove of the steamer Alban, which is to accompany her to the East of Syria. The body forming the expedition consisted of fifteen officers, every one of them distinguished in scientific, literary, or professional attainments; picked artillerymen, chiefly artificers, six engineers, Liverpool blacksmiths, and two interpreters, fifty persons, under the command of Colonel Ross, of the royal artillery. The officer second in command is already in Syria making arrangements. At number of labourers and seamen will be engaged. The George Canning has on board two iron steamers in the Euphrates and the Tigris, with their materials and stores; in all, probably, little short of 300 men. These are made up into many packages, which will be transhipped on the coast of Syria into country craft, and conveyed up the Orontes as far as possible. This river, after passing the ancient Antioch, falls into the Mediterranean, near the Scanderoun. These packages will be taken from Antioch to Bir, on the Euphrates, across a desert of sand, chiefly by camels, which carry about half a ton each, and may be hired on the coast of Syria to Antioch, and at a trifling expense. Some of the articles will be mounted on carriages which are not on purpose. At Bir the steamers will be retained, and the Grand Signior and Mehemet Ali promised their protection as far as their authority extends. We sincerely wish success to the enterprise, and to be assured that it has many difficulties and dangers attending it.

In the Court of King's Bench, a Mr Wigley was charged with perjury, brought by O'Gorman Mahon, who had some bill transactions with him. Sir F. Pollock, however, had not concluded his statement for the defence, before Mr Justice Coleridge stopped the case, as he said there was not enough to go to the jury that was alleged against Mr Wigley was not proved. The defendant was therefore acquitted. Another case was then proceeded with; but the court was interrupted by a noise outside, followed by a commotion. O'Gorman Mahon had furiously assaulted Mr. Mahon, and broke or dislocated his jaw. The judge, with the judges in the Court of Exchequer, Justice Coleridge inquired into the circumstances of the assault. O'Gorman Mahon endeavoured to prove that he had pushed against him, and provoked him to use the language; but it seemed clear enough that he was the aggressor, and he was sentenced to three months imprisonment. He conducted himself with most respectful submission to the court, otherwise the sentence would probably have been more severe.

The Benchers of the Inner Temple, on the motion of the Attorney General, have passed resolutions abolishing the privileges that existed in respect to university men, of dispensing with the L.100 deposit on entering their names on the books of the Inn. It is now proposed to give no advantage to academical proficiency, and to make every man deposit L.100; and to call him to the bar at the end of three years, provided he has not been earning his livelihood in any other way for five years preceding. He is, in short, to have no advantage from proficiency; his only ground of rejection being proof against him of his having been diligent in any other calling.

The judgeship in the Court of Common Pleas, vacant by the death of Sir W. Taunton, was first offered to Mr Bickersteth, who refused it. It was then offered to Mr Sergeant Coleridge, and accepted. The Examiner allows credit to the government for this compound proceeding: the first offer was to the best man, the second to the second-best. The new judge is a Tory, and at one time conducted the Quarterly Review.

In consequence of the Lord Mayor of London (Winchester) having violated the pledge, given before his election, to call common councils and halls whenever requested to do so by his fellow-citizens, it has been decided in a Court of Common Council, by 85 to 59, that he is not a fit person to sit in committee.

Louis Boswell, king of the gipsies, died lately at the "Royal Encampment," in the vicinity of Nottingham. He was buried next Sunday, in the presence of a great multitude, in No Man's Heath. The following curious caution was lately posted up in a conspicuous place in Peckham, Surrey:—"Whereas several idle and disorderly persons have lately made a practice of riding on an ass belonging to a gentleman of this place: now, lest any accident should happen, notice is hereby given, that he has determined to shoot the said ass, and cautions any person who may be riding on it at the same time, to take special care of themselves, lest, by some unfortunate mistake, he should shoot the wrong animal."

A distressing instance of the disregard of human life which results from the existing regulations respecting shipping, has recently been related in the newspapers. An emigrant vessel had left Liverpool for New York, with 150 persons on board. They had been fifteen days at sea, when the vessel, which was an old one, became so leaky that there was no chance of her swimming much longer. Just at this awful crisis, the Sarah providentially hove in sight, and took the unfortunate passengers off the wreck. There was not time to save the luggage or provisions before the emigrant vessel sunk. Captain Cormick treated the people with the greatest humanity; and, assisted by the stores which he received from vessels he fell in with on his passage, men, women, and children being put on short allowance, he brought them safe back to Liverpool, with the exception of seven, who died ere they reached port, and some, who were put on board the Donegal, and arrived at Falmouth.

A curious circumstance lately occurred in the county jail in Nottingham, which deserves notice:—A soldier was on his return from furlough to his regiment, and when near Mansfield, he fell in with a man named Goodall, who had just escaped from the officers of justice.

The fellow contrived to steal his bundle of wearing apparel, and reached Mansfield without detection. The soldier, determined, if possible, to regain his clothes, staid three days beyond his furlough, but unfortunately without meeting the object of his pursuit. At length he gave himself up to a magistrate as a deserter, and of course was forthwith committed to the county jail. On the Sunday following, the soldier with the other prisoners attended divine service in the prison chapel, when to his great surprise, who should be amongst the congregation but the very man (Goodall) who had stolen his bundle! He recognised him, and after proper investigation the committing magistrate received an authority from the War Office for the soldier's liberation, a fresh furlough, and an order for marching money, and on Saturday last he was liberated. The man, whose name is Job Wragg, belongs to the royal sappers and miner corps, and was on his return from Chesterfield (his native place) to Woolwich, when he was robbed by Goodall, about half way between Chesterfield and Mansfield. Goodall stands committed to the next assizes on the charge of robbing Wragg, as well as for a burglary.

Entries in Bibles, &c.—As the entries in family bibles, prayer and other books, when made by the parent or head of a family, of births, marriages, deaths, and other circumstances, happening within his own knowledge, are good evidences of such transactions, it is surprising that so little regard should be paid to the regular entries of events of so much importance. No search can be too earnest to discover the family bible, for innumerable are the individuals in England not registered in the parochial books of baptisms. Some parents are Roman Catholics or sectarians, some are too poor, some too careless, while others erroneously think all is accomplished by a half-baptism; and unless the bibles or private manuscripts of such parties contain entries of their families, there may, perhaps, not be a single proof in existence by which their descents can be traced; such also has been the neglect which many of our parish registers have suffered from political troubles during the time of Charles I., and from individual negligence since that time, that the rarity of a family register is often greater than there ought to be occasion for. At the last Shrewsbury assizes, a family bible containing the plaintiff's pedigree was produced, and it was allowed to be read; the judge receiving it on the authority of the case of Doe dem. Cleveland—York Assizes. The memorandum had been written by one person at one time, although comprising the family events of nearly half a century. The entries, however, were considered entitled to credit, and were understood to have had much influence (notwithstanding a very unsatisfactory account of the plaintiff's possession of such bible) in the success which ultimately attended the plaintiff's claim. In the important case of Hans Francis Hastings, Esq. in 1818, the earldom of Huntingdon, there was produced before the Attorney-General, to whom the claim was referred, a bible from the Countess of Moira, deceased, the heiress of the late Earl of Huntingdon, in which she stated that the petitioner's uncle, and, on the failure of his issue male, the petitioner's father, was next heir to the earldom. This was received in evidence as good and sufficient proof of the various statements in the petitioner's pedigree.

The Great Snoring Committee.—It is usual to designate Parliamentary committees by the names of the bills which they sit to consider. A few years ago a bill was introduced into the House of Lords for enclosing lands in the parish of Great Snoring, in the county of Norfolk, and was, in regular course, committed to a select committee. It is sometimes a practice to move that, on a select committee, all the lords who attend it shall have voices; and Lord Eldon, then Lord Chancellor, one day rose with the greatest gravity, and said, "I request your lordships' serious attention to the motion I am about to put; it is, that all the lords who attend the Great Snoring Committee shall have voices."

In his reply to the address of the Dublin Corporation, the new Lord Lieutenant (Earl of Haddington) gave an assurance that it was "the firm and unalterable determination of his Majesty's government to protect, to uphold, and to strengthen the institutions of the country; to protect them against those who would operate their ruin, whether designedly or from morbid love of innovation; to uphold them by a zealous maintenance of all those essential principles, on an adherence to which the very existence of such establishments must depend; to strengthen them by a conscientious distribution of office, and an honest exercise of patronage; by exacting from every functionary the strict performance of his duty; and by pursuing such judicious and well-considered measures of reformation as may be best adapted to the actual circumstances and condition of the country." The first visit of his lordship to the theatre was marked by considerable disturbances in the house, chiefly arising from the Orange party.

In his recent popular addresses, Mr O'Connell has warmly recommended forgiveness to the Whigs, with increased virulence against the Tories, whom he says he has exerted himself for six or seven years to conciliate, but in vain. He also recommends a suppression in the meantime of the repeal question, for the sake of which, however, he would willingly take office with a liberal ministry, in order to have opportunities of pressing it upon them.

In the Dublin Court of King's Bench, Jan. 22, application was made for a writ of certiorari to remove the proceedings affecting Captain Bagly, Captain Collis, and the Rev. W. Ryder, for the part they took in the Rathcormac tithe affray, to the Court of King's Bench. The application was granted.

The National Bank of Ireland, recently established by Mr O'Connell and his friends, seems to be succeeding remarkably well, so far as the free reception of their notes by the people is concerned.

We hear much that pleases us of the language and observances of Sir Edward Sugden in the Chancery Court. The strictness he employs on all occasions—the bounds he sets even to the talk of the bar—has told well already, not only in economising time, but the funds of the suitors. As yet, no one who has ever sat in his court has rendered himself more remarkable for sameness towards all persons with whom he has to deal, whether they be counsel or clients.—Dublin Register.

The Dublin banking-house of Hutchins Williams, carrying on business under the name of Gibbons and Williams, has stopped payment. The debts are said to be £60,000, and the assets £30,000.

THE NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE list presented in our last having necessarily been imperfect, we think it proper to lay before our readers a complete one, with which the Spectator has obliged the newspaper world; in which the strength of the various parties is carefully and clearly indicated. The first numeral column gives Reformers; the second, Tories; and the third, doubtful persons.

EPITHETS FOR THE PEOPLE.

curious to trace, throughout ancient and modern literature, the terms in which the common have been spoken of. The most respectful phrase the Greeks could apply to them was hoi polloi—many: their fickleness, their violence, their ingratitude, furnished, even in those ancient democracies, a favourite matter of scornful maxims, both in literature and in philosophy.* When we descend to modern times, we find Cicero speaking of the common people as the lowest multitude—Horace proclaiming that he would drive the profane vulgar, and drove them from him—Julius Italicus emphatically apostrophising them as "hen plebes scelerata!" freely translated by Henry Fielding into O ye wicked rascallions! Every word which, among this originally republican people, expressed things belonging to the common people, was used also to signify, by reflection, mean, base, simple, homely, of little value or worth.† Baseness and cowardice are the characteristics applied by Plutarch to the common people. The case improved among the men of chivalry, the generous warriors who made it their boast to be gentle to the haughty, but gentle to the low." They were condescending, it is true, to the great mass, but was in so hopeless a state of servile degradation as to excite no dread of rivalry; but whenever it happened that a person of plebeian birth attempted to rise against the decrees of fortune, he immediately became "audacious varlet" and "presuming caitiff." Old English chroniclers abound in contempt for the people, who so often rose against the Plantagenet and Tudor princes. John Knox himself, though not regarded as among the most courtly characters in his country, openly denounces the rascail multitude. Sir Philip Sydney, the soul of gentleness and manly virtue, the most accomplished man of his time, is proud in his Arcadia to esteem it as a proof of a thoughtful and lofty mind, to disdain the lower sort, and to rise beyond a regard for their opinion. Even Shakespeare, though himself a man of humble birth, spent no period of his life in exalted circumstances, perpetually giving forth pithy sarcasms on the vices of the common people, and seldom places a member of that body in an amiable light, except in the capacity of a faithful servant or retainer. The rascal people and rascality, from the Saxon times, a lean beast, are as old as the days of Chaucer, and frequently appear in the works of later writers. "The nest of hornets, the hotch-potch of society," say Beaumont and Fletcher, in reference to the people. Scum is another of the designations of the lower class in our past literature. Thus Dry-

Away, ye scum,
That still rise upmost when the nation boils!

able and rabblement, from the Low Latin word rabdo, a brawler, have been, from time immemorial, applied to the multitude, with a reference to the noise they used to make in their assemblies. Mob is no higher than the reign of Charles II. The word was used by the Earl of Shaftesbury and other members of the patriotic party through the streets of London, whose senseless terrors were the cause of all the atrocities of the Popish Plot, obtained from the streets of the court the epithet of mobile vulgus, the excitable vulgar. In a short time, this was too long a phrase, and the adjective was alone used. "The mobile," says L'Estrange, "are without a ruler; they are restless with one."

But the English are essentially a contracting and abbreviating people: they have not leisure to pronounce words in full: hence mobile soon became mob. Tom Brown, writing in 1690, uses both words; and Dryden, not long after, is found employing the latter exclusively—

Dreams are but interludes which fancy makes;
When monarch reason sleeps, this mimic wakes,
Compounds a medley of disjointed things,
A court of cobblers and a mob of kings.

The mob—the rabble—the scum—the rascality—the herd—the crowd—the vulgar—resound throughout the whole of our literature, down to a very recent period. Fielding devotes two papers in his Covent Garden Journal, published in 1752, to an ironical satire of what he calls the Mobility, or Fourth Estate; tracing in the first their rebellions under Tyler, Cade, and others; and in the second, describing the control which they exercise by their violence and insolence over their betters. He instances the exclusive right which the fourth estate assert to the river Thames. "It is true," says he, "the other estates do sometimes venture themselves upon the river; but this is only upon sufferance, for which they pay whatever that branch of the fourth estate called watermen are pleased to exact from them. Nor are the mob contented with all these exactions. They grumble whenever they meet any persons in a boat whose dress declares them to be of a different order from themselves. Sometimes they carry their resentment so far as to endeavour to run against the boat, and overset it; but if they are too good-natured to attempt this, they never fail to attack the passengers with all kinds of scurrilous, abusive, and indecent terms, which indeed they claim as their own, and call mob-language.

"The second exclusive right which they insist on, is to those parts of the streets that are set apart for foot passengers. In asserting this privilege, they are extremely rigorous; inasmuch that none of the other orders can walk through the streets by day without being insulted, or by night without being knocked down. And the better to secure these footpaths to themselves, they take effectual care to keep the said paths always well blocked up with chairs, wheelbarrows, and every other kind of obstruction, in order to break the legs of all those who shall presume to encroach upon their privileges by walking the streets.

"Here it was hoped their pretensions would have stopped; but it is difficult to set any bounds to ambition; for, having sufficiently established this right, they now begin to assert their right to the whole street, and have lately made such a disposition with their waggons, carts, and drays, that no coach can pass along without the utmost difficulty and danger. With this view, we every day see them driving side by side, and sometimes in the broader streets three abreast; again, we often see them leaving a cart or waggon in the middle of the street, and often set across it, while the driver repairs to a neighbouring alehouse, from the window of which he diverts himself when he is drinking, with the mischief or inconvenience which his vehicle occasions.

"The same pretension which they make to the possession of the streets, they make likewise to the possession of the highways. I doubt not I shall be told they claim only an equal right; for I know it is very usual when a carter or drayman is civilly desired to make a little room, by moving out of the middle of the road either to the right or left, to hear the following answer, "— your eyes, who are you? Is not the road as free to me as you?" Hence it will, I suppose, be inferred that they do not absolutely exclude the other estates from the use of the common highways. But notwithstanding this generous concession in words, I do aver their practice is different, and that a gentleman may go a voyage at sea with little more hazard than he can travel ten miles from the metropolis."

We have here, unquestionably, a good deal of the spirit of the Westminster Justice,* indignant at the outrages which daily came before him to be punished; but at the same time it is impossible not to perceive, in these papers, a large infusion of that patrician contempt of the populace which breathes almost universally throughout past literature. A period at length came to this style of speech. The swinish multitude of Burke† was perhaps the last remarkable instance of a gentleman pouring indiscriminate scorn upon the vast majority of his fellow-creatures. Of the opposite feeling, the Elegy in a Country Churchyard was one of the earliest, and accordingly the most honourable, examples; and in the writings of Burns, thirty years later, we find it in full glow, the latter instance being the less remarkable, in as far as the poet was himself a peasant. Who can ever forget the noble burst of the inspired ploughman, in reference to his cottage family?—

From scenes like these old Scotia's grandeur springs,
That makes her loved at home, revered abroad;
Princes and lords are but the breath of kings—
"An honest man's the noblest work of God!"
And certes, in fair virtue's heavenly road,
The cottage leaves the palace far behind—

Since the days of Burns, many of the most eminent men of letters have, in numerous instances, deliberately preferred subjects and thoughts and feelings drawn from the humbler departments of society. Education and political circumstances have elevated the character and increased the importance of the same orders. The wealthy, the privileged, and the enlightened, have in the same time become inspired with more benevolent and affectionate feelings towards those who in general depend upon them. Owing to all these causes, we now no longer hear of the mob, the rabble, or the vulgar. The labouring or industrious classes, the manufacturing and agricultural population, and other such simple descriptive phrases, have come in place of those terms of obloquy. Even the words superiors and inferiors, lower orders and upper ranks, are now deemed uncourteous towards the bulk of the people, and are not much used in either literary or political discussions. It is undeniable that, in the same period, owing to various causes, there has been a diminution in the actual intercourse of the employers with the employed, the wealthy with the poor, and the titled with the untitled; but, as often happens with broken-up families, separation has greatly added to the politeness of the parties. A gentleman may not now shake hands or exchange talk with his tradesmen or labourers once in a twelvemonth; but he never speaks of the great mass of tradesmen and labourers, he never considers these classes in the abstract, without very great deference. They now possess a collective respectability, which, without altogether repelling his affections, commands his homage.

It will probably be questioned whether this double

* Fielding held the situation of what was called a trading justice in Westminster.

† Soon after the appearance of the work in which this celebrated phrase was used, a pamphlet was published in the form of a catechism, with a reference to the war then about to be commenced: the first question, "What is the first duty of a member of the swinish multitude?" was answered, "To save his bacon." A very good-humoured reproof.

change be fit matter of congratulation or of regret for the bulk of the people. It may seem to many that the former system of things, by which the lofty manifested kindness for individuals, while they despised the multitude, was better than one which yields only a courteous and barren respect. In this we cannot join. The causes of the change, in both parties, have been of a kind favourable to the humble—their own improved circumstances, their increased power, their advanced intelligence and worth, as well as the increased morality and taste of the so-called superior orders. Taking the case in the worst point of view, a manly mind would always prefer respect which he commanded by his merit, to kindness which he attracted only by his weakness and his inability to protect his own interests. But this is neither the whole case nor the case in its best aspect. The respectful feeling now entertained by the exalted for the whole body of the lowly, has in it fully as much to gratify individuals as the former kindness. When we reflect on that kindness, we are too apt to picture it as the courteous and soothing benevolence of an equal and a brother. In reality, it was little better than the common treatment extended to serviceable and helpless animals. It was a kindness given too frequently with an imperious roughness, and accepted too often in fear and trembling; it was rigorous in exacting homage and obedience in return, and never led to the least relaxation of the bonds which fettered at once the souls and bodies of the humble. The exalted are now incapable of extending the insult of such kindness. They follow certain modes of life, which do not lead them into much personal intercourse with those whose wealth is inferior; but they know well enough the improved character of that class of persons, and, in the enlightened philanthropy with which they regard them, pay them a much higher compliment, and are induced to do more to promote their real welfare, than the baron of yore who knew no difference between his vassals and his dogs.

Foreign History.

CHINA.

WE stated in our last the particulars of Lord Napier's proceeding from Macao to Canton, contrary to the wishes of the Chinese government, together with the suspension of trade that had taken place. Subsequent accounts have brought the melancholy intelligence of his lordship's death at the former place, on the 11th October last. It appears he had been ill of fever when he went to Canton, and that his continual application, when there, to business, in order to re-establish a good understanding with the Chinese, together with bad accommodation and provisions, had greatly aggravated his disease. Hoping to derive benefit from a change of air, his lordship put himself into the hands of the Chinese, to be conveyed back to Macao; but his conductors purposely kept up such an incessant noise around the vessel, by beating gongs and other means, that he obtained no sleep for many days and nights, and was almost exhausted before reaching Macao. His funeral was attended, with great pomp, by all the merchants at Canton, who went down to Macao on purpose.

Trade has been resumed, but not, it seems, without decisive measures on the part of the British. While Lord Napier was at Canton, his Majesty's ships Imogene and Andromache, under command of Captain Blackwood, received orders to proceed up the river; and in passing what is called the Bogue, a narrow fortified strait, the Chinese fired upon them. The fire was returned, and the action lasted for a considerable time, when the batteries were at length silenced, and the passage was effected. The Imogene had one man killed, and the Andromache had one man killed and three wounded; the loss of the Chinese was much more considerable. This action had created a strong sensation in Canton, and was immediately followed by the re-opening of the trade; and this agrees with all that has been stated of the impolicy of cringing and fawning upon those semi-barbarians, thus fostering them in their absurd and ill-founded ideas of the meanness and inferiority of Europeans, and drawing on ourselves fresh indignities. The Viceroy at Canton was deposed from office by the Emperor, and deprived of his peacock's feather, for not "blowing the two small English vessels out of the water." By the death of Lord Napier, the care of the British interests has devolved on an old resident, and late officer of the Company, who, it may be believed, is perfectly competent to the task of maintaining tranquillity. It was expected that the ships would take in cargoes of tea in November and December; and as they will probably arrive in Britain in March and April, the price of this necessary article will then fall to its natural level in a free market, which will, it is thought, be about 4s. per lb.

FRANCE.

SINCE our last, France was without a ministry almost for a month. On February 24, the Duke of Treviso (Marshal Mortier) resigned the presidency, and his example was speedily followed by all his colleagues in the cabinet. The cause of this rupture is not properly explained; but there seems little doubt that it has been occasioned by Louis Philip himself, on account of the little influence which his ministers were found to have in the Chamber of Deputies, where they were twice defeated in an attempt to retain the tobacco monopoly for the exclusive benefit of the crown. Marshal Soult was sent for, from his seat at the foot of the Pyrenees, as well as Sebastiani from the court of England; and it was expected that either one or other would succeed to the president's chair—but this has not been the case. It is stated that both these statesmen, as well as Dupin, agreed to take office on condition of Louis Philip not personally interfering in their measures; which proposition of course was not listened to. A ministry, however, has again been constructed. The Duke de Broglie has accepted the Presidency; Admiral Rigny has been appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs; and the War Department is provisionally filled up, in expectation of its being accepted by Marshal Maison, now ambassador at Petersburg, who has been nominated to the office. No further changes have taken place, the residue of the old ministry having resumed their places. The new ministers are mostly Doctrinaires, and are not popular either in the Chamber or out of doors; and hence it is not thought that this ministry, whatever may be its other attributes, will have that of durability.

The Parisians are watching with intense interest the present movements in British politics; and the intelligence of the defeat of the British ministry on the question of the speakership, which was conveyed to Paris by telegraph, caused a considerable fall in the French funds.

UNITED STATES.

THE feeling of hostility towards France, in consequence of the latter refusing to fulfil her pecuniary obligations to the American merchants, seems to be gaining ground in Congress. In consequence of dispatches from Mr Livingston, the American minister at Paris, stating his being "far from sanguine in the success of his endeavours to accomplish the objects of his mission," President Jackson sent a second message to Congress, amongst with those dispatches and other documents relative to the French question. A debate ensued, in which Mr John Quincy Adams (the ex-President) moved the reference of the message and the accompanying documents to the committee on foreign relations, with instructions to report on the subject forthwith. He declared that "there was no longer any reasonable ground to expect that France would render them justice, and that the time had come when the house owed it to the nation and the world to sustain the President in the proposition he had made in support of the national dignity and honour." The sentiments advanced by Mr Adams were in general responded to, but his resolution was ultimately modified, so as to require the committee to report on the 20th February, and in this form was adopted. The Journal of Commerce says that the prevailing opinion is, that the Congress of the United States will authorise the President to issue letters of marque and reprisal against French commerce before they adjourn.

AUSTRIA.

THE Emperor of Austria expired, from an attack of pleurisy, at Vienna, on March 2, in the 67th year of his age. He left five children, two archdukes and three archduchesses, the issue of his second marriage. (He was married four times.) The heir to the throne, or imperial prince (now emperor), is Ferdinand Charles Leopold Joseph Francis Marcellin, who is forty-two years of age. He was crowned King of Hungary on the 28th September 1831. In the month of February of the same year he was married to Maria Anne Caroline, the daughter of Victor Emmanuel, the late King of Sardinia.

The death of the emperor created considerable sensation, as it was believed that his successor was personally hostile to Prince Metternich, and would probably, therefore, occasion a change of state policy, by calling others to his councils. But it appears, from a friendly and even affectionate letter, addressed by the new emperor to the old minister (published in the Vienna papers), soliciting, in flattering terms, a continuation of his services, that the anticipation was erroneous, and the old system of foreign and internal policy will be continued.

SPAIN.

GENERAL VALDEZ has been appointed successor to Llauder (as Secretary at War), whose unpopularity, as stated in our last, had occasioned his dismissal. There have also been other changes in the ministry. Gareli, a friend of Martinez de la Rosa, has given up the ministry of Justice to de la Depesa. No sufficient reason is assigned for this change, and it is thought to be the forerunner of the resignation of Martinez de la Rosa himself. Toreno is said to enjoy great favour at court. There have been no important recent accounts from the seat of war, but Mina appears to have made as yet little or no impression upon the Carlists.

PORTUGAL.

SOME changes have taken place in the Portuguese ministry. The bishop of Coimbra gave up the department, and has been created a peer. M. J. Freire has been transferred from the marine department to replace the bishop; Count Villa Real has filled up M. Freire's place; and the Duke of Palmella has taken on himself the foreign affairs. But what has caused much more excitement at Lisbon than these changes, is the circumstance of Saldanha, formerly leader of the opposition, having joined the ministry, and accepted the post of ambassador to French court.

TURKEY.

THE British fleet in the Levant has again put to sea, in consequence of Lord Ponsonby's orders, received on the 3d of February by Admiral Rowley, at Malta. The squadron consists of six ships of the line, the frigates, and four smaller vessels. No certain reason is given for the movement of this formidable armament; but there was a report at Malta that a conspiracy against the sultan had been discovered at Constantinople. It was not supposed at Malta that the movements of the Russians had caused the sudden activity of our fleet; and we observe that the Duke of Wellington stated in the House of Peers that there is no ground for uneasiness in that quarter.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

VERY serious accounts were lately received from the Cape of Good Hope, of an irruption by the Caffres into the British settlements in December last, who are said to have carried off about 10,000 head of cattle. Ten British colonists are also said to have been killed by the Caffres, who even made several attempts to destroy Graham's Town. After three days spent in repelling their attacks, Lieutenant-Colonel Somerset, with a detachment of the 75th regiment, succeeded in driving them back to their mountain-fastnesses, but not before nearly 100 of them were killed. The last accounts state that the disposition of the British troops around Graham's Town had restored perfect order, and awed the Caffres into quiescence.

It would appear, however, that the Caffres were not really the aggressive parties in this unfortunate dispute. Agreements had been entered into between the Caffres and the colonists, that should any property be stolen by the former, the colonists should not proceed vi et armis to enforce restitution, but compel the next kraal, or Caffre encampment, who would make restitution. A few cattle happened to be carried off from the colonists by some of the vagabond Caffres; the nearest border kraal was appealed to; and because restitution was not instantly afforded, the assistance of British military was called in, and the property of the Caffres indiscriminately carried away. In their retaliation, too, it appears that the Caffres acted with extraordinary lenity towards the British females and children, and, in one instance, a Caffre actually acted as guide and preserver to a British female and her family to Graham's Town, after her husband had been killed by the Caffres.

EAST INDIES.

RECENT arrivals contain intelligence of the disputes between the East India Company and the Rajah of Joudpoor being accommodated, and consequently the abandonment of the formidable expedition preparatory against that prince.

PARLIAMENT.

1. THE SPEAKERSHIP.

WE noticed shortly in the postscript to our last, the assembling of the new Parliament on February 1, by commission; together with the election of Mr Abercromby, M.P. for Edinburgh, as Speaker, in opposition to Sir C. M. Sutton, who was put forward as a candidate, under the auspices of ministers. As we then likewise detailed pretty fully the circumstances attending the canvass and election for the speakership, we reckon it unnecessary to revert at great length to that subject in our present number. Sir Charles Manners Sutton was proposed by Lord FRANCIS EGERTON, who dwelt at much length upon the able and satisfactory manner in which that gentleman had discharged the duties of the speakership for the last eighteen years, and who had been elected seven successive times almost without a dissenting voice. Lord Francis then quoted eulogistic passages from the speeches of Lord Morpeth and Sir Francis Burdett, on proposing and seconding Sir Charles Sutton for the chair of the first reformed Parliament; and the testimony of Lord Althorp to the merits of Sir Charles Sutton was also adduced. He then went on to allude to the "monstrous absurdities" against the late Speaker, which had been circulated for the last two or three months. He did not expect the charges to be repeated in that house, but he was told that his motion was to be opposed upon "a great public principle." What that "public principle" was, the noble lord (Lord John Russell) with whom the intended opposition originated, had left in Cinerean darkness. But as far as he (Lord Francis) could understand it, it was a principle as new as offensive to English feelings—that of condemnatory out trial, and the setting aside of all considerations of talent, fitness, ability, experience, and even of economy, for party political motives.—Sir R. B. BURRELL seconded the motion.—Mr J. DENISON fully admitted the many admirable qualities of the late Speaker, and his many virtues in private life; but this was not a question of a personal nature; it was one of great public principle. (Laughter from the ministerial benches, met by a roar from the Opposition.) The King had dissolved the late Parliament, and appealed to his people. The people had responded to the call by electing a majority of reformers; and he did think it incumbent on the house to elect a chairman whose principles assimilated with those of the majority of its members. Mr Denison then adverted to the important qualifications of Mr Abercromby for the duties of Speaker, by his experience, legal knowledge, amiable temper, and application to business; and concluded by proposing that gentleman—which was seconded by Mr ORD (of Newcastle). Sir CHARLES MANNERS SUTTON then rose and spoke at great length, in exculpation of himself from the charges lately brought against him, particularly his having intrigued for the dismissal of the present ministry, and assisted and advised in the formation of the present one. Respecting the latter, he went into a minute detail of all his communications with the court for some time before and after the dismissal of the late ministry; tending to show that these had not the slightest reference to political matters, and that in fact he had no communication with the King for many months, except in reference to the burning of the houses of Parliament. With respect to his assisting in forming the present government, he could most boldly and conscientiously declare, that, with the exception of his having been made aware of the appointments of Sir R. Peel, Lord Lyndhurst, and the Duke of Wellington, previous to their having been publicly announced, he had never advised, suggested, been consulted about, or, in short, knew of the appointment of any individual in the ministry until after it had taken place. He had certainly attended privy councils about the time, because he was summoned; so; but nothing but the most formal business was then transacted, as many gentlemen who then attended him could attest. He had also been charged with advising the dissolution of Parliament; but here he could solemnly declare that he never advised, suggested, or was consulted on that subject. He was not even present at the council when that measure was resolved upon. Upon all and each of these charges, continued the honourable member, "I will repeat, that, with respect to my having had any communication with any human being at any time in reference to the dispersion of the late government, or to my having had any interference at all in the appointment of the present government, or in having had any thing to do, either in the way of advice, suggestion, or by being present at any meeting, with the dissolution of the last Parliament, nay, to each and all of these matters, with the most solemnity, and with the strongest sanction that can be given in any court, and upon the faith and honour of a gentleman, that, from the beginning to the end, each and all of these charges are wholly and utterly false." He concluded by saying that the question—whether elected or not—fell to nothing as compared with the vindication of his personal character which it involved. There was no disgrace he could feel so heavy as the impression his defeat must have given that he had acted discreditably in an office which it had been the pride of his life for so many years to hold.—Mr ABERCROMBY briefly stated his reasons for coming forward as a candidate for the speakership on the present occasion. He had declined all urgent solicitations to do so, and would still adhere to that resolution, so far as regarded personal inclinations, but he had yielded in the end to the pressing solicitations of those in whom he placed the fullest confidence.—Lord STANLEY stated his own political sentiments differed widely both from those of Sir C. Sutton and Mr Abercromby. He owed to no man in zealous attachment to the principles of Earl Grey's ministry—the principle of reform. He incurred in all the praise the members of that ministry bestowed on Sir Charles Sutton, and thought there was no difference of political opinion was sufficient to counterbalance the inestimable advantages which the reform would derive from his services. He was of opinion then, he was of the same opinion still, that the charges which had been made against the late Speaker, that gentleman had triumphantly refuted. On the ground of those charges, therefore, the house could not degrade him from the situation he had long held. Lord Stanley then adverted to the argument that a great public principle was involved in the election of the house. That principle, it seems, was that the Speaker should represent, in his political opinions, those of a majority of the house. If this were a great public principle, Earl Grey's ministry had given it the go-by in 1831; they had given it the go-by in 1833. But it was said that the principle of 1833 was not one of an alarming or extraordinary description; that there was no immediate question of issue, on which a mistake could arise—no question on which a direct appeal to the country had been made. Why, what did the house say to 1831?—1831—when an appeal was made to the country involving the whole of the principles of the reform bill—involving the question, whether the country and the Parliament would have or would not have reform? Now, was there ever a question on which a public principle was so broadly put forward as that? Why, the first act of that Parliament—the first act of that reform administration, in the very agony and struggle for the reform bill itself—was to propose to the house, and to have unanimously adopted, a Speaker whose very principles were in opposition to that measure! The only principle he (Lord Stanley) could see in the present opposition, was to signify to the crown that the house had no confidence in the present ministry. If this was the case, he would say that an act of grosser injustice, an act savouring more of resentment than justice, could not be perpetrated. Let the question be manfully brought to an issue upon an address for the removal of ministers. Lord S. concluded by saying, if he were to name a fit person for the speakership, whose political opinions accorded most nearly with his own, that person would be Mr Spring Rice. But, in justice, candour, and honesty, the house could not reject Sir Charles Sutton.—Mr FERGUSON (M.P. for Haddingtonshire) explained at some length why he would not vote on the present occasion. He had pledged himself not to vote against Sir C. M. Sutton; but finding the struggle came to be regarded as a great constitutional question, he had requested to be released from his pledge. Unfortunately, as Sir Charles considered his honour and character involved in the question, he (Mr F.) had no alternative but to decline voting.—Sir C. M. SUTTON appealed to the honourable member whether or not his answer was—that he advised him (Mr F.) to take that course which should honestly and conscientiously satisfy his own mind, and that, whatever that course was, he might depend on its proving satisfactory.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL could not see how Sir C. M. Sutton's character could be injured by being rejected on this occasion. Respecting the charges against that gentleman, he (Lord John) entirely acquitted either him, Sir R. Peel, or the Duke of Wellington, of plotting for the overthrow of the Melbourne ministry; but he certainly thought Sir C. M. Sutton's repeated attendance at privy councils subsequent to that event, laid him open to suspicion in interfering with the new ministerial arrangements. Lord John defended his former vote in favour of Sir Charles, on the ground of his solicitude for the character of the first reformed House of Commons, many of the members of which were unacquainted with Parliamentary forms; but he thought the peculiarity of the present circumstances rendered it imperative to choose a Speaker who would be zealous for the liberties of the people in all his communications with the crown. His lordship then proceeded to argue upon the right of the Commons to choose their own Speaker, and alluded to the successful resistance made in the reign of Charles II. to an attempt to force on the house a Speaker favourable to the court, and quoted part of a speech by Sir Harbottle Grimston on the occasion, which concluded with these words, "Let every man remember the rights of the Commons of England." And so he (Lord John) would say on the present occasion.—Sir ROBERT PEEL said, that soon after he had undertaken the office of forming a cabinet, he applied to Sir Charles Sutton to become one of his colleagues; but that Sir Charles declined, on the ground that having been for eighteen years in the chair, it might lower the dignity of the chair were he to take part in political contention on the floor of the house. Lord John Russell had publicly stated that he now opposed Sir C. M. Sutton because the latter had contributed to the late dissolution of Parliament; but since it was now clearly shown that that impression was erroneous, he hoped the noble lord would either withdraw his opposition, or state other grounds for it. Sir Robert then went on to argue at great length in a similar strain with Lord Stanley, upon the absurdity of the plea that the Speaker should represent the principles of a majority of the house; the inconsistency of the supporters of Earl Grey's ministry now opposing the individual whom they themselves had elected; and the gross injustice in now passing a direct censure on his conduct and character, by rejecting him without a cause.—After Lord D. Stuart, Mr G. F. Robinson, and others, had explained why they now voted for Sir C. Sutton against those with whom they generally acted, the house divided, when there appeared

For Sir C. M. Sutton,	306
Mr Abercromby,	316
Majority against the former,	10

It is stated in various papers that betting to an extraordinary extent took place upon the issue of the contest, not merely in the club-rooms, but also in the lobby of the House of Commons, and that Sir C. M. Sutton's wellwishers lost to a great amount by the odds they gave on his success. So important was the contest considered, that some gentlemen came from the Continent expressly to give their votes. Among these, was Mr Macleod, the member for Sutherlandshire, who voted for Mr Abercromby. The following is a national analysis of the vote on the speakership:—

It appears that, excepting six absent, all the gentlemen described in the Spectator as Tories voted for Sir C. M. Sutton; that of those described as Reformers, 35 (none of them belonging to Scotland) voted for the same gentleman, and 17 were absent, including Mr Fergusson, M.P. for East Lothian, Mr W. F. Campbell, member for Argyleshire, and Lord James Stuart, member for Ayr; and that of the Doubtfuls, 39 supported the ministerial and four the Opposition candidate. Sir James Graham joined Lord Stanley in voting for the former, and Sir Francis Burdett, who intended doing the same, was prevailed on by his constituents to abstain himself.

2. THE KING'S SPEECH.

On Tu. Feb. 24, the King proceeded to the House of Lords to open the Parliament in person. His Majesty, we are told, was partially cheered while passing to and from the house, but the majority of the crowd offered no demonstration of feeling. The attendance of peers and ladies was unusually large, as also of the Commons when summoned to the bar. His Majesty then read the following speech, in a clear and firm voice:—

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I avail myself of the earliest opportunity of meeting you in Parliament, after having recurred to the sense of my people.

You will, I am confident, fully participate in the regret which I feel at the destruction, by accidental fire, of that part of the ancient palace of Westminster, which has been long appropriated to the use of the two houses of Parliament.

Upon the occurrence of this calamity, I gave immediate directions that the best provision, of which the circumstances of the case would admit, should be made for your present meeting; and it will be my wish to adopt such plans for the permanent accommodation of the two houses of Parliament as shall be deemed, on your joint consideration, to be most fitting and convenient.

I will give directions that there be laid before you the report made to me by the Privy Council in reference to the origin of the fire, and the evidence upon which their report was founded.

The assurances which I receive from my allies, and generally from all foreign princes and states, of their earnest desire to cultivate the relations of amity, and to maintain with me the most friendly understanding, justify on my part the confident expectation of the continuance of the blessings of peace.

The single exception to the general tranquillity of Europe is the civil contest which still prevails in some of the northern provinces of Spain.

I will give directions that there be laid before you articles which I have concluded with my allies the King of the French, the Queen of Spain, and the Queen of Portugal, which are supplementary to the treaty of April 1834, and are intended to facilitate the complete attainment of the objects contemplated by that treaty.

I have to repeat the expression of my regret that the relations between Holland and Belgium still remain unsettled.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I have directed the estimates for the ensuing year to be prepared and to be laid before you without delay.

They have been framed with the strictest attention to economy, and I have the satisfaction of acquainting you that the total amount of the demands for the public service will be less, on the present, than it has been on any former occasion within our recent experience.

The satisfactory state of the trade and commerce of the country, and of the public revenue, fully justifies the expectation that, notwithstanding the reductions in taxation which were made in the last session, and which, when they shall have taken full effect, will tend to diminish the existing surplus of the public revenue, there will remain a sufficient balance to meet the additional annual charge which will arise from providing the compensation granted by Parliament on account of the abolition of slavery throughout the British dominions.

I deeply lament that the agricultural interest continues in a state of great depression.

I recommend to your consideration whether it may not be in your power, after providing for the exigencies of the public service, and consistently with the steadfast maintenance of the public credit, to devise a method for mitigating the pressure of those local charges which bear heavily on the owners and occupiers of land; and for distributing the burden of them more equally over other descriptions of property.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The information received from the governors of my colonies, together with the acts passed in execution of the law for the abolition of slavery, will be communicated to you. It is with much satisfaction that I have observed the general concurrence of the colonial legislatures in giving effect to this important measure; and notwithstanding the difficulties with which the subject is necessarily attended, I have seen no reason to abate my earnest hopes of a favourable issue. Under all circumstances, you may be assured of my anxious desire, and unceasing efforts, fully to realise the benevolent intentions of Parliament.

There are many important subjects, some of which have already undergone partial discussion in Parliament; the adjustment of which, at as early a period as is consistent with the mature consideration of them, would be of great advantage to the public interests.

Among the first, in point of urgency, is the state of the tithe question in Ireland, and the means of effecting an equitable and final adjustment of it.

Measures will be proposed for your consideration, which will have for their respective objects to promote the commutation of tithe in England and Wales, to improve our civil jurisprudence, and the administration of justice in ecclesiastical causes, to make provision for the more effectual fectual maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline, and to relieve those who dissent from the doctrines or discipline of the church from the necessity of celebrating the ceremony of marriage according to its rites.

I have not yet received the report from the commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of municipal corporations—but I have reason to believe that it will be made, and that I shall be enabled to communicate it to you at an early period.

I have appointed a commission for considering the state of the several dioceses in England and Wales, with reference to the amount of their revenues, and to the more equal distribution of episcopal duties—the state of the several cathedral and collegiate churches, with a view to the suggestion of such measures as may render them most conducive to the efficiency of the established church; and for devising the best mode of providing for the cure of souls, with reference to the residence of the clergy in their respective benefices. The especial object which I have in view in the appointment of this commission is to extend more widely the means of religious worship according to the doctrines of the established church, and to confirm its hold upon the veneration and affections of my people.

I feel it also incumbent upon me to call your earnest attention to the condition of the church of Scotland, and to the means by which it may be enabled to increase the opportunities of religious worship for the poorer classes of society in that part of the United Kingdom.

It has been my duty, on this occasion, to direct your consideration to various important matters connected with our domestic policy.

I rely with entire confidence on your willing co-operation in perfecting all such measures as may be calculated to remove just causes of complaint, and to promote the concord and happiness of my subjects.

I rely, also, with equal confidence on the caution and circumspection with which you will apply yourselves to the alteration of laws which affect very extensive and complicated interests, and are interwoven with ancient usages, to which the habits and feelings of my people have conformed.

I feel assured that it will be our common object, in supplying that which may be defective, or in renovating that which may be impaired, to strengthen the foundations of those institutions in church and state, which are the inheritance and birthright of my people, and which, amidst all the vicissitudes of public affairs, have proved, under the blessing of Almighty God, the surest guarantees of their liberties, their rights, and their religion.

3. THE ADDRESS.

In the House of Commons, immediately after the delivery of the King's speech, Lord SANDON moved the address, which, as usual, was merely an echo of the speech. He contended that ministers were entitled to a fair trial, and felt he could consistently support them, as their principles, as expressed in the royal speech, were perfectly consistent with those of Earl Grey's administration, with which he had been connected. He never had, and could not have, the slightest confidence in Lord Melbourne's ministry, which was diametrically different from that of Earl Grey; and he thought those gentlemen who supported the latter, but were now arrayed against the present ministry, must secretly feel very awkwardly situated. After alluding in hopeful terms to the various heads of the royal speech, his lordship concluded by reading the address.—Mr BRAMPTON briefly seconded it.—Lord MORPETH, in rising to propose an amendment to part of it, allowed there was much in the speech calculated to give satisfaction, but complained of its vagueness on many important points, particularly as regarded the Irish church, corporation reform, dissenters' grievances, &c. He loudly condemned the unceremonious dismissal of the former ministry, which so largely possessed the confidence of the late Parliament, as well as the "unseemly holding of many offices" by the Duke of Wellington for such a length of time. He willingly bore testimony to Sir Robert Peel's high talents, and honest aspirations to serve his country, but thought that he had now opposed himself to the political inclinations of the country. His overt act had been to dissolve a Parliament which had manifested every inclination of loyalty to the crown and duty to the people. His lordship concluded by moving the substitution of the following words for the last two paragraphs of the address (corresponding to the last two paragraphs of the speech):—"To assure his Majesty that his Majesty's faithful Commons acknowledge with grateful recollection, that the acts for amending the representation of the people were submitted to Parliament with his Majesty's sanction, and carried into a law by his Majesty's assent; that, confidently expecting to derive further advantages from these wise and necessary measures, we trust that his Majesty's councils will be directed in the spirit of well-considered and effective reform; and that the liberal and comprehensive policy which restored to the people the right of choosing their representatives, and which provided for the emancipation of all persons held in slavery in his Majesty's colonies and possessions abroad, will, with the same enlarged views, place without delay our municipal corporations under vigilant popular control, remove all the well-founded grievances of the Protestant dissenters, and correct those abuses in the church which impair its efficiency in England, disturb the peace of society in Ireland, and lower the character of the establishment in both countries. To represent to his Majesty that his Majesty's faithful Commons beg leave submissively to add, that they cannot but lament that the progress of these and other reforms should have been interrupted and endangered by the unnecessary dissolution of a Parliament earnestly intent upon the vigorous prosecution of measures to which the wishes of the people were most anxiously and justly directed."—Mr BANNERMAN seconded the amendment, though he was aware many of the members on his side of the house considered it to be too much of a milk-and-water nature. He expressed his hope that the present ministry would be turned out as unceremoniously as their predecessors had been.

—Mr PEMBERTON spoke at great length in defence of the address, and in eulogy of Lord Stanley, whose absence from the government he much regretted. He denied that opposition to the reform bill was any disqualification for taking office. There was nothing in its construction that indispensably required that the original inventors should always preside over its workings. Yet the subject was treated as if the reform bill were a machine which necessarily gave the inventor a patent right in its management and use.

—Mr RICHARDS (member for Knaresborough) regretted that he had now to differ from those with whom he had usually acted as a reformer; but he could not support the amendment, the evident tendency of which was to bring back the Whigs to power, and who were perfectly incapable of maintaining the reins of government independent of that party, one of whom (Mr O'Connell) had in the last session characterised their measures as brutal and bloody, and of whom another (Mr Hume) had said he would rather see Sir Robert Peel in office than the Whigs.—Mr GROTE at great length supported the amendment, which he said would be one of the best amendments ever made, if it produced the effect anticipated by Mr Richards—the retirement of ministers.—Mr Gaskell, Mr Trevor, Colonel Sibthorpe, Mr C. Pelham, and Lord Castlereagh, severally spoke in favour of the address; and Mr Poulter, Mr Clay, Sir S. Walley, Mr Barron, and Dr Bowring, for the amendment.—Sir ROBERT PEEL rose to give those explanations which had been required of ministers in the preceding discussion. He stood there as the minister of the crown; placed in that situation by no act of his own—from no combination with those to whose principles he had been uniformly opposed, or seeking a temporary alliance for the purpose of embarrassing any government. He stood there in fulfilment of a public duty; shrinking from no responsibility; and resolved to persevere to the last.—(Loud and long-continued cheers from the ministerial side)—so far as was consistent with the honour of a public man, in maintaining the prerogative of the crown, and in fulfilling those duties which he owed to his king and to the country. In vindication of the course which he had pursued, it was necessary that he should refer to the circumstances which preceded the dissolution of the last government. He had been asked whether he would impose on the crown the responsibility of the dismissal of that government? In answer to this question, he could only say that he claimed all the responsibility which properly belonged to him as a public man: he was responsible for the assumption of the duty which he had undertaken; and, if they pleased, he was, by his acceptance of office, responsible for the removal of the late government. But he could at the same time unhesitatingly assert that under no circumstances would he have been a party to counselling or instigating the removal of any government. Although, however, he had not taken any part in procuring the dismissal of the late government, he was ready, be the majority against him what it might, to take all the responsibility which properly belonged to him, and to submit to any consequences to which the assumption of that responsibility might expose him. Sir Robert animadverted bitterly upon the conduct of the Whig party of the Opposition, and referred to the numerous occasions on which he had lent efficient aid to the late ministers, in proof of the absence of all desire to embarrass them by a factious opposition. He then proceeded to detail at considerable length the circumstances which occasioned and attended Lord Grey's resignation, and the reconstruction of the ministry by Lord Melbourne, laying particular stress on the importance of Lord Althorp to both ministries, and reminding the house that Lord Althorp was in fact the basis of the Melbourne administration—the corner-stone upon which the government was founded. Not only was the Melbourne ministry weakened by the loss of Lord Althorp, and the withdrawal of Lord Grey, Lord Stanley, Lord Ripon, Sir James Graham, and the Duke of Richmond, but it was deprived of the support of a large body of those who professed extreme opinions. He called attention to Mr O'Connell's letters to Lord Duncannon, and read some extracts from one dated the 11th October, in which Mr O'Connell charged Lord Duncannon with having "bitterly and cruelly deceived Ireland," and declared that Ireland could expect nothing better from the Whigs than "insolent contempt, and malignant but treacherous hostility." In the same letter, Mr O'Connell declared that there must be a change of men before there was a change of measures; he charged Lord Melbourne with incapacity for the office of Prime Minister, and asserted that Lord Lansdowne was hostile to Ireland, "with a hatred the more active and persevering, because he is bound by every obligation to entertain diametrically opposite sentiments." From the hostility thus avowed by the Irish members, the loss of all the most powerful members of Earl Grey's government, and the recurrence of that condition of things that had caused Earl Grey's retirement, Sir Robert argued that it was impossible Lord Melbourne's ministry could continue to govern upon constitutional principles, and that his Majesty was perfectly justified in taking the reins of power from their hands. Sir Robert defended the conduct of the Duke of Wellington during the interval of the two ministries, and quoted the precedent of the Whig Duke of Salisbury, who, while Queen Anne was dying, was invested with the offices of Lord Treasurer, Chamberlain, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He then came to the dissolution of the late Parliament, the whole responsibility of which, he said, heaped upon himself, without a moment's hesitation, seemed most extraordinary that the Opposition should blame him for dissolving a Parliament, of which he had all along been their boast that he could not to a division more than 120 members. But that was, that dissolutions of Parliament had always resorted to upon all extensive changes of government. He had been told that he ought to conform his principles to those of the reform act; but he wished to know what those principles were. During the two sessions, he found himself constantly supporting the reformed government on a great variety of occasions, when that government was strenuously opposed by those who call themselves reformers. He said Sir Robert never was opposed to salutary, progressive, well-considered reform; and such was the principle upon which he had always acted, and would continue to act. He then proceeded to give some explanation of the course he meant to pursue, and the measure he intended to bring forward. And first of all, he denied that the foreign policy of the country was to undergo alteration; while he maintained the wisdom of keeping up friendly relations even with despotic powers. The next point was economy; and he believed that he should be able to effect a reduction in the estimates of £500,000. With regard to slavery, the government felt especially anxious that something should be done to insure the success of the experiment of emancipating the negroes, and without view had requested Lord Sligo to retain the governorship of Jamaica, as his lordship was cognisant of the views and intentions of the late ministry. Sir Robert (continued Sir Robert) to propose a commutation of tithe in England and Wales. I intend to propose a measure founded on the report of the ecclesiastical commission, of which Sir James Graham was the chief promoter, the effect of which will be to appoint supreme courts for the cognisance of all ecclesiastical causes. I shall propose a measure for the effectual maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline, meaning thereby the discipline of the church over its laity, but to enforce episcopal authority, and prevent those instances of clerical misconduct which occasionally arise. We propose also to relieve those who dissent from the doctrine or discipline of the church from the necessity of celebrating the ceremony of marriage according to its rites." With regard to general registry, the subject was surrounded with numerous difficulties, but he would certainly give it his earnest attention. On the subject of corporation reform, he said it would be altogether improper to prejudge the report of the commissioners, or pledge himself to any particular measure, before that document was given in: it would be ready about the end of March. He was prepared, however, to say as much as Earl Grey had advised his Majesty to say upon the opening of the session of 1834, namely, that a commission was issued to inquire into corporation abuses, and that in due time these abuses would be corrected. Respecting church rates, he was bound to say that he could not consent to their extinction, as it was a positive obligation on the state to provide for the repair of churches. He meant rather to direct attention to a fairer appropriation and distribution of those local burdens that fell so heavily upon the laity. Respecting church reform, commissioners were now engaged in investigating the various topics which were most extensive and complicated; but of his own desire to promote it, he said, the best earnest witness to be found in the fact, that on the first vacancy that had occurred of those appointments called sinecures (prebendal stall of Winchester, value £1200), although the commission had not been instituted, Sir Robert Peel advised the crown to make no appointment, but to leave it in the hands of the commissioners; and he meant to take the same course with every other similar preferment in the church, with the view of anticipating the object of the commission. Having now gone over the general measures indicated in the speech, Sir Robert alluded to the amendment, which indicated no measure or principle; but only hoped that the same principles which directed the abolition of slavery and the reform of Parliament, would correct church and corporation abuses. It was perfectly evident that the amendment had been proposed for other than its professed purposes, and that its supporters were afraid to recognise in it those measures on which they differed amongst themselves. Why had they not inserted in the ballot? the repeal of the septennial act? the repeal of the Union? Because upon none of those measures did they (the Opposition) entertain the same opinion. It was evident their amendment was intended to trap the support of Lord Stanley and his friends, whom they had concurred in the reform bill, and the abolition of slavery. It professed a readiness to abuses in church and state, leaving every man to go for himself what these abuses were. "With to the church of Ireland, you take an indirect unfair advantage: you do not say that the settlement of the tithe question is essential to the peace of the land, but only that something respecting the tithe disturbs the peace of society. Such a topic is to be disposed of by mere equivocal and general terms of this kind. Let us discuss it fairly, and know the principles really are on which we are to proceed."

Sir Robert concluded his speech by expressing his hope that an opportunity would be allowed the members of carrying their plans of reform into effect. He offered them a reform in the various branches of ecclesiastical establishment. He offered them an endeavour to remove the disabilities under which they laboured in entering upon professions. He offered them the prospect of permanent public peace. He offered them the hope of carrying many measures of utility into effect. He offered them that pecuniary advantage in his position which he trusted would enable him to restore harmony between the two houses of parliament. An endeavour might be made to form a coalition of men of extreme opinions; but unless he was greatly deceived, the popular feeling in behalf of the coalition would soon abate; and there would be no alternative but either for such an administration to resign, and leave the government in the hands of those who, by sober measures, would carry with them the concurrence of the respectable portion of the community and of the House of Lords, or to have recourse to a system of compulsion and violence which would render all their reforms ineffective, and would lead to the fate of the British constitution. In the address, Wed. Feb. 25, Lord STANLEY said, as he assured his supporting the address would not be construed into expressing a confidence in ministers (which he could not feel), he would state his reasons for opposing the amendment; and he wished it understood that he spoke the sentiments of a gentleman, not insignificant in point of number, in the house, who were bent upon the attainment of certain measures of reform, but would not attempt to secure them by a course of proceeding. He had no hesitation in stating that his own mind, and that of many others in the house, were made up on having the corporation reformed upon the principle of the reform act. The whole country was agreed upon this point, and the omission of ministers to notice it more made him look with more jealousy than ever on the conduct. His lordship complained that the subject of Irish church reform was so vaguely alluded to in the amendment; and maintained that the tithe question, which ministers were pledged to adjust, was a question which disturbed the peace of Ireland, though the existence of the Protestant church was an occasion of irritation and discontent. Lord RUSSELL rose to state his reasons for supporting the amendment, and proceeded, in a strain of irony, to point out why the several points touched upon in it had not been stated more explicitly. He denied that the resignation of Earl Grey was occasioned by the intrigues of one of his colleagues. The Melbourne ministry had determined to follow up the intentions of Earl Grey. With respect to their (the Melbourne ministry's) intentions respecting the Irish church, he might safely declare that the principle on which they were all agreed on was this—that the funds of the Protestant church in Ireland ought in the first place to be applied to give religious instruction to the Protestant population; and when that had been carefully and fully provided for, the surplus had the right to apply any surplus to the general education of the people, including Churchmen, Roman Catholics, and Dissenters. There was the smallest difference amongst the Melbourne ministry on this or any other subject, and there never was an exercise of the royal prerogative so unreasonable as that of their dismissal. The confidence of the House of Commons in the peace was maintained abroad; tranquillity at home and commerce and manufactures were increasing. The debate was adjourned at one o'clock.

In the adjourned debate, Thurs. Feb. 26, Lord STANLEY opposed the address, and especially contended that part of the King's speech which intimated an intended grant of money for building a new establishment for the Scotch establishment. Major BRUCE contended, that although the majority of Scotch members were anti-ministerial, the proportion of the men of property in Scotland were supporters of ministers. He also expressed himself strongly in favour of upholding and extending the union of church and state, and extending the benefits of religious education. Mr MAULE denied that the majority of men of property in Scotland were friends of the existing ministry. Mr MAULE also declared that he could not conscientiously vote any of the public money for building churches. Mr GIBBONE, in a long satirical speech, ridiculed the idea of the present ministers reforming the corporations or the Irish church. He defended Sir Robert Peel to his colleagues around him. The Opposition was taunted with inability to form a ministry, (Mr Gibbone) thought very differently. He amplified the case, and state two men who he would both possess and deserve, as ministers, the confidence of the country—he meant Mr Grote and Mr Warburton. (Cries of "Oh! Oh!" and loud laughter from the ministerial benches.—Lord HOWICK supported the amendment, especially as he thought its being carried would not lead to the resignation of ministers. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" and cheers, from the ministerial benches). He felt so strongly the reasons which were urged the other night by Sir Robert Peel—he also felt so strongly the arguments of Lord Stanley—that he could not without very great apprehension—and, indeed, he was not quite certain that he should feel it his duty to give such a vote as he intended to give on this subject—if he thought that it would have such a result. (Hear, hear, hear!) At any rate, he could not, without great difficulty and apprehension, give a vote which might at once lead to the dismissal of ministers.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM (who was labouring under severe indisposition) regretted that the King's speech had not been more explicit on the subject of corporation reform. The popular election principle was what the people were determined to have. He could not, however, support the amendment, the carrying of which might cause serious consequences by displacing ministers, and which he looked upon as a dishonourable intrigue. In allusion to the report of his having said to his constituents that the government was composed of the "worst possible materials," he explained that his words were, that the government was composed of men in whom he could not place unlimited confidence; but that not seeing the chance of obtaining a better, he was resolved to resist any factious motion for displacing it.—Mr O'CONNELL then spoke at great length in a strain of ridicule against those calling themselves reformers, who supported the address, especially those who adhered to Lord Stanley and Sir James Graham, whom he termed the tail of these gentlemen. He then went in detail into an examination of all the principal topics of the King's speech, and concluded by adverting to the subject of the repeal of the Union. It had been said of him that he now supported the Whigs, and quashed the subject of the repeal merely to get them back to power, after which he would again renew his agitation for it. This was not true; he would merely ask the Whigs to do justice to Ireland, which, if they did not, he would then propose the repeal.—Mr O'DWYER and Mr SHAW spoke briefly; and the house divided—

For the address,	302
For the amendment,	309

Majority against ministers, 7

The report was ordered to be received on Friday.

Immediately after the division, Lord JOHN RUSSELL asked if Sir Robert Peel intended again dividing upon bringing up the report?—to which Sir Robert declined replying; but upon the report being brought up the following night (Fri. Feb. 27) Sir Robert declined dividing, as, from inquiries he had made, he was convinced that the division was not accidental, but a fair indication of the sense of the house. (Loud cheers from the Opposition).—Lord J. RUSSELL said Sir Robert Peel's conduct in the matter was in accordance with his usual candour.—Mr HUME read an amendment he had intended to propose, which went simply to express a want of confidence in ministers, but he would not press it to a vote. He maintained, that however they might differ on other subjects, the Opposition were agreed on one point—that of turning out the ministers.—After remarks from other members, the address, as amended, was agreed to.

On Mon. Mar. 2, the Speaker announced to the Commons that he had presented the address of the house to the King on the previous Saturday, and that his Majesty had made the following gracious reply:—"I thank you sincerely for the assurances which you have given me, in this loyal and dutiful address, of your disposition to co-operate with me in the improvement, with a view to their maintenance, of our institutions in church and state. I learn with regret that you do not concur with me as to the policy of the appeal which I have made to the sense of my people. I never have exercised, and I never will exercise, any of the prerogatives which I hold, except for the single purpose of promoting the great end for which they are intrusted to me—the public good; and I confidently trust that no measure conducive to the general interests will be endangered or interrupted in its progress by the opportunity which I have afforded to my faithful and loyal subjects of expressing their opinions through the free choice of their representatives in Parliament."

In the House of Lords, on Feb. 24, Lord MELBOURNE moved a similar amendment to the address (the latter being proposed and seconded by Lords HARDWICKE and GAGE), as that proposed in the House of Commons. He reprobated in strong terms the assumption of so many offices by the Duke of Wellington during the interval of the administrations; and characterised the dissolution of the late Parliament as a mere wanton exercise of power, adopted for no other purpose but that of introducing a few Tory members into the House of Commons, in order to drag them through the mire, after the abandonment of their principles.—The Duke of WELLINGTON detailed at considerable length the circumstances under which he came to take office. He demonstrated the absurdity of the rumours that he and his friends had intrigued for the dismissal of the late ministry. Was it likely that, if they had been plotting for, or expecting, that event, Sir Robert Peel would have been travelling upon a pleasure tour through Italy, or he himself (the Duke) residing at his house in Hampshire? He was quite ready to abide the consequences of discharging so many duties during the interval of the two administrations. He conceived there was nothing criminal in his readiness to assist his Sovereign at such a crisis; and if there was, Lord Melbourne himself was a party to the offence, for he had brought the letter summoning him to Brighton with him to London.—Lord MELBOURNE explained, that, to oblige Sir Herbert Taylor, he had merely allowed his servant to carry the letter to Sir H. Wheatley.—Lord BROUGHAM spoke at great length. He said that the speech was one continued eulogy on the measures of the late ministry. He ridiculed the idea of the existence of a British ministry depending on the life of an old man of seventy-eight, like Lord Spencer, and quoted some passages from Earl Grey's Edinburgh speech, to prove that he never contemplated the breaking up of the liberal ministry, and the accession of the Tories upon Lord Althorp's removal, although the resignation of Lord Althorp had certainly caused Earl Grey's retirement. The Melbourne ministry was perfectly united; and it was because the present ministry knew that the last House of Commons would have supported it, that they had adopted the dissolution. He spoke in bitter terms of the dismissal of the Melbourne ministry by the King. The King's prerogative was a thing not to be used for his amusement; it was not to be used as an idle or a pampered man might exercise the right of sending away his servants without notice, and choosing others; and he need scarcely suggest that the man who exercised that right capriciously would be all the worse served for indulging his whims. If men of that description turned off their servants for no assignable cause and without notice—if they so made fools of themselves, they must pay for it. He charged the present ministry with a desertion of their principles now, as they had done upon the question of Catholic emancipation, from the mere love of office.—The amendment was negatived without a division.

4. MALT TAX.

In the House of Commons, Mar. 9, the Marquis of Chandos brought forward his important motion for the repeal of the malt tax. The marquis gave a brief history of the tax. It was first imposed in the reign of William III.; it was then 4s. a quarter; and had been gradually raised, until, in 1804, it reached 38s. 8d.: it was now 20s. 8d. a quarter. The consequence, as the noble mover believed, was an alarming increase of crime and immorality, by encouraging the use of ardent spirits. By removing the tax, private breweries would be re-established in the dwellings of the poor, and gin and beer-shops abandoned. The farmer would also be greatly benefited. A farmer holding two hundred and fifty acres of arable land would be benefited to the extent of L.70 or L.80 per annum. Lord Chandos then alluded to the enormous profits which he said were engrossed by the maltsters. In some way or another, nearly three millions sterling paid by the country found its way into the pockets of individuals, the greater part of which ought to be paid into the Exchequer. He found upon inquiry that the quality of the beer now brewed in London was very inferior to what it was formerly. In another way, too, the malt tax was injurious. The farmers were deterred from feeding cattle on the refuse barley, by the fear of coming within the excise laws. In Buckinghamshire, many respectable graziers fed their cattle for the Smithfield market upon oil-cake, a most expensive article for the purpose, because they were afraid to use the cheaper and more wholesome food of refuse barley wetted with water, and which might be pronounced malting by the excise. The revenue now derived from the malt tax might be made up by imposing duties on raw spirits, foreign wines, and other articles of luxury, without taxing the comforts of the poor. All he now moved for was a resolution declaring the expediency of abolishing the tax, and it might afterwards be considered in what way it ought to be done, whether gradually or at once.

Major HANDLEY seconded the motion. He would suggest a property tax, or a tax on stock-transfers, if necessary, as a substitute for the malt tax.—Sir ROBERT PEEL set out with complaining of this motion for abolishing several millions of revenue being brought forward before the house had been made acquainted with the financial state of the country, and without an opportunity being afforded for any other class to put in their claims for a remission of taxes. Sir Robert then explained, that the surplus revenue of the year ending 5th April 1836, according to his own calculation, as well as Lord Althorp's, would not exceed L.250,000. Now, the gross produce of the malt tax last year was L.5,150,000 sterling. It had been progressively increasing without any augmentation of rate. In 1831, the net sum paid into the Exchequer from the produce of the tax was L.4,208,000; in 1832, L.4,675,000; in 1833, L.4,772,000; in 1834, L.4,812,000. As he had only L.250,000 surplus, the consequence of repealing the malt tax would be a deficit in the public revenue of L.4,500,000. Lord Chandos spoke of the great depression in the price of agricultural produce; but the fact was, that, whilst wheat was very low in price, the much taxed article of barley was unprecedentedly high. Notwithstanding this, the quantity malted was steadily increasing. He found upon inquiry that the increase in the quantity brought to charge, between the 10th of October 1834 and the 19th of February 1835, as compared with the corresponding period of the preceding year, was no less than 846,000 bushels. He admitted that the quantity of beer consumed had not increased in the same ratio with that of tea, coffee, sugar, and spirits; but he contended that the change in the national tastes, indicated by the consumption of these articles, was the reason of the comparatively less increase in the consumption of beer—it could not be the tax. Sir Robert then stated the various rates at which tea, coffee, spirits, &c. were taxed by government, showing that barley was the least taxed of all. He demonstrated the absurdity of the supposition, that the poorer classes would brew their own beer if the tax was abolished. Why did they not so when the duty of 35s. a-barrel on beer existed? That tax, be it recollected, was only paid by the brewer, and the poor man who brewed his own beer did not pay any duty of the kind. Then, did the practice of the poor man brewing his own beer prevail to a greater extent than at present? At that time honourable gentlemen connected with the agricultural interests dwelt on the advantages that would result from the removal of the duty on beer; but it was now found that the existence of the beer-shops had more than counterbalanced the other advantages. Then as to the proposed substitutes for the malt tax, he observed that a tax on spirits would neither diminish the consumption nor benefit the revenue; it would merely encourage smuggling. It would ultimately be necessary to have a property tax, of which all the landed interest, farmer as well as landlord, would bitterly repent. He warned the house, therefore, of the consequences of adopting the present motion. The history of this very malt tax was pregnant with lessons of warning. On three different occasions they had retraced their steps. In 1816, they took off part of the duty, in the hope that there would be some great correspondent reduction in the price. In this being disappointed, however, in 1819 they replaced the duty they had so taken off. In March 1821, the house determined, by a small majority, to repeal the malt duty; but in one month after, in April 1821, it rescinded its own decision. They did the same thing in 1833. By a precipitate vote, adopted in the enthusiasm of the moment, they passed a resolution with a view to the repeal of a portion of the duty, and on the following Monday they retraced their steps.—Mr COBBETT supported the motion, as did Mr BENNETT and Lord DARLINGTON.—Mr C. WOOD and Mr S. RICE avowed their intention of supporting ministers, notwithstanding the charges made against them by the latter of factious opposition.—Mr P. THOMSON and Sir J. GRAHAM also spoke against the motion, the latter saying it was the only one remaining of those peculiar burdens which justified the landed interest in demanding the corn-laws.—Mr HUME supported the motion, and entered into some long figurative statements to show that L.500,000 would be saved out of the mere expense of collecting this the malt tax. After several others had spoken, and the mover replied, the house divided—

5. ORANGE ADDRESSES.

A long and angry discussion took place in the House of Commons on Wed. Mar. 4, upon the legality of addresses from Orange societies in Ireland, and their presentation to the King.—Mr O'CONNELL and others asserted their illegality, and the notorious encouragement given to these societies by the present government, who filled up all the public offices with Orangemen.—Sir R. PEEL said the reception of a petition must depend greatly upon the wording of it; and further added, that its reception was no recognition of the legality of the society that offered it.—Sir HENRY HARDINGE denied that ministers had shown a partiality for Orangemen, and referred to the case of the Attorney-General for Ireland, and other officers, who were retained by the present government, although appointed by the last.—Mr LEFROY asserted that Mr O'Connell's statement that Orangemen took secret oaths was false and calumnious. These societies had left off prescribing oaths since the latter were declared illegal.—On Fri. Mar. 6, the subject was again renewed by Mr SHEIL moving for production of the addresses and answers to them, alluded to on the above evening, as well as the opinions of the Irish law officers respecting Orange societies.—Sir R. PEEL challenged the Opposition to divide on the latter clause of the motion. Having no moral power on their side, let them show what their numerical strength was.—Mr O'CONNELL attributed all the evils that prevailed in Ireland to Orange societies.—Mr SHAW retorted in a long vituperative speech against Mr O'Connell, who never scrupled to coalesce with Orange societies when it suited his purpose. Mr Shaw referred all the party ill-blood in Ireland to Mr O'Connell himself, and alluded to his having, at the last election for the county of Kerry, held out threats of assassination against all who dared to vote contrary to his wishes.—(Mr Shaw, at the suggestion of the Speaker, retracted this expression, but added)—at least he (Mr O'Connell) had ordered deaths' heads and cross-bones to be painted on the doors of the recusant voters, and stated an instance where a man's house was attacked in consequence.—Mr O'CONNELL declared solemnly that the whole statement was totally false.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL spoke earnestly against Mr Shaw's allegations, and considered the present government gave full evidence of their approbation of Orangeism. He likewise taunted them with their inconsistency in continuing the system of national education in Ireland established by their predecessors, and which they had formerly denounced.—Sir HENRY HARDINGE defended the consistency of government, who only wished to give their predecessors' plans a fair trial.—After much discussion, the first part of Mr Sheil's motion was agreed to.—On Thur. Mar. 12, Mr DOBBIN moved for certain papers relative to the riotous proceedings of certain magistrates, police, and Orangemen, at Keady, in Armagh, in November last.—Sir HENRY HARDINGE said, the papers were in the hands of the crown law-officers, with instructions to prosecute the parties, whose conduct the government highly condemned. Sir Henry at the same time promised to produce papers relative to other riotous proceedings in the same county; and likewise stated that he had issued orders that clerical magistrates should not in future act personally in the collection of their own tithes.

6. IRISH TITHES.

Mar. 20. Sir H. HARDINGE brought forward the ministerial measure for the settlement of the Irish tithe question. It proposed to convert the present tithe composition into an annual rent-charge on the owners of the first estate of inheritance, at the rate of L.75 for every L.100 of composition; such rent-charge to be redeemed, and the redemption-money to be invested in land, or otherwise, for the benefit of the titheowner. All collision between the clergyman and the payer of the rent-charge would be provided against. Sir Henry also proposed to remit to the clergy the sums they had got from the million loan, and to surrender the remainder (L.300,000) to them, in lieu of other arrears. The two parts of the plan having been submitted to the house in committee, several of the Opposition members delivered their sentiments respecting it, commenting with some bitterness on the rejection of the plan of last year, which proposed L.77, 10s. instead of L.75, and complaining of want of time to consider the proposal respecting the loan.—Mr O'CONNELL said it shut out all prospect of relief and peace for Ireland, which only could be gained by the concession that the church revenues might be appropriated for other than ecclesiastical purposes. In consequence, he said, of the conduct of the House of Lords, the massacre of Rathcoormac had taken place. "The mother had her sons in the morning, and amidst the scene of blood, she went to examine the bodies that lay on the ground: she found a first body, and she shrieked with joy, for it was not the dead body of her son: she found a second body, and she gave a second shriek of joy, for that was not the body of her son: but the third—oh God!—her eyeballs glared on the corpse of her child, and she wept not—she could not weep—a woman's tears could not fall—nor do they yet flow!"—Mr HUME moved that the whole question be postponed, and that the chairman do report progress. In the course of his observations, he remarked upon the conduct of Sir Robert Peel in bringing forward the present measure after opposing the bill of last session; and said, that, had he been in his place, he should have held such conduct to be dishonourable.—This moved Sir Robert Peel to demand an explanation; but he could get nothing from Mr Hume but a repetition of the substance of what he had before stated.—[Mr Hume, at Sir Robert Peel's request by letter, that evening, granted an explanation, which satisfied the right hon. baronet.]—After a rather sharp discussion between Mr Spring Rice, Sir Robert Peel, and Mr Poulett Thompson—in which the previous conduct of each of those gentlemen was referred to by one or the other, in order to demonstrate the inconsistency of their present with their former course, in relation to the tithe question.—Mr Hume withdrew his motion; and Mr Spring Rice moved, as an amendment to the resolutions, "That it is expedient to alter and amend the laws relating to tithes in Ireland." This resolution, he maintained, would enable the ministers to bring in their bill.—Sir Robert Peel refused to give way; and the committee divided—

7. ENGLISH TITHES.

Mar. 24. Sir R. PEEL obtained leave to bring in a bill for enabling parishes, at their option, to enter into those arrangements with the titheowners for a commutation, which 2000 parishes had already entered into at the expense of separate acts of Parliament. He proposed that there should be nothing compulsory in the measure except that a commissioner should preside over the transactions in each case, as an amicus curiæ. A number of members expressed great apprehensions that the intention of the bill would be frustrated by the difference of opinion between the titheowners and the tithepayers as to the value of the tithes, a variance unavoidable where the comparative expenditure of capital, ingenuity, and industry, create such differences in the productiveness of various parts of the soil.

8. MINOR SUBJECTS.

Mar. 4. Sir John Campbell obtained leave to bring in a bill for the abolition of imprisonment for debt, except in fraudulent cases.—It was read a second time, Mar. 18, and referred to a select committee.

12. Mr Hume mentioned to the house, that, after a consultation with his friends, he had resolved to postpone his motion for limiting the supplies to a short period, from a consideration of its being insufficient to decide the question of the confidence of the house in ministers. This announcement produced some exulting taunts from Sir R. Peel and several members friendly to the ministry.—The Attorney-General obtained leave to bring in bills for the improvement of the administration of justice in civil cases. On Mar. 18, Sir R. Peel demanding credit for this intended reform, Mr Hume asserted it was one of those intended by the late administration, and that the new government was only proceeding to hatch an egg laid by the old.

13. Mr Sheil made a motion expressing the dissatisfaction of the house with the appointment of Lord Londonderry to the Russian embassy, and was followed by several other members, all of whom spoke warmly against that exercise of the crown patronage. Sir Robert Peel defended the appointment on its merits, and deprecated improper interferences of the house with the prerogatives of the crown. The motion, which had not been formally made, was finally withdrawn.—Mar. 16. The Marquis of Londonderry announced in the House of Lords, that, in consequence of a sense of his usefulness as an ambassador having been impaired by the late conversation in the other house, he had felt it his duty to resign the appointment.

17. Sir R. Peel introduced his measure for the marriages of dissenters, which seemed to give general satisfaction. It provides that dissenters, after a residence of seven days in a certain hundred, may appear before a magistrate, and declare their intention of entering into the married state. An oath, stating that the parties are of age, or have the consent of guardians, will then be required; at any time after fourteen days, but within three months, the parties may come again before the magistrate, and be married man and wife by simply signing a declaration to that effect. The only charges will be 2s. to the magistrate, and 5s. to the parson of the parish for registers.—Lord John Russell gave notice, that, on Mar. 30th, he should bring the question of appropriation of Irish tithes before the house, and would enforce a call of the house for that purpose.—[This motion, which it will be impossible to give any account of next month, is understood to be the question on which, after several delays, the strength of the ministry is to be finally tested.]

18. Mr O'Connell obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law of libel. He gave a brief account of the existing law; remarking upon its anomalies and injustice; but postponed a description of his own measure until the first reading of the bill. He mentioned that the law officers of the crown had promised to watch the progress of the measure, and give it their best attention.—Mr Poulter obtained leave to bring in a bill for preventing intimidation at elections.—On the ensuing day, Mr L. HODGES gave an illustration of the necessity of such a measure, by referring to a petition from 330 of the electors of Chatham, complaining that Colonel Tremanheere, commander of the marine barracks in that town, had interfered to stop the usual course of commercial transactions between them and the inhabitants of the barracks, in consequence of their having voted for Captain Byng at the last election, while three individuals, who had voted for Sir John Beresford, were permitted to transact business as formerly, and thus monopolised the whole trade of the barracks. The petitioners prayed for relief.—24. Mr Hodges moved for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the charges contained in this petition, and was opposed by Sir J. Knatchbull, on the ground of a total denial of the charges; by Sir G. Clerk, who alleged that the order for excluding the traffickers was solely the result of an inquiry unfavourable to the integrity of the dealers; and by Sir R. Peel, who, on the ground that such a committee would amount to an inquiry, moved an amendment to the effect that the inquiry the committee be limited to the official conduct of Colonel Tremanheere.—On a division, the ministers were defeated by a majority of 161 against 130, and the committee was accordingly appointed.

Petitions from certain members of the House of Assembly and Legislative Council of Lower Canada, complaining of misgovernment, have been laid before the Houses of Parliament by Lord Brougham and Mr Roebuck. Mar. 24. Lord Aberdeen presented an address from ten thousand of the most respectable persons of the province, chiefly the children of British settlers, expressing warm attachment to the British government, and deprecating all efforts to raise hostile feelings between the two countries.—[The Vicar of Canterbury was honoured by the ministry with an appointment to go out as commissioner, with powers to satisfy the malcontent Canadians; a task for which his talents and amenity of disposition are stated to qualify him in a peculiar manner. By his lordship has been seen fit to resign the appointment in consideration of the severe indisposition of his lady.]

ENGLAND.

Feb. 23. Sixty houses were burnt in the town of Peterborough.

March 2. A destructive fire began in Marshall Street, den Square, London, and wholly or partially burnt at thirty houses in Broad Street and Silver Street; damage in all being reckoned at £50,000.

19. The first report of the English Church Commissioners, appointed by the King in February last, was presented to Parliament, and was found to relate solely to territory, revenue, and patronage of the bishoprics; proposing that two new bishoprics should be erected; one of Manchester, to be taken out of Chester; another, to be taken out of York; those of Bangor and St. Asaph being at the same time united to St. Asaph and Llandaff, so as to leave the whole number as before. Attached to the incomes of the bishoprics, which range between £924, the revenue of Llandaff, and £19,182, that of Canterbury, and of which the whole amount in 1831 was £57,731. The commissioners do not wish that any increase should take place in those incomes which reach £500, or that any decrease should take place in those which do not exceed £500. They think that the two bishoprics, with London, Durham, and Winchester, should have larger provision than the rest, and that the same for the new bishoprics should be made out of the secular preferments, chiefly of St. Paul's and Westminster.

In every change vested interests to be respected. A paper has been just now laid before the House of Commons, containing an account of the public revenue expenditure for the year ending the 5th January 1835, in which it appears that we have a surplus of revenue expenditure amounting to £1,608,155, the revenue expenditure being respectively £46,509,856 and £4,901,700. From this statement it appears, that, notwithstanding the successive reductions of taxes that have been made within the last seven or eight years, the revenue still remains as productive as ever. In 1827, public revenue amounted to £46,650,672; and, in this period, taxes have been repealed in 1830, namely, those on beer, leather, cider, cotton, candles, amounting annually to £4,477,000; in 1831 and 1832, on printed goods, coals, and slates, hemp, &c. to the amount of £1,790,000; and in 1833, on tiles, marine insurance, soap, &c. to the amount of £1,545,000, making a total annual sum of revenue lost by the repeal of taxes amounting to £7,822,000; and yet the produce of the remaining taxes has not fallen off. It was in 1834, £46,650,672; it amounted for the last year to £46,509,856, being only £140,816 less, notwithstanding the repeal of taxes to the amount nearly of eight millions. What a forcible illustration does this fact supply of the elasticity of the national revenues, and of the wisdom of laying out our whole surplus revenue in the reduction of taxes, which, like seed thrown into the ground, is sure to afford a plentiful and an increasing harvest of future revenue.

The returns of imports, exports, and tonnage of ships, recently printed by order of the House of Commons, afford satisfactory evidence of the activity in our foreign trade, especially in some of the most important branches of our manufactures, the declared value of which exported from the ports of the United Kingdom in the last year having exceeded the exports of the preceding year upwards of £2,000,000.

most singular event has occurred in the family of a noble lord. Lady B. having lost some jewels last week, in the same mysterious way in which other robberies of a similar kind have been committed, sent for two police officers to institute a rigorous inquiry amongst the domestics of the establishment. The only individual whom her ladyship proposed to exempt from personal search was her own maid, of whose integrity and excellent qualities, though she had been with her but a few months, Lady B. entertained so high an opinion that she could not bear the idea of treating her as an object of suspicion. The officers arrived, and, after a very short visit, came at once to the astonished Lady B. and told her, "Madam, not must your maid be searched, but she is the only person here who need be searched, for the maid has got the jewels, and what is more—the maid is a man!" The lady was soon proved to the satisfaction of all beholders. The maid was a returned convict—a young man sentenced to transportation for life for various ingenious crimes, but who had made his escape, and assumed the dress of a woman as the best mode of returning to this country with impunity. Of his extraordinary dexterity, no further proof can be given than the fact, that for eight months he had lived in Lady B.'s family without the least suspicion being entertained as to his sex, and had won the confidence of his mistress by the uniform propriety of his conduct. The affair is a very awkward one, and we really do not know what precautions ladies should take in future, when forced to change their personal attendants.—Hertford Reformer.

Mr. Wharnclyffe, Sir James Kempt, Mr R. C. Ferguson and three other gentlemen, have been commissioned by the King to inquire how far it may be practicable to increase the number of flogging in the army.

The new ministry have already done something for science and literature: they have given the living of St. Peter's, Walbrook, to Mr Croly; conferred the dignity of a baronetcy upon Mr Barrow, and offered the title of Mr Southey, who has rejected it; and presented a sum of £300 to Professor Airey of Cambridge, a natural antagonist. The Lord Chancellor has given a sum of considerable value to the Rev. George Crabbe, an and biographer of the poet, who is also a Whig. Meeting of members of Parliament, who are understood to be friends of Lord Stanley, took place, Feb. 25, and amounted to the unexpected number of fifty-three. Addresses are mentioned as having been received by R. C. M. Sutton, on his loss of the chair; one from Murray, and another from the Merchant Tailors' Company of London.

The ex-Speaker was gazetted, March 3, as Baron Botesford and Viscount Canterbury.

The house of the Earl of Warwick in Carlton Gardens has been taken on lease by government for three years, as an official residence for the new Speaker.

Lord Cowley is appointed ambassador to the court of France.

A valuable prebendal stall in Canterbury Cathedral, vacant by the death of Earl Nelson, and another in Westminster, vacant by the death of the Rev. E. Sutton, are reserved by the ministry, to be disposed of according to their forthcoming plan of church-reform.

The reforming electors of London have formed themselves into a club, for the purposes of overlooking the interests of their party in the registrations, managing canvasses, and selecting and recommending candidates for vacant seats.

In consequence of the notice taken in Parliament of the appointment of the Marquis of Londonderry as ambassador to Russia, the noble marquis has resigned the situation.

By a new regulation of the Colonial Office, the tax on emigrants proceeding to Lower Canada has been renewed, and is now in force.

We observe by the newspapers that canvassing, in expectation of a speedy dissolution of Parliament, is already going on in many counties and towns in England.

Sir Francis Burdett, who originally designed to vote for Sir C. M. Sutton as Speaker, ultimately yielded so far to a deputation of his constituency, as to absent himself from the division. Sir Francis afterwards received two visits from similar deputations, who took him to task for his absence on the speakership and address. To the second of these two, he expressed some irritation at the distrust which was manifested respecting his political integrity.

We have reason to believe that a measure is in the contemplation of the government, which will have the effect of providing for the local administration of justice in a manner exempt from the objections made to former proposals on this subject. The ministerial plan will reserve to the superior courts the hearing of causes involving the more important points of law, insure an uniformity of practice in the local tribunals, and at the same time provide for the speedy and economical dispatch of all business that can safely be intrusted to a local tribunal.—Standard.

At a meeting of the members of the Mary-la-bonne Literary and Scientific Institution, March 4, Lord Brougham mentioned that he had been engaged to a much greater extent than was supposed in efforts for the instruction of the people. Not the thousandth part, he said, of what he had written was suspected to be his. Ten or twelve years ago, he had written lectures, which are yet delivered throughout the country, and may be so for many years to come.

Jewels to the value of between five and six thousand pounds were lately stolen from the bonded warehouses of Hall and Co., near the Customhouse, London.

On the evening of March 5, jewellery of the value of £10,000, belonging to the Duchess of Gordon, was abstracted from her grace's residence, 34, Belgrave Square, Piccadilly. There was no trace of forcible means having been used. The Queen, at whose drawing-room the duchess had that day been wearing her jewels, has presented an elegant new set to her grace.

The Birmingham Political Union is stated to be on the point of recommending its operations. Associations similar to that which is above mentioned as having been instituted in London, are rising in various parts of the country, particularly at Liverpool and Walsall. Conservative clubs for electioneering purposes are also becoming very general.

Joseph Ady, who was convicted of obtaining money under false pretences, and sentenced to be transported for seven years, has obtained a commutation of his sentence to twelve months' imprisonment in the House of Correction.

A company is forming at Bristol, with a capital of half a million, divided into shares of £100 each, for the purpose of opening a direct trade with China.

According to the admission of Baron d'Haussez, one of the late ministers of marine, in France, the British navy destroyed in the last war no fewer than 1200 ships of war; viz., 156 ships of the line, 382 frigates, and 662 corvettes and other vessels belonging to the French navy.

A bank, designated "The Bank of Australasia," with a capital of £200,000, has been formed in Hobart Town, for the purpose of establishing banks of issue and deposit in New South Wales, Van Diemen's Land, and other settlements in Australasia. The charter (the terms of which have been fully agreed upon between his Majesty's government and the directors) constitutes the Company a body corporate, and invests it with the powers and privileges usually granted to corporations, limits the responsibility of the shareholders to double the amount of their respective shares, and authorises the directors, with the sanction of the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, to increase the capital from time to time by the creation of additional shares—such additional shares to be first offered to the shareholders in the Company.

Some proceedings of an interesting character have taken place in the United States, in reference to a charge brought against Mr George Poindexter, a member of the Senate, and a political opponent of the President, as having been accessory to the attempt of Lawrence to shoot the latter gentleman.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE VALE OF THE WHITE HORSE.

The celebrated figure of the horse, which is cut on the north-west side of a steep hill near Stanford, is generally supposed to have been formed by order of Alfred to commemorate his victory over the Danes at the battle of Ashdown. The white horse was the standard of the West Saxons previous to their adoption of the Christian cross. Some writers, however, think it to have been partly the effect of accident, and partly the work of shepherds, who, observing a rude figure somewhat resembling a horse, reduced it by degrees to a more regular shape. Be it as it may, it has been there for many ages, and the neighbouring parishes assemble annually for the purpose of clearing it from weeds. This practice is called "scouring the horse," and is celebrated by a rustic festival and various games.

PAWNBROKERS.

The business of a pawnbroker was not known in Glasgow till August 1805. At that period an itinerant English pawnbroker commenced business in a room in the High Street, but was obliged to give up at the end of six months, for want of business; and it was not till the 8th of June 1813 that John Graham, a disbanded town-officer, set up a regular pawnbroking office. There are now twenty-two licensed pawnbrokers in the city.—Encyc. Brit. new edition.

OUR FINANCIAL SYSTEM.

When M. Thiers was in England for ten days in 1833, he was anxious to transmit to his government at home an abstract of the English monetary system. He accordingly sent to a gentleman connected with the Treasury the following note:—"My dear sir, can you spare a quarter of an hour to explain to me the financial system of your country? Always yours, Thiers."—Quarterly Review.

EMINENT NATIVES OF EDINBURGH.

Sir Walter Scott was born in the College Wynd. The father of Falconer, author of "The Shipwreck," was a barber and wigmaker in the Netherbow. Lord Brougham first saw the light in St Andrew Square. David Hume is ascertained from family papers to have been born in the Tron Church parish. Lord Jeffrey was born in the Lawnmarket. The prime minister Earl of Bute was a native of the Parliament Square.

SCOTLAND.

Feb. 14. Thirty thousand letters were delivered by the penny-post in Edinburgh, being about fifteen times the usual number—an increase occasioned by the custom of sending valentines.

15. By a fire at the farm of Mains of Skelmorlie, near Largo, twenty-five head of cattle and a large quantity of farm-produce were destroyed.

Mar. 1. The Gaelic chapel, Glasgow, was preached vacant, in consequence of the degradation of the former clergyman, the Rev. Adam Gun, upon a confession of criminal intercourse with his servant.

2. The students of Marischal College, Aberdeen, elected, as their Rector, Dr John Abercrombie, of Edinburgh, who has since declined, but finally accepted, the honour.

17. The Town Council of Edinburgh agreed, by a majority of 21 against 8, to approve of a bill for establishing the ecclesiastical tax at 5 per cent. over the whole rental, instead of 6 per cent. upon all except the members of the college of justice; by which it is calculated that the revenue of each of the 18 clergymen will be increased to £675. At a meeting of the inhabitants, March 26, it was agreed, if the necessary funds could be raised, to oppose this bill by the introduction of another, reducing the number of the clergy to 13, fixing their stipends at £1,500, and rendering the whole body of the inhabitants liable on for what might be required after appropriating the product of the church seat-rents.

18. Four men, Keir, McInnes, McEwen, and McLeod, were tried before the High Court of Justiciary, for mobbing and rioting at Crieff, at the late general election, and assaulting and maltreating three voters; after a trial which lasted fourteen hours, they were all acquitted upon a verdict of Not Proven.

19. The foundation of a monument to the late Charles Marjoribanks, M.P. was laid at Coldstream with masonic honours.

20. The annual West Lothian steeple-chase was run from a grass field about three quarters of a mile north of Livingston toll-bar, to a post about a mile south of Uphall, the direct distance being four miles, with twenty-seven intervening fences. Of eighteen horses started, fifteen came to the post in good condition, seven of which were placed, Lucksell being the winner, and Goliah second. The run was done in fourteen minutes.

The scheme lately brought into notice by the Scottish established clergy for increasing the opportunities of worship enjoyed by the poor, has derived great additional importance from the recommendation which the King has given it in his speech, and from the activity of the parochial incumbents all over the country in getting up petitions to Parliament, in support of the design. Dissenters, voluntaries, and liberal politicians, are every where on the alert to counteract the exertions thus made; and among other public meetings announced in opposition to it, one took place on the 30th ult. at Glasgow. By way of commemorating the spirit and views of both parties, we shall present documents proceeding from both. The first is the petition of a meeting held at Coldstream, March 17, and is as follows:—"That his Majesty's present advisers having avowed the intention of recommending a grant of public money to enable the clergy of the church of Scotland to erect new places of worship, wherever they may deem it expedient, and to endow chapels of ease, which have hitherto been supported by voluntary contributions, your petitioners cannot refrain from expressing their strong and deliberate disapprobation of the measure.—That, in the judgment of your petitioners, it is a direct invasion of the rights of conscience, and a flagrant departure from the spirit of that religion in whose holy name the outrage is perpetrated, to compel persons who have no communion with the established church, or who conscientiously dissent from it, to contribute in any shape towards its maintenance or extension.—That your petitioners, besides, can see nothing so deplorable in the moral situation of Scotland, as to call for the step which his Majesty's present counsellors have thought fit to advise. At any rate, the clamour for additional churches has been raised by an interested party; and the legislature, granting it were at liberty to interfere, ought to have the case fairly and thoroughly investigated, and not proceed on representations, which, there is ground to suspect, will turn out to be the reverse of correct and impartial.—That, with regard to the established church in this part of the island, your petitioners are at a loss to comprehend how she can need the new assistance which the state is called to tender. Being a large and a powerful body, she can, by collections and subscriptions, raise sufficient funds for the advancement of her private interests; and as the late conduct of her friends evinces a plenitude of zeal to strengthen the influence and extend the limits of their communion, the government may safely leave them to their own resources and energies.—That the measure to which your petitioners are opposed is regarded by the dissenters at large as an attempt (not the more honourable that it is a disguised and covert one) to thin their places of worship, and deprive them of popular support; and they leave it to the candour of your honourable house to determine whether they deserve to be made the objects of any invidious enactment, and whether the cause of true religion and civil liberty will be promoted by subjecting them to a despicable, because unavowed, persecution.—That your petitioners entertain the suspicion that this is the result contemplated. If it is, they venture to foretell that the issue of the enterprise will disappoint its projectors. It may render the dominant party officious and inquisitorial, but it will not scatter the congregations nor break the spirit of the dis-

INFLUENCE OF THE INJURED.

Mr O'Connell, who, little more than a year was denounced almost by name in the King's of a liberal ministry, as a grand incendiary, and have exercised so much virtual influence over the appointment of nearly the same men to office, a fact which ought to induce those formerly his enemies to search deeper than they have hitherto into the sources of his power, and the true philosophy of his position. This man, we fear, has been ally estimated in England upon false and narrow grounds, even by those who are disposed to take the liberal views of public questions. The anomalous unauthorised nature of his power, and his want of status which is derived from customary state laws, seem to have prevented the multitude from forming a just notion of him. Viewed abstractedly of unimportant and personal circumstances, Mr O'Connell is unquestionably one of the most memorable historical personages of our day.

The good policy of honesty has long been a settled principle in respect of our personal affairs, but it has not been sufficiently applied in politics. England has long acted an unjust part towards Ireland, and no one could be more clear than that she has not lately profited by the injustice. It is much to be lamented that men, either as individuals or as communities, should suppose that evil can either be commenced or resisted in with any permanent advantage to those who are guilty of it. True policy dictates alike to us that wrong should be avoided, in order that the wrong against whom it is directed should acquire no influence over the others. If we filch a sixpence, does it not arm him from whom it is taken with the power of causing us to be degraded for ever? We even commit the slightest trespass on the property of a fellow-creature, without giving him the opportunity, by an appeal to the sense of justice of our neighbours, to avenge it tenfold by loss of the esteem of those neighbours? The very clamour of complaint and remonstrance has a force, against which the most sullen obstinacy of the injurer is of little avail. In fact, by injuring, we give vigour and importance to what may naturally be very weak and feeble. A king, by a wanton outrage upon a beggar, does not raise him to a position morally superior to his own.

Only let the court of appeal be sufficiently powerful, and no revolution of condition but may be wrought by such means. It is from this cause that we often witness the apparent paradox of a greater disposition in the injured to forgive the injurer, than the injurer to forgive the injured. The latter has a much temporary importance from the sympathy of concerned parties, that he is usually rather pleased with his situation; while the other suffers so much from the contrary cause, that, attributing all his pain to the individual whom he has wronged, he regards him with the bitterest rancour. Indeed, there are situations in life more distressing than when one is so far compromised his own dignity, fortune, and peace of mind, as to give his neighbour reason to say, "You have injured me."

England, with regard to Ireland, is in exactly this predicament. It has endeavoured for centuries to retain what was from the first an injustice towards Ireland, and now, by the sympathy which the latter country obtains, the clamour which indubitable wrong gives it to make, and the frightful barbarism which it has created, there is something like a reversal of condition between the two—Ireland, inferior as it is in wealth, population, and every ordinary-kind of influence, having become almost a dictator to England. The leading portion of the United Kingdom now absolutely groans under the oppression of a detached province. Its affairs are deranged and obstructed by Ireland. It cannot advance a step for Ireland. It is troubled, frightened, taxed, tormented by Ireland. The concessions which it has already made in the vain hope of palliating the great injury, have been enormous—every thing but reparation. It has built custom-houses of the utmost splendour, given the handsomest possible grants for roads and harbours, remitted a great proportion of the quota of taxation, and purchased Irish corn and bacon unburdened by poor-laws. It has laid its head almost beneath the feet of Ireland. Nightly it weeps and gnashes its teeth in the House of Commons, vainly imploring the pity of Ireland. A more impressive example of the misery incurred by injustice, could not be adduced for the warning of both men and nations.

Scotland does not contain much more than a fourth of the population of Ireland, and with an inferior soil could not, under the same circumstances, have advanced to the same relative prosperity. But had the policy of the Stuarts, in forcing an Episcopal church upon Presbyterian Scotland, been continued after the Revolution, we have not the least doubt that it would have at this day exercised fully as much influence over England as the more populous sister isle. We should not, in that case, have found the representatives of Knox and Melville supporting Episcopacy in the other countries, as they are now doing, but a continued thunder of wrath, indignation, and complaint poured upon the English legislature, and probably more than one repetition of the events of the year 1640. Had such been the case, the state buildings in Scotland would have probably been a little better than they are, and even greater sums might have been expended upon Parliamentary roads. But the stern spirits of the north, poor as they must have continued to be, would have laughed at such palliations of the grand injury, and continued to threaten and overbear the neighbouring kingdom, as Ireland does at the present day, till full reparation had been made. It is needless, however, to speculate upon the results of a policy so unfortunate, for had England been obliged to support the reformed Episcopal church in both countries, she must have utterly sunk long since beneath the reacting influences. She could not have performed the part of an injurer on so extensive a scale without absolute ruin.

What is it, then, that invests Mr O'Connell with the power of actively or negatively controlling the formation of a British ministry—what but the injuries which he is commissioned to avenge and to redress? How absurd to speak of this man as an individual—as an individual selfish or generous, or with any peculiarity of human character! In person, certainly, he is an individual; but politically he is seven millions—seven millions of wronged men—men in humble condition, and who in ordinary circumstances would be little heard of in the courts of the national legislature, but who, through our perverse determination to do to them that which justice says we ought not to do, are almost able to turn the balance for general ruin or general good. It is of no more importance that Mr O'Connell should have the elements of a good citizen in his composition, than that the seven millions should be all of them in superfine coats. It is in the injury that the influence lies, and in no other circumstances of the condition. But whatever Mr O'Connell may be, he certainly has the sense to perceive and appreciate the full advantages of his situation. To resist, as he has done, the blandishments of those whom he considers as the enemies of his country, and to despise the scorn and shame which many have poured upon him, must have required no ordinary firmness—for, however poor may be the importance of a state office in comparison with the homage of millions, however ruinous apostacy would clearly be to his historical character, however consoled he may have been in the affections of the multitude for the indignities of the few, we find birthrights so often sold for messes of pottage, that he who has stood firm against such things may well be allowed the praise of a more than usually comprehensive intellect, as well as a more than usually vigorous character. The very expectations which are perpetually expressed in all quarters of the possibility of his taking some courtly or official honour, and thereby destroying his popular influence, show that to do so would be natural. There even appear to be some who would consider the offer of a ministerial office as an honour to Mr O'Connell. Such must be the men who, in political affairs, never look beyond little inconsistencies in the opinions of statesmen, and, filled with anecdotes of what has been said or done by individuals, are unable to take a complete view of any single question. O'Connell evidently can feel the grandeur of his position, and, feeling it, can estimate all competing temptations at their proper value. He sees day after day how those who once opposed him are won by his steady advocacy of the rights of his country—how, while he stands firm to his principle, all others shake, and veer, and sink by his side—how every movement in affairs only brings him a little nearer to the great object at which he aims, and which must in the long-run place him among the greatest of the benefactors of mankind. Considering how rapidly he is approaching this object, he would be impatient indeed if he could not wait till it has been gained.

Such are the remarks which have occurred to us in reference to the posture of affairs produced by the church established in Ireland. We treat the question apart from all other political questions—as one involving a simple and obvious principle of justice and policy. Our views may startle some politicians of almost all classes; but we would just ask if the institution adverted to has not been a rock of destruction alike to its friends and its enemies, and if there be any fair prospect of either Conservative or Liberal conducting the affairs of the country in a satisfactory manner, so long as one large portion of the people is frenzied by so palpable a wrong.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

In the latter end of March, the Chamber of Peers decided that the prisoners whom they were about to try for political offences, should not be allowed to select their own counsel, but be satisfied with whomsoever the Chamber should appoint. This resolution, to which the Chancellor Persil gave the form of a royal ordinance, met with a determined resistance from the barristers, who, April 6, held a meeting, at which they decided that the ordinance was illegal, and that they could not be compelled to plead before a tribunal whose jurisdiction and forms of proceeding were not legally defined. The recusant advocates were then summoned before the Royal Court, which, however, evaded the question of the legality of the ordinance, and merely decreed that the Barristers' Council of Discipline had exceeded its powers, and that in any case it ought to have protested against the legality of the ordinance in the usual way. A proposition to affirm the legality of Persil's proceedings was negatived by a majority of 52 to 11. The advocacates have resolved to appeal to the Court of Cassation against even this mild decree of the Royal Court.

SPAIN.

ON the 14th of March, Mina issued a proclamation to the Navarrese, threatening with fire and sword all who should not submit to Queen Isabella; and he followed up his menace with proceedings of the utmost severity, which are said to have been attended in no small measure with the desired consequences, as the Carlists were surrendering themselves in considerable numbers. Lord Eliot has proceeded to Spain on a mission from the British government to endeavour to prevail on Don Carlos to retire from the country. In the meantime, the ultra-liberals have made some strong demonstrations at Malaga and Sagossa, murdering priests and proclaiming the constitution of 1820.

CANADA.

SINCE Lord Canterbury declined going out to Lower Canada, as commissioner for the settlement of the complaints of that colony, Lord Amherst has been appointed to the same office. Meanwhile the House of Assembly of the province has, by a majority of 64 against 8, resolved that any censure of their proceedings by another branch of the legislature is a violation of their privileges—that the speech of the governor on the 18th March last session was a censure of their proceedings—and that the said speech should be expunged from their journals. The House of Assembly has also passed a bill, appointing Mr Roebuck, one of the members for Bath, as their agent in England, with a salary of L.600, an allowance of L.500 for contingencies, and L.150 for a corresponding secretary in Quebec.

The British squadron has sailed from Vourla on its return to Malta; Lord Ponsonby having ascertained that there was no probability of any disturbances at Constantinople.

The Archduke Antony, brother to the late Emperor of Austria, died on the 2d April.

Baron Humboldt, the celebrated scientific traveller, died at Berlin on the 7th April, in his sixty-eighth year.

Prince Augustus of Portugal, who was married so recently to the Queen of Portugal, expired on the 28th March, in consequence of inflammation in the windpipe, brought on by a cold, which had commenced a week before, and was aggravated by his highness having attended a hunting party and overheated himself. No change in the policy of the kingdom is expected to follow from this event. The deceased prince, a son of the celebrated Eugene Beauharnois, possessed an amiable character.

The Queen of the Belgians was delivered of a son on the 9th of April. Great anxiety is felt respecting the health of this infant, upon which seems to depend much of the future peace of the country.

A tremendous but brief eruption of Mount Vesuvius took place on the 1st April.

It results from the researches of Dr Chevalier, a member of the Academy of Medicine in Paris, and of M. Boys de Loury—1st, That within seven years 273 individuals have been tried for administering poison; of whom 171 have been acquitted, and 102 condemned. 2dly, That the poisons employed were in 54 cases arsenic, in 7 verdigris, in 5 cantharides, in 1 perchlorure of mercury, in 4 nux vomica, in 3 powder for the destruction of flies, in 2 nitric acid, in 1 sulphur of arsenic, in 1 emetic tartar, in 1 opium, in 1 acetate of lead, in 1 white lead, in 1 sulphuric acid, in 1 sulphate of zinc, in 1 mercurial ointment, in 5 poisons not named. 3dly, That the assigned motives for the crimes have been—in 28 cases interest, in 24 libertinism, in 15 vengeance, in 10 jealousy, and in 6 madness. 4thly, In 28 out of 81 cases the poison was administered in broth, in 8 cases in milk, 7 in flour, 4 in medicine; twice it was introduced immediately into the mouth, twice in coffee, once in cider, and once in a fowl. It is proposed, that, to prevent poisoning, all the usual substances employed for the purpose should be sold with an uniform tincture from some odiferous stuff, calculated not to affect them in any other way than by making them in every case excite a suspicion of their presence.

At the end of March, Amsterdam was the scene of a riot, which gave the government much uneasiness. It arose from the resistance of the owners of small houses to the tax-collectors. The small landlords in Rotterdam and Amsterdam are very numerous, and possess great influence over their poor tenantry. They formed themselves into an association to resist the payment of the tax; and upon the occasion in question, one of them barricaded his house against the officers of government. A mob soon collected to aid him in his resistance to the authorities, who thought it prudent to retire, and give up all attempts to enforce payment of the impost.

A committee of the Senate of the United States have published a report respecting the patronage enjoyed by the executive of that country, which seems to be enormous. Of officers at the appointment and under the control of the President, the army, navy, and other departments, contain 60,294, to which, if we add 39,549 pensioners, we have in all 100,079 persons dependent in some manner on the public treasury. With every disposition to concede, that, in a country of such vast extent and diversity of interests as that of the United States, a strong executive is necessary, the committee strongly contend that its influence should be so moderate as to compel its chief to identify his administration with the public interest, and to hold his patronage subordinate to the principles and measures necessary to promote the common good. In very decided and eloquent terms, they proclaim their opinion, that, when the executive has been suffered to become so strong as to be capable of sustaining itself by its own influence alone, the reign of irresponsible and despotic power is at hand; and once that point attained, it would be difficult to find any where in the existing system a power sufficient to restrain its progress to despotism. The committee propose, in opposition to a danger so formidable, the passing of a bill to counteract the influence derivable from such extensive patronage. They propose, in short, a prompt and decided reduction of the patronage vested in the hands of the President, and at great length point out the practicability and means of effecting that reduction.

Two Arab horses, sent as a present by the Emperor of Morocco to the President of the United States, have been sold by auction at Washington, on the 2d ult., agreeably to the resolution of the Congress. One of them was purchased at 1205 dollars, and the other at 860.

Intelligence from the West Indies to the 26th February represents the apprentice experiment as becoming generally successful throughout the islands. The negroes are beginning to feel confidence in the new magistrates, and to better understand the position in which they find themselves.

An extraordinary circumstance took place in Jamaica on Saturday and Sunday, the 21st and 22d of February. On the 22d, the sun appeared from two P.M. until between three and four deeply eclipsed. On the morning of the 22d, the houses were covered with a fine dust, resembling white lime mixed with ashes; and although swept and wiped, they could not be kept clean. The plantain and cocoa leaves were covered with this strange mixture. Vessels at sea were covered with this white ashy powder, which was supposed to have been produced by some volcanic eruption on the South American coast. The conjecture here stated afterwards proved true, the dust being ascertained to proceed from a volcanic eruption in Guatemala, one thousand miles distant. The conveyance of the dust against the monsoon prevailing at the time, proves that there are upper currents of air which have a directly contrary movement.

Considerable interest had been excited at the Cape of Good Hope by the extensive operations of the company sent out from Boston to supply the menageries of the United States with wild beasts. A large party had gone out in search of a camelopard, and had not been heard of for two months, when they were 2000 miles in the interior. The party of forty hunters who had set off for the rhinoceros district, had endured much suffering in consequence of the extreme drought, and the impossibility of obtaining food for themselves and horses. A third party had been extremely successful, having already secured four leopards, two quaggas, and a gnu; a fourth had accompanied Dr Smith into Central Africa, and with him had ascended the Compass Berg, the highest mountain in that part of the continent. The doctor had ascertained the height to be 7400 feet above the level of the sea, and the hunters had caught two or three very rare animals, and some beautiful species of birds.

There is now living at Matanne, about eighty leagues below Quebec, on the south shore, Lauchlan McKinnon, who served in Prince Charles's army at the battle of Culloden, 1745. He was from the island of Egg, and had two brothers older than himself in the battle, both of whom were killed; he concealed himself for some time in the neighbourhood, and finally emigrated to Canada in 1773. He lives on a farm with his son and daughter-in-law, and others of the family, and is still in the enjoyment of all his faculties, although, from his being able to bear arms ninety years ago, he must be nearly a hundred and ten years old. He speaks Gaelic, and better French than English; is a Roman Catholic, and very devout. —Montreal Herald.

PARLIAMENT.

1. IRISH CHURCH.

AFTER various changes of intention, the Opposition determined to test the ministerial strength by a resolution on the subject of the Irish church, which Lord JOHN RUSSELL, accordingly, as mentioned in our last sheet, announced for the 30th March. On this day, a call of the house being enforced upon Lord John's motion, 630 members answered to their names: among the absent was Sir F. Burdett. Lord John, before bringing forward his motion, entered into details, the object of which was to prove that the church in Ireland, instead of doing good, was an instrument of enormous mischief, and had entirely failed to accomplish its main design, the religious instruction of the people. Since 1716, the revenues of the clergy in Ireland had advanced from L.110,000 to L.791,721; while the number of Protestants had relatively decreased. The total number was 750,000, of which 400,000 reside in the province of Armagh, while several dioceses do not contain above five, six, or eight thousand, and one in particular only 235. Even in Armagh, the Catholics were to the Protestants as seven or eight to one. Every attempt to pacify Ireland having failed, and tithes having been successfully resisted, he was convinced that the only reasonable course which remained was to reform the church in such a way as to give adequate spiritual instruction to the Protestants, and apply the surplus in some way by which the moral and religious instruction of the whole people should be advanced. He announced that, having first moved a committee of the whole house to consider the temporalities of the church of Ireland, when the house had resolved itself into a committee he should move a resolution, that any surplus which may remain after fully providing for the spiritual instruction of the members of the established church in Ireland, ought to be applied locally to the general education of all classes of Christians. The resolution being reported, he should move an address to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty would be most graciously pleased to enable the house to carry it into effect. It would depend, he said, on the hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel) whether he would advise his Majesty to give effect to that resolution, or would cease to be an adviser of his Majesty. Lord J. Russell then, after a very eloquent peroration, sat down amidst great cheering. —Sir E. KNATCHBULL, who he avowed his willingness and that of his colleagues to remove every blemish from the face of the Irish church, and felt as deeply as the Opposition within the name of Rathcormac was mentioned, opposed the resolution as only an oblique mode of removing the present ministers, and accordingly directly negatived it. —Mr WARD entered into a long exposition of the opinions of eminent statesmen and writers, as Mr. Burton, Paley, Burke, Mackintosh, Bishop Watson, and Hallam, in favour of the right of the state to interfere with the revenues of the church, which, indeed, the state had originally given to it. He contended that the same justice should be done to Ireland that was done to Canada. —Sir JAMES GRAHAM contended that the state had no right to divert the church revenues from Protestant purposes. He would defend the Irish church as they to the united church of England and Ireland. To apply the funds of the corporation of Liverpool to the cutting of the Dublin and Kingston canal, with which Liverpool had nothing to do, would be as rational as to apply the Protestant church revenues to the education of the Catholics. He read extracts from documents to prove that the Catholics of Ireland would be satisfied with nothing short of the abolition of the established religion. He owned he had a religious feeling on this subject, and must assert that they ministered at the altar had a right to live by the altar. "I say that that principle is as high as heaven; you cannot touch it; it is as strong as the Almighty, and you cannot overturn it; it is as fast as the Eternal, and can never cease to bind you: it is fixing you as Christian men, and, as Christian legislators, can never fail to actuate you. This is the view at I take of the principle of the question which were called on to decide, and I for one will declare that no consideration on earth shall induce me to compromise or to destroy it." —The next speaker was Lord Howick, who ridiculed the illustration of the Liverpool corporation funds, by asking if, in the event of the keeping up of the Liverpool harbour, which is the original purpose of those funds, being defeated by sandbanks which no human effort could remove, it would be rational to persist in spending the money on such an object. Was church property to be restrained to its original professed purposes when it only served to deluge the land in blood? At the conclusion of Lord Howick's speech, the house adjourned. —Mr. 31. The debate was opened by Mr SHIEL, who, after congratulating the house on the sentiments expressed by the preceding speaker, as in some measure assuring them of the opinions of Lord Grey on this subject, referred to the case of Scotland before the Revolution exactly parallel to the present condition of Ireland, and said that the prosperity of the former country was attributable to the settlement of a religion suitable to the wishes of the majority of the people. "In that country the ecclesiastical institutions have been adapted to the character, manners, and feelings of the people, and accordingly the country has been conspicuously fortunate: her trade, her manufactures, her agriculture, have made an amazing progress, and the splendour of her military establishment affords the best proof of the pacific habits of a virtuous and industrious people. Turn, then, to Ireland: the heart grieved at the thought of what she might be and what she is—of what she was made by nature, and what she has been made by you: for she is yours, she belongs to you; you have had the care of her: her fates are yours, her follies are yours: you are answerable for her errors; for her transgressions you are responsible: her crimes, her atrocities, her bloodshed, her horrors, her madness—all, all are yours; and if I tell you this, it is not for the purposes of unavailing censure—no, it is in order that I may awaken your minds, and in your hearts, a sense of the striking coincidence between your palpable interest and your obvious duty, and persuade you to adopt a policy by which the source of all this calamity and all this crime shall be closed; for which it is not superstitious to say that those who, from factious motives, shall be instrumental in its continuance, will have to pass before a higher than any human tribunal, a terrible account." —Dr LEFROY contended that the prospective revenues of the Irish church would not exceed L.500,000. —A number of members spoke for and against the resolution. —Sir W. FOLLET (Solicitor-General) MAY, 1835.

and it, because its design was to increase the disunion already existing in Ireland.—Sir JOHN ROSE ridiculed the idea of a great nation being den to do justice to one connected with it by the arm-bell of "the church is in danger." Theaters of ministers taunted the Opposition by asking they could make up a government, in the event present being turned out. He might retort by how the present ministers had come to suppose themselves qualified to do so; they who had not been to command a single majority in the House of Commons.—The house then adjourned.—April 1. Discussion was opened by Mr Sergeant TALFOURD, in favour of the resolution, who was followed by Mr D. against it.—Dr LUSHINGTON spoke for, Mr B. THOMSON against it; the latter being followed by Mr LITTLETON, who said that the interests existing incumbent were intended to be affected is measure.—After some explanations by Sir H. DINGE, designed to show that the incomes of the clergy had been stated too high, Mr SPRING RICE entered into details to prove the inutility of the Protestant establishment in many quarters. He possessed a list of the comparative numbers of the Protestants and Catholics from thirty or forty parishes in his neighbourhood. In the first parish there were 625 Catholics, and not a single Protestant. (Hear.) In the second there were 545 Catholics, and not a single Protestant. (Hear, hear.) In the next, 495 Catholics, and not a single Protestant. In the next, 1515 Catholics, still not a single Protestant. (Cheers from the Opposition.) In the next the Catholics were 756, but was no Protestant. In the next, there were Catholics—not a single Protestant. In the next, Catholics, still not a single Protestant. (Great cheering from the Opposition.) Now, he should come to parishes in which there were a few Protestants. In the first of these there were 851 Catholics and 11 Protestants. (Hear, hear.) In the second, 1371 Catholics and 11 Protestants. (Cheers.) In the third, Catholics and 11 Protestants. In the next, 1449 Catholics and 21 Protestants. In the next, 3450 Catholics and 15 Protestants. (Loud cheers from the Opposition.) In the next, 367 Catholics and 11 Protestants. The next parish contained 1842 Catholics and 27 Protestants. The next, 4393 Catholics and 27 Protestants. (Cheers from the Opposition.) In the next, there were 5335 Catholics and 12 Protestants. (Loud cheering from the Opposition benches.) Now, these returns came from a part of his own neighbourhood, and as far as he was able to collect information on the subject, he believed the account to be fully correct. Thus it would be seen that in several of these parishes there was no Protestant at all, and in the others the disproportion between the Catholics and Protestants was so great as hardly to justify making the Protestants into account. Now, he asked whether the maintenance of a great church establishment in those parishes in which there was no Protestant was either creditable to the bishop of the diocese, or advantageous to the country. (Cheers.) Mr RICE further took it upon him, by quoting enactments, to show that the Irish church was burdened with the duty of educating the people, and that the situation virtually was only an enforcement of the duty. The Bishop of Durham had set them a precedent in obtaining a Parliamentary enactment enabling him to apply part of the cathedral revenues in founding a college for the general education of all classes.—Lord STANLEY did not think the precedent of Lincoln College applicable. He opposed the motion in principle, and the amount of surplus, however little, or however great, would not alter his opinion. He was convinced that Sir Robert Peel's bill would settle the tithe contest. On the same principle that would make him maintain Presbyterianism in Scotland and Catholicism in Canada, he would maintain Protestant religion in Ireland, because it was the religion of the state, and we were bound by treaty to preserve it so. He contended against the principle that a clergyman should be remunerated according to his duties, which he said was most dangerous, and that places without congregations were only in more remote parts of the residence of a Protestant clergyman, as there were usually in such quarters few other gentlemen present. He knew instances where a clergyman, possessing youthful vigour and good nerves, had soon taken a congregation—in one instance, it was done at the very door of Derrynane Abbey [the residence of Mr O'Connell]. His lordship concluded a long speech, of which every leading feature is here adverted to by pointing out, that, in the event of this resolution being carried, those who had done so would immediately after, as a ministry, be obliged to concede the same to those who had supported them.—April 2. Mr J. CAMPBELL, Mr Sergeant WILDE, and Mr F. STON, spoke for the motion, and Mr GOULBURN and Mr H. TWISS opposed it.—Mr O'CONNELL contended that the question was not important as one which to settle who was to be minister, but as holding a hope to Ireland that she would henceforth be treated with in a better spirit. The British government too long marred the prosperity and insulted the feelings of the Irish; but though they did not turn on the mountain side, with their good broadsword, like the Scotch, they had already settled that they were to pay no more tithes. He described the Protestant church as one to which nothing could be done the Irish, as it had been the means of overrunning their own altars, and had oppressed them for centuries. With regard to the young clergyman "of nerve," alluded to by Lord Stanley, his congregation could be accounted for by new incomes into the parish, among whom was a cousin-german of his (Mr O'Connell's) own, with ten children, and a wife and servants. Mr O'Connell quoted a passage from Boswell's Johnson, in which the latter was represented as exclaiming with generous indignation, "The Irish are in a most unnatural state, for we there see the minority prevailing over the majority: there is no instance, even in the History of the Ten Persecutions, of such severity as that which the Protestants of Ireland have exercised against the Catholics. Did we sell them, as we have conquered them, it would be above-board; to punish them by confiscation and other penalties, as rebels, is monstrous injustice."

—At the conclusion of Mr O'Connell's speech, Sir R. PEEL rose, and contended that the motion avoided the real question, with respect to which four other courses might have been followed. [He specified these.] He maintained that to apply church property to other than spiritual purposes, was to violate the act of Union and the act of Catholic Emancipation, by which it was implied that no invasion of such would be attempted. But how much surplus did the noble lord expect? L.100,000? [Lord J. Russell here said L.200,000.] In that case, as the Opposition calculated the church revenues at L.791,000, they admitted that the remainder, after deducting the L.200,000—namely, L.591,000—was not too much for the church. But there was actually no more than L.450,000 altogether. The whole revenue was therefore confessedly not too much for the maintenance of the church. Even if there were any surplus, it would do nothing to content the Catholics. The Opposition could not conscientiously say that they considered this a final measure. And if not final, to what practical good did it tend? The Catholics knew that their professions did not consist with their resolutions, and would therefore distrust them. He concluded by declaring his intention of resisting the resolution in every stage.—After a reply from Lord John Russell, the house divided, when there appeared for the resolution 322, against it 289; majority against ministers 33.—The announcement was received with loud cheering, both within and without the house. The house then went into committee, the resolution was proposed, agreed to, and ordered to be reported, and, the house having resumed, the report was brought up.—April 3. The house having resolved itself into a committee, Lord J. RUSSELL moved his further resolution, upon which an interesting debate took place. The debate in committee having been adjourned to April 6, it was resumed on that day, when on a division there appeared for the resolution 262, against it 237; majority 25.—April 7. According to notice given on the preceding evening, Lord J. RUSSELL moved a resolution to the effect that no measure on the subject of tithes in Ireland would be satisfactory which did not embody the principles of the resolution just adopted by the house. In the course of the debate, the house went into committee on this resolution. Lord John, in replying to some observations by Mr G. Sinclair, said he felt convinced, from precedents, that, when they had obtained the sanction of the crown to the proceedings of this house, the House of Lords would not refuse to concur in them. After an interesting debate, the resolution was approved of by 285 against 258; majority 27.

2. RESIGNATION OF MINISTERS.

April 8. The resignation of ministers being understood to have taken place this morning, the house was crowded with members to hear the event announced. After some unimportant business, Sir Robert Peel rose and pronounced the following speech:—"It is my intent to move that the mutiny bill be read a third time; and in making that motion, I wish to avail myself of the opportunity it affords to notify to the house that I, and all my colleagues of his Majesty's government, in conjunction, and in conformity with our unanimous opinion, have felt incumbent upon us, on combined considerations of the vote which the House of Commons came to last night, and of the position in which, as a ministry, we find ourselves here, to signify to his Majesty, that, in our judgment, it was our duty to place the offices we held at his disposal. (Cheers.) I do not hesitate to say that we have taken that course with the utmost reluctance, and not without the deepest conviction of its necessity; because we feel, that being in possession of the entire confidence of the King, and having received from his Majesty the most cordial and unremitting support—looking to the present state of public affairs, to the present state of political parties, and to the strength (not only the numerical, but the moral strength) of that great party by which we have had the honour of being supported—we felt it to be our duty, under existing circumstances, to continue the attempt of administering public affairs as the responsible advisers of the crown, to the latest moment that was consistent with the interests of the public service, and with the honour of public men. (Cheers from all sides.) When I do not hesitate to avow that reluctance, I believe I shall have credit with the great majority of the house, that it is connected only with public principle. (General cheers.) I have a strong impression that when a public man, at a crisis of great importance, takes upon himself the trust of administering the affairs of the government of this country, he does incur an obligation to persevere in the administration of these affairs as long as it is possible. I do feel that no indifference to public life—that no disgust at the labour it imposes—that no personal gratification—that no discordance of private feeling, would sanction a public man, on light grounds, in withdrawing from the post in which the favour of his sovereign has placed him. But at the same time, there is an evil in exhibiting to the country a want on the part of government of that support in the House of Commons which will enable it satisfactorily to conduct the business of the nation, and to exercise a legitimate and necessary control over the proceedings of this house—a control conferred by the possession of the confidence of the house. I say that there is an evil in that exhibition of weakness to which limits must be placed; and reviewing all that has occurred since the commencement of the session, looking at the little progress we have been able to make (I presume from want of confidence and support as public men), looking at what has taken place even within the four last nights, that we have had the misfortune to be in a minority upon each—on Thursday last, on Friday last, on Monday last, and again last night; considering that that minority was a minority of thirty, and that it was larger in relation to the minority than the minority with which we commenced the session; adverting also to the fact, that on this occasion we received the support of those who, not having general and unlimited confidence in the government, have still given us, I must say, a cordial and honourable support—(cheers)—on every occasion in which it was consistent with their public principle to give it; adverting to all these considerations, in my opinion the time had come when it was incumbent on us to withdraw from the responsibility which office under such circumstances imposes. In addition to these considerations came the vote of last night; that vote was tantamount to a declaration that the house had not that confidence in the government which entitled it to permit that government to submit to consideration the measures of which it had given notice. The noble lord had signified his intention that if the vote of last night did not lead to the result he anticipated, he would follow it up with an address to the crown. As I conceived that embarrassment of public affairs would proceed from the presentation of that address, and as I had no right to presume that the house would take a different view of the policy of the address than of the policy of the resolution, it did appear incumbent upon myself and my colleagues, whose views are in exact conformity with my own, as a part of our public duty, not to persevere in a useless struggle, which might involve his Majesty and political parties in the country in additional and unnecessary difficulty. The vote of last night also implied the necessity of a total change of system in Ireland, so far as the church revenues are concerned. It would also, in my opinion, oppose such difficulties in the way of the practical administration of affairs in Ireland (in addition to its being a vote of want of confidence) that it made it next to impossible for us to undertake the execution of the law in Ireland, a majority—and a considerable majority—of the House of Commons having approved of a principle which was in direct variance with the principle to which we declared our adherence. The vote of last night was not an abstract question: it is not one the practical execution of which admits of delay. There may be points on which the House of Commons may come to a different conclusion to that of the government; it may do so on an abstract question, and that of great importance; but still it might admit of postponement: and there may be cases where it would be possible for a government even in opposition to the House of Commons to conduct the administration of public affairs, but you cannot leave the tithe question in its present state. (Cheers.) The laws now in force for the collection of tithes are every day infringed; and while uncertainty prevails as to the future system, they cannot be enforced. Nothing can be more dangerous than to leave matters in that condition; where there is a perpetual conflict in the execution of the law, property must be ultimately endangered unless the system be established and the law enforced. Under these circumstances it would have been our duty, had we continued in office, to have pressed for an immediate decision on the tithe bill. That tithe bill we could not have presented to the house without previously proposing a resolution for a grant, or rather a vote, for the remission of the claim for the repayment of the instalments. I cannot say that I anticipated a different conclusion from that which was come to last night; I cannot think that the House of Commons would sanction the grant of a million of money without a distinct understanding of the principle on which the tithe bill was to rest. We therefore thought that the delay of a few days could make no material difference in our position, as it would be impossible to let the principle of the vote of last night lie dormant. If we had proceeded with the tithe bill, the vote of last night was tantamount to a declaration that we should be obstructed in our progress. Being firmly resolved to adhere to that principle—(cheers)—whatever are the difficulties of the times, and not to adopt the principle of the vote of last night, on all these combined considerations we have, as I said before, felt it to be a duty incumbent upon us, as public men invested with a public trust, respectfully to request his Majesty to permit us to retire. We therefore now hold our offices for the execution of public business, and to prevent inconvenience, until his Majesty shall have had time to make other arrangements.

ments. I wish to give this explanation as briefly as possible, and in the manner least calculated to produce any angry feelings. (Cheers from all parts of the house.) The whole of my political life has been spent in the House of Commons: the remainder of it will be spent here; and whatever may be the conflicts of parties, I, for one, shall always be anxious to stand well with the house, whether I be in a majority or in a minority. (Loud cheers.) I do not hesitate to declare that, under no circumstances, under the pressure of no difficulties, would I ever have advised the crown to resign that great source of moral strength which consists in a strict adherence to the practice, to the principles, to the letter, and to the spirit of the constitution of this country. I am confident that that adherence will be the surest method of warding off eventful dangers. It is because I believe, in conformity with that constitution, a government ought not to persist in carrying on public affairs after a fair trial against the decided opinion of a majority of the House of Commons—it is because I have that conviction deeply rooted in my mind, that I have relinquished my post; although I do sincerely regret the necessity which has compelled me to abandon the King's service at the present moment. (Much cheering.) Yet, upon the balance of opposite interests, I believe I have taken that course which is more likely to maintain the character of a public man, and to promote the ultimate interests of the country, rather than persevering in what I believe would be a fruitless attempt to conduct public affairs in the face of an Opposition which has hitherto obstructed the satisfactory progress of the business of the nation." Sir Robert also made proposals for an adjournment of the house to the ensuing Monday (April 13), and suggested some other regulations for the management of the business immediately before the house.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL, in agreeing to these suggestions, said it was not a fit time to make any comment on the right hon. Baronet's statement; he would only say that the right hon. Baronet had "acted entirely in the spirit of the constitution."

3. MINISTERIAL ARRANGEMENTS.

The House of Commons met on April 13, and April 15, and was on both occasions adjourned, on account of the arrangements for a new ministry being still incomplete. On the latter occasion, Mr G. SINCLAIR taunted the Opposition with the difficulty they seemed to experience in their arrangements, and said that the country would have more confidence in the future Opposition than in the ministry. This called up Lord JOHN RUSSELL, who gave the following information:—"I have only to state, that on the dissolution of the late administration, his Majesty sent for Earl Grey, and requested his advice in the arduous condition of public affairs. By the recommendation of Earl Grey, his Majesty, on the following day, sent for Lord Melbourne and the Marquis of Lansdowne, in order that he might consult with them, and that he might hear their opinions. The result has been, that various communications have taken place between his Majesty and Lord Melbourne; but those communications have been of a preliminary nature, and of course of that confidential kind that I am not at liberty to state the nature of them to the house. But I may say this—that I do not think that until Saturday Lord Melbourne will be able to say that he is definitively authorised to submit to his Majesty a list of the members of the present government."—In the House of Lords, April 18, Lord MELBOURNE said, "My lords, I rise for the purpose of informing you that his Majesty has been pleased to appoint me First Lord of the Treasury, and that this day I and my colleagues have received the appointments to our respective offices. With respect to the difficulties under which the administration has been formed, and great and many they have been, some indeed of a peculiarly severe and mortifying nature, it is not now my business to say any thing; nor indeed need I say more of the principles upon which that administration has been constructed than that they are those principles of reform and economy which have been to a very great extent admitted and confirmed by all those who profess to be the true friends of the country, and of that kind of reformation which seeks to be strengthened and established by the good wishes of the people at large. In reference to those particular subjects which lately engrossed the attention of Parliament, and have been alluded to by some noble lords on the other side—I mean those measures which relate to ecclesiastical government—allow me to inform your lordships, and, therefore, through your lordships to tell the country, that every measure contemplated in reference to that subject will have for its end and purpose the promotion of true piety throughout the whole and every part of his Majesty's dominions." His lordship concluded by moving that the house should adjourn till the 12th May.—Lord ALVANLEY wished to know if the noble viscount had or was to have the powerful aid of Mr O'Connell and his party. Only a few months ago, the now existing ministry had denounced that individual in the King's speech, while Mr O'Connell, on the other hand, had lost no opportunity of stating his opinions with regard to the repeal of the Union and the destruction of this house. He should like to know how the parties now stood with regard to each other, and how far Lord Melbourne coincided with the opinions of Mr O'Connell.—In reply, Lord MELBOURNE said he did not at all coincide in opinion with Mr O'Connell. He also continued to have the same opinion respecting that gentleman as on the occasion alluded to. He did not know whether he was to have the assistance of Mr O'Connell or not, but he knew that he had taken no pains to secure it.—In a subsequent part of the discussion, the noble lord mentioned that he held himself bound and pledged to act upon the resolution lately adopted in the House of Commons, respecting Irish church property.—In conclusion, the house adjourned to the 30th April.

4. IRISH TITHES.

Mar. 20. Sir H. HARDINGE brought forward the ministerial measure for the settlement of the Irish tithe question. It proposed to convert the present tithe composition into an annual rent-charge on the owners of the first estate of inheritance, at the rate of L.75 for every L.100 of composition; such rent-charge to be redeemed, and the redemption-money to be invested in land, or otherwise, for the benefit of the titheowner. All collision between the clergyman and the payer of the rent-charge would be provided against. Sir Henry also proposed to remit to the clergy the sums they had got from the million loan, and to surrender the remainder (L.300,000) to them, in lieu of other arrears. The two parts of the plan having been submitted to the house in committee, several of the Opposition members delivered their sentiments respecting it, commenting with some bitterness on the rejection of the plan of last year, which proposed L.77, 10s. instead of L.75, and complaining of want of time to consider the proposal respecting the loan.—Mr O'CONNELL said it shut out all prospect of relief and peace for Ireland, which only could be gained by the concession that the church revenues might be appropriated for other than ecclesiastical purposes. In consequence, he said, of the conduct of the House of Lords, the massacre of Rathcoormac had taken place. "The mother had her sons in the morning, and amidst the scene of blood, she went to examine the bodies that lay on the ground: she found a first body, and she shrieked with joy, for it was not the dead body of her son: she found a second body, and she gave a second shriek of joy, for that was not the body of her son: but the third—oh God!—her eyeballs glared on the corpse of her child, and she wept not—she could not weep—a woman's tears could not fall—nor do they yet flow!"—Mr HUME moved that the whole question be postponed, and that the chairman do report progress. In the course of his observations, he remarked upon the conduct of Sir Robert Peel in bringing forward the present measure after opposing the bill of last session; and said, that, had he been in his place, he should have held such conduct to be dishonourable.—This moved Sir Robert Peel to demand an explanation; but he could get nothing from Mr Hume but a repetition of the substance of what he had before stated.—[Mr Hume, at Sir Robert Peel's request by letter, that evening, granted an explanation, which satisfied the right hon. Bart.]—After a rather sharp discussion between Mr Spring Rice, Sir Robert Peel, and Mr Poulett Thompson—in which the previous conduct of each of those gentlemen was referred to by one or the other, in order to demonstrate the inconsistency of their present with their former course, in relation to the tithe question—Mr Hume withdrew his motion; and Mr Spring Rice moved as an amendment to the resolutions, "That it is expedient to alter and amend the laws relating to tithes in Ireland." This resolution, he maintained, would enable the ministers to bring in their bill.—Sir Robert Peel refused to give way; and the committee divided—for the resolution 213, against it 198; majority 15.—Mar. 23. The report of the committee on this proposed bill was brought up, and occasioned a stormy debate, in the course of which Mr BARON, in reference to ministers, used the words "base love of office," which Sir H. HARDINGE said with great warmth he could only attribute to "vulgar insolence." By the interference of the Speaker, both gentlemen were induced to apologise for those expressions. Colonel Evans then entered into a long exposition of the inconsistency of Sir Robert Peel, which the right hon. Baronet repelled by counter explanations. The resolution was finally read a second time and agreed to, but the farther progress of the bill was stopped by proceedings adverted to under the head IRISH CHURCH.

5. MINOR SUBJECTS.

Mar. 25. Mr Hume obtained leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of lighthouses, according to the recommendations of a committee which sat last session. From the report of that committee it appeared that lighthouse dues to the amount of L.60,000 were annually pocketed by individuals who had obtained favourable leases from the crown. Take the country throughout, and it was made apparent that a waste was incurred of no less than L.143,794 per annum. Besides, the duty in various places was ill performed, and frequent shipwrecks were the consequence. The committee of last session recommended that all the lighthouses should be placed under the control of the Trinity House. This he did not approve of, but thought that a board of management should be appointed for the whole kingdom, and that the expenses of keeping up the lighthouses should be defrayed by the public.—Mr Poulter's bill for the better observation of the Sabbath was presented for a second reading, which was carried by 121 against 45.

—The house went into committee, and voted upwards of a million and a half for the naval halliards and the pensions of naval officers. The remainder of the navy estimates were passed, after some altercation April 6.

—26. A motion was made by Mr Tooke, that an address should be presented to his Majesty, beseeching him to grant a charter of incorporation to the University of London, with the restriction only of the power of conferring degrees in divinity and medicine. An amendment was moved by Mr Goulton that there should be laid before the house all the petitions and proceedings on the subject. After debate of considerable length, a division took place, and the amendment was lost by a majority of 246 to 100.—April 1. Mr Corry, controller of the house, appeared at the bar of the House of Commons, to answer from the King to the address of the House of Commons on the subject of granting a charter to the London University. Mr Corry said, he was directed by his Majesty to assure his faithful Commons "that he would call on the Privy Council for the report of the subject now before them, in order to ascertain upon what conditions such a grant might be acceded to, and to adopt measures for carrying to effect the wishes of his faithful Commons."

—27. The house went into a committee of supply on the army estimates, Mr Hume having previously threatened a motion for the consolidation of the army and ordnance departments, which he was induced to withdraw. A motion by Major Beaulieu, to reduce the army by 75,000, was lost by 252 to 101, and the estimates were then passed with little further objection.

April 8. The mutiny act was read a third time in the House of Commons, and being immediately carried up to the House of Lords, was there quickly run through the whole of its stages, and passed on the 11th.

—18. The sitting members for Cork (Tories) were declared by committee to have been unduly elected, and their liberal opponents, Callaghan and Baldwin, have accordingly obtained their seats.

—20. The house met, and after some unimportant business, adjourned to the 12th May.

THE THAMES TUNNEL.—The most active operations are in progress at the Thames Tunnel to recommence the work of carrying across the bed of the river this great structure. Upwards of one hundred workmen are engaged in a portion of the Tunnel in preparing for the reception of the new shield, and other operations connected with the work. The visit to the arch, however, is still kept in the most clean and dry state; and such is the increasing interest taken by the public in the undertaking, that upwards of one thousand persons inspected the Tunnel in the course of the last week.

THE DOCKS.—Great progress has been made during the winter and spring in the construction of the new docks at the north end of the town. When finished, they will certainly make Liverpool one of the first ports not the first, port in the world for accommodation; and yet so rapidly is the commerce of the town increasing, that it is still too great for all the docks united, and will be so when the new ones are finished. There are at present three large steam-boats building in a single yard, all for the Liverpool trade, and vessels of all sizes are launched every week.—Liverpool Chronicle.

TONNAGE OF VESSELS.—The following is from a return made to the House of Commons of the ships and tonnage that have entered inwards, and cleared outwards, in the years ending 5th January 1834 and 1835:—Entered inwards in 1834, from British colonies and possessions, 4582 ships of 981,375 tonnage; from foreign countries, 6407 ships of 1,018,555 tonnage. In 1835, from British colonies and possessions, 4920 ships of 1,015,885 tonnage; from foreign countries, 6758 ships of 1,092,607 tonnage. Cleared outwards in 1834, to British colonies and possessions, 4352 ships of 765,519 tonnage; and to foreign countries, 5192 ships of 378,375 tonnage. In 1835, to British colonies and possessions, 4392 ships of 761,000 tonnage; and to foreign countries, 5342 ships of 379,054 tonnage.

FRENCH RAILROADS.—Amidst the mere alterations of party, which in France, as well as at home, engross so much of the attention of the legislature, we are glad to find some attention bestowed on projects of public usefulness. M. Thiers, in presenting lately to the Chamber of Deputies two projects of law, the one relating to railroads, the other to river navigation, announced that the government engineers (des ponts et chaussées) had fixed upon three principal lines for railroads—one from Paris to Havre, by Le Havre, Pontois, and Gisors, with branch lines to Rouen and Dieppe—from Paris to Lyons, Lyons to Marseilles—Paris to Lille, to Bourdeaux, and Strasbourg. Surveys have been made, and plans drawn out, for these several lines; but one only, that from Paris to Havre, is in a state of forwardness such as to offer immediate prospects of actual execution. It is proposed to throw open the work to public competition, and entrust it to a company who will offer the best conditions and sufficient securities. M. Thiers further proposes that the government should a system practised in America, by takingshares enterprise, on the same footing as private shareholders. The government proposes to take a fifth in the project, limiting its investment to 50,000 francs.—Globe.

ENGLAND.

CHANGE OF MINISTRY.

On the 19th of February, the Conservative ministry met at the close of 1834 met the new House of Commons which they had summoned, in high hope of being able, by liberal measures, to conciliate a majority, and thus be able to redeem the country from that errorous course in which they believe it to be engaged. At the very opening of the house, they were defeated by 316 against 306, on the appointment of a speaker, which they vainly endeavoured to pre-empt being considered as a party question. On the 21st they were defeated on the address by 309 against 316. Minor defeats on election questions and others followed; and though the Opposition had not sufficient confidence in itself to attempt a vote of want of confidence in ministers, or the stopping of the supplies, they were able to give such annoyance to the administration as must have rendered the situation of the members of that body in the highest degree irksome. Measures brought forward by ministers with respect to tithes in England and Ireland, and the marriage of dissenters, were not in themselves disapproved of; but the ministry was greatly, and perhaps necessarily injured, by endeavouring to defend the appointment of the Marquis of Londonderry and the conduct of Colonel Tremanheere, and refusing the charges desired for the London University. The only major question which they could be said to have upon any vital political question was one of 213 against 198 (March 20), on the resolutions for the proposed Irish tithe bill; and it was acknowledged that the house was taken by surprise. After various delays, and alterations of detail, occasioned it is said by the difficulty of getting Opposition to move with unanimity, it was resolved to attempt the destruction of the ministry by a resolution of the house for the appropriation of the revenues of the Irish church to general purposes of education; which was accordingly moved by Lord John Russell, March 30, and, after a four days' debate, carried against the government by a majority greater than any former one during the session—322 against 289. On the receipt of this intelligence throughout the country, the Conservative parties got up addresses every where—even in the remotest English villages—expressing confidence in Robert Peel, and entreating him to retain possession of the reins of government. For some days gratifying tributes poured in upon him in hundreds. The minorities, however, in which he found himself in the subsequent stages of Lord John Russell's resolution, determined him, as he explains in his own admirable speech (reported elsewhere), to resign; which he and his colleagues accordingly did on the 8th of April.

The King immediately sent for Earl Grey, by whom he was recommended to consult Lords Melbourne and Lansdowne. Respecting the negotiations which followed between his Majesty and those noblemen, the time of time (nine days) to which they were protracted shows that they must have been attended with difficulties; that they were of "a severe and trying nature" to the noblemen, is acknowledged by one of themselves. It is conjectured that Lord Melbourne stipulated, as preliminary to every other proceeding, for a change in the chief command of the army, and the dismissal of several members of the royal household; and from an expression used by Lord Russell, it would appear that the King required the abandonment of this stipulation before he would accept the new ministerial list to be placed before him. To what extent the two parties receded from their respective demands, will probably remain as one of the secrets of office. During the negotiation, there was a prevalent impression that no ministry could be formed without the late Opposition, without either including Mr. Russell, or receiving his sanction, as, deprived of the support of his party, the remainder would be in a minority. But it ultimately appeared that this gentleman was never consulted. To a question put to him in the street, as to the place which he was to fill in the new administration, he is said to have answered that he and sixty Irish members would be seen to move over to the Treasury side of the house, without stipulation whatever, solely because they believed the new ministry were disposed to do justice to their country. His adherents Perrin and O'Loughlin have nevertheless been appointed Attorney and Solicitor Generals for Ireland.

The arrangements for the new ministry were completed on Saturday, April 18, when the following list was announced:—

Mr George Arbuthnot is the	Private Secretary of Mr E. J. Stanley at the Treasury.

The new ministry will of course proceed upon the principle of the resolution, the carrying of which has brought them into office. Their other objects may be partly gathered from an address made by Lord J. Russell to his South Devon constituency, in which he avows his determination to endeavour to bring about a reformation of the church in England and Ireland, the establishment of a civil registry of births, marriages, and deaths, whereby the grievance of dissenters' marriages may be abolished, to do away with church-rates, and to reform the corporations. While contemplating no further organic changes in the constitution, his lordship states it as his wish "to see the popular influence control and check the exorbitant or corrupt expenses of the state; to see our institutions renewed and purified by clearing them of their defects, and restoring their original spirit; to witness the removal of all unnecessary impediments to free thought, writing, and action; to have the interests of all classes weighed, not by the prejudices and partial affections of those who counterfeited the people's voice, and usurped the people's inheritance, but by the legitimate representatives of that people, summoned by the sovereign to uphold that monarchy of which they are the firmest support, and to be the image of that enlightened nation whose confidence they enjoy."

With regard to the conduct of Sir Robert Peel during his late government, and in his resignation, there cannot be a more unequivocal testimony of the general feeling of the country, than the following passage in the Globe:—"The resignation of Sir Robert Peel was a dignified ending to a ministerial career marked by great and acknowledged ability. Even the most decided of his opponents felt the manliness of his demeanour, and seemed almost to relent at the consummation of their exertions. There is but one opinion of the skill and talent which he has displayed throughout his arduous and disheartening enterprise."

THE CORPORATION REPORT.

The General Report of the Corporation Commissioners was delivered to Mr Goulburn on the 24th of March; and on the 30th, when laid before the House of Commons, it was ordered to be printed for Parliamentary distribution. The particular reports on which it is founded are not yet, we understand, all printed; but they are believed to be entirely confirmatory of the statements in the General Report. Nearly three hundred corporations have been visited; upwards of two hundred reports are printed, and the remainder are in the course of preparation. The inquiries in all cases were conducted in public.

The corporations which have refused all information to the Commissioners, are Corfe Castle, Dover, Lichfield, Maidstone, New Romney, and some of the London companies; those which afforded partial information, but refused to exhibit their accounts, or to permit inquiry into the state of the corporate property, are Arundel, Hull, Leicester, Rochester, and several of the London companies. The reports on those corporations are said, notwithstanding, to be exceedingly rich; those of Hull and Leicester particularly so. It will be found that they have not been successful in averting exposure; and details of the most gross perversion of public trust are laid open. There is a merciless array of magisterial delinquencies, and all the corruptions of the system of self-election are exhibited in their naked deformity.

The Commissioners, it appears, did not consider themselves authorised to recommend specific measures for the improvement of the corporate system; they have confined themselves to pointing out its abuses, and have suggested no remedies. The following we present to our readers as a condensed view of the results to which the Commissioners have arrived. Its general correctness may be relied on.

The all-pervading abuse of the corporate system is that of self-election. The Common Councils, or the governing bodies of the corporations, commonly elect, or admit, the freemen, choose the mayor and other officers, and fill up the vacancies in their own body. They have the irresponsible and uncontrolled management of the whole public property; they dispose of it to themselves or to their friends; they contract debts and bestow the patronage held in trust for the benefit of the community among their own partisans.

The most striking defect in the constitution of the municipal corporations is, therefore, that the corporate bodies have an existence distinct from the communities in which they are found. The corporations look upon themselves, and are considered by the inhabitants, as separate and independent communities; in fact, in most places all identity of interest between the corporation and inhabitants has disappeared. To maintain the political ascendancy of a party, or the political influence of a family, has been the one end and object which has been systematically pursued in the admission of freemen, resident or non-resident, in the selection of municipal functionaries for the council and the magistracy, in the appointment of subordinate officers and the local police, in the administration of charities, in the expenditure of corporate revenues, and in the management of corporate property. The most flagrant abuses have arisen from this perversion of municipal privileges to political objects; and it has been generally found that those corporations which have been unconnected with the Parliamentary franchise have most faithfully discharged the duties of good government, and have acquired, more than others, the confidence and good-will of the communities to which they belong.

The exclusive and party spirit which belongs to the whole corporate body, appears in a manner still more marked in the councils by which they are governed. The members of these councils are for the most part self-elected, and hold their offices for life. They are commonly of one political party, and their proceedings are mainly directed to secure and perpetuate the ascendancy of the party to which they belong. Individuals of adverse political opinions are invariably excluded from the governing body. Since the repeal of the corporation and test acts, and the emancipation of the Catholics, very few instances occur in which either dissenters or Catholics have been chosen into the governing body of the corporation. To these councils, which embody the opinions of a single party, are entrusted the nomination of magistrates, and of the civil and criminal judges. They ought to be the leaders of every measure concerning the interests and prosperity of the town; but they do not even represent the privileged class of freemen; and being elected for life, their proceedings are unchecked by any feeling of responsibility. They are the representatives neither of the population nor of the property of the town; and the discharge of the functions with which they are entrusted is rendered difficult equally by the dislike and the suspicion which the manner of their accession necessarily entails upon them.

The mode in which their revenues are levied and expended, and through which the general mismanagement of the corporate property arises, is fully detailed. The power assumed by the corporations of levying tolls on merchandise or goods brought to market by persons not freemen, is a fruitful subject of complaint. The freemen themselves are invariably exempt from these impositions; and the magnitude, as well as the partiality of the evil, will be understood from the fact, that in Newcastle-upon-Tyne the payment of these tolls has made a difference to a merchant of L.450 annually. In Liverpool, one mercantile firm has paid to the town-dues more than L.1400 in one year. In some towns, as in Bristol, a merchant, by payment of a fine, may be admitted to the freedom of the city; but in Liverpool the corporation refuses to sell the freedom, and the tolls consequently remain as a permanent tax upon the non-freemen merchants. In some towns a large amount of the public property has been spent in bribery, and other illegal practices of contested elections. During the election of 1826, the corporation of Leicester expended L.10,000 to secure the success of a political friend of that body, and mortgaged some of their property to discharge the liabilities so incurred. In Barnstaple and Liverpool, the funds of the corporation have been wasted in defending a body of freemen from threatened disfranchisement, who had been proved guilty of bribery. In general, the corporate funds are but partially applied to municipal purposes; and they are frequently expended in feasting and paying the expenses of unimportant officers.

Some corporations consider that their property has been vested in them solely for the public advantage; but in most cases this truth is acknowledged only when forced on their attention; it is received with difficulty and qualification, and is liable to be continually overlooked or forgotten. Even in those cases where it is admitted, party and sectarian purposes often prevail in its application. Few corporations would admit that any obligation lay upon them to expend the surplus of their income in objects of public advantage different from that which might be supposed to devolve on any wealthy individual in the town. Such expenditure would be considered as a spontaneous act of private generosity; and the corporation would consider itself entitled in consequence, not to the credit of judicious administrators, but to that of liberal benefactors. The opinion having taken strong root, that the property of the corporations is held in trust for the benefit of the corporate body only, distinguishing that body from the community with which it is locally connected, the transition is not difficult to the opinion that individual corporators may justifiably derive a benefit from that property. At Cambridge, the practice was avowed, and attempted to be justified!

This principle has been undisguisedly adopted in few corporations, compared with the number of those in which it is indirectly acted upon. Some sense of impropriety, indicated by the secrecy with which such transactions are conducted, has accompanied the execution of long leases for nominal considerations, or the alienations in fee of the corporate property to individual corporators. The system of lavish expenditure in the shape of salaries to sinecure, unnecessary, or overpaid officers, found in most of the important corporations, is more extensively mischievous than actual peculation, because there is no lack of persons willing to profit by it; at the same time that the direct appropriation of the capital, instead of the income of the corporation, is contemplated as a fraud upon the public by all but a much more limited class of persons.

The heavy debts which have been incurred in many corporations have been increased to their present amount by most negligent and improper management. At Berwick-upon-Tweed, where the freemen manage the affairs of the corporation in Common Hall, and where commons of the value of about L.6000 per annum are enjoyed by them, sums of money have been borrowed for the express purpose of dividing among themselves.

The instances of gross mismanagement of trust property are numerous and striking. At Coventry, the funds of an endowed school amount to L.900 per annum; the two masters divided L.700 between them; but they had only one pupil in 1833, and for some years previously. At Tewkesbury, no redress could be obtained against the master of the school, because he was one of the borough justices, by whom the master is appointed and the school visited.

The administration of justice, both civil and criminal, is in a state disgraceful to an enlightened community. The magistrates are usually chosen from the aldermen, and the aldermen from among the leading political partisans; moreover, they are often taken from a class of persons totally incompetent to the discharge of judicial functions.

The above is an outline of the systems of abuse, though numerous cases illustrative of them are necessarily omitted. The final result—the summing up of the report—is to this effect: That where corporations exist in their most perfect form, and are most rightfully administered, they are inadequate to the wants of the present state of society. In their actual condition, when not productive of positive evil, they, in the great majority of instances, exist for no purpose of general utility. The perversion of municipal institutions to political ends has occasioned the sacrifice of local interests to party purposes, which have been frequently pursued through the corruption and demoralisation of the electoral bodies. That, in conclusion, there prevails amongst the inhabitants of the great majority of these incorporated towns, a general and a just dissatisfaction with their municipal institutions; a distrust of the self-elected municipal councils, whose powers are subject to no popular control, and whose acts and proceedings being secret, are unchecked by the influence of public opinion; a distrust of the municipal magistracy, tainting with suspicion the local administration of justice, and often accompanied with contempt of the persons by whom the law is administered; a discontent under the burdens of local taxation, while revenues that ought to be applied to the public advantage are diverted from their legitimate use, and are sometimes wastefully bestowed for the benefit of individuals, sometimes squandered for purposes injurious to the character and morals of the people. That, in short, the existing municipal corporations of England and Wales neither possess nor deserve the confidence and respect of the community; and that a thorough reform must be effected before they can become what they ought to be, useful and efficient instruments of local government.—Courier.

Mar. 28. The dinner proposed by the late Opposition in honour of Lord John Russell took place at the Freemasons' Tavern, when, with very few exceptions, the whole of those who had voted for the amendment on the address were present, Lord Morpeth in the chair. In replying to the toast of his health, Lord John made the following, among other remarks:—"It has been my fortune to propose a measure for the relief of the Protestant dissenters from the degrading bonds by which they were formerly confined. It has been my fortune to propose a bill for the reform of the representation of this country; and, gentlemen, I may now say, that, among all my day-dreams of ambition, there has been none which, after those connected with these two subjects, I have cherished so long, or entertained with such perseverance, as the hope that I might, one day or other, be the means of subduing another great grievance—I mean the grievance of the abuses of the Church of Ireland—(tremendous cheering)—abuses which seem to combine the political usurpation of our close boroughs with the religious intolerance of our corporation and test acts." (Renewed cheering.) "Gentlemen, I am glad that we have reserved for this occasion the great trial of strength between ourselves and our Tory opponents. Not that I think that those doctrines which were promulgated so industriously after the dismissal of the late ministry, of 'measures, not men,' and 'wait till they have had a fair trial,' and 'you will find the Tories more liberal than the late ministry'—(cheers and laughter)—not that I think that those doctrines had any thing of truth in them to recommend them, but because I am sure that if we had succeeded in throwing out the present ministry at the commencement of the struggle, it would have been said that there was no difference of principle between us—that we had availed ourselves merely of a party superiority, and that, if the present ministers had been allowed to continue in office, they would have shown, by the measures they adopted, and the success with which they advocated them, that they were better qualified than any other men to conduct the affairs of this country." (Cheers.) At a later period of the evening, Mr O'Connell expressed an anxious hope for the continuance and increase of that cordial spirit of amity and co-operation which now existed in the three several portions of the United Kingdom.

In addition to the acts of patronage mentioned in our last as having been exerted by government in favour of men of genius, we have now to record a pension of L.200, bestowed at the instigation of Sir R. Peel, upon Mrs Somerville, author of the Mechanism of the Heavens; one of L.150, bestowed upon Mr James Montgomery, the poet; one of L.300, bestowed upon Mr Southey; one of L.200, to Mr Sharon Turner; a present of L.100 to Mrs Hemans, who is stated to be in distressed circumstances; and the appointment of Mr Milman to the living of St Margaret's, Westminster.

Talleyrand is at present engaged in dictating his memoirs to a nephew: the product must be a work of extraordinary interest.

The Rev. Lord Wriothsley Russell, a son of the Duke of Bedford, has resigned the valuable living of Streatham, in the county of Surrey, from conscientious motives, not approving of pluralities. His lordship retains the living of Cheyneys, though comparatively of small value.

Lady Byron, widow of the noble poet, has broken up her establishment at Hanger Wood, near Acton, preparatory to her departure with her daughter, the Hon. Ada Augusta Byron, on a tour for the summer in France and Italy.

Mr Alexander Baring, the eminent merchant, was gazetted, April 8, as a Peer, under the title of Baron Ashburton.

The amount of the revenue for the year, and the several quarters of the year, up to April 5, compared with the year and quarters of the year ending 5th of April 1834, presents a diminution of the aggregate income of the year, when compared with that which terminated on the 5th of April 1834, of L.751,527, and a diminution of the income of the quarter, when compared with that of the corresponding period of last year, of L.474,451. The most important decrease is in the excise, while in the customs there is a considerable increase. A large proportion of the whole diminution of revenue for the quarter is under the head of taxes, arising, no doubt, from the repeal of the window-tax, considerable arrears of which were received during the corresponding quarter of the last year.

By the criminal returns showing the number of persons taken into custody by the metropolitan police, and the result of the charges, in the year 1834, which have been recently printed, it appears that 64,269 persons were taken into custody, of whom 34,499 were discharged by the magistrates, 26,302 were summarily convicted or held to bail, 3468 were committed for trial, 2565 were convicted and sentenced, 551 acquitted, 329 not prosecuted (bills not found), and 23 whose cases have not been ascertained. The criminal charge under which the greatest number appears is that of uttering counterfeit coin, 929 having been taken into custody under that charge, of whom, however, 819 were discharged by the magistrates, and 98 convicted and sentenced. The charges of murder have been 26, but only 11 prosecutions upon them have been instituted, and 9 convictions obtained, of which last 8 were declared manslaughter, so that only one execution followed. Not less than 19,779 have been taken into custody for drunkenness, of whom 10,944 obtained their discharge without fine, and 8835 summarily convicted. A comparative statement of these returns with those published the three previous years shows that from 1831 to the end of 1834 there is a decrease in the number of persons taken into custody of 8555, an increase during the corresponding period of 513 of committals for trial, and of 4459 convictions by magistrates. The comparative statements of the intermediate years, following one another, do not exhibit any very remarkable difference, the increase in one year of some cases being counterbalanced by a decrease in the next.

Among the points to which the inquiries of the committee of Lords on Prison Discipline has been principally directed in examining the witnesses from the Middlesex House of Correction and the Westminster Bridewell, has been as to the practical working of the silent system, recently introduced. This system consists in compelling the prisoners to maintain a profound silence while performing their labours on the rotary wheel or mill. Neither laugh or joke may pass, on pain of solitary imprisonment and partial stoppage of provisions, a view to improving the discipline of the gaol, the visiting magistrates sent Mr Chesterton, its governor, a visit while back to visit and to make inquiries at various prisons as far north as Glasgow, and much of the information gleaned has since been adopted, this being its object. It has been found to work wonderfully in producing a salutary dread of imprisonment. Persons whose families had been constantly familiar for years to the turnkeys, have, on their discharge, declared they would take great pains not to come there again, and have kept their word. Many known metropolitan thieves are now making the circuit of the provinces. A large proportion have emigrated into Surrey, and it appears others have confined their operations to the city of London. A short time ago Sir Peter Laurie declared that the gaols of London had become completely crowded since the change. It is by the fair sex that this plan of compulsory taciturnity seems to be the most abhorred.

On Sunday morning, April 5, a gravel-digger, named Ward, residing in Globe Lane, Milnd Road, quarried with his wife, and struck her a blow which sent her flying against the mantelpiece, when out fell two sovereigns and rolled on the floor. A cessation of hostilities took place directly, and an inquiry as to the source from which the gold came, when the mantelpiece was examined, removed, and one hundred and seventy sovereigns were found. The man and his wife have been keeping blind day ever since, and the old woman jocularly tells her neighbours it was the luckiest hit she had in her life. Much curiosity appears to be excited in the neighbourhood as to whom the hoard originally belonged; but it is well known that a foreman of excavators, a singularly thrifty fellow, lived in the same room about six months ago. He met with an accident in the course of his employment, and was taken to the London hospital, where he died after his thigh had been amputated. In his last moments he appeared anxious to impart something to those about him, but was unable to speak. He left only one son, who has been seen to beg in the streets since his father's death.—Morning Herald.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE FORTUNES OF A SPANISH MINISTER.—A speech lately delivered in the Chamber at Madrid by Martinez de la Rosa entered into an explanation of his past and present sentiments with regard to the constitution of the Cortes, and gave, in the course of it, a striking picture of the strange vicissitudes to which a Spanish statesman has been subject in recent times—dungeons one day, the seals of office the next. He began by professing his youthful enthusiasm for the principles of the constitution of Cadiz:—"I entertained the same principles when 40,000 men advanced against this capital; and when, if I may be permitted so to speak, the dungeon was opened in which they were to bury me, I made a proposition that the deputy who should consent that the constitution should be destroyed or altered, should be deemed guilty of perjury, and punished accordingly. That day when 40,000 men were on the point of entering the capital, the very evening before the Cortes were to be forced. . . . Senor Isturiz will say to me he did the day before the constitution was destroyed in Cadiz. Condemned without being heard, threatened with the punishment of death, buried in a prison, I refused even to defend myself, because I believed that a deputy of the nation would be degraded by allowing a judge to call him to account for his opinions. Thus I always maintained my principles—thus I always maintained my consistency. I was shown a decree of the 4th of May, by which it was decreed that those who adhered to the principles of the constitution were liable to the punishment of death, remained firm; I did not solicit that the punishment might be changed; I never demanded favour, I never feared death. I was sentenced to the most atrocious punishment possible—the banishment to a rock in the middle of the sea; and in it I remained six years, having the axe constantly suspended over my head. The year 1820 arrived; my province honoured me with its confidence, and I belonged to the Cortes of that day." The Spanish premier then detailed the circumstances which induced him to change his opinions respecting the practicability of the system he had up to that period upheld:—"I foresaw the evils to which that system would lead, and I was convinced of the necessity of supporting the royal authority and defending order, that liberty itself might not be endangered. I gave expression to these views as a deputy; I was not believed. His majesty did me the honour of naming me minister, and I maintained, as minister, the same principles with the situation in which they happen for the time to be." M. de la Rosa then eloquently stated that, notwithstanding the change of opinion he had avowed,

W TO SELECT A PAIR OF SPECTACLES.—When son calls at an optician's shop for the purpose of using this article, the question is asked, What age of the person who is to use them ? and on information being given, the article is produced the greatest confidence. Few of those who have used spectacles in this manner need be told that is not proper data for selecting the article. It is about as difficult to find two persons of the age alike in respect to this faculty, as it would find them alike respecting any other, such as ng. The following method may be depended on, where available should be resorted to :—Where person for whom the spectacles are wanted has y a pair, or can procure the loan of a pair that n, hold one glass of such between the sun and a of white paper. JOHN CAMPBELL'S BILL FOR THE ABOLITION OF IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.—According to the in which the bill now proposes to alter the law, ll be in the power of a man's butcher to whom he twenty pounds, to walk up to him in the street, say, "How d'ye do, sir?" touching his hat at ame time ; upon which the customer will express hanks, and tell the butcher he is pretty well ; upon the butcher will say, "I beg your par- I want my bill ; you have got a remarkably hand- watch, and chain, and seals—come to the sheriff ve them." Upon which the customer is forced o and barter his bijouterie for sundry legs of mut- and sirloins of beef which he has eaten. Ashamed s fate, he goes home to tell his wife ; and when ed there, he finds that his baker has walked off his window-curtains, that his tailor has carried a satin-wood bookcase, and his shoemaker an ght pianoforte. In despair he asks for his slip- and morning gown, and is told the milkman has ssed himself of these ; and when he rushes to his oom, to seek rest in oblivion, he discovers that rewer has carried off his mattress, and his but- an possessed himself of his blankets and sheets.—

—[Upon this we would make one simple remark ne language of Meg Dods—"And what-for no?"]
MARTHA CRUMP.—Number one of Dame Deborah ham's almshouses is occupied by a very old—what we call her?—not lady, for ladies do not live in houses, nor woman, for there is no such being as an woman—old women went out of fashion soon after abolition of witchcraft :—well then, an old body, for e is generally termed by her neighbours. This old r, whose name is Martha Crump, has been in the e upwards of twenty years. She was not very young a she came in, and of course is now much more re- from youth than she was then. But you never saw a picture of neatness, such an image of exactness ur life. Upon her head she wears a white muslin plaited all round with mathematical precision, from enith of her forehead to the nadir of her chin ; and in that oval muslin frame appears her face, as a re of profound placidity, a homely of contentment eace. The very wrinkles which time has made in visage are exact and uniform—nay, they are not les—they are rather superannuated dimples, all ng—not laughing—for smiling age is beautiful, and ing age is irreverent—they are the trophies, not riumphs of time, for there can be no triumph where has been no resistance, and Martha Crump was r known to struggle against time, either to urge his or to retard it. Tradition says that she was once rettiest little girl in the village, as lively as a bird, rful with unobtrusive mirth, and prettily blending, ngent combination, the purest innocence and ut- lun. They used to say of her that her heart was ght to break—but sorrow, alas ! found its way there- und made it heavy enough. A thoughtless and ed young man, who mistook passionate admiration of a pretty face for the sober sincerity of honest love, gained her unsuspecting heart, became her husband, and deserted her, even before her first and only child was old enough to call her mother. But even then, deeply as she felt her sad and worse than widowed lot, she gave not way to gloomy despondency, nor did she make others wretched by wearying them with the tale of her sorrows. She toiled diligently for the support of herself and child ; but by the time her son was able and willing to labour for himself and his mother too, he died ; and when the neighbours expressed their pity that her boy had not lived long enough to repay the debt of gra- titude which he owed to his mother, she replied that he had more than repaid a mother's care each hour he had lived. Every body pitied the bereaved mother, and they wondered much at the tears she shed when she heard that her wicked husband had perished miserably in a fore-ign land. Every body also thought she was a very proper object for Dame Deborah Boreham's charity ; and after waiting twenty years for a vacancy, she obtained admittance. Now every body said that Dame Deborah Boreham's wish would be abundantly gratified in the instance of Martha Crump. They were right enough. Here Martha has lived upwards of twenty years, and here, for aught that appears to contradict it, she may live upwards of twenty years longer. There is a look of dura- bility about her, which seems not so much to defy the effect of time by a hardness of resistance, as to evade it by a sweet placidity. Her days are so much alike, that she can hardly distinguish one from another. Her time never hangs heavily, and never moves too rapidly—she finds no fault with any thing that is—she has no vain re- grets for any thing that has been—she has no fears or ap- prehensions for any thing that may be.—Provincial Sketches.

AN ADVENTURE WITH WOLVES.—My adventure in the forest having been mentioned, the old Frenchman congratulated me on my escape, assuring us that the danger from the wolves in some seasons was serious ; for though they generally waited till hunger drove them down in winter, yet frolic or fasting sometimes sent them into the vallies, where the sheep, and, unless he happened to be considerably on the alert, the shepherd himself, might be missing by morn. As to the question of domesticating the wolf, he told us that it had often been tried, by tak- ing the whelps young, but that it was a perilous experi- ment at best ; of which he gave an example in his own instance :—Shortly after his return to France, he had shot a she-wolf in the mountains, and tracking her to her den, found her dying, with two young ones at her side. He took them away, and reared them about the chateau like house-dogs. All went on well for a time. The young animals frisked at his sight, licked his hand, followed him like his pointers, and appeared so thoroughly reconciled to the chateau, that he frequently showed them as an answer to the doubts of his neighbours on the subject. But one evening, having lingered rather longer than usual in the hills, and hurrying home by moonlight, he observed his two companions suddenly snuffing the air, smelling to the ground, and exhibiting signs of extraordinary rest- lessness. "As I could see them perfectly by the moon- light," he continued, "I absolutely remarked a total change in their physiognomy. The tame look had van- ished in a moment, and the savage had come in its place. Still they snuffed the air, and every moment grew wilder still. I called to them ; they merely curled up their lips, and showed me their teeth. I now began to conceive that my generalship could not be better em- ployed than in a speedy retreat. However, I was aware of the laugh that would be against me on my return, and I moved off at a walk until I had turned a corner of the road which hid me from them. I then gave the spur to my mule, and galloped. I had scarcely got on a couple of hundred yards, when the whole thicket seemed to be in motion. The cry of wolves was gathering on every side, and full speed after me came my two old acquaintances : one of them sprung on the croup of the mule, the other seized my bridle arm in his teeth. Fortunately the right arm had not been his choice, for if it had, I should not have been here to tell the story. I drew my couteau-de- chasse, and slashed my captor across the face, until he dropped with a yell. Another blow drove off my assailant behind. My mule now became a new source of trouble. Though a powerful and extremely well-trained animal, it refused to stir a step farther. Whip, spur, voice, all were in vain ; it reared, plunged, kicked, ran from side to side of the glen, but advance it would not. In the interim, the howling redoubled and drew nearer, though I could see none of the performers. My two companions were quite enough for the purpose of de- vouring me ; and if ever any two animals held a council of war, they were that minute engaged in the purpose. They walked together, they separated, then joined their noses, as if they were whispering their minds, and, fi- nally, as if they had signed my death-warrant, they marched leisurely side by side towards me, howling and showing their tusks. Their former ill reception had evi- dently made them cautious, but they were as evidently determined not to go to bed supperless that night. My mule now became still more outrageous. At last it broke my bridle, and with the same plunge flung me head foremost into a bed of brambles. I thought that my time had fairly come, and grasping my couteau, re- solved to die like a hero on the body of at least one of my enemies. However, I was not to have this chance of glory. My mule paid this penalty for its master. The instant the two wolves saw it without a rider, they rushed upon the unfortunate animal, tore it to the ground, and began sucking its blood. The mule defended itself fu- riously ; and on my coming up after the first stunning of the fall, I found its shoe stuck fast in the brain of one of the wolves. The other had gorged itself and was gone. From that time I limited my zeal in the conversion of wolves to shooting and skinning them."—From the Water Drinker in the Pyrenees.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE HONOUR.—It is remarkable that, tenacious as public men are of their honour, they seem to have found it an inconvenience to keep or to guard it all, and consequently have divided it into two parts—public honour and personal honour. The public honour, about which we know something, is given up to any judgment which people may think proper to pass on it ; but the personal honour, which is the share with which we have nothing to do, is most jealously protected. You may do what you like with a man's public character, provided you acknowledge the separate maintenance of his personal character. This is a distinction which has been split by so blunt an instrument as a pistol-ball. The an- cients did not know it because they did not duel. In the progress of improvement there will probably be farther divisions of honour, for there seems to be no reason why it should be split only into public and personal, and there may be an honour for every relation and class of transactions between man and man ; and if a person's conduct as a merchant be impugned, he may fiercely ask the question whether it is intended to impugn his hon- our as a husband?—and he may be satisfied with the assurance that nothing was farther from the purpose of his censor.—Examiner.

SELF-INCURRED MISERY.—The amount of self-incurred misery which mankind have suffered in past ages, seems almost to exceed all that they can have endured in the same time through natural evils. A curious publication, showing the number of victims that have been sacrificed by the Inquisition, has just appeared, and according to which, 105,285 fell under Torquemada, 51,167 under Cisneros, and 34,952 under Diego Perez. Those who suffered under the inquisitors who preceded these three monsters amounted to 3,410,215. It is reckoned that 31,912 have been burnt alive, 15,657 have suffered the punishment of the statue, and 291,450 that of the peni- tentiaries. 500,000 families have been destroyed by the Inquisition, and it has cost Spain two millions of her chil- dren.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF MICROSCOPY, OR THE IMPORTANCE OF A BUG TO HIMSELF.—Men are perpetually wondering what can be the use of bugs, and fleas, and wasps, and such vermin, and speak of them as absolute blots in the escutcheon of the Almighty. The use of these insects is surely to teach man a perpetual lesson of humility. He is extremely apt to fancy himself the only being of real importance in this planet, and that every thing in it has been made for his exclusive use and accommodation ; whereas a very little consideration must teach him that the said fleas, and bugs, and wasps, &c., are intended to enjoy themselves in their own way, just as he does ; that is to say, without greatly considering the inconvenience, comforts, or happiness of other beings. I consider it as certain that bugs were intended to prey upon man, as that man and the other predaceous mammalia were in- tended to destroy the weaker animals. If a bug (I beg pardon—a cimex lectularius) could reason, it would proba- bly suppose that man was of no other use in the creation than to prepare its habitation and supply its food ; and would think that no better evidence need be adduced to prove the immense importance of a bug than that such bountiful provision had been made for it.

THE TWENTY-FOUR LETTERS.—The father of the in- genious self-taught mathematician, Edmund Stone, was gardener to the Duke of Argyle. Edmund had attained the age of eighteen, when the duke, walking one day in his garden, saw lying upon the grass a Latin copy of New- ton's Principia, and, concluding it belonged to his own library, directed it to be carried back and placed there. This was about to be done, when young Stone, stepping forward, claimed the book as his own. "Yours!" replied the duke ; "do you understand geometry, Latin and Newton?" "I know a little of them," answered Stone, modestly. The duke then entered into particular con- versation with him, and requested to know how he had obtained his present knowledge. "A servant," said Stone, "taught me, about ten years since, to read. Does one need to know any thing more than the twenty- four letters, in order to know every thing else that one wishes?" The duke's curiosity was redoubled, and sitting down on a bank with Stone, the latter, at his request, thus proceeded in his account of himself :—"I first learned to read : the masons were then at work upon your house. I approached them one day, and ob- served that the architect used a rule and compasses, and that he made calculations. I inquired what might be the meaning and use of these things, and I was informed that there was a science called arithmetic. I purchased a book of arithmetic, and I learned it. I was told there was another science, called geometry ; I bought the necessary books, and I learned geometry. By reading, I found there were good books in these two sciences in Latin : I bought a dictionary, and I learned Latin. I understood, also, that there were general books of the same kind in French : I bought a dictionary, and I learned French. And this, my lord, is what I have done : it seems to me, that we may learn every thing when we know the twenty-four letters of the alphabet."—The duke now determined to draw Stone from his obscurity, and immediately provided him with an employment which left him in possession of ample time to follow his favourite pursuits.

SELECTIONS FROM BENTHAM.

LOCAL JUDICATURE.—To us a system of local ju- dicature, distributing justice upon the spot, in all its branches, is new, not only in practice, but in imagi- nation. With us no man has yet been found bold enough to insinuate that fifty pounds may be too high a price to pay for five shillings, or four hundred miles too far to go for it.—Power gives existence to a law for the moment, but it is upon reason that it must depend for its stability.—It is the delight of lawyers to go on plodding in paths which reason has never vi- sited, or having visited has deserted.

PROMULGATION.—In England the business of pro- mulgation is a very simple affair. In the body of every act of Parliament a day is specified in which it shall be considered as being in force. Nothing is done to circulate it by king, or judges, or any body else : but a copy is given to the king's printing-office, Max, 1835.

where it is printed in an obsolete obscure type, and inconvenient folio form, and sold, as may be expected under a monopoly, at a dear price; and there it lies for the use of any one that has money to spare to buy it, and thinks it worth his while to do so. Every man is then supposed to know and to understand the law: juries excepted, who, when they have taken upon them to pronounce a man guilty of having violated the law, are held not to have decided upon the law, it being impossible they should understand it.

THE JUDGES AND THE DEFECTS OF LAW.—All human laws will have defects: all new ones more particularly: defects to be remedied must be pointed out by somebody: and who so proper to point them out as the persons engaged by duty in the study of them, and by practice in the observation of the incidents that bring them into notice? No legislator can as such possess opportunities of this nature equal to those which must present themselves to every judge. In England no invitation of this sort was ever given to the judges. Those magistrates, however, have always had the right of making representations of this sort, since, under the name of petitions, it is no more than that which all subjects in general have enjoyed. No nation hitherto whose laws have such large features of excellence in them, as those of England; yet none perhaps whose laws are more abundant in particular, and very gross defects. No judge can well sit on the bench for a day together without being witness to numerous exemplifications of them. In one of the houses of legislature all the judges have always had seats, and at all times some of them have had votes. Yet who ever heard of a representation of this sort spontaneously given by a judge to the legislature? and how many instances do the annals of Parliament afford of bills brought in by law-lords for the amendment of the law? Is a bill of this sort attempted to be stole in by an unlearned hand? learned eyes are not wanting for spying out the defects—not of the law, but of the bill which seeks to remedy it; and scorn is the reward which public spirit gets for its temerity.

PUBLICITY.—Publicity is the very soul of justice. It is the keenest spur to exertion, and the surest of all guards against improbity. It keeps the judge himself, while trying, under trial. Under the auspices of publicity, the cause in the court of law, and the appeal to the court of public opinion, are going on at the same time. So many by-standers as an unrighteous judge, or rather a judge who would otherwise be unrighteous, beholds attending in his court, so many witnesses he sees of his unrighteousness, so many condemning judges, so many ready executioners, and so many industrious proclaimers of his sentence. By publicity, the court of law to which his judgment is appealed from is secured against any want of evidence of his guilt. It is through publicity alone that justice becomes the mother of security. By publicity the temple of justice is converted into a school of the first order, where the most important branches of morality are enforced by the most impressive means:—into a theatre where the sports of the imagination give place to the more interesting exhibitions of real life. Nor is publicity less auspicious to the veracity of the witness, than to the probity of the judge. Envied as he sees himself by a thousand eyes, contradiction, should he hazard a false tale, will seem ready to rise up in opposition to it from a thousand mouths. Many a known face, and every unknown countenance, presents to him a possible source of detection, from whence the truth he is struggling to suppress, may, through some unsuspected connection, burst forth to his confusion. Without publicity all other checks are fruitless; in comparison of publicity all other checks are of small account.

SCOTLAND.

April 2. A whale, seventy-eight feet long, came ashore on the side of Seil, near the mainland of Lorn, in Argyshire, and was secured and killed by the country people.

10. A meeting was held in the Royal Exchange Coffeehouse, Edinburgh, for the purpose of considering the propriety of opening a subscription to defray the expense incurred by Mr. Tait, in his exposure of the spy system. Bailie McFarlane presided, and, in an excellent speech, recommended the proposal being carried into effect. Dr. Browne followed, by proposing the resolutions, and was seconded by Mr. Burton, when a committee was appointed. A large meeting of the working classes was also held in the ensuing week, to petition government in favour of the Dorsetshire unionists, &c.; and it was also resolved to raise a subscription in aid of Mr. Tait, to whom the thanks of the meeting were voted.

Addresses favourable and unfavourable to ministers were dispatched early in the past month from various considerable towns in Scotland. From Edinburgh a favourable one was dispatched with upwards of 2000 signatures, immediately followed by one of the opposite kind, signed by 13,454. From Glasgow the corresponding numbers were 3200 and 15,000.

The sum of £8000 has been bequeathed by the late John Carnegie, Esq. of the Hon. East India Company's service, for the establishment of an hospital in Aberdeen for orphan female children.

One evening, some weeks ago, the inhabitants of Carstairs village were surprised and excited by the unusual conduct of a dog, that went howling round the loch in the centre of the village, and trying to direct the attention of all he met towards something in the water. Lights being brought out, and the surface of the loch examined, a moving body was discovered, when some persons plunged in, and found the almost lifeless body of an Edinburgh carrier, only the skirts of his coat being above the water. About an hour elapsed before animation could be restored, and by day-break next morning, the carrier was able to take the road, in dry clothes. He died, however, soon after.

Several of the landed estates in the neighbourhood of Montrose have lately changed hands. The estates of Charlestown and Kinbar, in the immediate vicinity—part of the contiguous lands of Rosemount—and the valuable estate of Dunottar, near Stonehaven—have all been disposed of on terms which are considered extremely favourable to the purchasers. The fine estate of Rossie is also in the market, and it is believed that a portion of it at least will be sold on the day announced for the roup.—Montrose Rev.

A commodious place of worship in connection with the established church, and calculated to contain 1200 sitters, has just been opened at Airdrie.—The sum of £539 has been subscribed at Inverness, for the erection of a new church in that town.—Sir Charles Forbes, Bart. of Newe and Edinglassie, has resolved to erect, at his own expense, on the upper part of his Strathdon and Corgaff estates, a new church and dwelling-house for one of the General Assembly's missionaries.

The Scottish newspapers, metropolitan and provincial, have been filled for several weeks with accounts of meetings favourable and adverse to the proposal for endowing new churches in connection with the establishment. We deem it only necessary to advert to this fact, as the controversy, being at present carried on without a basis of facts which both parties may rely upon, is in our opinion unworthy of further notice in a chronicle addressed as much to the future as to the present. Undoubtedly, sufficient facts will soon be laid before Parliament, to enable the members of that august court to determine to what extent there are local deficiencies in the opportunities of social worship, and what likelihood there is of additional endowments being serviceable in bringing to church such of the poor as are not now in the habit of attending it. It will also be matter for the consideration of Parliament, whether the taxing of dissenters, in common with others, for setting up places of worship obnoxious to them on religious, and injurious to them on secular considerations, be consistent with justice, or likely to be attended by the desired effects.

Owing to the new ministerial appointments, the following seats are vacated in Scotland—Stirling burghs by Lord Dalmeny, Dundee by Sir H. Parnell, Elgin burghs by Col. Leith Hay, Kirkcubright by Mr. R. C. Fergusson, Leith by Mr. J. A. Murray, Haddington burghs by Mr. R. Stewart, Edinburgh by Sir J. Campbell, Clackmannan by Admiral Adam, and Inverness by Mr. C. Grant. We have as yet (April 24) heard of only one of these seats being contested—Leith by Admiral Sir D. Milne, a Conservative zealous in the church interest. The electors in Dundee and Edinburgh are to re-elect their late members without requiring their presence.

Four Scottish members, reputed heretofore as liberals, have excited the indignation of portions of their constituencies by their late conduct in Parliament—Sir M. S. Stewart, member for Renfrewshire; Mr. J. Maxwell, member for Lanarkshire; Mr. G. Sinclair, member for Caithness; and Mr. A. Johnston, member for the Cupar burghs. The votes chiefly complained of were in favour of the inviolability of the Irish church revenues. It seems that Mr. Johnston, at his last election, engaged to resign on being called to do so by a majority of those who voted for him: a requisition for his resignation, signed by two-thirds, has been dispatched to the honourable gentleman, who is expected accordingly to vacate his seat.

Postscript.

The bill authorising the payment of the American claims passed the French Chamber of Deputies, April 19, by a vote of 289 to 137. Two amendments—one, that no interest at all should be paid, and another, that interest should only commence from the passing of the bill—were negatived; but ministers assented to what General Valdez proposed, that the money shall not be paid until after the French government shall have received satisfactory explanations with regard to President Jackson's threatening message. This was intended, we presume, as balm to the wounded pride of the nation. No doubt the President will give such explanations as the Duke de Broglie will admit to be satisfactory, if thereby he can procure a speedy settlement of this tedious transaction.

It is now certain that General Valdez has succeeded Mina in the command of the army in the rebellious provinces of Spain. Mina is said to be in miserable health. The total amount of the force which Valdez will have at his disposal, is stated at not less than 60,000 men; and the plan of the campaign is to drive the insurgents into the province of Biscay, and there overwhelm them.

The rumour that Lord Eliot's mission to the seat of war was connected with a project of marrying a son of Don Carlos to the Queen of Spain, has been revived, but seems entitled to little notice. The Bayonne correspondent of the Times says that the result of his exertions will be nothing more than perhaps a cartel for the exchange of prisoners.

The Spanish Chamber of Procuradores has decreed the suppression of eight hundred monasteries, the revenues of which are to be applied to the liquidation of the national debt.

Lord Foley and Lord Gosford are to resume their former situations in the household, and the Earl of Errol is to be Master of the Buckhounds.

PRICE THREE HALPENS

JUVENILE CRIMINALS.

FEW months since, in the course of some inquiries which it was our duty to make in the jail of this city, we were ushered into an apartment containing a solitary inmate—a miserable broken-hearted boy, who had been brought there two days before for some trifling depredations committed in his master's shop, and who had scarcely lifted his head or broken his silence since. He was the only son of a poor but decent widow, and, having been apprenticed to a mercer, in whose shop there were other lads somewhat older than himself, he had been tempted by them to filch some trifle for their common benefit. For this offence, which bore hardly the hue of guilt, the prospects of the youth were to be blighted for ever by a disgraceful confinement and trial, and the hopes of an unfortunate mother prostrated in the dust. Nay, we were informed, that, in all probability, he would be immediately brought into fellowship with a number of hardened offenders of his own age, who would make him the real criminal which the laws and regulations of his country only supposed him to be. Here, unquestionably, was a great wrong. Society is evidently injured two individuals of its number as effectually as if it had robbed them of actual property, or condemned them without fault to lose the advantage of all its institutions. It also exposed itself to the risk of converting one who might have been a valuable member of its body, into a dangerous enemy.

It cannot be told without shame, that Britain has advanced to its present point of civilisation without making any decisive attempt to prevent the frequent recurrence of this evil. As blundering and indifference in much of their public procedure, as they are prompt and intelligent in the prosecution of their individual interests and happiness, the people of this country contentedly from age to age see small offenders punished by modes which only tend to make them worse—in other words, a small mischief corrected into a greater, by which themselves are to be the only sufferers. The absurdity of the procedure has been often pointed out, and some partial attempts have been made to abolish it; but still it prevails generally over the country, causing the expenditure of vast but useless sums, and afflicting humanity to a tremendous extent, while public attention is perhaps too much engrossed by political questions to afford any hope of its entire removal for many years to come. In America, where the settlement of all the great questions respecting state polity leaves more of the talent and philanthropy of the country to be employed on matters of minor interest,* there are at least three flourishing institutions of a charitable character for reclaiming and replacing in society those unfortunate beings who are either born and reared in vice, or have fallen in the thoughtlessness of youth into errors, here punished as crimes. These institutions, respectively placed in Pennsylvania, New York, and Boston, contain each about one hundred and twenty children, of whom eighty out of every hundred are stated to be regained for the pure world. Let us not treat children as criminals, say our friends in America, but let us put giddy and misguided children to school under a strict discipline. Their time in the institution is spent in work, in study, and in amusement—the last being allowed in greater ratio, in proportion to their industry in the former—and the presiding sentiment of the place is kindness, which, with a proper degree of firmness, is after all the only true mode of operating extensive results upon the erring human heart.

"Let us consider," says a judicious writer, "the inmates of our prisons, and analyse the causes of their misfortunes. What does their criminal conduct arise from? In many from ignorance. In many from the pressure of misery. In some from temporary want of balance between the passions and moral powers, which exists generally in youth; in most from vicious habits early acquired. Knowledge is the cure for ignorance, so that those in this class may without much difficulty be made good members of society: instead of despising and punishing, let us also teach them. We are aware that it is an easier matter to keep ourselves altogether aloof from persons of this description, than to improve them; indolence and pride both favour such conduct, but is it generous or even politic? for though we personally may avoid contamination, society, in the mass, cannot. In these times, if we would have society avoid threatening convulsions, there is but one course to pursue, which is active benevolence. The crimes of those in the second class proceed from circumstances which human nature can seldom withstand, and it should not be forgotten that the money required to punish might often in such cases be sufficient to reclaim. To the third class, those who have done wrong from a temporary want of balance between the passions and the moral powers, most men have belonged in the earlier period of life, and their future course for good or ill has depended much upon the education they have received, and the society into which they have been thrown. We cannot be too careful about destroying prospects in life by too severe a condemnation of the thoughtlessness of youth, by degrading him for ever for actions for which those who ought to have restrained him are more responsible than himself."

Within the last few years some benevolent individuals in our metropolis have formed themselves into what they call a Society for the Suppression of Juvenile Vagrancy, their chief objects being to seclude as many destitute and vicious children as their funds will admit of, in an establishment which they have at Hackney Wick—to educate these to a certain extent, and give them habits of industry—and finally to apprentice them in the colonies. "The plan," says our authority, "which the society has adopted and pursued is as follows:—A fit master having been in the first instance sought out, a number of children were collected in certain premises, with a portion of land attached to them, at Hackney Wick, in the immediate neighbourhood of London. These children have had not only the advantage of all the instruction usually given at the national schools, but pains have been taken to habituate them to patient and intelligent labour: they are taught to mend their own clothes and shoes, cook their own victuals, rear their own vegetables and other produce of the land; and, in fact, not only to perform every service of whatever kind for themselves, but to do whatever else is likely to render them useful and intelligent members of an infant community. To what advantage the labour of the boys has been employed upon the land, we do not know; but we feel convinced that active boys, employed under good direction upon the soil, should, particularly in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, earn a very considerable proportion of the expenses of their maintenance.

To give a perfect education, extending as it must do through a long period of time, was by no means the object of this establishment; it was for the purpose of receiving children either standing on the verge of crime, or already imbued with vicious habits, and of educating them to such a point that their former bias might be counteracted, and that, when placed, according to the intention of the society, in a sphere of activity and usefulness, the only one in which virtue can thrive, hope might with good reason be entertained of them for the future.

In order that the discipline of the school might not depend upon the amount of active interest taken in its well-being by the committee of management, which of course must be influenced by a variety of circumstances, a well-considered code of laws for the regulation of the little colony has been framed, which we doubt not will much assist in keeping the school up to the standard so necessary for the success of the undertaking. We here extract a few of the regulations.

2. Each boy, after medical examination, and on admission to the school, to be well washed in a warm bath, under the direction of the medical gentleman who examines him, and to have his hair cut short.

3. The boys to be numbered from No. 1 upwards, and entered upon a roll; the name, the age, size, previous mode of life, and extent of acquirements on admission, to be noted.

6. Each division to be placed by the master under the charge of a boy, selected by him for good conduct, to be called a monitor.

8. The master has supreme authority in the school; obedience to him is the first duty of every boy.

10. Each boy to have a separate hammock.

11. Nightly inspection, at irregular hours, of the boys' dormitory, to secure decent and orderly conduct.

12. Morning, the boys' names to be called; wash, personal cleanliness to be very strictly enforced; a place for every thing, and every thing in its place.

13. When the weather is unfavourable for field labour, the boys to be employed in learning some useful trade, such as the committee may from time to time approve. They should be taught also to grind their own corn in hand-mills, make their own bread, cook their own meat.

18. Any boy guilty of falsehood, to be placed in solitary confinement for three hours, and for every repetition of the offence an hour additional. If a monitor, to be reduced, and not again appointed until after long probation; the punishment for every oath or bad language to be the same as above.

20. Flogging or blows are strictly forbidden; and no task to be given from Scripture as a punishment.

In addition to these regulations, there are also certain printed instructions for the direction of the master, of which the following are some extracts:—

6. The master must make himself intimately acquainted with the character and disposition of each boy, and act accordingly. He will generally find that kind words, and above all strict justice and impartiality, will secure to him their affection and respect, which, when once acquired, he will experience but little difficulty in moulding them to his wish. It is, however, required that he should at all times act with spirit and firmness, and, when requisite, awe the refractory into instant obedience by summary punishment. Obedience is to be considered the first duty of the boys; mildness, combined with inflexible determination, is considered that of the master. He will endeavour as much as possible to govern them through the medium of their affections, but will never forget that discipline must be maintained.

* This is a fact which the most cursory glance over a bundle of American periodicals renders abundantly clear. The magazines of America very rarely contain a political article, while ours are filled full of them.

The master will keep a vigilant eye upon the members of divisions, and his constant attention directed towards rendering them efficient in aiding him to keep good order in the colony. His instructions to them must be clear, and delivered in mild language, and in a tone of voice; he will also select, from number, one to act as a general monitor, and for juvenile labour in the colony have, for instance, being ascertained, the next form a committee there for regulating the children upon their arrival, and to the sanitary arrangements of the society; when done, sixty-nine boys from Hackney, in the form of a school with its Cape of Good Hope. Of those who society has received most gratifying masters being satisfied with the boys, with their new situations. Several efforts have also been made, but sufficient not yet elapsed for the receipt of intelligence respecting them all. The total of youthful emigrants has amounted, in this first year of their exportation, to two hundred and sixty-six boys and twenty-six girls.

The society has not only the advantage of doing good, but of doing it with benefit to its own funds, a circumstance which will enable it to extend the sphere of its usefulness to other regions of the world, and to send forth a population not like a pestilence to blight young societies in their bud, but one that will add to the moral power and real vigour of any they may incorporate themselves with. This, we believe, has been the first instance of children emigrating. As inhabitants of a new colony, they have the advantage over grown persons in every particular. The children arrive without any prejudices upon their minds, and are ready to conform themselves to and take advantage of whatever circumstances they may be placed in; whereas persons of mature age have as much to unlearn as to learn; it is long before they can habituate themselves to what must be so totally at variance with what they have been accustomed to in the mother-country. It is up-hill work with them; they begin life twice over. The young emigrants arrive without encumbrances, without wives or children; they are unfettered, and after a time free to apply all their energies in contending with the difficulties of their situation with the greatest possible advantage. The youthful emigrant has but one mouth to feed, and one back to clothe; add to this, he is not turned out raw and ignorant, but, from his previous apprenticeship, has become well acquainted with the actual state of things at the risk of his master, and, before he actually enters into life, has been educated and instructed for it as it is there. The reverse of this is the case with the adult emigrant, who is accompanied by a family; he has to contend, under the greatest possible disadvantage, with difficulties, of the nature of which he is utterly ignorant; he lands generally knowing but little what he is to do, or what he is likely to meet with; he has all to learn, and that, by the way of experiment, at his own cost. Besides this, however elated he may be with the hope of success, still the circumstance of complete separation from those whom blood and friendship have bound to him, must always afflict him. No connections formed late in life have associations so pleasing as those entered into at an earlier period; we must not only perceive together, but recollect together. What an hour that is which we pass with an old friend in recalling the things which time has mellowed in the distance; when we touch occasionally a chord, which vibrates as though it were then that the circumstance was occurring! They have not this. The young emigrant has all his ties to form. From birth, perhaps, an outcast from society, of uncertain origin, unjustly branded with a stigma from this circumstance, it is probable that he has but few ties in the mother-country. The colony will easily be recognised by such an emigrant as his home.

If it be granted, as we think it must, that emigrants of the description under consideration have advantages which no others can have, we also contend, that, for the colonists themselves, this is the exact description of persons they should be the most solicitous of obtaining, for they arrive at the precise period of life when they become the most useful and profitable servants. The colonists have not the expense of rearing them up from infancy, nor of supporting their aged relatives; they stand alone, ready to return hard labour for the lengthened period of five or six years, for the sum of £12, paid to the society, with food, lodging, clothing, good treatment, medical assistance when requisite, and a small sum for pocket-money, to be withheld in the event of bad conduct.

With most associations, it has been generally the practice to expend large and unnecessary sums upon the buildings and other matters which are by no means intimately connected with the main object; and their funds have frequently been exhausted, not in carrying on the business which they have undertaken with ardour, but in making an appearance before the world. It was therefore with much gratification that, upon visiting the asylum at Hackney Wick, we saw the reverse to be the case. One large room, lofty, and consequently healthy, serves for all purposes, except cooking. It is there that the hammocks are swung, the children are instructed, and eat; the office, too, at which the general business is conducted, is shared with another society. In fact, the strictest regard to economy appears to have influenced all the proceedings of this society."

We take leave of this subject with an earnest hope that other associations, similar to that here described, will speedily be put into operation throughout the country. That their labours may be attended with a result beneficial alike to individuals and to society, we cannot for a moment doubt.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

WE mentioned in the Postscript to our May number, that the bill authorising the payment of the American claims passed the French Chamber of Deputies, April 19, by a vote of 269 to 137. Two amendments—one, that no interest at all should be paid, and another, that interest should only commence from the passing of the bill—were negatived; but ministers assented to what General Valez proposed, that the money shall not be paid until after the French government shall have received satisfactory explanations with regard to President Jackson's threatening message.

On the 5th May, the trial of the prisoners implicated in the disturbances at Paris, Lyons, and other places in France, in April 1834, commenced. A battery of cannon was concealed in the Palace of the Luxembourg, but there was no extraordinary display of force to prevent disturbance. A hall has been constructed for the occasion, of lath and plaster, and redolent of damp paint, but gorgeous and gilded withal. The hall was opened about eleven o'clock. The witnesses for the crown and for the prisoners occupied distinct benches. Among the former were many females. The accused were brought in by gendarmes, and some of them were singular and picturesque in their appearance and dress. Those from Lyons had long beards and hair, with waistcoats à la Robespierre, and fantastical coats. The Parisians provided themselves with glazed broad-brimmed hats, adorned generally with the tri-coloured cockade. The names, professions, and ages of the prisoners, were asked and taken down; and some of them demanded that certain of their friends, not lawyers, should be allowed to plead for them. Preliminary business of this description occupied the first day.

When the court re-assembled on the 6th, an extraordinary scene occurred. Martin, one of the prisoners, demanded to be heard on a question of right, common, as he said, to all the prisoners. The president commanded silence until the "act of accusation" had been read. Martin persisted, and the guards endeavoured to silence him. Cavaignac, another prisoner, demanded to be heard in behalf of all the prisoners; he spoke with extreme vehemence. The president repeated, that in the first place the act of accusation must be read. All the prisoners then rose at once, and loudly protested against the president's decision. Martin was especially vociferous. Lagrange, another prisoner, repeated the protest of his comrades; and all of them again rose en masse. Martin (du Nord), the Attorney-General, endeavoured to address them, but his voice was completely drowned by the stentorian exclamations of his namesake, Martin the prisoner. This scene of uproar continued for some time; the peers being visibly embarrassed as to their mode of proceeding. Cavaignac was held down, shouting all the time, by three of the municipal guard. The Attorney-General demanded that he should be imprisoned for insulting the court; the law allowed him to be sentenced to any term of imprisonment less than six months. Cavaignac demanded two years' imprisonment; and all the prisoners, except twenty from Lyons, rose and demanded the same. The court retired to deliberate.

After four hours of deliberation on the mode of dealing with the refractory prisoners, the president announced that it had been determined that no sentence should then be passed, but that the "incident would be united with the main question, and both be judged at the same time;" in other words, that their punishment would be aggravated, when sentence was passed on them for their political offence. It was also announced that prompt measures would be taken to ensure the tranquillity of the future proceedings. The court then adjourned. The scene of tumult was renewed on Thursday; the prisoners and their advocates denouncing the proceedings, the crown lawyers endeavouring to defend them. Towards the close of the sitting, it was quite impossible to hear a sentence distinctly on either side. Beaune, one of the prisoners, distinguished himself by speaking down the Attorney-General, who attempted to read a charge against him for contempt of court. The rivalry of lungs was continued so long that the scene became irresistibly ludicrous; and the court was broken up in a hurry, amidst the denunciations and frantic protestations of the prisoners—in order to prevent the laughter which seemed ready to burst from all present. Written protests against the course adopted by the court have been published by the prisoners and their advocates.

In consequence of the refractory conduct of the prisoners, Martin, the Attorney-General, proposed that all who refused to behave quietly and decorously should be tried in their absence. The peers deliberated on this proposal, which caused no slight sensation in Paris, as the last person who had been so tried was the celebrated Danton; and the papers were filled with extracts from the History of the Revolution by Thiers, full of eloquent denunciations of the inquiry of proceeding against even such a wretch as Danton in his absence. Many of the peers, including Court Mole, and Pasquier, the president, refused to concur in the Attorney-General's proposal; but it was finally agreed that the act of accusation, or indictment, should be read in the presence of those only who refrained from interrupting the proceedings by clamour. (The peers have since decided, by a majority of 278 to 78, not to try the accused in their absence. Accordingly, on Saturday, all the prisoners were moved, after a scuffle between one of them and an officer of the national guard. Subsequently, twenty-nine of the more peaceable were brought again into court. One of these, however, Lagrange, attacked the court with vehemence; and it was not until he was dragged out that one word of the indictment could be heard. This document consists of five hundred and nineteen pages, the reading of which would occupy several days, and had not concluded when the last accounts were dispatched.

In the mean time, out of the twenty-eight prisoners who submitted to hear the indictment read, twenty-three have vehemently protested against the illegality of the whole proceedings. The chosen defenders of the accused, to the number of ninety-one, comprising in their body several barristers of reputation, and five members of the Chamber of Deputies, have had frequent meetings; and in the last number of the Tribune, published May 11, they inserted a spirited protest against the tyrannical refusal of the Court of Peers to allow them to plead the cause of the accused. The Duke de Montebello brought this subject before the Chamber of Peers, and proposed to summon the editor of the Tribune, and the ninety-one signers of the protest, to the bar of the chamber, to answer for their conduct. But on the day after the protest was published, the Tribune ceased to appear, being utterly borne down by fines and the expenses of prosecutions; and the editor is already in prison, along with two of his predecessors in the same office. The peers agreed to the motion of the Duke de Montebello on Thursday, May 14. On the same day, M. Pers applied to the chamber for permission to prosecute the two deputies who signed the protest, but the discussion was postponed.

Forty-three peers have retired from the court in disgust, in addition to eighty-eight who had previously refused to take any part in the proceedings. About five hundred of the tenth legion of the national guard have protested against being employed in guarding the Luxembourg during the continuance of the "motus processus."

Attempts have been made at Lyons to intimidate the witnesses summoned to give evidence for the prosecution. Part of the mayor's house was blown down by the explosion of a species of hand-grenade.

After great opposition, the French ministers succeeded in obtaining a vote for £48,000 additional secret service money, on April 30th, by a majority of 259 to 130.

SPAIN.

WE noticed in our last the retirement of Mina from the command of the royal troops of Spain, after doing little or nothing beyond showing his determination to persevere in the inhuman system of cold-blooded massacre which has from the commencement disgraced this civil war. It is satisfactory, therefore, to learn that a termination has at last been put to these atrocities, by the interference of Lord Elliot, whose mission to the seat of war, for the purpose of mediation has, it seems, been thus far successful. Previously to his arrival, some severe fighting had taken place, in which the Carlists are said to have been completely victorious. Valdez, Mina's successor, is said to have lost 5000 men, and some accounts assert his defeat to have been "disgraceful." The latest accounts would lead us to anticipate a speedy termination of hostilities altogether. General Cordova, who was dispatched to the north for the purpose of inspecting the state of affairs, has returned to Madrid, and, in consequence of his report, the queen is said to be disposed to listen to proposals for a pacification. The terms, according to some of the French papers, are, that Don Carlos should renounce his pretensions to the crown; that his eldest son should be affianced to the young queen, and succeed to the throne by the title of Louis II.; that the Estatuto Real should be maintained, and the privileges of the northern provinces secured: these provisions to be guaranteed by France and England, and ratified by the other leading European powers. Be the latter statement true or false, the reported proposals of pacification seem to confirm the statement put forth some weeks since by some of the (then) ministerial London papers, respecting the object of Lord Elliot's mission, viz. to assure Don Carlos that he never would be recognised king of Spain, even should he succeed in dethroning his niece; for that France and England were both pledged to support the present sovereign. As Lord Elliot is on his way home, however, we may shortly expect some explanation on these points.

PORTUGAL.

THE sudden demise of Prince Augustus of Portugal was noticed in our last. No time is to be lost, it would appear, in providing the young queen with another island. The two Chambers of Peers and Deputies on occasion, in their addresses of condolence, to suggest to her majesty the propriety of speedily providing a suitable successor to the deceased, as being the most likely and effectual consolation both for herself and the afflicted nation. Animated by a responsive sympathy for her people's grief, the widow has expressed her conviction of the judiciousness of the commendation, and her perfect readiness to act upon

"Noble Peers of the Kingdom—Twice in one day to express the wish expressed which you have addressed to me, a task which far exceeds the strength of my afflicted heart. Those amongst you who have known the generous and honoured husband whom I have had the misfortune to lose, will be able to appreciate, as they deserve, the loftiness of his mind and the magnanimity of his intentions—powerful reasons, which justify a deep regret; but since the interests of the empire, and its welfare which is inseparable from it, lead you this day by my presence, I must, and am able to reply to the noble Peers of the Kingdom, that I will take their wishes and the interests of the nation into consideration." "Gentlemen Deputies of the Portuguese Nation—If I did not do justice to the grave motives which have determined the Chamber of Deputies of the Portuguese nation to send me the present message, I should witness with pain the interruption to my deep grief; but since to representatives of the nation, who, like me, are aware of the great loss which we have sustained, believe that in order to consolidate the institutions which emanated from my august father, of glorious memory, I could choose another husband, I reply to the political necessity which has dictated the present message, that I am a Queen and a Portuguese. In virtue of these two qualities, the Deputies ought to and may expect from me the sacrifices which the country demands, and which I will not derogate from my dignity."

Modern times furnish no parallel to this sacrifice of royal inclinations to "political necessity." It is stated that the younger brother of the queen's late husband has been fixed on, or at least recommended by the Portuguese legislature, as the second husband of Donna Maria.

Her majesty prorogued the Chambers in person on April 21. There was nothing worth notice in her address.

The Marquis of Palmella has resigned his office to Count Villa Real, and is said to be coming to England to consult the British ministry on the subject of the marriage. M. Ferraz, the minister of justice, has also resigned, and is succeeded by M. Leitao. These changes do not seem to have at all affected the ability of the administration.

AFRICA.

INTELLIGENCE from the Cape of Good Hope to the 15th March, contains accounts of another irruption by the Caffres into the British settlements, and of some most severe actions having taken place between our troops and the savages. The Caffres had appeared in great numbers on the Fish and Kieskamma rivers. Colonel Somerset, with the forces under him, had been successful in driving the savages from their location with little loss; but Captain Jarvis, with a division of the 72d regiment, and the field commandant, having discovered the track of a large body of the savages, proceeded to Trumpeter's Drift, when, on the 9th March, they discovered a large body of the enemy, sufficient to overpower the forces, had they fought well. The Caffres attacked the troops, and the conflict was very severe. The great intrepidity of the captain and the field commandant, added to the valour of the troops and the Westenhage burgher force, enabled them to cut their way completely through the enemy, with the loss of only five killed and eight wounded, while the Caffres lost in killed no less than one hundred and fifty. Severe conflicts had taken place with other bodies of the Caffres, which had been attended with more loss of life to the colonial forces than had hitherto occurred. Colonel Somerset had again cleared the Fish River, and driven the savages into the interior. The commander was about to take the field and proceed into Caffre land, having considerably increased his forces. A great number of cattle had been taken. The governor had appointed a commission to inquire into the losses of the agriculturists, in order to afford relief.

WEST INDIES.

WE are happy to observe that the accounts from our various West India colonies are gradually becoming more favourable. The Barbadian of the 18th March says, "After all the gloomy anticipations and predictions of a large majority of slave proprietors, of ruin to West India property, by the abolition of slavery, the prospect of future prosperity brightens every day. There may be here and there trifling exceptions, but we can safely say that the apprenticeship scheme is working as well as any reasonable man could expect. The recent importation into Jamaica of eight hundred European colonists, consisting of carpenters, masons, ploughmen, &c. and for whom an act had been passed, granting £5000, "in order to establish townships," appears to have given great satisfaction to the planters in the neighbouring colonies.

EGYPT.

ARRIVALS from Egypt, to the middle of March last, furnish dreadful accounts of the ravages of the plague, which, after being confined for a while within the walls of Alexandria, is now spreading far and wide over Syria. At Alexandria, by the last accounts, upwards of 200 were dying daily of the pestilence; all trade was suspended, and the ships that were waiting for their cargoes had put to sea without them. The plague was brought to Alexandria by a Maltese, and on its first appearance Mehemet Ali issued strict measures of precaution to prevent its spreading; but the people, who will not be persuaded that the disease is contagious, evaded the sanitary cordon, which was ultimately abandoned. The elder inhabitants expect the disorder to become still more aggravated and fatal when the warm weather sets in. Mehemet Ali and his son Ibrahim set out on separate tours to distant provinces soon after its breaking out. A letter from Cairo, dated 13th March, states that the distemper had spread all over that city.

The trial of Richard Lawrence, on an indictment for an assault upon the President of the United States, with intent to kill, took place, April 11, before the Circuit Court for Washington. Prior to the commencement of any proceedings, Lawrence rose and addressed the court: "I am under the protection of my father at home. The throne of Great Britain and the throne of this country of right belong to me. I am superior to this tribunal." After many other interruptions of the same sort, the trial at last proceeded. After evidence had been heard, the jury retired for about ten minutes, when they returned with the following verdict, being the same with that which was returned in Hatfield's case, viz. "Not Guilty according to the indictment, the prisoner labouring under insanity at the time of the act."

The following is an extract from an interesting letter, just received by a gentleman in Liverpool, from Mr Sutcliffe (a native of Lancashire), who holds an official situation in the island of Juan Fernandez. Mr Sutcliffe, we believe, distinguished himself at the battle of Waterloo, and has since been for some years in the service of Spain:—"Island of Juan Fernandez, South Pacific Ocean, Dec. 10, 1834.—Dear Sir, you perhaps never dreamt of my addressing you from this island, but strange as it may appear, you will receive these few lines from the military and political Governado. It is more than three months that I have had the honour of that title, and as an opportunity offers by a vessel leaving here for Chili, I send this to inform you of my emigration from the Cordillera of the Andes to the Pacific Ocean. Little did I ever think when a youngster, whilst perusing that insinuating book wrote by Daniel Defoe, that I should ever read it on the island—be the first governor from our native soil. However, fate has so ordained it. There are three islands, and about five hundred inhabitants, including the troops; and I have no doubt but that the population will increase, as all the political and criminal exiles are sent to people this island, and over which I have a limited sway. In fact, I may repeat what is said of Alexander Selkirk, 'I am monarch of all I survey.' The climate is delightful, it is a continual spring; and as I am fond of field sports, there is plenty of occupation. There is an abundance of the most delicious fish, and plenty of birds; not forgetting an amazing quantity of goats and seals, which we kill for their skins. There is a rare shell, the paper nautilus, of which I shall send you a few. I hope this will find you in good health—this leaves me in the best. When you write, send me all the news you can; and, if convenient, a few papers, as any thing in this retired spot will help to drive away a dull hour. If any of the vessels from Liverpool, that are bound for the Pacific, should be in want of wood, water, or refreshments, they may be sure of a supply while I am on the island. They need not come to anchor, but send their boats into Cumberland Bay, where I have made a mole, and excellent watering-place. Wood is always ready cut, as the South Sea whalers are continually calling in for supplies."

Intelligence has been received of the total loss of his Majesty's ship William IV., commanded by Captain Milne, on the coast of South America. The William IV. was bound to Valparaiso in Chili, with a general cargo valued at about £40,000. Five times they had got about three hundred miles to the west of Cape Horn, but were as often beaten back by the violent gales. At last they were steering to Monte Video, on the north of La Plata, with a view to refit and repair the ship; but the atmosphere was so hazy that no observation of the sun, moon, or stars, could be obtained to ascertain their position; and they in consequence ran aground upon the coast of South America, about three hundred and ninety miles from Buenos Ayres, where the vessel was totally wrecked on the 5th of October last. Josiah Wilkinson, the cook, was washed overboard; Thomas Adams, seaman, died of fatigue, after getting ashore; Captain Milne and the rest of the crew, although much reduced, are safe. On the 21st of September, Mr James Headrick, eldest son of the Rev. James Headrick, of Dunnichie, Forfarshire, second mate of the ill-fated vessel, fell from the jib-boom, and was unfortunately drowned.

Some of the South American republics appear to be again "upon the move." There were some rather serious disturbances at Callao, on the 1st of January, in consequence of an attempt on the part of the soldiery to make General Lafuente President of Lima. The insurrection was suppressed, and the general banished; but the peaceable inhabitants were so much alarmed as to leave their houses and take refuge in the British and American ships in the harbour. A Lieutenant Drummond, of the British ship Satellite, was wounded in the knee, while assisting a lady to reach his vessel.

The House of Assembly in Lower Canada was, when the last accounts were dispatched, occupied in discussing a plan for appropriating the clergy reserved lands to the purposes of general education; and it was supposed that a majority of the house would vote for such a measure.

The East India Company have been taking measures to ascertain whether the tea plant can be successfully cultivated in any part of their territories. A tea committee has been constituted; Mr Gordon, one of the members, was dispatched from Calcutta some months ago, to

Canton, with 30,000 rupees, to purchase seeds, plants, and engage labourers; and some specimens of a plant indigenous to some parts of Assam have been received at Calcutta, which are pronounced by Dr Wallick, of the Botanic Gardens, to be the true tea plant.

PARLIAMENT.

BOTH houses of Parliament re-assembled on Thursday May 12. From the absence of Lord John Russell, the House of Commons (owing to his defeat in Shire), no public questions of great importance yet been brought forward there.

1. SLAVE TRADE.

On Tuesday, May 12, Mr F. BUXTON addressed to the King, praying him to take an end to the slave trade, which is now on extensively by foreign nations. The address occupied nine pages of the vote paper. Mr Buxton reported his motion by a speech of some length, and several official documents. From these it appeared that, between the 1st Jan. 1827 and the 30th Oct. 1833, there had sailed from the port of Havanna 1,000 vessels in the slave trade; and that, in the course of three years and a half, 150,000 slaves had been exported into Rio Janeiro alone.—After a brief discussion, in which Mr Hume and Mr Spring Rice took part, Mr Buxton, on the suggestion of Mr Hume, withdrew his motion, with the view of bringing it forward in a more concise form.

2. IRISH PROCESSIONS.

In the House of Lords, on Friday May 15, the Earl of WICKLOW adverted to the procession which had welcomed Lord Mulgrave to Dublin on his assuming the duties of Lord-Lieutenant. Lord Wicklow said it was an organised arrangement of Mr O'Connell, marshalled under officers, carrying banners with inscriptions of "Repeal of the Union," "O'Connell for ever," and such like. Such a procession was illegal; and he wished to know whether Lord Melbourne was aware of these circumstances, and whether he had intimated his displeasure at them? —Lord MELBOURNE said he was aware that there had been an enthusiastic demonstration of popular feeling on Lord Mulgrave's entry into Dublin, but he did not know that any illegal ensigns had been exhibited. If there had been any violation of the law, punishment would follow.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY said he had received letters stating that the banners and green flags in the procession had upon them these mottoes: "The Rising Sun"—"Dan's Lieutenant"—"Repeal"—"Separation."—These accounts were confirmed by private letters; and if the noble viscount were ignorant of them, if he had not heard of such things, he begged to assure the noble viscount that he was almost the only one who had not. (Hear.) He was apprehensive that what one of these writers said would be verified. The writer said, "Lord Mulgrave's entry into Dublin was a complete display of O'Connell's force, and the sanction given to the late proceedings will induce loyal Protestants not to abstain from celebrating the 12th July, when, I much fear, some conflict will take place."—Lord MELBOURNE said he was perfectly aware of the evil consequences that might ensue from such an exhibition, but did not see how Lord Mulgrave could have prevented it.

3. RESIGNATION OF LORD WELLESLEY.

The preceding conversation led to another respecting the unexpected resignation of Lord Wellesley of his recent appointment as Lord Chamberlain, on the preceding day. Alluding to the questions put to Lord Melbourne by Lord Wicklow, the Marquis of LONDONDERRY observed, a noble person high in the confidence of his Majesty, and in that of the government, had just resigned office, because he felt that the influence of Mr O'Connell was so great in the government, that, with his opinions, he could not properly continue in office. If the noble viscount's personal friends were thus alarmed, could he wonder that his political enemies were frightened?—Lord MELBOURNE said he had the authority of Lord Wellesley himself for stating most distinctly, that any report to that effect was entirely without foundation. It was not upon the grounds stated that the noble marquis had resigned his office; and with respect to the state of Ireland in general, Lord Wellesley agreed with the views of his (Lord Melbourne's) late government, and with what he presumed to be the views of the present government, with respect to that country.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY said, the person who told him the report about the Lord Chamberlain had it from Lord Wellesley himself.—Lord BROUGHAM observed, that, in opposition to Lord Londonderry's second-hand information, there was the evidence of two persons who had communicated directly with Lord Wellesley. He was himself a witness beyond doubt; he knew of Lord Wellesley's intention to resign, and the reasons of it; and those reasons were completely different and wholly standing apart from those supposed.

4. NATIONAL EDUCATION.

May 21. Lord BROUGHAM proposed a series of fourteen resolutions for the establishment of schools for the instruction of youth, and the formation of school-masters, and the appointment of a board of commissioners for superintending the application of the funds arising out of the endowments for education, and providing that the trusts be duly executed. His lordship introduced the subject in a long speech, in which he compared the past and present state of education in England, and illustrated the subject by references to what had been done in other countries. As the resolutions embraced a variety of views, he was anxious that they should be printed, and considered by their lordships, before he made any distinct motion on this important subject.—Lord MELBOURNE expressed approbation as to the course adopted by his learned friend, and, on the part of his Government, undertook that they would give the most anxious attention to the proposition. The Bishop of GLOUCESTER concurred in the views taken by the noble and learned lord, the Archbishop of CANTERBURY.—Lord also agreed with the general views of the , and expressed a hope that the object for which he had so long struggled was on the point of being accomplished.

5. MINOR SUBJECTS.

2. Sir GEORGE GREY stated, in reply to a question from Mr Hume, that ministers had determined to recall Lord Aylmer from the governorship of Lower Canada, and to send commissioners to that province with the view of settling the matters in dispute between the House of Assembly and the government. He also said that Lord Amherst had been offered the place of Chief Commissioner, but had declined it, and that the Colonial Secretary was employed in the selection of persons to act as commissioners, who, it was hoped, would fully and impartially investigate the differences now troubling the colony.—The Duke of RICHMOND presented the report of the select committee on the state of prison discipline in England and Wales. The report recommends the adoption of one uniform system—the appointment of government inspectors, the classification of prisoners, and the enforcement of silence both before and after trial. The noble duke concluded by moving that the powers of the committee should be extended to Scotland.—Agreed to.

—14. Lord MANDEVILLE, in moving for a return of the chief constable's report of the outrages which were perpetrated at the Armagh races in October last, charged the Earl of Gosford (Lord-Lieutenant of the county) with having packed the magistrates who were to conduct the investigation, &c.—Dr LUSHINGTON defended Lord Gosford from the charges of partisanship which had been brought against him.—Mr HUME moved an amendment, to the effect that there was no foundation for the charges made against Lord Gosford.—After a few unimportant remarks, Lord Mandeville's motion was withdrawn, and Mr Hume's amendment was put and carried.—Lord BROUGHAM presented a petition, signed by 12,000 persons resident in Edinburgh, against any grant of public money for procuring additional church accommodation in Scotland. It appeared that in the Edinburgh churches and chapels there are no fewer than 5000 unoccupied seats, or sittings, as they are most frequently called; and excess of accommodation was also to be found in other parts of the kingdom. The noble and learned lord said he had no doubt, before any grant was made, that inquiry on the subject would be instituted.—The Duke of Buccleuch maintained that, however the fact might be with respect to Edinburgh, he was prepared to prove that in other parts of Scotland additional church accommodation was wanted.—In the House of Commons, on the same evening, Mr CUTLAR FERGUSSON presented four petitions from Kirkcudbrightshire, and one from Paisley, signed by 2000 persons, praying for a grant of public money to increase church accommodation in Scotland. Mr Fergusson coincided with the petitioners, and hoped the establishment would be supported.—Mr STEWART MACKENZIE presented several petitions of a similar tenor from places in Scotland.—A great number of petitions on the same subject, both pro and con., have since been presented by various members on the same subject.

—15. In reply to a question from Mr O'BRIEN, Mr SPRING RICE stated, that the evidence collected by the Irish church commissioners had been all received, and that the substance, if not the whole, would soon be laid on the table. Ministers were very anxious that there should not be one moment's needless delay.

—19. Mr WALLACE obtained leave to bring in four bills to improve the practice of the Courts of Session, Teinds, Justiciary, Sheriff, and Burgh courts; to amend the Small Debt Act, and enforce the holding of Small Debt Circuit Courts by Sheriffs; also to extend its provisions to the amount of L.10, and to abolish the arrestment of workmen's wages, and imprisonment for debt for sums under L.10. He did not feel himself called upon to enter into explanations relative to those bills, but should reserve what he had to say for another occasion.

—22. Lord JOHN RUSSELL gave notice, amidst loud cheers, that, on Monday the 1st of June, he should move for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the municipal corporations of England and Wales.

ENGLAND.

THE ELECTIONS.

THE elections consequent on the appointment of the new ministry, have been occupying the attention of the public during the adjournment of Parliament. The success of the ministerial candidates has been remarkable; out of twenty-two members who vacated their seats on taking office, the whole, with one or two exceptions, were re-elected by their constituents without opposition. The friends of the new ministry point to this fact as affording undoubted evidence of the confidence of the country in their prospective government, more especially when contrasted with the unfavourable reception experienced by their predecessors, eleven of whom were rejected by the constituencies to whom they offered their services. The Conservatives, on the other hand, allege that the heads of the new government cunningly selected only such colleagues as were almost, if not wholly, certain of being returned to Parliament; thus throwing an ostensible glare of popularity upon their party, which, generally speaking, they do not in reality possess. They likewise explain their non-opposition to the ministerial candidates by stating, that, knowing a Whig or Radical (or a coalition of the two) ministry must for the time be appointed, and believing that Lord Melbourne, Lord John Russell, and the other heads of it, would not scruple to place in office even the most democratic of the Radical party, in the event of the Conservatives successfully opposing their own more immediate party friends, they (the Conservatives) rather prefer entrusting the government to men, whose present "liberalism" will, as they anticipate, evaporate with the termination of their period of exclusion from office.

Of the English members attached to the new ministry, those who have been returned without opposition are, Sir John Hobhouse (Nottingham), Lord Howick (Northumberland), Sir Rufane Donkin (Berwick), Lord Seymour (Totness), Mr Spring Rice (Cambridge), Sir Thomas Troubridge (Sandwich), and Mr Ord (Newport). There is nothing material to record in the proceedings and speeches on the above occasions. The principal topics touched upon by the speakers were the English municipal and Irish church reforms, both of which the ministry were determined to carry through against whatever opposition. At Cambridge, Mr Spring Rice declared that he had no wish to hurry the late ministers from office. "Their own Secretary for the Treasury was not more anxious to avert the crisis, which at last ended in the breaking up of the government, than he was. He was most anxious to see them convert to reform, and bringing forward measures founded on sound principles of reform. He wished to see them in office, so that the career of reform might advance independent of all opposition; but, at the same time, it was impossible for him to sacrifice principles to keep them in." As to the support the new ministry might receive from the Radicals, Mr Rice protested that no collusive paction or compromise had taken place (as had been alleged) between these gentlemen and the government. Although Mr O'Connell might support them, the ministers were as much opposed to the repeal as ever. At Nottingham, Sir John Hobhouse hinted at the probability of a short tenure of office to himself and colleagues, and stated that they had more obstacles opposed to them than ever beset an administration. He warmly praised the conduct of the Radical members in the House of Commons, and implored union amongst reformers of all descriptions, to withstand the influence of the Court and House of Peers.

Of the English ministerial candidates whose elections were contested, the following were returned. Mr Rolfe for Falmouth, by a majority of 22 over Lord Tullamore; total voters 708. Mr Labouchere for Taunton, by a majority of 170 over Mr D'Israeli (author of several fashionable novels); total voters, 734. Lord Morpeth for West Yorkshire, by a majority of 2807 over Mr Stuart Wortley; number of voters, 13,194 (the constituency amounts in all to 18,000). Mr Poulett Thomson for Manchester, by a majority of 1366 over Mr Braidley; total voters, 5044. Mr Thomson's speeches on the hustings afforded no indication of the course to be pursued by his colleagues, and he pointedly refused to give any pledges.

The only instance of defeat sustained by a member of the new ministry, was that of Lord John Russell himself, in South Devonshire. A Mr Parker was put forward in the Conservative interest, and the struggle that ensued exceeded any thing of the kind that has yet taken place since the passing of the reform act. All that money and influence could do was exerted by the supporters of both. Liberal sums were subscribed by Mr Parker's friends (amongst others Lord Rolfe for L.1000) to defray the expenses of his canvass; but that gentleman has since declared that his own family have borne the whole expenditure. On the other hand, public subscriptions were opened in different quarters in behalf of Lord John Russell. His Westminster committee collected L.3000; Newcastle-upon-Tyne sent L.123; Taunton L.60; Cheltenham L.35; Manchester L.1000; Stroud L.100; and subscriptions were also opened in Liverpool, Cambridge, Reading, Bristol, and other places. Lord John was likewise personally assisted in his canvass by Lord Ebrington, Sir W. Molesworth, Colonel Seale, Dr Bowring, and many other gentlemen both in and out of Parliament, who went down to Devonshire for the express purpose, and the utmost confidence of success prevailed amongst his lordship's friends.

In almost all his speeches during the progress of his canvass, his lordship pointedly alluded to the Irish church question, and stated his determination to adhere to the principle of appropriating the surplus church revenues to the purposes of "general education," although "nine-tenths of the whole population of Ireland should be opposed to him." The nomination took place on Friday, May 1, in the Castle Yard of Exeter. Mr Bulteel proposed and Mr Sillifant seconded Lord J. Russell; Mr Parker was proposed by Mr Baldwin, Fulford, and seconded by Mr Henry Northcote. When Lord John Russell came forward to address the electors, he was assailed with tremendous hootings, and cries of "Who told a lie?" "The bishop's coming?" "How's your friend the Pope?" Lord John stated his determination to have a hearing, if he staid till sunset. The sheriff in vain endeavoured to procure silence. At length Sir Thomas Dyke Acland (a supporter of Mr Parker) came forward, and the crowd listened to him. He made a brief but manly appeal to their better feelings and sense of justice, which produced the desired effect; and Lord John, after thanking the sheriff, and especially Sir Thomas Acland, for the interference in his behalf, was allowed to proceed, though at intervals he met with much interruption. He defended his recent conduct in Parliament, and stated the principles on which he accepted office, especially in reference to corporation and Irish church reform. In allusion to the charge of his truckling to Mr O'Connell, he denied that he had acceded to any measure detrimental to the interests of the country (including repeal of the Union) to purchase that gentleman's support, which, however, he would always be proud to receive. Mr Parker spoke briefly, but with much energy and effect. He avowed himself an enemy to the spoliation of the church, and attributed the insubordination of Ireland to that system of taxation which the Whigs encouraged. He would give no pledges as to particular votes, and had no panacea for agricultural distress, but would support a fair commutation of tithes. He placed no confidence in a majority in which Mr O'Connell's little finger was heavier than all the rest of the government. At the conclusion of the first day's poll the numbers were: for Lord John 2738; for Mr Parker 3372; majority for the latter 634. At the final close the numbers were:—Parker 3745; Lord John 3117; majority for Parker 628. (The number of registered voters was 8100.) Lord John did not attend at the declaration of the numbers, nor did any one appear for him: but an address was circulated by him, in which he attributed his defeat "to the effects of intimidation and undue influence to the temporary alarm on weak minds, caused by the revival of the cry of 'No Popery'; to the advantage gained by misrepresentation and slander among the ill-informed; and lastly, to the great industry displayed by my opponents in registering their friends and dependents." The chairing of Mr Parker is described as being a singularly magnificent spectacle; upwards of two hundred carriages, and troops of farmers and others on horseback, decorated with flags and ribbons, and attended with bands of music, attended that gentleman from the hustings, and paraded through the town of Exeter.

As soon as Lord John's defeat was known, offers of a seat were made to him by various members of constituencies, both in England and Scotland; amongst others, by the electors of the Cupar district of burghs—a majority of whom had previously signed a requisition to their sitting member, Mr Johnston, requiring him to resign. After considerable hesitation, his lordship at length accepted the offer of Colonel B. (his Majesty's son-in-law) to vacate his seat for the borough of Stroud in his favour. He was accordingly introduced to the electors by the colonel on May 1, and returned on the 19th without opposition.

In Scotland, the whole eight members appertaining to the ministry were returned without opposition, with the exception of the Lord Advocate (Mr Murray) of Leith, who was opposed by Admiral Sir David Milne. After the first day's polling, however, the latter was tired, having not the slightest chance of success. Lord John Campbell was re-elected for Edinburgh in his absence. As a partial set-off against this success, the ministerial candidates in Scotland, the representation of the county of Inverness has fallen into the hands of the Conservative party. The late member, Mr Charles Grant, having been raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Glenelg, Mr Grant of Glenmorrison came forward as his successor in the Whig interest, and was opposed by Chisholm of Chisholm, a Conservative. After a severe contest, the latter was returned by a majority of 28.

In Ireland, the new Solicitor and Attorney Generals were re-elected: the former without opposition, the latter by a large majority.

LIBERAL REGISTRATION CLUB.

MAY 21. Between two and three hundred gentlemen, connected with the Liberal party, held a meeting at the British Coffeehouse in Cockspur Street, for the purpose of establishing a reform association or comprehensive plan. The venerable reformer, Mr Coke of Norfolk, having been called to the chair, Lord Ebrington, after some prefatory remarks, moved a series of resolutions for the formation of the association, with general committee and sub-committee finance, &c. The resolutions state, that the object of the association should be strictly limited to obtain information of the numbers and other circumstances connected with the local constituencies; to procure knowledge of the organisation and rules of all existing local societies for the registration of voters; to promote the formation of associations for registration in every county and town, and in parishes and

On Monday, May 11, a public dinner was given in honour of Sir Robert, in the Merchant Tailors' Hall, London, originating with a great body of the merchants, bankers, and traders, in the metropolis. About 400 individuals were present, the hall being completely filled; and so great was the demand for tickets of admission, that the issue of them was obliged to be stopped many days before the festival took place. Mr John Masterman was in the chair; and among the company, besides Sir Robert himself, were the Duke of Wellington, Marquis Camden, the Earl of Aberdeen, Earl de Grey, Viscount Sandon, Viscount Canterbury, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Wharcliffe, Lord Abinger, Lord F. Egerton, Lord Ashburton, the Lord Mayor, the Right Hon. Sir J. Beckett, Bart. M.P.; the Right Hon. Sir George Clerk, Bart.; the Right Hon. Sir H. Hardinge, K.C.B.; the Right Hon. F. Shaw, M.P.; the Right Hon. G. R. Dawson; the Right Hon. W. Yates Peel, M.P.; W. O. Gore, Esq. M.P.; J. H. Palmer, Esq. late Governor of the Bank, &c. After the usual loyal and patriotic toasts being given and responded to, the chairman proposed the toast of the evening in a speech highly flattering to their guest, in the course of which he stated that he had been deputed to present an address to Sir Robert, signed by 8450 of the principal bankers, merchants, and others, of London. Sir Robert, after expressing his total inadequacy, considering the circumstances in which he was placed, to express his sense of their kindness, said that he considered it not so much in the light of a compliment to himself, as a demonstration of public principle, from which, considering the quarter whence it proceeded, he augured the most beneficial consequences. He considered that their assembling there that day was a pledge of their determination to support the ancient institutions of the country, and to maintain those principles, which were interwoven with the safety of those institutions, and the security of prosperity in this empire. He understood that it was in some degree incumbent upon them to come forth in this manner, because they did not happen to have any publicly recognised organ through whom their sentiments could be expressed. (Loud cheers.) When he considered that that great meeting, abounding in wealth, intelligence, and respectability, had not one single member out of the eighteen allotted for the metropolitan districts, to represent its opinions, he certainly confessed himself something astonished. (Cheers and laughter.) The hall had been taxed to the utmost extent of its accommodation, and if there had been room for ten times a greater number of gentlemen within these walls, they should have had them present. And yet they and their friends had not the good fortune to secure a single representative through whom their just and legitimate influence could be exercised. After some general remarks about his late and present position, Sir Robert proceeded to say there was no greater mistake than that people situated as he was, were so very anxious for office. There was to him nothing in office abstractedly to compensate for its labours and inconveniences, its annoyance, and its deep anxieties. That office holds out great advantages to the ambitious mind, he would not deny; but are there not without office, equal if not greater means of distinction in public life? For himself, in taking office, he was urged by nothing but a sense of public duty, and from the desire to serve his king when called upon, to the utmost of his ability and power. (Loud cheers.) The chief advantage, perhaps, arising to him from office was, that he had had the good fortune of being connected, in civil life, with that great man whose fame exceeded that of any other conqueror—(cheers)—a man from whom he (Sir Robert) never had been separated by any difference on political subjects, and with whom his connection never had been embittered by the slightest touch of paltry jealousy—(loud cheers)—and if he hoped that, connected as he had been with him in civil appointments, he should have the happiness to have his name transmitted with his (the duke's) to after ages, it would be the chief pride, the dearest gratification of his heart. (Great cheering.) Sir Robert then proceeded to allude to the present state of the political world, and observed, "In one word, I say to you there is at present great danger to the institutions of this country—danger to the form of government under which we have lived and prospered. But it is in your power, and that of those who think with you, and fill your situations in the country, to avert the danger. (Continued cheers.) It is in your power, by exertion, and by the exercise of those functions which the constitution has left to you, to mitigate, if not altogether to remove, the evil. (Loud cheers.) My opinion is, that the danger can be only met by your gaining an effectual influence in the popular branch of the legislature. (Hear, hear.) We shall only aggravate the evil if we attempt to deceive ourselves. Let us not indulge in any useless lamentations. Let us waste no time in regretting that which is beyond our remedy. (Cheers.) But if we cease to take a desponding view of public affairs, all will yet be well. Act like Englishmen; and if you will only do so, I am confident the country will be rescued from the dangers by which it is at present so closely enveloped. I warn you that you must not place a firm reliance upon the prerogative of the crown—on the influence or authority of the House of Lords. The prerogative of the one, the authority of the other, are constitutionally potent in controlling the powers of the lower house; but you must not now-a-days depend upon them as bulwarks which are impassable, and which can be committed without apprehension to the storm and struggle of events. The government of the country, and the mode in which it is conducted, allow me to tell you, must mainly depend upon the constitution of the House of Commons. I again say the royal prerogative, the authority of the House of Lords, are most useful, nay, necessary, in our mixed and balanced constitution. But you must not strain those powers. I ask you, then, to take means to assert in the House of Commons those principles which we believe to be just, and to exercise that authority to which you are fairly entitled." Sir Robert proceeded to remark, that he took office with the avowed determination of abiding by the reform bill; and acting upon that principle, he felt bound to resign, when he decidedly found a majority of the House of Commons hostile to him. "Allow me then," he continued, "to recommend you all, in common with myself, to refrain from flattering ourselves with any distant hope of altering the present system—let us not seem to threaten, even in thought, those who have acquired new rights with the forfeiture of that acquisition. (Cheers.) Let us stand by the constitution as it exists at present. (Cheers.) Let us never hint at alteration, or raise a secret doubt by our conduct, even in the minds of the most suspicious. I may venture to prophesy to you that the first proposition for change will come from the other side—(great and continued cheering)—from those who were themselves the authors of that reform bill. (Great cheering.) Ay, it will come from them, and the moment, perhaps, is not far distant—the moment they have ascertained the bill is not likely to answer the purposes they had in view—the moment they see it is not potent to exclude the influence of what we call Conservative principles. (Continued cheering.) Allow me to say to you, gentlemen, that your duty will be to use every means to regain your influence in the House of Commons, not, as your enemies would say, by bribery and corruption, but by going forth and giving a frank exposition of your principles—and by showing there is nothing selfish in your support of institutions under which we all live, and the rights which we all enjoy—that we are not interested in the maintenance of any abuse—that we hold that no public office ought to be maintained for the purpose of patronage—that we want no salaries no more amount of salary for the reward of public men than that which may be sufficient to integrity and competence in the discharge of their official duties—(cheers)—that we are separated by any line of internal demarcation, from the misgovernment of the country. (Cheers.) Why, who are nine-tenths of those who are here one should tell us that we have an interest separate from those of the middling classes of society? (Cheers.) Speaking in behalf of nine-tenths of those assembled within these walls, I say we disclaim any separation from the middling classes of society in this country—(loud cheers)—and if circumstances may appear to have elevated us above them, to what, I venture to ask, is that elevation in our case owing? (Cheers.) Either on our own part or on the part of our immediate forefathers. It is owing to nothing else but to the exercise of those qualities of diligence, the love of order, of industry, of integrity—(cheers)—which secure to every member of the middle classes of society the opportunities of elevation and distinction in this great community—(cheers); and it is because we stand in our present situation—it is because we owe our elevation in society to those qualities to which I have alluded, and because we feel that the same elevation may still be secured by the same means, that we feel our interests identified with theirs, and, by the blessing of God, are determined to keep open to them those same avenues that have been opened to ourselves. (Loud and continued cheering.) Gentlemen, while on this subject, will you allow me to recall to your recollection what was the grand charge against myself—that the king had sent to Rome for the 'son of a cotton-spinner,' in order to make him Prime Minister of England. (Cheers.) Did I feel that denomination by any means a reflection on me? Did that make me at all discontented with the state of the laws and institutions of the country? No. But does it not make me, and ought it not to make you, gentlemen, do all you can to reserve to other sons of other cotton-spinners—(loud cheers)—the same opportunities, by the same system of laws under which this country has so long flourished, of arriving by the same honourable means at the like distinction? (Loud cheers.) We are charged with having interest in the perpetuation of abuses, and as fattening on the public income. Looking to this company, and to those associated with it in feeling, I say we have a direct, a superior interest to any other body in the nation, in the correction of every abuse and the application of every just and economical remedy; but, consistently with those feelings, we do not disguise our firm resolution to maintain to the utmost of our power the limited monarchy of this country—(cheers)—to respect the rights of every branch of the legislature—(cheers)—to maintain inviolate the united church of England and Ireland—(loud cheers)—to maintain it as a predominant establishment—meaning by predominance, not the denial of civil rights to other classes of the community, but maintaining it in the possession of its property and of all its just privileges, and that we will not permit the ancient institutions of this country—(cheers)—our limited monarchy, to be changed by specious propositions of reform—(loud cheers)—into a democratic republic. (Loud cheers.) Now, gentlemen, that is what I apprehend by Conservative principles; and we tell all, in whatever class of life they may be, that they have as deep an interest in the maintenance of those principles as any of the politicians or men of property who are now within my hearing. (Cheers.) The encouragement of industry depends on the maintenance of those principles. (Cheers.) The preservation of order depends on this not less than the maintenance of that security which has hitherto led men through honest industry to accumulate property in this country." (Loud cheering.) Sir Robert then proceeded to advise a cordial and active co-operation amongst all who cherished these principles, with the view of regaining a predominant influence in the legislature. They might differ on minor points, but he hoped they all agreed in one—that the reform bill should not be made a platform from which a battery may be directed against the institutions of the country. In conclusion, he entreated them to recollect the associations connected with the place where they were assembled. From that place a voice issued in 1793, which enabled the ministers of the day to check the contagion of democratic and French principles, then in their rage. (Cheers.) "I call on you to remember the motto under which you are assembled, Concordia parva res crescit: however little your influence now may be, by firm union, by determined perseverance, you will yet be enabled to overcome all difficulties, and rally around you a thousand arms to fight in the same cause. (Loud cheers.) Proclaim to the country, from this the centre of the metropolis, that, entertaining principles of moderation, you still will stand by the ancient walls, the ancient landmarks of the constitution—(cheers)—that you will rally round the monarchy, and protect it in its just prerogatives, protect the independent exercise of the authority of the House of Lords—(loud cheers)—and maintain firm and inviolable the rights of the established church. (Cheers.) You will stand by, in the emphatic language of acts of Parliament, the Protestant government and Protestant religion of this country. (Cheers.) Elevating that voice, maintaining those principles, as I must contend, so moderate, so just, so necessary, so essential, depend upon it the voice you are called upon to utter from every part of this country, from the heart of this great corporate community, through every artery of this empire." (The right hon. Baronet Lord and long-protracted cheering.) The Duke of Wellington being next engaged and received, and briefly acknowledged, Sir Robert Peel gave their chair-man's health, in a highly complimentary speech, during which he impressed on the meeting the present indispensable duty of "registering their votes; to postpone all private feeling, and local and personal interest to the public good; and to appear at the hustings, boldly, manfully, and uncompromisingly, and tender their votes in the cause of right and order. That was the real and the only effectual way in which they could enforce their principles." None of the other toasts or speeches of the evening demand notice.

Since the above meeting, deputations from the respective parishes of Mary-le-bone and Westminster have waited on Sir Robert to invite him to similar public entertainments; but he has declined both, on the score of its being improper to contribute to any sort of political excitement during the sitting of Parliament.

POLITICAL DUELLING.

Our readers will recollect that, in the Parliamentary summary in our May number, we noticed, in our account of the proceedings in the House of Peers, certain interrogatories put to Lord Melbourne (upon the latter announcing his re-accession to the Premiership) by Lord Alvanley, touching the "terms" said to have been come to with Mr O'Connell by the new ministry, with the view of obtaining the powerful aid of that gentleman, and which Lord Alvanley concluded by remarking, that "it was beyond all power of human credulity to believe that he would not oppose the present government, unless he received an equivalent for his forbearance." On the 20th April, Mr O'Connell, in the Commons, said, "The bloated buffoon, who had talked of them as he did, might learn the distinction between independent men and those whose votes were not worth purchasing, even if they were in the market." Subsequently to Mr O'Connell's departure for Dublin, Lord Alvanley enclosed a letter, dated at Clefen, to be forwarded by his friend, Colonel Damer, to Mr O'Connell at Dublin, in which the following occurs:—"I am aware that you assume a right of insulting with impunity, and I can hardly hope that you will make an exception in my favour by doing that which every other gentleman would do, and giving satisfaction where you have offered insult; I however give you the option of doing so." Colonel Damer, having inclosed this and forwarded it on the 22d, and having then ascertained Mr O'Connell's arrival in Dublin on the 26th, and received no answer on the 28th, wrote to him again on that day. Still not hearing, Lord Alvanley, on May 2, addressed a letter to the members of Brookes's, in which, having stated a part of the above circumstances, he appealed to the society:—"Having, therefore, tried those means to obtain redress which are customary amongst gentlemen, I now appeal to the only tribunal of men of honour to which we are both amenable; and have, therefore, sent a requisition, already signed by several members of the club, requesting the members to call a general meeting, to take the case into consideration." In answer to this appeal, the following requisition and names immediately appeared:—"London, May 2. We, the undersigned members of Brookes's Club, request the managers to call a general meeting as soon as possible, to consider a statement that will be made to it of Mr O'Connell's conduct to Lord Alvanley, both being members of the club. Alvanley, Seston, De Ros, H. Gally Knight, Argyll, Jersey, Tankerville, Stanley, C. C. Greville, Willoughby de Eresby, T. S. Duncombe, C. Standish, H. Baillie, C. St John Fancourt, R. Errington, Villiers, W. H. Irby, Norfolk, J. S. Hippisley, R. W. Bulkeley, M. W. Ridley, J. R. Graham, G. Anson, Lichfield." This was on Saturday. On Sunday, 3d of May, Lord Alvanley enclosed the requisition to the managers, and received an answer from them on the same day, signed as below, stating that "it would be inconsistent with the practice, and contrary to the established rules, to take cognisance of differences of a private nature between members of the club, and therefore decline to call a general meeting in compliance with the above requisition. Duncannon, Albemarle, John Byng, Edw. Blount, Edw. Ellice, R. C. Ferguson. Brookes's, May 3, 1835." The next step in the matter was taken by Mr Morgan O'Connell, who, on Monday the 4th, delivered to Lord Alvanley, by his friend Col. Hodges, a letter, in which, having stated the principal circumstances in the transaction glanced at above, he continues to say, "It is now quite evident that your object, and that of those with whom you act, was by no means that of obtaining the satisfaction which one gentleman may have a right to demand from another. Your object, in fact, in thus publicly parading your willingness to fight, was quite clearly neither more nor less than that of casting a stigma on my father, on the party of which I am one, and so, through us, to cast discredit on the measures we advocate, and on the government of whom we are the supporters." In conclusion, Mr Morgan O'Connell writes—"I have considered you the most fitting medium through whom to convey this succinct narrative to the public; but not, I confess, in the vain hope of inducing a man whom I sincerely believe to have been appropriately designated by my father, and who, moreover, has been deliberately guilty, as I must conceive you to be, of this utterly ungentlemanlike and braggadocio mode of carrying on party warfare; not, I repeat, in the vain hope of its inducing you to give me satisfaction, or to call upon me for a meeting." A meeting was the immediate result of this letter—of which two accounts have appeared from the two seconds on the occasion, not, however, materially differing, except in one point. After the parties were on the ground, Colonel Hodges "thought it his duty to declare that he was ready to recommend to his friend (Mr Morgan O'Connell) to receive an apology from Lord Alvanley. Colonel Damer replied, that Lord Alvanley came there to convince Mr Morgan O'Connell that he was ready to put matters to that test which Mr Morgan O'Connell had intimated that Lord Alvanley was unwilling to do; Colonel Damer then offered a paper to Colonel Hodges, protesting against the proceeding of Mr Morgan O'Connell, and disputing his right to interfere. Colonel Hodges refused to receive the protest, and denied its admissibility. The ground was then measured at twelve paces." We shall now quote the accounts referring to the point of difference we have already touched on. "It was agreed," says Colonel Hodges, "that Colonel Damer should give the word, and that it should be, 'Ready, fire!' The parties were placed—the pistols were delivered. Colonel Damer gave the words, and Mr M. O'Connell fired. Lord Alvanley did not fire, and exclaimed that he thought the words were only given by way of preparation, and claimed the right to fire. Colonel Damer agreed with Lord Alvanley, but Colonel Hodges protested against such interpretation being attached to the words, and insisted that Lord Alvanley, having omitted his opportunity, should not fire." Colonel Damer, on the other hand, relates the matter thus:—"Colonel Hodges and myself agreed that I should give the signal to fire, and that it should be, 'Make ready! fire!' I was proceeding to instruct the gentlemen concerned as to the signals that were to be their guide, and had said, Gentlemen, I shall use the following word, 'Make ready! fire!' when Mr O'Connell thinking that I had given the signal, through mistake discharged his pistol. I had then a short discussion with Colonel Hodges as to the light in which that shot was to be considered, when Lord Alvanley desired me to withdraw the right I conceived he had to return the fire." The shots were afterwards ineffectually exchanged, and Colonel Damer declaring that Lord Alvanley had proved to Mr M. O'Connell that he was ready to meet him, waded him off the ground." "After the parties had left the ground," says Colonel Hodges, "Lord Alvanley told Mr Morgan O'Connell, that although he (Lord Alvanley) had not fired on the first shot, he was convinced that Mr Morgan O'Connell had not taken any sort of advantage, and had acted with perfect fairness." This last circumstance was also stated by Colonel Damer. Here terminated the matter betwixt Lord Alvanley and Mr Morgan O'Connell;—when Mr O'Connell senior again came on the ground. On the very day of the above meeting, Colonel Damer received an epistle from the latter, dated Merriem Square, Dublin, May 1, in which he acknowledges the receipt of Colonel Damer's letters, but serves, "Your first letter is indeed dated the 22d April, but was not put into the London Post-office till the 24th, and could not reach me here before the 29th." He then makes some facetious remarks about the "unvalorous absurdity of Lord Alvanley sending him a challenge, considering his (Mr O'Connell's) 'sentiments on that subject have been so publicly and frequently proclaimed' (alluding to his vow against duelling, since his fatal success in a duel, an action of that nature some years ago), he adds, 'But there is really a serious view of the subject, which I do believe, my duty to take: it is this—that these letters are a distinct breach of privilege. It seems to me, at present, that I am bound to treat them as such. If I continue to think so, I will bring them to the attention of the House of Commons accordingly. As to the matter, I have no hesitation to tell you that I treat it as the most sovereign contempt, as a practice inconsistent with common sense, but, above all, as a violation of the palpable of the divine law.' To this letter Colonel Damer replied, May 5, by affirming that he put his (Colonel Damer's) letter of May 21st to Mr O'Connell in the letter-box of the Travellers' Club-room before 10 o'clock on the 22d, and therefore requesting Mr O'Connell to return him the envelope enclosing it, that he might ascertain how the delay in its being forwarded came about."

Mr O'Connell's answer is as follows:—"Merriem Square, May 8. Sir, As you have been pleased to publish my last letter to me before I could possibly reply to it, I am under all the existing circumstances, decline altogether (but without intending any personal offence) any further correspondence of any kind on the subject contained in any of your former letters. I have the honour to be, &c. Colonel Damer forwarded the above to the Times, enclosed in a note which begins thus:—"Upper Grosvenor Street, Tuesday, May 12. Sir, Mr O'Connell having closed his correspondence with me, I beg you to be good enough to insert his answer to my letter, requiring of him the envelope of the one which I put in the post on the 22d of April, and which he affirmed to have borne the post-mark of the 27th, and to have been received by him on the 29th. As he is particular in dates, I take this method of informing him that his letter of the 8th of May was put into the post on the 10th; and that the cover, which I had fortunately preserved, bears the Dublin post-mark of that day."

Here, for the present, rested the dissension between Lord Alvanley and Mr O'Connell; but the latter, during the transaction of the foregoing matters, gave offence in another quarter, which nearly led his son to a similar perilous predicament with that above stated. Mr Benjamin D'Israeli the younger, author of "Vivian Grey," &c. having, while addressing the electors of Tottenham, on the 28th April, spoken of Mr O'Connell as "traitor," upon the authority, as he remarked, of "Whigs whom he (O'Connell) now supported; the lie in retaliation, while addressing the New Franchise Association in Dublin on May 2, spoke of Mr D'Israeli as "a fellow whose conduct had never been equalled in the annals of political turpitude for downright blackguardism. This miscreant," he continued, "is a liar in action and in word; in his life he is a living lie. If such a creature as this shall be tolerated amongst gentlemen, England must be degraded by allowing a creature like this—a most depraved of his species and his kind—a creature so atrocious, so vile, and so selfish a character, to have any intercourse with the virtuous and respectable portion of her sons." Mr O'Connell concluded by saying, "As this D'Israeli's genealogy been traced up, he has no doubt he would be found the true heir-at-law of that penitent thief who atoned for his crimes on the cross. I now had done with D'Israeli, and forgave this heir-at-law of the blasphemous thief." In consequence of this speech Mr D'Israeli wrote to Mr Morgan O'Connell, observing that, as the latter "had established himself

er's champion," he (Mr D'Israeli) requested him "to give him his vicarious duties," and yield satisfaction for the attack on his character. To this Mr Morgan O'Connell replied, "I deny your right to call upon me to be present instance, and I am not answerable for what my father may say. I called on Lord Alvanley for satisfaction, because I conceived he had purposely insulted my father, by calling a meeting at Brookes's for the purpose of expelling him the club, he being at the time absent in Ireland." Mr D'Israeli then tells Mr Morgan O'Connell that he feels it his duty to publish the correspondence, and afterwards writes a letter to Mr O'Connell himself, in the columns of the Times, dated May 6, mentioning in the most severe terms upon that gentleman's political character and conduct. Mr D'Israeli also writes to Mr Morgan O'Connell on the same day, in which he says, "I deduce from your communication that you do not consider yourself responsible for any insults red by your father, but only bound to resent the insults that he may receive. Now, sir, it is my hope that you will not be so; assuredly it was my intention to do so. I shall take every opportunity of holding your father's name up to public contempt; and I fervently pray that, if some one of his blood, may attempt to avenge the distinguishable hatred with which I shall pursue his existence." To this Mr Morgan O'Connell, on May 7, simply replies, "Your letter of the 5th instant, in which you declare that you 'did not intend to convey to me any personal insult,' followed by a publication of which you gave notice, induced me to think that the matter was closed between us. The tenor of your last letter is such that it is impossible for me to renew the correspondence." Nothing further has taken place betwixt any of the different parties—nor is there likely to be any, as we observe that Mr D'Israeli and Messrs Maurice and John O'Connell have since been bound over to keep the peace. Alluding to the circumstances above detailed, the Spectator observes, "Every body professes to disapprove of duelling. It is admitted to be an absurd mode of settling disputes; but it is nevertheless one to which persons who are in a certain rank of society feel themselves compelled to resort; and they who declaim most philosophically against the practice are as likely as others to submit to it when the time of trial arrives. We are all slaves in a greater or less degree to the tyrant custom; and experience has proved that no considerations of religion, or utility, or regard to the law of the land, are sufficiently powerful to induce the generality of mankind to brave the censure of society, even though that censure is felt acknowledged to be unjust. As long, therefore, as a man is 'cut and sneered at by his former associates on account of a refusal to send or accept a challenge under circumstances which are commonly supposed to call for a proceeding, duels will continue to be fought. The time will be put an end to when it becomes ridiculous to such a mode of obtaining 'satisfaction' is laughed at as its absurdity—and not before." We are inclined to a more serious view of this "tyrant custom" than the Spectator, and hold, that if duelling be, as it is, a transgression equally against divine and human laws, it is the duty of a government to punish it as such. To look on it as indirectly to sanction it, thus recognising the existence of a foolish and criminal habit as of superior consideration to the direct injunctions of God.

On 24. An action, brought by Mr Nugee, the fashionable tailor in St James's Street, against Mr Grant, a Jew of Sir Colquhoun Grant, was tried in the Bail Court on Thursday. The ground of the action was the payment by the defendant of a bill for clothes furnished him in the summer of 1832, amounting to £16s. 6d. Mr Grant was under age when the clothes were bought, and son of a surgeon at Burmah in the East Indies. Among the items in the bill were charges of twelve guineas for a blue cloth cloak, and in the charge one guinea for rich neck lines tassels; two pounds fourteen shillings a pair for trousers; six guineas for each coat, &c.; and it appeared in the course of six months the plaintiff had ordered and received six coats, seven waistcoats, and ten pairs of trousers. Mr Stultz and Mr Story, also fashionable tailors, proved that the charges were rather below than above the mark. Mr Justice Williams said that the first time the land would not have thought of ordering a quantity of clothes, in so short a time, and at such a price; and the jury by their verdict cut down the tailor's bill to £7s. 10d.

On 28, 29. A grand festival of no less than seventeen temperance societies in the towns and villages round Eton (Yorkshire), was held. The vast body of members arrived on the appointed ground in succession, headed by a banner, presented a most interesting and imposing spectacle. At 12 o'clock on Monday (28th), the church was filled by the temperance societies. Several highly interesting speeches were delivered on the subsequent occasions (in the evening, and on Tuesday, both in the morning and evening), by Mr Gough, E. Parsons of Leeds, Pollard, agent of the Temperance Society, and Livesey, Anderton (the temperance poet), and Swindlehurst (King of the Reformed Guards), all of Preston. Striking pictures from real life drawn of the evils of intemperance, and of the progress resulting from moderation, but especially from abstinence; which was shown to have been remarkably beneficial to the health of sawyers, pressers, and engaged in the more laborious and exhausting occupations. In a field near the church, a splendidly decorated booth, forty-five yards by eighteen, had been erected, down which seven rows of tables were ranged. In the afternoon of Monday, one thousand four hundred persons sat down together to tea, and were succeeded by another thousand one hundred, who in their turn were fed by two hundred. Mirth and cheerfulness pervaded the vast assemblage; and, when morally considered, any night could be of equal interest with that which passed on this occasion. Next day the proceedings continued; a prayer meeting and a public meeting were held, and tea was again partaken of by an immense number of individuals. The same evening the festival terminated.—Leeds Mercury.

— 30. The Venus steamboat left the Steam Packet Wharf, St Katharine's Dock, with from 230 to 240 female emigrants, to take their passage on board the ship Canton, for Sydney. The emigrants were for the most part fine healthy looking girls, some of them of exceedingly interesting appearance, and almost of a class much above that in which the distress which prompts to emigration might be supposed to exist.

— 11. Two steam-boilers exploded at Messrs Ring and Vicar's sugar-house, at the bottom of Ford Street, Vauxhall Road, Liverpool. Such was the force of the explosion, that it carried away the whole roof of the building, blew down the newly erected chimney, which fell upon a house occupied by Mr Acton, his wife, and servant; and carrying with it the roof, floors, furniture, bedding, &c. to the bottom rooms. In one of these, Mr Acton was sitting with his wife, and a friend who had just called upon him. The latter was killed, by the accumulated weight of bricks and rubbish falling upon him; but Mr Acton and his family escaped with trifling injuries. Four men engaged on the premises of Messrs Ring and Vicar, one of whom was the engineer, were also killed. The cause of the accident was the trial of a new boiler, which exploded from inability to bear the pressure of the steam with which it was charged. Immediately after the first explosion, a second took place of the old boiler, occasioned by the concussion, and by the falling materials heaped upon it by the first shock.

Since the accession of the Melbourne ministry, the Right Hon. Charles Grant has been raised to the Peerage, by the title of Lord Glenelg of Glenelg; the Right Hon. It is stated that Sir Edward Sugden, late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, has declined accepting the retiring pension, to which he was thereby entitled, and means to resume his practice at the English bar, but only as a chamber counsel. From the testimony of all parties, Whig, Tory, and Radical, Sir Edward seems to be considered the ablest, as well as the most popular, Chancellor that ever presided at the Irish bar.

Some days ago, a very numerous deputation, from the nine parishes of Westminster, waited by appointment on Mr Spring Rice, Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the purpose of pressing on the right hon. gentleman the propriety of abolishing the window-tax. The deputation were received with great courtesy, but Mr Rice gave them no prospect of any immediate repeal.

Tumults have broken out in Bedfordshire and other districts, amongst the peasantry, occasioned by the detestation felt at the working of the new poor-law bill. They have since been quelled without difficulty. There have been several incendiary fires lately in Essex, Sussex, Huntingdonshire, Warwickshire, and Somersetshire; and a number of persons have been apprehended on suspicion of being concerned in them.

It seems probable that the "silent system," which has so long been in operation in America, will soon be universally adopted in Great Britain, from the success of the first experiment of this sort, made by orders of Sir Robert Peel's ministry—or rather, as is stated, upon the suggestion of the Duke of Wellington. At the close of the Middlesex adjourned session lately, the foreman said that he was instructed by his colleagues, who had visited the House of Correction, to express their admiration of the cleanly appearance of the prison and its inmates, but most of all at the excellent discipline which prevailed. The rule for prohibiting conversation amongst the prisoners seemed to them to be calculated to produce the most beneficial results. The chairman said he was happy to hear a jury approving of that system, which was the best mode of punishment ever adopted. It prevented the contamination of juvenile delinquents by older and more hardened offenders, and had already had the effect of reducing the number of prisoners.

The William Rodger, of Glasgow, a large ship of the first class, carrying nearly 1000 tons measurement, has arrived at Bristol, direct from China, with a cargo of upwards of 11,000 packages (nearly 10,000 chests) of sorted teas. This is the first tea-ship that ever entered the port of Bristol.

IRELAND.

On Monday, May 11, the new viceroy of Ireland, Earl Mulgrave, made his public entry into Dublin with circumstances of extraordinary splendour. He landed at Kingstown, from the Lightning steam-packet, about eleven forenoon. Many thousand persons on the pier received him with loud acclamations. The Duke of Leinster, Lord Cloncurry, the Earl of Leitrim, and several other noblemen, welcomed his arrival. About half-past twelve, Lady Mulgrave entered one of Lord Haddington's carriages, which was sent to receive her; the viceroy mounted his horse, and moved towards Dublin, a cavalcade of more than five thousand persons following him.

The inhabitants of Kingstown had erected three triumphal arches, thrown over the principal street leading to Dublin, decorated with green boughs and festoons of flowers, through which the cortege passed at a very slow pace, the windows being filled with well-dressed ladies, who wore green and blue favours, and waved their handkerchiefs as the viceroy's carriage passed along the town. On entering Black Rock, his excellency was met by an immense cavalcade of well-dressed and comfortable farmers, wearing sashes, and bearing wands surmounted with green ribbons. On arriving at Merriem, about three miles from town, the procession was joined by the several members of the trades of Dublin, bearing banners, flags, &c. splendidly ornamented. They took their places in regular order in rear of the procession. When his excellency reached Ball's (now denominated Mulgrave) Bridge, the ceremony of giving a name to that beautiful structure was performed by Lord Mulgrave, amidst the enthusiastic cheers of the people, in which Lady Mulgrave and the military officers present most heartily joined. Shortly after, the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, with some of the civic officers, made their appearance, and proceeded in advance of his excellency to town. For some hours before the procession had reached the city, the streets leading to the Castle were lined with military, who preserved excellent order, and appeared on the most good-humoured terms with the people. The trades marched four abreast in regular military order, with the standards and insignia of their craft, besides other flags bearing inscriptions appropriate to the occasion, such as "Welcome Mulgrave," "Cead Mille Failte" (the national welcome), "Ireland gives her rulers a fair trial," &c. There were also others of the "Repeal" character (see Parliamentary summary). A correspondent of the Times says, "One of the most remarkable features about the procession was the entire absence of the Conservative aristocracy." It is also said that the unusually splendid display of popular welcome to the viceroy was chiefly promoted by Mr O'Connell. On reaching the statue of King William in College Green, one fellow contrived to mount on the head, and having seated himself there, waved a green bough, and cried out lustily, as his excellency was passing, "Ireland for ever!" at which he laughed heartily. The day was, from the time of quitting Kingstown until the arrival of the noble earl at the Castle, very propitious. Shortly after two o'clock, a rocket was sent up at the Castle as the signal of his excellency's having been sworn into office, and immediately twenty guns fired a royal salute in Phoenix Park.

The Irish Anti-Tory Association was dissolved on Thursday, April 30, on the motion of Mr O'Connell; the object for which it was established, namely, the ejection of the Tory ministers, having been effected. A new society, called the Franchise Association, was then formed; and Mr O'Connell declared himself an advocate of poor laws for Ireland, as a means of compelling the landlords to support the tenantry whom they turned adrift for using their political franchise with independence. He has at the same time published a long letter to the "People of Ireland," in which he states he has tendered to the Melbourne ministry his "unbought, unpurchaseable, unconditional support," and without having "made terms or stipulations with them." He then explains at great length his reasons for doing so, and enumerates the benefits he expects from the new ministers, which are these:—1st, That the power and insolence of the fell Orange faction must instantly cease; 2d, The country will cease to be governed by its enemies; 3d, The alien landlord will be banished; 4th, The land will be reclaimed; 5th, The people of Ireland will be enabled to govern themselves; 6th, The great mass of the population will be enabled to live in peace and determination.

tion of the country; 7th, That the present ministers are publicly and most unequivocally pledged to a thorough reform of all corporate abuses.

There are many other benefits, he says, to be derived to Ireland from the present ministry, and proposes giving the Union another trial under them; "but if," he concludes, "the experiment fails, why then we will demand 'the repeal' in a voice of thunder, and we shall be joined in that cry by all the rational and honest politicians in Great Britain. Thus, then, either the repeal will be rendered unnecessary—which I candidly own is not my own opinion, though it is that of myriads of men of intelligence and integrity—the repeal will either be rendered unnecessary, or its imperative and inevitable necessity will be demonstrated, and then the repeal will be certain."

SCOTLAND.

April 27. At a Court of Justiciary, constituted for the purpose, the Right Hon. John Archibald Murray took the oaths on his re-appointment as Lord Advocate of Scotland, and produced a commission, appointing J. Shaw Stewart, Graham Spiers, George Napier, and Cosmo Innes, Esqrs. to be Advocates-Depute.

May 7. A pint of young potatoes, the first of the season, sold in Edinburgh green-market for 10s.

—8. A great public meeting of the "bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and other inhabitants of Glasgow, cordially approving of His Majesty's most gracious declaration of his desire to extend the benefits of religious instruction, in connection with the established church of Scotland, to the poorer classes of society in that part of the united kingdom," pursuant to a published requisition subscribed by upwards of one thousand of the most influential gentlemen in the city, was held in the Trades' Hall, Glassford Street, Baillie Gilmore in the chair. Many other public meetings of a similar, as well as an opposite, disposition, have been held in different parts of Scotland within the last month. It would be as superfluous as impossible to give any outline of their proceedings.

—9. The equestrian statue of Charles II., which originally graced the Parliament Square, Edinburgh, was replaced in its former position, amid a considerable concourse of spectators; and this fine specimen of art, remarkable for spirit and classical grace, harmonises well with the finished architecture of the surrounding buildings. The statue was formerly deeply overlaid with paint, of which it had received more than one coat. All these have now been removed, so that the fine lines of the artist are again brought out almost as sharp as at the first, and it is to be protected from the effects of the weather by bronze of a proper hue. The pedestal on which it is placed is very neatly designed; it is constructed of large masses of stone from the Craighall quarry, and its architecture is simple and in good taste. The old marble tablet, with the original inscription, containing an eulogium on the character of Charles II. more flattering perhaps than true, which had disappeared for many years, and was found in a small vault in the Parliament House about the year 1815, and then replaced in its panels, has been restored. The following notices respecting this statue, extracted from the Council books, are curious:—"A. D. 1686. George Drummond, town-treasurer, in his accounts, charges L.2580 Scots (L.215 sterling), the contents of a bill of exchange, for the statue of Charles II.—Paid the mason for the pedestal, L.20 sterling.—Allowed Mr. Clark, advocate, an abatement of his stent, &c., (suppose L.25 Scots) for writing the inscription."

—13. City Expenditure.—The long pending action between the Town Council and the Trustees for the city creditors, respecting the expenditure of the town, came on for decision before the Lord Justice Clerk, and Lords Meadowbank and Glenleith. Among their findings respecting the various items of the city expenses, the following were the most remarkable:—Their lordships were unanimously of opinion that the Lord Provost had no claim whatever upon the city for salary, and that no sum for this purpose should be allowed. They also decided that the principal and professors of the University, and the masters of the High School, could claim at present no farther salary than the amount of the College revenue divided among them; and that for the remainder they were to rank among the ordinary creditors of the city. Their lordships were farther of opinion, that, in strict law, the pensions granted by the Town Council ought not to be paid; but as the most of them were of trifling amount, they hoped the trustees would not press their rights on this point. With respect to the civil and criminal establishments of the city, the alighting of prisoners in the jail, bridewell, &c., and the salaries of the city-officers, their lordships were of opinion that these should be maintained. They farther found, that no specific sum ought to be allowed the town for carrying on law-suits, because, as every law-suit must be for the interest of the trustees as well as for the city, they held that the trustees must be consulted on every law-suit that was entered into. It may be proper to state, that this will have the effect of preventing the town from engaging in a law-suit with the trustees respecting the disputed properties that the town holds in its possession, as it is not to be supposed that the trustees will consent to a law-suit being carried on against themselves. The trustees have announced their intention of soon paying four and a half per cent. to the creditors.

—17. This evening, a very serious affair occurred at Piershill barracks, at present occupied by the 6th dragoon guards. Bell, a private in the regiment, having taken deep offence at Troop Sergeant-major Moorhead, because the latter refused to obtain a pass for him from his officer, in the heat of passion ran to his room for his pistol, which having loaded, he returned to where the sergeant-major stood, and deliberately levelled and fired the pistol at him. The ball entered upon the left side, a little below the shoulder, and severely shattered the spine, at the same time lodging internally. The unfortunate victim is scarcely expected to live, the surgeons being unable to find the ball. Bell has been committed to the Causton jail.

—18. A washerwoman in Crosscauseway, Edinburgh, having fallen asleep at her employment during the night, was found suffocated in her own tub next morning, her head below the water and her feet raised from the floor.

—19. The first sale of teas imported directly from China took place at Leith. Much interest and considerable competition amongst the trade was excited, and the teas met a quick sale at the following prices, exclusive of duty:—Bohea, from 1s. 1½d. to 1s. 5d. per lb.; Congou, 1s. 4d. to 2s. 2½d.; Orange Pekoe, 2s. 6d. to 2s. 7½d.; Capers, 1s. 1d. to 1s. 3d.; Blackleaf Pekoe, 1s. 9d. to 2s.; Twankay, 1s. 9d.; Hyson, 2s. 9d. to 3s.; Gunpowder Hyson, 2s. 9d. to 3s. 4d. The teas upon the whole were considered an excellent parcel. They were brought into Leith, April 29, by the Isabella, and it was announced during the sale that the ship was to continue a regular trader, and that her cargo would be brought to public sale annually.

—23. The ship Highlander sailed from Berwick to Montreal with 118 emigrants; and on the same day, 147 sailed from Greenock to New York in the John Hale.

A weaver at Dundee has been committed to jail under suspicion of having murdered his wife by stuffing cotton down her throat. The General Assembly of the church of Scotland met on Thursday, May 21, Lord Belhaven, Lord High Commissioner. Dr Thomson, one of the ministers of Perth, was chosen Moderator. The Herald says that Lord Melbourne has refused to accept of appointments of some deputy-lieutenants proposed by Gordon, and that the refusal was couched in very published statement, it appears that 3522 of the port of Greenock to North America, Lothians, Renfrew, Lanark, and portion of them. It is also stated that they were taken across the Atlantic. Mr Buchanan, the British Consul at a notice, stating, that he was migrating to Canada, by way of inspection; and when containing charged accordingly. He also states that articles suited to new settlers can be obtained in Upper Canada on better terms than they can be brought out; and he strongly urges the advantage of going out in a vessel from which spirituous liquors are totally excluded.

Another newspaper has been announced to appear shortly in Edinburgh, called the "Constitution." Its principal object is understood to be the defence of the church.

We stated in our last that Mr A. Johnston, member for the Cupar district of burghs, had been called on by about two-thirds of the electors who voted for him at the last election, to resign his seat, in consequence of his opposing Lord John Russell's motion respecting the Irish church. Mr Johnston laid the case before Lord John Russell, Mr Spring Rice, and Dr Lushington; and they being unanimous, that, under the circumstances, he was not bound to retire, he has determined to retain his seat. Mr Johnston has published the written opinions of the three right honourable referees.

Postscript.

In the House of Commons, May 22, Mr Spiers moved the second reading of the Liverpool police bill.—Mr Ewart moved that it be read a second time that day six months. He said, in point of fact, it was a bill to enable the corporation of Liverpool to pay the clergy of that town out of the corporate funds, which were the property of dissenters as well as of churchmen.—Lord Sandon said the plan was generally acceptable in Liverpool, and as long as an established religion supported by all classes was kept up, the principle on which Mr Ewart's objections rested could not be recognised by the legislature.—A long and animated discussion followed; in the course of which, Mr Thorneley, Mr Sheil, Mr O'Connell, Dr Bowring, Mr Wilks, and Mr Mark Phillips, supported Mr Ewart's amendment; and Sir Robert Inglis, Lord Francis Egerton, Mr Goulburn, and Colonel Sibthorpe, spoke in favour of the bill.—Lord Stanley wished the bill read a second time, and the third reading to be delayed until the corporation reform bill had been introduced.—In the course of the debate, there was an altercation between Lord Stanley and Mr Sheil, which provoked some very warm language from the latter.—On a division, the numbers were—for the second reading, 185; against it, 171; majority, 14. From a list of the minority given in the Chronicle, it does not appear that any of the ministers voted against the bill.

May 26. News of a very serious character has arrived from Spain. It appears that as soon as the treaty for exchange of prisoners betwixt Valdez and Zumalacarrreguy (effected by Lord Elliot and Colonel Gurwood) was made known, violent tumults broke out. On the 11th May the crowd collected in considerable numbers, and proceeded to the residence of M. Martinez de la Rosa. They were dispersed by military force. On the 12th the troops were under arms, in the midst of such great agitation, that fears were entertained of a more serious revolutionary movement. Some cries of "Live the Constitution" were heard. Nor were these symptoms confined to the streets and the populace. The Spanish Chamber of Deputies was the scene of as much excitement and threatening. M. Galiano had risen and denounced, in the strongest terms, the convention, and demanded from the ministers the production of a copy. Most injudiciously on the part of the ministers, this was refused, and the consequence was their immediate defeat by a majority of four. By accounts down to the 14th, it appears that public tranquillity had been in a great measure restored, and the Procuradores had become comparatively calm. A private declaration of Martinez de la Rosa, that no farther negotiation with Don Carlos would be attempted, had tended to produce this alteration in the temper of the Lower Chamber. The son of Galiano, the deputy, had been arrested on a charge of being implicated in the riot of the 11th; but this was looked upon as an imprudent step; and it is not generally believed that the young man is guilty. Meanwhile, matters at the seat of war are becoming worse and worse. Valdez openly proclaims the utter failure of his plans hitherto. In a fit of despondency, he withdrew the garrison from Estella, and Zumalacarrreguy is said to have instantly pitched upon that town for the quarters of his sick and wounded. In almost every province, too, hitherto quiet, conspiracies are starting into existence; and the difficulties of the party of the queen seem to have become so overpowering, as to leave no hope of retrieval, except in intervention.

A correspondent of the Times gives a curious statement of a conversation betwixt Louis Philippe and Lord Elliot and Colonel Gurwood, on the return of the latter through Paris. Louis Philippe having asked their candid opinion of the state of things in Navarre, Lord Elliot answered, "that he was convinced that Zumalacarrreguy would beat Valdez, as he had done his predecessors in the command." "But," asked the king, "can he beat them up to Madrid?" "Yes, sir; there is nothing to hinder him," was Lord Elliot's answer. "Very well," rejoined the king, "Don Carlos is a very honest man." Further, when the obligations imposed upon the contracting parties by that treaty (calling for an armed intervention) were alluded to, the king is represented to have distinctly declared that he did not feel himself called upon to answer the demand of the Spanish government, if it threatened to involve such an interference.

The Belgian Chambers were suddenly prorogued on the 14th May; the object, it is said, being to avoid a ministerial defeat on the question of a new commercial code.

an examination of the Gazettes, it will be found here are on an average about eighty bankruptcies in England and twelve in Scotland every month. The exhibition of these bankruptcies in the Gazette does not by any means convey a faithful idea of the amount of insolvency in the two countries; unless other bankruptcies are compounded for secretly. What with gazetted bankruptcies, private compositions, cessios, executions of trust-deeds, and other varieties in processes of insolvency, there are at some hundreds of failures monthly in Great Britain. Many great evils in this world are slurred over and little thought of, from a way that people are of speaking of them lightly in a sort of slang, as if a peculiar form of speech or a smirk could radically change the nature of what is an absolute mischief. Bankruptcy is an evil which usually goes with this kind of treatment. An enormous amount of individual and family distress is created, and yet it is looked upon as a merely ordinary thing—a thing not warranting a momentary reproach. Well, you would hear I am down for twenty thousand—couldn't be helped—Tipper and Jenkins are in three thousand five hundred—understand it will be them—sorry for it—a capital fellow is Jenkins." Such is the way we often hear men talk of their bankruptcy. They speak of it as an affair of no serious importance—treat it as only the unfortunate result of a game at which they had been playing, and find it very strange that any of their old friends should look cold upon them in consequence.

Unfortunately, all do not speak and feel in this manner. Many there are who bitterly feel their situation, with reference to its consequences to others and to themselves, who deplore the good nature which led to destruction of their hopes, and perhaps have a consciousness that their insolvency does not, in a moral sense, release them from their obligations. On the whole, however, these are exceptions which are for the most part only found in unsophisticated parts of the country. Generally speaking, the public mind is in an unhealthy state in respect of bankruptcy. A man would appear to have arisen, that commerce, trade, or business, is a game in which all must necessarily take their chance of losing without grumbling; and amounts to the conclusion that bankruptcy is a natural, not a moral evil, and is therefore incurable. We would wish to see a very different mode of thinking prevail upon this subject. Trade is not a game; it is a sober arrangement betwixt parties, in which the element of faith is the principal element in the contract. When we play a game of chess, we know that we have a chance to lose, and make up our mind accordingly; when we transact business, we do it on the principle of a hazard, but of a certainty that it is, putting speculation out of the question, a game, hence a loss under such circumstances is felt to be the character of a robbery—a taking of property by fraudulent or fallacious representations. But it will be answered, such is now the extensive use of credit, such the changes and chances in society, such the competition in gaining a livelihood, that bankruptcy is a contingency quite unavoidable, a tune which will overtake the best of us. In this there is no semblance of sound reasoning. It is an error by a pleading of error. It is at the bottom of the whole mischief is credit. It is the curse of the country. It may be said there are now two kinds of capital in current circulation, one true, the other false. The true kind is composed of property, money, skill, labour, and so forth; while that which is false consists of credit—a vision—a nothing. Betwixt these two descriptions of capital a constant struggle is maintained, greatly to the injury of the honest and industrious part of the community. One man, after twenty years' toil, commences business with the savings of his industry. He perils a thousand pounds of hard-won money. He stakes his all. But he can make little or nothing by his enterprise. He is opposed by a man who has commenced on credit, one who has raised money in various oblique ways, and given for his stock a mere promise to pay. This opponent, having got his goods for nothing, at least not being particularly animated with the intention of paying for them to their full value, can greatly undersell the real capitalist. Dashing into business with a flaming announcement of the extent, excellence, and cheapness of his commodities, he throws the modest small capitalist into the shade. With him trade really becomes the game which it is often represented to be. It is all one to him whether he hit or miss. And so, after doing a world of mischief by underselling, after filling the market with his wares, after living for a certain period on the produce of his sales, and committing all kinds of extravagances, he all at once quietly goes down. He appears in the Gazette as a bankrupt: his assets will not pay a quarter of the demands upon them; a large drain is also made from the funds to satisfy lawyers and trustees; his stock is sold for a trifle, by that means still further glutting the market with a particular kind of goods; in short, the ramifications of the mischief he has committed are endless. And this is described as a misfortune—a natural unavoidable evil—a contingency arising out of the chances and changes of life. Such a burlesque on common sense! The whole affair is a gross moral error; first, an error on the part of the creditors in trusting; and, second, a much greater error of the debtor in dissipating their property foolishly, we might almost say criminally, without a moment's reflection on the consequences of his delinquency.

It is generally observable that in the long-run the steady man, with his small but substantial capital, is farther advanced in his worldly circumstances than the flash man of business with all his surreptitious advantages; but his advancement has required superlative exertion; the difficulties he had to contend against were enormous; and it is likely that he is an old man before he can say he has secured anything like a competency. Credit, as now exercised, is in these respects the heavy drag on the wheels of a wholesome system of trading. All businesses, every department of society, feel its searing influence. It is the fruitful source of extravagant expenditure among all classes of society; the temptation to gamble away the property sacredly committed to our charge; the cause of that wide-spread insolvency, open or concealed, which leads to every species of misery. It is usual to declare that the worst thing that can be said of the bankrupt is, that he was imprudent—imprudent either in taking or giving credit, or in both. But this is a silly palliative. Can a mere expression of regret cancel a large amount of debt, or restore comfort to the fireside rendered dismal by his imprudence? We remember when, ten years ago, an extensive bankruptcy occurred, it did not only injure capitalists, but swept away the means of creditable support from a considerable number of families in the rank of tradesmen. It carried distress into many a domestic circle; and all that was said of the bankrupt was, that "he had been imprudent." Morally speaking, the conduct of the highwayman who plunders all he meets was not more criminal or productive of greater misery. If, instead of imprudence, we should say, a want of calculation and due regard for the interests of others, the definition would be a good deal nearer the truth. A blind spirit of speculation—a staking of the property of creditors on little else than the throw of a die—is the fertile cause of insolvency. Unfortunately this recklessness in trading has frequently the tendency to produce bankruptcy in others, to whom no blame can be imputed—a circumstance which certainly ought to have the effect of introducing a distinction of opinion in reference to the rash and imprudent on the one hand, and the blameless unfortunate on the other.

When one searches into the remote causes of the boundless extent of insolvency which prevails, it will generally be seen that much of the evil has been generated by paper currency. By the free manufacture and dissemination of paper money, particularly such as prevails in Scotland, almost every kind of adventurer, with a show of security, has the means of overcoming the substantial capitalist, and injuring any branch of manufactures. There was a period in the history of the country when the institution of paper money as a representative of real property was perhaps of use; this period has, however, passed away, and the establishment of banks, with the power of issuing notes to an unlimited amount—that is, lending fictitious capital—is now the source of incalculable injury to the fair trader. To this cause alone may be traced not a small proportion of that extensive system of underselling, as well as working at under prices, of which every reputable tradesman, who gives value for his materials, so loudly complains. The Scottish banks have, in most instances, sustained their credit, and carried on this injurious process, simply from the influence of national wants, and the support which they mutually yield. No one knows the amount of the real property responsible for the payment of their notes, and there is an equal ignorance in relation to the extent of their issues. Possessing the extraordinary double advantage of deriving a profit both from the notes they put in circulation and from the property of which these notes are supposed to be the representatives, they have, little by little, assumed a dominant character in the country, and made nearly all classes feel their dependence upon them. On all sides are they observed to prop up, on a principle of usury, the credit of merchants, tradesmen, farmers, private gentlemen, and professional persons, greatly to the injury, as we have said, of the real capitalist, and thereby actively creating subjects for the Gazette, the trust-deed, and the cessio.

It has usually been represented that the credit fabricated by banks is of exceeding utility in assisting industrious individuals at their outset in business. But the representation rests on a fallacy. The community at large is not bettered by the forcible establishment of any individual in trade. The giving of an advantage to one is only taking it from others. If there be a wholesome demand for goods in a particular trade, there is no danger of that demand being left unsupplied by men already in business, and who have some real capital to venture. The intrusion of a young penniless speculator, backed by credit, is not a matter of necessity; it is a matter of absurd favour, and, as such, is calculated to do more harm than good.

If credit, on the principles we have been adverting to, have produced a moral evil, as it assuredly has, mankind are not without the ability to rectify the mischief. The legislature has it in its power to enforce a system of more rigorous scrutiny into the causes of bankruptcy. The commissioners of inquiry ought to be enabled to make an effective distinction between the three classes of insolvents, namely, the criminal, the rash or imprudent, and the blameless unfortunate, and release them from their obligations accordingly. Such a species of examination on public grounds, would act as a preventive of deliberate injury to society, and prove a source of consolation to those whose ruin is to be traced to the conduct of others, or the result of sheer misfortune. The practices under the insolvent act in England, and the similar arrangement of cession in Scotland, stand likewise greatly in need of amendment. As for the cession, it is a mere farce—an interposition of certain legal forms to enable an individual to set his creditors at defiance. Much is at present said of the propriety of abolishing imprisonment for debt, and of the compensatory privilege of summarily seizing on the goods of the debtor for liquidation of claims. Whatever may be the result of this process in England, we know that in Scotland it will be worse than useless, and certainly add to the number of insolvents; and for this reason—that the landlord has a prior claim over the goods of the tenant; and if any one dare to touch these goods, he becomes liable in paying the rent of the tenant. This has ever acted, and will continue to act, as an insurmountable obstacle to the seizing of goods by the creditor; and the only remedy would be placing the landlord's claim on the footing of an ordinary debt. With such remedial measures as these, it is desirable that the legislature should forthwith institute a searching scrutiny into the issues of paper money on the part of the banks, as well as of the amount of real property liable to meet the demands which may be made upon them in the case of runs. An obligation to make these exhibitions at stated intervals is what the public have a right to demand, and without which they will ever remain obnoxious to the paralysing effects of an illimitable system of credit, or currency of fictitious capital.

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

THE affairs of Spain prove to have been affected in a most unexpected manner by the mission of Lord Elliot. The Duke of Wellington, in the treaty with which, in his late capacity of foreign secretary, he charged this nobleman for an exchange of prisoners between the contending parties, and which was effected on the 29th of April, used terms very respectful to the Carlists. The validity of the decrees issued by Don Carlos was in this document indirectly acknowledged; the same titles were conferred on Valdez and Zumalacarreguy; and the two armies were put upon an equal footing by being called the "belligerent armies." These phrases, and the respect implied by the mission itself, communicated fresh hopes to the Carlists, and in a corresponding manner depressed the adherents of the established government. Valdez was consequently compelled to retreat to the Ebro, leaving a large tract of country to the rebels, who then became possessed of the whole of Navarre and Biscay, except the towns of Pampeluna and Vittoria. The intelligence of these results caused insurrections of the more liberal or republican party in various parts of Spain, but particularly in Madrid, where, on the 11th of May, the people assembled in tumultuous parties, assailed the minister De la Rosa in the streets, to the peril of his life, and could only be dispersed by military force. In London, the Madrid riots and other disastrous effects of the Duke of Wellington's mission were made known on the 21st, when intelligence was also communicated of a conversation in which Louis Philippe had spoken favourably of the Carlist cause to Lord Elliot, as that nobleman was returning home. A dreadful panic consequently took place in the money market, during which Cortes bonds fell from 64 to 51 in one day, and soon after to 49, though they ultimately found a temporary point of settlement at about 51. On the 29th of May, an application from the Spanish to the English government, for aid in suppressing the Carlist insurrection, in terms of the Quadruple treaty, reached London, while a similar application, it was understood, had been made to France. Some communications are said to have been immediately held between the French and English governments, the result of which was a resolution against the direct interference which, in a more imminent danger to the Spanish government, would have been necessary in terms of the Quadruple treaty; but at the same time a resolution to allow forces to be enlisted in France and Britain on behalf of the Queen of Spain. Accordingly, on the 10th June, the King of Great Britain in council issued an order, taking advantage of a provision in the foreign enlistment act, to allow his subjects to engage in the service of the Queen of Spain during the ensuing two years; the French government at the same time granting permission to enlist in France, where 1500 men are already prepared to cross the Pyrenees, and taking steps for the transportation, to Spain, of a foreign legion of 6000 men, now in their service at Algiers. Means were immediately taken by the Spanish minister Alava for raising 10,000 men in England. An office was established at Charing Cross for the reception of recruits, and Colonel Evans, M.P. for Westminster, was announced as the individual who was to be placed at their head. The multitude of applicants was so great, that no doubt is entertained (June 23) of the complement being speedily obtained. On the other hand, a volunteer force is said to be forming at Amsterdam in favour of Don Carlos; and it is surmised that the despotic powers may conceive themselves to have the same right to aid that prince which France and Britain assume to aid Queen Isabella. A French colonel, moreover, who has been at the head-quarters of General Valdez, as an accredited agent from his own government, reports, that, to reduce the rebellious provinces to an unconditional surrender, would require a French army of 120,000 men. The truth is, that these provinces do not rebel so much through favour for Don Carlos, as through resentment for the abolition of some peculiar privileges of independency which took place a few years ago, and the rescission of which act would do more, it is stated, for the queen's cause, than almost any display of military force. The Carlists, who at the utmost possess but two provinces, forming about a thirtieth part of Spain, are less formidable enemies to the existing government than the republican or ultra-liberal party, who were at the bottom of all the late conspiracies and tumults, are of great strength in all the principal towns, and in the state of Spain have but too many justifying arguments for their eagerness in the pursuit of reformation. "There are other circumstances," says the Scotsman, "in the state of Spain, which are likely to nourish the elements of dissension. Many recent letters assure us that the priests, formerly so powerful, are now treated with contempt, and that their doctrines are not in greater esteem than their persons. The change is such as might be expected from the shock which the late revolution gave to ancient ideas, and the long sojourn of the British and French armies in the country. It has been ingeniously observed, that the literature of Spain is the echo of that of France, coming back from a period of fifty years; and it is extremely probable that the moral state of the Peninsula is not unlike that which existed on the other side of the Pyrenees at the commencement of the revolution in 1789. The superstition which has so long reigned paramount in Spain, has been sapped in the minds of the upper and middle classes; and where religion is so much disfigured by absurdities, the first and most natural transition is from implicit faith to entire infidelity. This state of things may continue for a course of years, but the revulsion which has been gradually taking place in France will follow in Spain, and Christianity, less or more purified of abuses, will regain its ascendancy. Such is the natural cycle. Religion allied with power, and exempted from free inquiry, sinks into superstition: this in its turn generates infidelity; and ultimately the natural craving in man for something to satisfy the higher aspirations of his soul, leads him back to Christianity in a more rational form. If the change to infidelity has already taken place in Spain, it will only be in the towns; and this, by separating the urban population from the rural, in their religious as well as their political sentiments, is likely to increase the estrangement between them, and add to the chances of collision. The priest-ridden and the priest-despising Spaniards will not easily be persuaded to act cordially together. Of the triumph of the good cause, however, in Spain, we entertain no doubt."

The Queen Regent prorogued the Cortes on the 29th of May, and soon after displaced the ministry of Martinez de la Rosa; for which, on the 14th June, the following substitutes were appointed:—Torreno, President; Marquis D'Amarilla, Minister of War; M. Alvarez Guerra, Interior; M. Garcia Herreros, Justice; General Alava, Marine; M. Mendizabal, Finance. As these individuals have all distinguished themselves on the ultra-liberal side, their appointments are highly popular, and the Queen Regent is much praised for her concession to the will of her subjects.

Recent intelligence, received by telegraph, announces a decisive victory, gained, on the 16th June, by Valdez over the Carlists, in the neighbourhood of Vittoria, and the disablement of Zumalacarreguy by a shot in the thigh, which was expected to prove mortal. In this fight, great numbers of the Carlists are said to have been slaughtered and taken prisoners; and they are also stated to have lost the whole of their artillery.

PORTUGAL.

AN unexpected change of ministry took place at Lisbon on the 26th of May, under circumstances which are thus described by the correspondent of the Times:—Freire, one of the late ministers, requested the young queen to confirm certain appointments; her majesty, who has lately been in very ill humour, and on bad terms with the Duchess of Braganza, refused to do this: Freire represented the absolute necessity of following the advice of ministers; upon which the queen burst into tears, and said, "I am no longer queen, if I cannot do my abn will, as my ancestors have done." She ran to the Duchess of Braganza, who said she had acted wrongly; she then consulted the Marchioness of Calho, and other court favourites, who commanded her conduct, and advised her to take a whip and lash Freire's shoulders; which suggestion the queen listened exceedingly. Soon afterwards, Villa Real, monstrated with her; she was obstinate: Villa Real threatened resignation: "that," said her wifm jesty, "is just what I want." Villa Real re and Saldanha, who was purposely at hand, was duced, and appointed President of the Council Minister of War.

The new ministry formed by Saldanha consists besides the President, the following members:—F. A. Campos, Minister of Finance; P. Magalhaes, Home Department; M. A. De Carvalho, Juiz Terceira, Commander-in-Chief; Palmella, Foreign Affairs.

It is understood that the two last only take office to prevent the further progress of mischief. The Minister of Finance has declared that he will religiously keep faith with the English creditors.

Other rumours represent the queen as having been prompted to this step by a predilection for the Duke of Nemours, second son of the King of the French, who she wishes to become her husband, against the election of her former ministers, and, it is added, the English government.

FRANCE.

THE trial of the conspirators, which commenced on the 5th, and of which many details were given last month, still drags its slow length along, producing apparently any thing but honour or popularity to the government. To overcome the difficulty arising from the clamorous behaviour of the prisoners, the Chamber of Peers discussed, on the 19th May, the propriety of conducting the trial in their absence, which was voted by 82 against 78. It would be difficult to make our readers comprehend the manifold absurdities and outrages of legislative and judicial decision which have since occurred; but some points must be adverted to. An altercation and personal collision between some of the reporters and M. Jaubert, member of the Chamber of Deputies, provoked the Reformateur journal to use the phrase "legislative bullies" in reference to that gentleman and some of his brethren who had supported him. For this offence the nominal editor was sentenced to a month's imprisonment, and a fine of ten thousand francs. Nineteen persons, including M. Puyraveau, a member of the lower Chamber, having addressed a letter of sympathy to the prisoners, that gentleman was summoned before the Chamber of Peers, whose authority, however, he refused to acknowledge, though ultimately yielded up to it by his brethren. After sitting upon this case, in secret conclave, a decision was given, on June 2, acquitting a certain number, but fining nine, inclusive of Puyraveau, guilty of contempt of court. One (Trelat) was sentenced to three years imprisonment, and a fine of L.400; three others to one month's imprisonment, and fines of the same amount; and the other five to one month's confinement, and fines from L.8 to L.20. Trelat openly avowed his desire at the bar of the court for the overthrow of the monarchy, and the establishment of a republic. Preliminaries having been thus settled, the Chamber proceeded to try the conspirators separately in small detachments, disregarding alike the dogged silence and their clamorous protests. Considerable excitement was occasioned during the trial (June 17) of Carrier, a workman of Lyons, who proved that Picot, a witness against him, was an emissary of police, sent to urge the people into rebellion.

It is gratifying, during proceedings so discreditable to the French government, to be informed, as was by the following letter in the Scotsman, written by a gentleman who has several times visited France, that the moral improvement of the people is making rapid advance:—

"PARIS, 16th May 1835.—However little may be thought by the British generally of Louis Philippe, and of his ministry, I must be allowed to entertain great respect for both, as men who, though they have doubtless made blunders, well understand the necessities and wishes of their country. When I see every where evident and palpable signs of rapid improvement in the soil, in the roads, in the houses, and in the people, it will be difficult to convince me that they are discontented and badly governed. In October 1831, I was struck, in my journey to Orleans and Nantes, with the advance made since 1825. In May 1833, I was still more forcibly struck with the increased advance made in the preceding eighteen months; and in now again entering France on its poorest side, at the distance of two years, the progress in the whole appearance of things is so remarkable, that, if I ever doubted of the possible improvement of masses as well as individuals, continued scepticism becomes impossible. On one occasion, I sat gazing for hours from the carriage, at well-dressed, intelligent, and contented-looking people—on their comfortable houses, crowded roads, and well-cultivated fields; and contrasted them with the squalid, dissatisfied, miserable appearance, patched dresses, and coarser manners and expression, of the people, the time I travelled the same road two years after the war, and my feeling was simply, 'now I could die contented—the people are advancing in prosperity and happiness, and the future is secure.' It seemed to decide the question."

tem, whether human nature is capable of attaining to a higher state of earthly existence than what it now endures, and to decide so conclusively in the affirmative as to make one 'feel joy all over.' It was not my state which made every thing coulour de rose; for I had been tramping all Tuesday night, and been turned inside out by sickness on Wednesday in a gale of wind crossing the Channel, and was rather tired. Besides the disappearance of wooden shoes—the substitution of three horses for one man to a plough, where formerly there were two horses, three oxen, an ass, a driver, and a ploughman—the variety of military appearances of any description—the decorated waggons and comfortable houses, are all objects which do not depend on the state of a man's feelings, but on that of his eyes. The more moral expression of the people is also remarkable."

The Grand Duke of Baden, against the vote of his representative chamber, has agreed to enter into the Russian commercial league, and proceeds to act accordingly.

The New Orleans Bee, May 6th, says—"By private advices received yesterday from Tampico, it appears that the revolution in Mexico is assuming a serious aspect. Already have several of the states declared in favour of the plan of Alvarez and Farias, and many others that have not yet made any demonstrations are expected soon to join them. Both generals intend to concentrate their forces on Mexico, and Alvarez has already advanced for that purpose. Santa Anna has assumed the command of the army, and gone to Tampico; but it is believed he will march thence (after some necessary arrangements) to the remnants of Gomez Farias, at Zacatecas. Barrón acts still as the Regent-President."

The following is an extract of a private letter from Jamaica, dated April 20:—"Never was Jamaica in a more contented and tranquil state than at this moment. The quantity of sugar this year, which will exceed that of many years past, will give contradiction to all that has been said or written against the emancipation act. That will exist as a glorious memento of the government of the Whigs, for every day's experience proves it to be a golden act. The apprenticeship term is now more valuable than when the negroes were slaves, and land, which, two months ago, was worth six years' purchase, is now worth ten, and is highly increasing. The importation of Europeans is a total failure, and ought to be cried down forthwith in Europe. It is from them that the future troubles of Jamaica will spring."

A recent letter from New York announces the fall of the Table Rock at the Falls of Niagara. This immense mass of stone was on the Canada side of the river, projecting so as to afford the spectator a front view of the horse-shoe fall. It was considerably undermined, and some fissures on the surface had for some time past indicated the disruption. A large mass detached two or three years back. By the total fall of the Table Rock, the visitor is now deprived of the most favourable position for viewing the magnificent appearance presented by that stupendous fall of waters.

It is not altogether improbable, from the present state of the American and the English corn-markets, that corn may, in the course of the present year, be exported from this country for the supply of the United States; a circumstance which, if it should occur, would be almost without precedent. The American corn-markets are rising rapidly, whilst ours, as every one knows, are "looking down," as the trade say. Whether the rise on the other side of the Atlantic and the fall on this will be so great as to render exportation from this country profitable, is uncertain; though there is already a great deal of trouble amongst the holders of bonded corn, and, if it should be cleared off, there may then perhaps be an inquiry for British. The harvest in the United States is expected to be late this year, from the coldness of the spring; and, if it should be deficient also, our farmers may possibly have the opportunity of turning the tables on the Americans.—Liverpool Times.

PARLIAMENT.

1. THE BALLOT.

June 2. Mr Grote moved a resolution, "that it is the opinion of this house that votes at elections for members of Parliament should be taken by way of secret ballot." His speech was allowed, by all sections of the liberal party, to be an able one. "The vote by ballot," said he, "is not un-English, for of thousands private associations and clubs which exist every where throughout the country, whenever members are called on to perform the process of election, the votes are uniformly taken by ballot. It is the mode of voting spontaneously resorted to by Englishmen when they are left to themselves in private associations, and when they desire to vote for a free and unconstrained expression of opinion from each individual member; and surely it is to be denounced as uncongenial to the feelings and habits of the nation. Some persons will tell me of undue interference with the liberty of voting will continue, even in spite of the ballot, because the ballot will not produce entire and effectual secrecy. A landlord (they contend) disposed to act oppressively, though he cannot watch his tenant during the express of voting, may yet find out, by indirect and collateral evidence, how he has actually voted, and may punish him accordingly. I shall admit, sir, that with or without the ballot an oppressive landlord may deal harshly by his tenant. But let him do this, or abstain from doing it, as he pleases, still he cannot make the infliction of loss conditional on the way in which the vote is given—he cannot make his oppression the means of controlling or perverting an unseen vote. If the tenant voter be an object of suspicion, he will not discharge himself from that suspicion by falsifying his vote at the poll, because it never can be made evident to any one else that he has actually done so." Mr Grote, in one part of his speech, alluded to the almost invariable result of contested elections:—"Often and often do open elections leave behind them a deplorable train of private feuds and animosities, even amongst equals and independent individuals. It is an object of first-rate moment to do away with those acrimonious political animosities which form the bane of social intercourse, and which so inevitably spring up in contested elections, if the citizens are marshalled in open and undisguised rivalry against each other. I venture to assert, that you will never approach to the solution of this problem without the aid of the ballot." (Hear.) The hon. gentleman concluded his speech in these words:—"There is the amplest proof that your suffrage is the very reverse of free; and, therefore, the measure which emancipates it will work a salutary and important change. But it is a change, the extent of which every man can see and measure—a change which can only land you in the true and natural haven of a representative assembly, the undisturbed manifestation of real electoral feelings. Let me remind you, sir, that the dignity, the usefulness, the moral ascendancy, of this house, depend upon its possessing the entire and unqualified confidence of the people; and that of this there is no other constitutional test, except the free and unbiassed choice of the electors. Let me remind you that the first and greatest interests of the state—the tie of affectionate reverence which binds a nation to its elective legislature—the inducements for the rich to respect the conscience, to cultivate the attachment, and to improve the understandings of the poor—all these inestimable objects are at stake in the integrity and independence of the suffrage. You ensure them, beyond suspicion or contest, by granting the ballot: you never can ensure them without it." (Loud cheers.)—The motion was seconded by Sir W. MOLESWORTH, who called on the ministry and their immediate friends to remember their late defeats in Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Cambridgeshire, Denbighshire, Derbyshire South, Devonshire South, Essex South, Hampshire South, Gloucestershire West, Lancashire South, Leicestershire South, Lincolnshire, Norfolk East, Northamptonshire South, Shropshire North, Suffolk East, Suffolk West, Surrey East, Surrey West, Warwickshire South, Devonshire, Inverness-shire, and Staffordshire; in all of which cases, according to their own confession, they had suffered from no reaction of public opinion, but from corrupt influences—influences which the ballot alone, he contended, could overcome.—The motion was opposed by Lord J. RUSSELL, who, notwithstanding his own suffering from corrupt influences, did not believe these to be generally exercised, and was inclined to hope that, as public opinion advances, they would be so universally scouted as to be no longer practicable.—The motion was lost by 319 against 146.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATION REFORM.

June 5. Lord JOHN RUSSELL moved for leave to bring in a bill to provide for the regulation of the municipal corporations of England and Wales. According to a newspaper abstract, "one hundred and eighty-three cities and boroughs in England and Wales, comprising upwards of two millions of inhabitants, will fall under the operation of this bill. It is proposed to repeal all acts, charters, and customs inconsistent with the provisions of the bill; and to erect in each of the one hundred and eighty-three cities and boroughs a new municipality, to consist of a mayor and burgesses. Permanent residence for three years, and the payment of three years' rates for any tenement, are the sole qualifications for a burgess. Speaking generally, therefore, it may be said that all who pay municipal taxes, however small their amount, will by this bill gain municipal privileges. The most important of these privileges will be the right to vote for members of a town-council, or local parliament. The town-council is to be elected for three years; one-third of the members to go out annually, and their places to be supplied by the constituent body. The mayor is to be elected annually by the council. The powers and duties of the town-council will be very extensive. They will appoint town-clerks, treasurers, and other officers; control absolutely the expenditure of the corporate funds of every description; have the management of the police, and licensing of public houses; and nominate justices of the peace, subject to the confirmation of the Crown. The mayor is to be a justice of the peace for the county as well as the town. A recorder will be appointed by the King, and quarter-sessions established, in those places where the town-council think it desirable, and are willing to pay the expenses; but in those only. All the exclusive rights of trading, peculiar privileges of certain companies, &c. are to be utterly abolished. The boundaries of the cities and boroughs are to extend to a distance of seven miles, and be generally similar to those of towns electing members under the reform act." On his lordship concluding his speech, Sir

R. PEEL professed his adhesion to the general principles of representative local government, reserving for himself the right of suggesting various alterations in the bill, in its subsequent stages.—After a short discussion, the bill was introduced, and read a first time.—June 15. The bill was brought forward for a second reading, when Lord STANLEY avowed a general approval of it, and Sir R. PEEL, while declaring that he would give no opposition to the present motion, still reserved his vote respecting "the three great points," as he called them, namely, the qualification of the constituency, the frequency of elections, and the question whether the governing body ought to possess a qualification or not.—The bill was then passed through the second reading.

3. IPSWICH ELECTION.

June 10. Mr P. M. STEWART brought up the report of the Ipswich election committee, and, by the direction of the committee, submitted the following resolutions to the house:—"That the resolutions of the 14th of April be rescinded; that Robert Adam Dundas and Fitzroy Kelly, Esqrs. were not duly elected, and ought not to have been returned members to have served in this present Parliament, for the borough of Ipswich; that the petition of Robert Gill Ranson, Richard Crawley, and Henry Haken, does not appear to be frivolous or vexatious; that the opposition to the said petition does appear to be frivolous and vexatious; that Robert Adam Dundas and Fitzroy Kelly, Esqrs. were, by their friends and agents, guilty of bribery and corruption at the late election for the borough of Ipswich, and that Arthur Bott Cook, J. B. Dasent, John Pilgrim, and others, were guilty of bribery at the said election; that J. B. Dasent, Arthur Bott Cook, R. B. Clamp, and John Pilgrim, were guilty of absconding to avoid being served with the Speaker's warrant, and that J. E. Sparrow and John Clipperton, the avowed agents of the sitting members, and P. F. O'Malley, Esq. one of the counsel employed by the sitting members, aided and abetted them in keeping out of the way to avoid giving their evidence before this committee; that the said John Pilgrim, having at length been served with the Speaker's warrant, was prevented attending the committee by being arrested on a charge of embezzlement by Messrs Sewell, Blake, Keith, and Blake, under very suspicious circumstances; that the conduct of the magistrates, Samuel Bignold, Esq., E. T. Booth, Esq., before whom he was charged, appears to this committee to be a breach of the privileges of the house."—Mr GISBORNE moved that Dasent, Cook, and Clamp, be taken into custody; that Bignold and Booth be taken into custody; and that Sewell and Blake be summoned to attend at the bar of the house.—In the debate which ensued, Sir R. PEEL stood forward in defence of the individuals referred to, and entreated the house not to condemn them without evidence.—Next day, Mr GISBORNE altered his motion to the following:—"That John Bury Dasent, Esq. John Bond, Arthur Bott Cook, Robert Burchamp Clamp, John Pilgrim, Frederick O'Malley, Esq. John Eddowes Sparrow, and John Clipperton, be taken into the custody of the sergeant-at-arms attending the house; and that Mr Speaker do issue his warrant accordingly." The motion was carried.—June 15. The sergeant-at-arms having reported that he had these individuals in his custody, Mr GISBORNE proceeded to move, seriatim, their commitment to the jail of Newgate. He observed that they might assume the guilt of the parties from the report of the committee and the evidence taken before it, or they might proceed to give the parties a hearing. He was of opinion that it was most expedient to pursue the first of the two courses; and this opinion was in accordance with the practice of the house; for he found that with only two exceptions, the house had never called a person to the bar, or in any manner listened to what he had to say in his defence, after he had been reported guilty of a breach of privilege, but that he had been treated as a guilty person. The hon. gentleman then went through the various cases analogous to that before the house, and concluded by moving the committal of the parties to Newgate—some for absconding, others for aiding those who absconded, in order to avoid the service of the Speaker's warrant.—The parties were accordingly committed.

4. GRANT TO THE SCOTTISH CHURCH.

June 11. Sir W. RAE moved "that the petitions presented to the house relative to the building and endowing of places of worship connected with the established church of Scotland, be referred to a select committee, and that such committee shall inquire and report how far the building and endowing such places of worship is required for the moral and religious instruction of the lower orders of the people in Scotland." Sir William supported his motion on the ground of the vast number of petitions presented for the increase of church accommodation in Scotland. He also stated, that the rapid growth of crime in that country was the consequence of the deficiency of church room.—Mr PRINGLE seconded the motion.—Lord Advocate MURRAY opposed it. Petitions signed by 79,000 persons had been presented to the house against the proposed grant. These petitions came from persons not differing in doctrine or morality, but merely from the members of the church of Scotland in some points of church government. They urged the house not to make such a grant as was asked for, as it would be most unjust to them, and injurious to their feelings. Now, when the question was so divided as this was, could the house decide as to the want of accommodation in the churches, and as to the other points alleged by Sir William Rae? He would take one of the petitions presented by Mr Pringle—this was signed by 200 persons; while there was another petition on the table which denied all the allegations in the first petition, and this was signed by 600 persons. How could the house determine which of these petitions was right? It was stated that the members of the establishment were a very numerous body. But he would ask, whether the members of the establishment were not quite as wealthy as the dissenters, and therefore quite as able to provide places of worship as the latter class of persons? Would it not be felt as a grievance by the dissenters, that a grant of the public money should be given to the establishment? If the whole of the money in the public purse belonged to the church of Scotland, then there might not be so strong an objection to the grant; but as long as the conscientious feelings of others were involved, and those having rendered important service to religion, he thought that the house was bound to attend to their feelings, and not call upon them to contribute their money. They supported their own form of religious worship, which differed only in church government, not in doctrine, from the church of Scotland; and it would be hard to make them contribute also to the latter. He proposed as an amendment, "that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he will be graciously pleased to appoint a commission to inquire into the opportunity of religious worship, and into the means of religious instruction, afforded to the people of Scotland, and especially to the poorer classes of the community, whether they belong to the established church, or be of any other religious persuasion; and into the state of the law for repairing or building churches; and into the funds which may now be, or which may hereafter become, applicable to that purpose."—Sir GEORGE CLERK was disappointed by Mr Murray's speech. He reminded the house that the subject before the house was one of the topics in the King's speech at the opening of the session, and that Sir Robert Peel had intended to act upon the suggestion. He regretted the tone of the learned lord respecting the established church of Scotland; for the tone of his argument was fatal to the existence of all establishments. It had been said that meeting-houses had been built by dissenters in Scotland; but, however praiseworthy might be the efforts of individuals, they did not absolve the state from the obligation of providing adequate means of worship for the people. He remembered an argument of Dr Lushington, when grants for building of churches were opposed on that ground: he had said, that it was not to be endured that members of the church of England were to be indebted to dissenters for the means of public worship; and the same argument applied to the church of Scotland. He objected to this new mode of governing the country by means of commissions. If a commission of inquiry was conducted without party-spirit, he did not decry it; but, coupling Mr Murray's speech with the motion to which it led, he could draw no other inference than that it was intended to hang up the question for a number of years.—Mr CUTLAR FERCUSSON was in favour of the grant; apparently for this reason, that "the county which he represented was unanimous in its favour." He should vote, however, in favour of the amendment; not for the purpose of throwing cold water on the subject, but as the facts of the case were disputed, they must be decided to the satisfaction of the country; and he was convinced that they could not be so decided by means of a committee of the House of Commons. He thought that the appointment of a commission would be a better mode of arriving at the truth.—Mr WALLACE supported the amendment. There existed a great deal of property in Scotland belonging to the church, which might be made available for church purposes. A great portion of the tithes, or tithes, were unappropriated. He possessed some property of that kind in two parishes, and he should disdain to put his hands into the public purse until those tithes were exhausted. (Cheers.)—Mr GILLON would not assist the church of Scotland with public money to put down the dissenters, and would oppose the motion.—The debate was adjourned to June 15, but was not resumed on that day.—Friday, June 26, was subsequently appointed for the further discussion of the question.

5. THE CATHOLIC OATH.

June 11. Mr ORMSBY GORE presented a petition from Oswestry, praying for such an alteration of the Catholic members' oath as would prevent them from voting on questions connected with the church.—Mr O'CONNELL reminded the house, that in a former session he had moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter the oath; but that the house, with Lord Althorp for its leader, had almost unanimously declared it to be unnecessary. The petition stated that the Roman Catholic members swore, on taking their seats, that they would not avail themselves of any privilege in order to weaken the Protestant religion. First, it was necessary distinctly to understand what privilege was. Did the right to sit and vote come within the meaning of the word "privilege?" That was not its legal interpretation. As a lawyer, he was quite clear upon that point; but if the house thought otherwise, let it be brought to a decision. The petitioners went on to argue that the Roman Catholic members ought not to vote to lessen the revenues of the church. That was as much as to say that revenue and religion were synonymous terms. If so, he admitted that the Roman Catholic members did not observe the oath. They contended, however, that religion was one thing and revenue another. The one emanated from God; the other was tainted with the Mammon of the world. He put it thus—Would the Protestant religion be at an end if the church were deprived of its entire revenues? (Cheers.) Was that meant to be contended? If it were, what a triumph did the Protestants give to those whom they called Papists! But they could not mean that the Protestant religion meant pounds, shillings, and pence. When the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland was deprived of its revenues, it did not diminish the quantity of religion there. This was the distinction on which he stood—that religion was not revenue, nor revenue religion. Were a question to arise on the Thirty-nine Articles, and were it proposed in Parliament, as in America, to cut them down to nineteen articles, he should not vote upon it; but on a matter relating to the revenues of the church, he said at once what all sincere religionists would say, that religion was only encumbered by revenue. What had been the revenue of the church for the first three hundred years? Revenue and religion were not combined then, and they were not combined now. He therefore laughed to scorn all those who said he was attacking religion because he wished to relieve his constituents from an unholy and an unchristian burden. The resolution passed by the house only declared that the surplus should be applied to the purposes of education, after providing for all the spiritual wants of the people. Was there any thing in religion beyond spiritual wants? Yes. There was a traffic in things that did not belong to the altar, but were about it. It had been well said by Dr Boyton, that, by not supporting the church, the Protestant aristocracy were slaughtering their milch-cow, since the church provided livings for all their younger children. If religion and revenue were separate, the Roman Catholic members could take and keep their oath with a clear conscience—with perfect fidelity; and he would not say they laughed to scorn their opponents, but dared them to introduce a bill to put a different interpretation on the oath. If they did not do it, he would; he had tried it before, and would try it again.—After some remarks from Mr Gore, the petition was laid on the table.

6. MINOR SUBJECTS.

May 25. A smart debate, occasioned by a petition, took place in reference to the conduct of the churchwardens at Bungay, who had imprisoned Mr Childs, the eminent printer, for a debt of 17s. 6d. of church rates, when the proper legal course would have been to distrain his goods. Mr Childs, who is a dissenter, refused payment on conscientious grounds, and of nine hundred householders in the village, no less than eight hundred and ten petitioned the house for some alteration in the law which authorised the act. He had been liberated on the following day, and was welcomed back to his residence by such a procession as the town had never before witnessed.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL expressed his adherence to the opinion he had formerly announced, that the state was bound to provide for the maintenance of the fabric of the church—a doctrine perhaps technically sound; but if the establishment has surplus funds of which it makes no use, or a bad use, common sense requires that the expense of maintaining the church should be thrown upon these, rather than upon the general revenue of the country. His lordship added, that while he fully admitted the necessity of a measure for the abolition of rates, it must be postponed. The government, he confessed, had got into difficulties before by attempting too much at once; against this error he wished to guard, and in the present session he had no hope of finding time to carry through any important bills, beyond the two for the reform of the municipal corporations and the Irish church.—Sir R. PEEL, in a sarcastic speech directed at the measures of the ministers, informed them that the provision for church rates would not be so easily attained as was supposed, for, instead of a debt of L.80,000 upon them, which Lord Althorp contemplated, he had ascertained it to amount to L.827,000.—At the conclusion of the debate, Sir JOHN CAMPBELL declared that the churchwardens had acted illegally, in which opinion he was joined by the Recorder of London.—The Marquis of CHANDOS, after a long speech respecting the deep regret the house felt at the continuing distress of the agricultural interest, to which the attention of Parliament was called by his Majesty's most gracious speech from the throne at the commencement of the present as well as the preceding session; humbly to represent the anxious desire of this house that the attention of his Majesty's government might be directed without further delay to this subject, with a view to the removal of some portion of those burdens to which the land was subject through the pressure of general and local taxation.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL replied, by moving as an amendment a resolution, "that this house will direct its early attention to the recommendations of the committee which sat during the late session of Parliament, on the subject of county rates, with a view to the utmost practical alleviation of those burdens to which the land is subject through the pressure of local taxation."—Lord Chandos's motion was lost by 211 against 19.

—26. The house, by 212 against 34, negatived a motion for inserting a clause in the Great Western Railway bill for preventing travelling by it on Sundays. The vote was announced amidst loud cheers.

June 1. Mr CAYLEY brought forward a motion for a select committee, to inquire if there be no effective means within the reach of Parliament to afford substantial relief to the agriculture of the United Kingdom, and especially to recommend to the attention of such committee the subject of a silver, or conjoined standard of silver and gold.—Mr WODEHOUSE supported the motion.—Mr POULETT THOMSON had he listened with the utmost attention he could command to the speech of the hon. member, but could not make out what definite object he wished to be accomplished by the committee, though, from the tenor of his argument, he could arrive at no other conclusion than that he aimed at a change in the monetary system, or standard of value. He opposed the absurdity of expecting relief to agriculture from conjoining silver with gold as a standard.—Sir R. PEEL said it was known perfectly well that the real object of the present motion was, not an inquiry into agricultural distress, but the depreciation of the standard.—Several speeches followed, and the house rejected the motion by a majority of 216 to 126.—In the course of the presentation of petitions respecting the Scottish church, Mr A. JOHNSTON attempted to obtain leave to explain his conduct in reference to his constituents; but the house overruled him, on the ground that they could not interfere in such a case.—18. The same member brought forward, in a house of about 120 members, a motion for the abolition of lay patronage in the church of Scotland; but was speedily left in a house of 30 members, and accordingly had to abandon the subject.

—3. Mr Poulter's Sabbath observance bill was thrown out by 54 against 43.

—19. Mr BUXTON moved for a committee to inquire how far the provisions of the bill for the abolition of slavery in the West Indies, upon terms of paying twenty millions to the planters, had or had not proved efficacious towards their objects; and whether, upon ascertaining their partial or total failure, it would not be advisable that payment of the sum in question might not be arrested for the present?—Mr Buxton then argued that they had failed.—Sir J. GREY opposed the motion, in an effective speech of considerable length and ability, admitting that cases of cruelty had occurred, but that such proceedings were not enough to require the interruption of the progress of the great measure of slave emancipation. The government had lost no opportunity of carrying forward the measure fully, fairly, and efficiently; and it would not relax its efforts. He made several statements of the beneficial effects of freedom in Bermuda and Antigua. A relation of his own had, he said, informed him, that this year his estate, with a smaller amount of labour, was more productive than in the corresponding part of the year 1833.—Mr O'CONNELL considered the explanation of the government so satisfactory, that he could not but recommend the hon. member to withdraw the motion. He had intended to support the motion, but after what had transpired, he thought it ought to be withdrawn.—Motion withdrawn.—Captain PECHELL presented a petition from Mr G. Pecheil, a captain in the navy, complaining of the proceedings against him in the Court of Exchequer for the recovery of L.3, 6s. due for tithes on some land in Hampshire, to the vicar, Mr Kemp Cook. It appeared from Captain Pecheil's statement, that the tithes in question had been held up, not for the purpose of sale or removal, but to be eaten on the field by his sheep, and that, therefore, they were not titheable; but that the vicar had demanded L.3, 6s. as the alleged value of a tithe of the (though it was really not worth more than 20s. or 30s.); and instead of bringing the petitioner before two magistrates—a tribunal quite competent to dispose of the case—had sued him in the Court of Exchequer; where, judgment being given against him by the Chief Baron (as the petitioner alleged, contrary to law), on the ground that the sheep were not admitted to feed all over the field at once, but in portions hurled off, though that was the usual way, the petitioner was involved in costs amounting to not less than L.318, 18s. 11d., although both his counsel and solicitor, from a sense of the extreme injustice of the case, gave their services gratuitously.—Some observations were made in defence of the clergyman, by Mr Estcourt, Sir Robert Inglis, and Mr A. Trevelyan; and by Mr Hume and Mr Gillon, on the oppressive nature of the proceedings.—The petition was then laid on the table.

ENGLAND.

POLITICAL ASSOCIATIONS.

THE resolution of the reformers to counteract the Conservative associations, by registration clubs, has been vigorously acted upon during the past month. Almost every large and many of the small towns throughout the empire have formed such associations, avowing for their chief object the registration of many of the liberal party as possible. Lord Stanley has addressed a letter on the North Lancashire Co-

...ative Association, to Sir T. Hesketh, from which following is an extract:—"Beware how you organise the whole country in such a manner that every man must be a partisan; and do not deceive yourselves by thinking that such an occurrence, forced on you, would strengthen your influence or augment your proportionate numbers. Beware, above all things, how you array the landed gentry and their dependents, in our mixed population, against the inhabitants of the mercantile and manufacturing towns. To ask no change in your county representatives, and to fear the democratic influence in the manufacturing boroughs. If you wish to create, to foster, to envenom it, interfere in their elections by your conservative associations; bring an extraneous influence to bear on their internal proceedings; and if there be a democratic spark in the town, you will kindle it into a flame. * * * Power vested in the hands, acting in concert for national objects, was one of the most dangerous symptoms of the early stages of the French revolution. Thank God! I see no cause to anticipate such scenes as then occurred; but there be a course calculated first to control the use of Commons, next to call in question and put in jeopardy the privileges of the House of Lords, the crown, and the throne, and in the progress of the operation to destroy public peace, private happiness, national confidence, it would be a system which could establish throughout the country, for political ends, and for permanent and systematic exertions, a rival set of political associations engaged in a daily struggle with each other for the maintenance of extreme principles—throwing over by joint consent, the first onset, the encumbrance of all those who would lend themselves neither to the one nor to the other, and then entering upon a protracted (and the more protracted the more embittered and irreconcilable) warfare of opinion. * * * Already, as we are aware, other associations are establishing themselves, with avowed objects not less plausible than yours, to maintain the freedom of elections, to effect the registration of votes, &c. The promoters of these associations admit that their effect will be to tear the country in pieces, and to render the task of government almost impracticable; but they shelter themselves under a political necessity of counterbalancing the combined organisation of associations similar to yours. It is a lamentable state of things when national good is sacrificed for the attainment of party triumph; but that party incurs a heavy responsibility which takes the first step towards provoking a conflict."

IPSWICH BRIBERY CASE.

The facts elicited by the inquiries of the committee on the Ipswich election, of which the results are elsewhere given, were of a most extraordinary nature, showing such a degree of depravity in all concerned as must shock every person of right feeling. The two Tory candidates, Mr. R. A. Dundas, Esq. 545; Fitzroy Kelly, Esq. 521; Rigby Wason, Esq. 521; James Morrison, Esq. 521. It is now clearly proved that this trifling majority obtained by wholesale bribery. The instrument of bribery was an experienced hand at Norwich—a place where all the arts of corruption are well understood—a John Pilgrim, who has been coroner of that city for twenty years, and confidential clerk to Messrs Sewell and Blake, solicitors, of Norwich, for thirty years. Mr. Kelly, one of the Tory candidates at Ipswich, and a barrister, wrote to Sewell and Co. a letter, in which he said—"We are much obliged to you for the services of my friend Pilgrim. He will be wanted." The meaning of this being well understood, Pilgrim was sent, and he acknowledged to have bribed by wholesale, giving about £200 vote, and receiving the money from Mr. Kelly, or in presence. Kelly said to him that he would not lose the election for thousands. When the election committee was to begin its inquiry into the bribery alleged in the petition to have been practised, Pilgrim and several other agents were sent off to Calais to be out of the way of the Speaker's warrant; the person who did this being Mr. Clipperton of London, Mr. Kelly's attorney; and these important witnesses remained there for some time. It happened, however, that Pilgrim's employers, Messrs Sewell and Blake, discovered in his name that he had embezzled from them the insignificant sum of £6, 13s. so far back as the year 1831; and one of the partners went over to Calais, and dismissed him from their service. This, or something else, induced him to return to England, and to Norwich; when the Tories, in mortal alarm at finding a witness who could reveal so much again within the reach of the Speaker's warrant, instantly took him into custody, brought him before the magistrates, made the most of a case of trifling embezzlement, got the Tory magistrates to prolong his examination, to detain him in spite of the Speaker's warrant, and at length got him committed to jail, refusing bail for his appearance. Luckily the Speaker's warrant was powerful enough to bring him up to London, and, to the disgust of Mr. Kelly and his friends, Pilgrim appeared on the 1st day, June 1, before the election committee, and let out all the secret history of the Tory bribery. The consequence of these disclosures was the unseating of the members, and the commitment of their subordinates to gaol, as elsewhere detailed. The Scotsman remarks—"There is something inconceivably revolting to all upright minds, in the practice of purchasing with money the suffrages of the humbler classes of the community. The beings who permit themselves to be bought, will acknowledge themselves not to belong to the class of moral agents. They may excite our deepest contempt, but they are entitled at the same time to our compassion. Their degradation is the result of their poverty and their ignorance; but the men who have enjoyed the advantages of a liberal education, who profess the doctrines of Christianity, and who pretend to be the friends and protectors of the poor, who can be guilty of corrupting every principle of integrity, and obliterating every glimmering of discrimination between right and wrong which may have reached the understandings of the humbler voters, merit our unmitigated execration; and the House of Commons will never satisfy the feelings of the people at large, until they shall prove, by their mode of dealing with their own corrupt members, that they view the act of bribery in this odious light. If the house seriously desires to put an end to this immoral degrading practice, it should pass a sentence of infamy, or other severe infliction, on the members who are convicted of the offence; and, according to the rule of law that a man is answerable for the actions of his commissioned servants, they ought to be held responsible, if their acknowledged agents are found guilty of the crime."

ELECTIONS.

THE election for South Staffordshire closed on the 27th May, by the triumph of Sir F. Goodricke, the Tory candidate, who had 1776 against Colonel Anson's 1553. In the course of the evening, some disturbances, to which various degrees of importance are attached by various partisans, took place at Wolverhampton, the scene of the election; a few pines in the Swan Inn, where Goodricke's committee assembled, were broken, and several gentlemen were insulted. The Tory magistrates present took so serious a view of this popular demonstration, that they deemed it necessary to read the riot act from the windows of the inn, and call out the military to disperse the people. The subsequent transactions were of so important a nature as to attract the attention of the House of Commons, June 1, when, at the urgency of Sir J. Wrottesley, Lord J. Russell agreed to send down a qualified person to inquire into the circumstances. The person chosen for this purpose was Sir F. Roe. The evidence taken on this occasion showed that a great crowd had assembled in front of the Swan Inn, where they shouted, yelled, and spit upon several individuals, but without proceeding to any actual violence of much importance; that some fear being entertained for their conduct throughout the evening, the riot act was read, and the military called in; and that, in riding through the streets, the soldiers (thirty-two in number) went in small parties, and rushed against the people, whom they struck and drove along with the flats of their sabres. In the violence of their motions, one horse fell and was killed, though it does not clearly appear by what means. The people, by whom many stones were thrown at the soldiers, took refuge in the churchyard, and in their houses, and the dragons continued to ride in a disorderly manner through the streets, firing at various individuals, in windows and within doors (thirty-five shots in all were fired), and cutting at several who were giving them no offence. A boy was shot in the leg, which was amputated. The remaining amount of injury to the people was three gunshot wounds and one sabre cut.

Mr. Kennedy, M.P. for Tiverton, having accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, a vacancy was created for Lord Palmerston, who was elected, June 1, without opposition.

Mr. Carruthers, the Tory member for Hull, having died suddenly, June 9, the vacant seat was contested by Colonel Peyronnet Thompson, editor of the Westminster Review, and Mr. H. Mildmay. The former gentleman was the successful candidate.

The late sitting members for Ipswich having been unseated for bribery, Messrs Morrison and Wason, their reforming opponents at the last election, once more presented themselves, and were opposed by Mr. Holmes and Colonel Broke, of the opposite complexion of politics, who in the canvass were warmly assisted by Messrs Dundas and Kelly. At the close of the poll, June 19, the votes were—For Morrison 542; Wason 533; Broke 455; Holmes 435.

Mr. More O'Ferrall was re-elected for Kildare, May 26, without opposition.

May 25. A bull, which had been over-driven from Smithfield, entered the shop of a linen draper on Ludgate Hill. The bull walked about the shop for some time, and seemed especially struck with the reflection of his own portly form in a large mirror; he then quietly went into the street again, having done no mischief, except frightening the shopmen and their customers.

June 9. The deputies from the several congregations of Protestant dissenters of the three denominations, in and within twelve miles of London, met at the King's Head, Poultry, and passed a series of resolutions, disapproving of the attempt to appropriate the public revenue in favour of new churches in Scotland.

—11. A dreadful accident occurred near the new market in the course of erection in the Nun's Field, Newcastle-on-Tyne, by which several lives were lost. Parts of the building on the south side of the street leading from the Turk's Head Inn, which had been raised nearly to its intended height, came down with a tremendous crash; and the men being at work, were precipitated along with them, and buried in the ruins. Five men were killed and eleven maimed, several seriously.

—14. This evening (Sunday) the neighbourhood of the Broadway, Great Chapel, and Orchard Streets, Westminster, was in a state of complete uproar, from the number of drunken and disorderly soldiers of the Guards rolling about and insulting every person within their reach. One of them was observed passing through York Street, in a drunken state, with his bayonet in his hand, uttering most obscene and disgusting language. Mrs. Howe, a respectable woman residing in that street, was attacked by him, and had great difficulty in escaping. He attacked another young woman with his bayonet, but she evaded the thrust. He then thrust his bayonet into the stuccoed front of Mr. Stearman's house, and staggered away, with his bayonet still drawn. The moment Mr. Stearman heard of the outrage, he applied at the Wellington Barracks, St. James's Park, for aid to take the fellow into custody; but so cavalierly was he treated, that he saw there was no hope of redress. These facts, should it be necessary, can be fully established by several respectable inhabitants of the neighbourhood, who are daily suffering from the insolent and unprovoked conduct of the Foot Guards stationed in and about Westminster.—[Two days before the occurrence of this outrage, a private in the 1st battalion of the Coldstream Guards seized a boy in Charles Street, Westminster, by the throat, and dashed his head through a shop-window. Upon two gentlemen interfering, he drew his bayonet, and was with great difficulty prevented from wounding them. The magistrates fined him five pounds, and sent him for two months to the treadmill. It may be added, that scarcely a week now passes without some such outrages being recorded by the newspapers.]

—15. Captain Robison was sentenced by the Court of King's Bench to four months' imprisonment, for a libel on General Darling, formerly governor of New South Wales.

—16. The races on Ascot Heath commenced. The attendance was far from numerous; and the running "reached the average, and nothing more." Next day, the "sport was indifferent, and the company thin." The principal event of the day was the announcement that Mr. Batson's Plenipotentiary, who was heavily backed for the cup on the ensuing day, would not start. The reason assigned by Mr. Batson was, that the ground was hard, and he was afraid of his horse breaking down. Much dissatisfaction was occasioned by this lame excuse, both among the bettors and the lovers of fine running. Thursday, the 18th, a brilliant and numerous assemblage graced the heath. The King was not there; being engaged to dine with the Duke of Wellington, he feared the additional fatigue. There was, however, a large party from Windsor Castle, who came with the Queen. The gold cup, value three hundred sovereigns, was gained by Lord Jersey's Glencoe, four years.

—17. Mr. John Shepherd was elected a director of the East India Company, in place of Mr. Cutlar Fergusson, resigned.

—18. The town-clerks of various corporations, whose offices are threatened by the municipal reform bill, held a private meeting at the British Coffeehouse, to concert measures for opposing it.—At two in the afternoon, an explosion of fire-damp took place in the Church Pit at Wallsend, when seventy-five boys, and twenty-five men, besides some superintendants, were in it. The whole, except three men and a boy, were destroyed, either by the flame or by subsequent suffocation.—The usual banquet, in celebration of the victory of Waterloo, took place in the house of the Duke of Wellington. The King honoured the Duke with his company.

The lord-lieutenancy of Sussex, resigned by the Earl of Egremont, has been given to the Duke of Richmond.

The Privy Council have begged that his Majesty will relieve them from the duty of giving any opinion respecting the proposed grant of a charter to the London University.

The Earl of Gosford, Sir Charles Grey, and Captain Gipps of the royal engineers, compose the commission which has been appointed by the government to proceed to Canada, with a view to the settlement of the dissensions of that province.

The expenses of the Ipswich inquiry, all of which, as well as the sums given in bribery and otherwise during the election itself, will fall on the late sitting members, Mr. Dundas (who formerly represented Edinburgh), and Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, are estimated to amount to nearly £15,000.—Globe.

The Bishop of London has made a regulation refusing ordination to any person, however excellent his qualifications and testimonials, who has exceeded the age of thirty.

The committee appointed to consider the complaint of the conduct of Colonel Tremehere, who was charged with improper interference in the last Chatham election, sat from the 31st of March to the 19th of May inclusive, when they presented their report, which is now printed. The committee have come to no decision, except to leave the points in question to the judgment of the house.

From a return just published, it appears that taxes to the value of £3,598,000 were repealed in the years 1833 and 1834; and new taxes (chiefly licence duties) imposed, to the extent of £1,99,600, leaving the net amount of relief to the country in round numbers, £3,400,000 per annum. The principal sources of the reduction were the abolition of the house-duty, and the repeal of one-half of the soap-duty.

The members of the Literary Fund Society dined together, at the Freemasons' Tavern, a few days ago; the Duke of Somerset in the chair. Among the other distinguished guests were Lord Teignmouth, Mr. Wilkie, Mr. Lockhart, Mr. Vernon Smith, Sir John Barrow, Dr. Roget, Mr. Macready, and Mr. Wyse. The amount of subscriptions announced was considerable, including £100 from the King, and £50 from the Duchess of Kent.

During two days near the beginning of last month, much curiosity was excited to see the front wall of a baker's house, contiguous to the Adelphi Theatre, in the Strand, which had sunk several inches, lifted to its original height by machinery, and properly secured. The means used were so efficient, that the whole house could have been lifted, if necessary, in the same manner.

The Colosseum has been purchased by Braham and Yates, and great preparations are making for evening entertainments there of a new character, but resembling Ranelagh of old; the day spectacle remaining as heretofore. Braham, it is also said, is about to build a theatre on the site of Nero's Hotel, St. James's, for which he has procured the Lord Chamberlain's licence.

The following regiments are for foreign service :— 27th and 28th, already sailed ; 43d, 60th, 80th, and 90th. Next to return from foreign service : 1st Royals, 20th, 22d, 25th, 38th, 96th, 97th, and 98th. Next again for service : 1st Royals, 2d battalion, 14th, 81st, 85th, 89th, and 91st. Next again for home : 7th, 42d, 79th, 88th, and 1st Rifle Brigade.

Among the innumerable painful circumstances which the newspapers from time to time record, few are more painful than those of the following class :—An union of Tory ladies has been formed in Newport, Isle of Wight, to abstain from dealing with reformers. A list of the tradesmen of Doncaster who supported Lord Morpeth at the late election has been published, as "persons who voted for the radical and destructive party;" to which is added a smaller list of those who voted for Mr Wortley, and who are stated to "deserve the patronage and support of the neighbouring gentry and farmers."

Another class of distressing paragraphs is that which chronicles the unpopular measures to which the clergy are compelled to resort for the assertion of their temporal rights. In the House of Commons, June 3, the following case was brought under notice :—A tithe of cabbages of the value of ninepence was claimed by the clergyman of a parish in Staffordshire ; which tithe having been set aside for the church in kind, but not removed after due intimation, the poor farmer foolishly thought himself justified in refusing to pay a second time. Not so the parson ; for he immediately instituted a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court at Lichfield, for payment of 7s. 6d., being the worth, according to the "established" valuation, of the half-dozen cabbages claimed. The farmer consulted the landlord (Mr Crompton, M.P., by whom the case was introduced), and that gentleman, wisely considering the difference between the cost of a heap of cabbages and the costs of an action, advised his tenant to submit to the extortion. The expense, as it was, amounted to L.15, 16s. 6d., all of which the poor farmer had to pay, in addition to the 7s. claimed by his religious instructor for the cabbage tithe !

At the third anniversary dinner in London, which was held in commemoration of the foundation of the Alms-houses erected out of the money subscribed for a reform illumination, Lord Brougham, the chairman, thus adverted to the positions of the ministry :—"In addition to a formidable majority leagued against them in the House of Lords, they had in the House of Commons to combat a powerful opposition, amounting to nearly one-half of the representation ; and what was worse, an opposition composed of a compact and resolute body, while their own party was split in half a dozen sections. But though thus comparatively weak in point of numbers, he was proud to say that the present ministry were strong in honesty of purpose—strong in the rights they had to guide them—strong, he trusted, in the support of their country. This was the support on which alone it could stand ; for should it desert and disregard the people, it would look in vain for court favour, and would be insulted, mocked, and turned out, with the contempt of the court which it had sought to fawn upon, and the detestation of the people whom it had betrayed. No ministry whatever could stand without the support of the people—it was the breath of their nostrils. He had said four years since, that no ministry ought to stand without the support of the people : he would now say—looking to the progress of public feeling and opinion—that no ministry could stand without it." The "liberty of the press, and the immediate repeal of the most pernicious of all taxes, the taxes on knowledge," elicited the following observations from the noble chairman :—"This toast had formerly been often drunk in Westminster, in the following form, 'the liberty of the press—it is like the air we breathe—if we have it not, we perish.' It was true that the air in question in some cases partook of the nature of an east wind ; that it was sometimes impregnated with the most noxious vapours, and conveyed to the ear harsh and grating sounds, disgusting falsehoods, contagious pestilential, and slanderous indecency ; yet no man out of St Luke's or Bedlam would abuse the air because the exceptions to its utility were so numerous. He had just recommended them, as the means to obtain good government, to keep a watchful eye on whatever ministry was in office ; the same vigilance would procure for them a free and a pure press. When they found a newspaper become corrupt, let them treat it with the indifference, contempt, and indignation it deserved ; they would soon find the remedy effective. On the other hand, let them not fail to support that portion of the press which did its duty manfully and honestly, even in some cases in opposition to its own interest. The taxes on knowledge were described on the toast-paper as pernicious : pernicious was an expression hardly strong enough ; he should call them infamous—he was going to say infernal. It was not very easy, however, to get this view of the case before the public, for the newspapers themselves were, in most cases, very careful in saying nothing about the matter ; 'not that they cared about it on their account ; oh, no ; they were quite disinterested parties : all that they feared was, that if the tax were taken off, the public would be shocked with the appearance of blasphemous, obscene, and seditious papers !' Now, he very much doubted whether any change of circumstances could increase the number of obscene, seditious, and blasphemous, certainly not of slanderous papers : indeed, if ministers would take off this tax, he would guarantee them against any increase in such publications."

At the Guildhall Court of Requests, a few days since, John Emmerson was summoned for the price of a violin, which Edward Shekil, a blind performer on the instrument, had lent him upon trial. The violin-player stated that the defendant was in the habit of supplying young men with musical instruments for performance in the street, where they obtained a great deal of money. One of them, however, popped off with the fiddle in question, as he had not been well looked after. The defendant said that the plaintiff used to play himself until he got a bad hand by a brickbat, which was thrown at him by an enraged opera singer, before whose window he was scraping out of all time. The plaintiff replied, "It is all your fault, as you sent me into the neighbourhood of the teachers of music. I give my oath that he has got the address of every fine musician in London, and off he sends one or two of the troop just when the ladies or gentlemen are sitting at their breakfast ; the minute the scratching begins, somebody roars out from within, 'Oh diabolissimo rascallo !' (Great laughter.) We then let fly the bow up and down over the strings as rough as we can, and presently down falls a shilling upon the pavement, and the gentleman calls out, 'Go away to the devil, musico blaguardo.'" (Laughter.) Some recrimination ensued between the parties, from which it appeared that men and women were in the habit of paying as much as 3s. 6d. per day for the loan of such instruments. At length the defendant agreed to let the plaintiff have a flute and dog to pursue his trade, and to pay a trifle per week for the violin, should he fail to find the thief.

The elopement of Mr R. B. Sheridan with the heiress Miss Grant, and their marriage on the 17th May at Gretna Green, were mentioned in the last paper. The circumstances under which this clandestine union took place have been made known through the newspapers. Mr Sheridan was aided in his scheme by three fashionable sisters, who supplied Miss Grant with clothes, and contrived to send her guardians in a wrong direction, while the pair were pursuing their way to the north. On the 28th May, the distressed father, Sir Colquhoun Grant, addressed the following letter to Lord Seymour :—"My lord, such has been the stupor and subsequent agony of mind I have endured since the sad event that has deprived me of the only remaining prop and comfort of my life, that till now I have not been able to calm my senses, or command my reason sufficiently to enable me to examine the circumstances connected with this foul transaction. If I have found it hard, very hard, my lord, to bear up against those afflictions which the will of heaven has visited me with, till but only one of all I had to bless my home was left to me, it is, I find, beyond humanity to endure that this last solace of my life, for whom alone I wished to live, should be torn from me by a train of artifice, disgraceful as it is cruel. My lord, I have said thus much, not with any wish or hope to move your sympathy—for that mockery would from you be fresh wrong—but merely that you may know that if I have a heart that deeply feels a grief, it can as acutely feel a wrong. The guilt of this my wrong, my lord, is shared by many ; by some placed beyond the reach of that vengeance due from me, and whom I must leave to the honour and character of society to punish ; by others, too, whom the laws of honour bring within my grasp ; among the latter I have just grounds for fixing on you, my lord. It might be hard, however so decided by law, in some cases, to hold a man responsible for the acts of his wife—such as where he could not, with the most honest feelings, control them ; but surely where, by active or tacit concurrence, he witnesses, wickedly or tamely, the most grievous injury done by her, the husband cannot complain that that redress, which could not in such case be obtained from the wife, should be demanded at his hands. In this precise predicament is your lordship placed with regard to me. At your house, from whence, it was known, mark, that my child had eloped, were assembled, with yourself and Lady Seymour, Mr and Mrs Norton, Mrs Blackwood, and Mrs Sheridan ; in whose presence (added to that of Colonel and Miss Armstrong, just arrived) my friend, and, in the event of my death, my daughter's guardian, as he stated himself to be, Sir Robert M'Farlane, required of your wife intelligence of her flight. This, in your hearing, and in that of all present, Lady Seymour refused ; and you, not enforcing Sir R. M'Farlane's right to trace my daughter, will, I think, be accused by all, as well as by myself, of having lent yourself to the plot. And for this most dishonourable conduct I demand that you render me satisfaction. My friend, the bearer of this, will, with yours, arrange matters without delay to this end." The parties immediately after had a meeting in a field near Hampstead, where, a single exchange of shots having taken place without effect, the seconds agreed that Lord Seymour had given due satisfaction, and the affair terminated.

Convictions have been obtained in Kent and Sussex against the individuals who lately committed such outrageous acts of riot against the poor-law commissioners. They have been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, with hard labour.

Two of the six men who were convicted at Dorchester in March 1834, and transported for seven years, for the offence of administering unlawful oaths, namely, James and George Lawless, are to receive a pardon in the colonies for the remainder of the term, provided their conduct has been good since their transportation. The other four are to receive immediately a pardon in the colonies, and after they have been there two years, if their conduct is good, will receive a full pardon.

The barque Manly, John Davies master, lately arrived in St Catherine's Docks, from Buenos Ayres, into which port the captain had been forced to put, owing to a mutiny in his crew. The vessel was on a whaling expedition ; but being well armed, it is supposed that the mates and a majority of the crew had resolved, if they could get rid of the captain, to turn pirates. But Captain Davies appears to have been a remarkably resolute man. As soon as he discovered the intentions of the mutineers, he removed a quantity of gunpowder and cartridges into his state-cabin, and determined to blow up the vessel rather than give her up. On the evening of Sunday the 23d of November last, it was resolved that White, the chief mate, should go below and seize the captain, and that on a given signal the second and third mates should proceed to his assistance, secure the captain's hands and feet, and throw him overboard. The captain, holding the muzzle of one pistol into a barrel of powder and the other pistol in his right hand, prepared to meet them. White first came down, but appeared thunder-struck when the captain, pointing his pistol towards him, declared if he moved an inch he would blow his brains out, and discharge the other pistol into the power. White appeared petrified with fear ; and the captain remained in this position several minutes with the pistol ready cocked, observing that the slightest pressure on the trigger would send them all into the air. White begged for mercy ; and the captain drove him with the muzzle of the pistol into a state-room, where he locked him in. The second mate came down soon after to look after White ; and, on receiving a similar reception, ran up the companion, and fell against his brother, who was standing on the hatchway, with the rope destined to the captain hand and foot. The captain, finding the ship was going out of her course, went on the deck with a steward, well armed, and found some of the men inclined to relent. He threatened to shoot the first man who disobeyed orders, and restricted the crew to a particular part of the vessel. Hearing, however, that the crew were still disposed to seize the ship, he thought best to run her into Buenos Ayres. White, in the interim, was released. The captain, carpenter, and steward (the latter of whom had been the captain's informant throughout the affair), kept watch, well armed. Blackwood, the second mate, made a confession of his guilt, which tended to implicate White as the ringleader of the mutiny. On the 7th of December, the vessel arrived at the river Plata, and anchored close to his Majesty's ship North Star, Captain Vernon Harcourt commander. The mutineers are expected to arrive soon, to take their trial at the Admiralty sessions.

IRELAND.

A BILL for the reform of the Irish corporations, similar in spirit to that for the reform of the English corporations, has been prepared by the Attorney-General, and is about to be introduced into Parliament.

The Dublin corporation has, in the case of the Earl of Mulgrave, for the first time departed from its custom of presenting an address to the new Lord-Lieutenant. This, however, has been compensated by a number of addresses from trades and parishes.

Owing to the failure of the potato crop, an appalling famine has taken place in the west of Ireland, reducing many of the people to feed on sea-weed, and leading in not a few cases with death from absolute starvation. In other parts of the country, the landlords are ejecting the humbler class of tenantry without mercy, and thus occasioning equal misery in another way. A clergyman named Dawson, at Ballinacraig, who was expected to institute some proceedings of this kind, fell a victim to a conspiracy which his tenants appear to have formed against him, having been shot, June 2, by three men in women's clothes, who are said to have undertaken that duty by lot. The men named Hogan, Dillon, and Fitzgerald, have since been apprehended on suspicion.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE INDUSTRIOUS IN AMERICA.—I think a European traveller, in order to form a just estimate both of the evils and advantages derived from the institutions of this country, should spend one day in the streets of New York, and the next in the walks of Hoboken. If in the one the toil, the care, the labour of mind and body, the outward and visible signs of the debasing pursuit of wealth, are marked in melancholy characters upon every man he meets, and bear witness to the great curse of the country ; in the other, the crowds of happy, cheerful, enjoying beings, of that order which in the Old World are condemned to ceaseless and ill-requited labour, will testify to the blessings which counterbalance that curse. I never was so forcibly struck with the prosperity and happiness of the lower orders of society in this country, yesterday returning from Hoboken. The walks along the river and through the woods, the steamers croling from the city, were absolutely thronged with cheerful, well-dressed population abroad, merely for the purpose of pleasure and exercise. Journeying labourers, handicraftsmen, tradespeople, with their families, bearing in their dress and looks evident signs of well-being and contentment, were all flocking from their confined avocations, into the pure air, the bright sunshine, and beautiful shade of this lovely place. I do not know any spectacle which could give a stranger, especially an Englishman, a better illustration of that peculiar excellence of the American government—the freedom and happiness of the lower classes. Neither is it to be said that this was a holiday, or an occasion of peculiar festivity ; it was a common week-day, such as our miserable manufacturing population spends from sunrise to sundown in confinement, incessant, unhealthy toil, to earn at its conclusion an inadequate reward of health and happiness so wasted. The contrast struck me forcibly ; it rejoiced my heart ; it surely was an object of contemplation that any of who had a heart must have rejoiced in. This country is in one respect blessed above all others, at above all others deserving of blessing. There are no poor—I say there are none, there need be none ; not here need lift up the despairing voice of hopeless and helpless wail, towards that heaven which hears what men will not. No father here need work away at his body's health and his spirit's strength in unavailing labour from day to day, and from year to year, bowed down by the cruel curse his fellows lay upon him. No mother need wish, in the bitterness of her heart, that the children of her breast had died before they exhausted that nourishment which was the only one by which misery could feel assured would not fail them. No need be born to vice, for none are condemned to poverty. Oh, it makes the heart sick to think of the horrible anguish that has been suffered by thousands and thousands of those wretched creatures, who want begets a host of moral evils fearful to contemplate, whose existence begins in poverty, struggles through care and toil, and heart-grinding burdens, ends in destitution, in sickness—alas! too often rime and infamy. Thrice blessed is this country, no such crying evil exists in its bosom; no such reproach, no such political rottenness. Not is the eye never offended with those piteous sights of human suffering, which make one's heart sick, and whose number appals one's imagination in thronged thoroughfares of the European cities; the mind reposes with delight in the certainty that not one human creature is here doomed to suffer to weep through life; not one immortal soul is thrown into jeopardy by the combined temptations of poverty and the heartless selfishness of those who pass it by without holding out so much as a finger to save it. If we have any faith in the excellence of mercy and benevolence, we must believe that this land will secure the blessing of Providence on this point.—Mrs Butler's Journal.

SCOTLAND.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The General Assembly assembled on the 21st May, and on the 22d, they considered commissions, one of which was of a peculiar nature. The town-council of Dundee having refused by a majority to elect a commissioner, the minority had elected one, who was now called upon to sit, while the Assembly passed a severe censure on the conduct of this popular body. An invitation from the pastors of the reformed church of Geneva, desiring the Scottish clergy to join them in celebrating the third centenary of the Reformation, was declined, on the score of heresies in that church.—Saturday, May 23, the Assembly received the report of the deputation which had been appointed to visit the government last year for endowments to new places of worship in Scotland. It appeared that the annual sum of £6000 had been requested in the first place, as a means of endowing sixty new parish churches with £100 a-year each, it being understood that in each of these cases the church should have been already built. The object of the deputation had received much favourable countenance from Lords Melbourne, Althorp, and Hugham, as well as from many of the Scottish members of the House of Commons. It was resolved to refer the deputation before the estimates for the present year should be made up. On the same day, the Assembly received a letter from the Original Burgher Synod, proposing an union with the church of Scotland.—Monday, May 25, Dr Brunton gave in the report of the committee on the Assembly's missions to India, containing the details of their progress, and of the state of the funds, in both of which cases the report was not favourable. The Rev. Mr Duff, a missionary, then rose, and, in a very eloquent address, gave a statement of the difficulties to be encountered in the attempts to teach the doctrines of Christianity to the people of India, in consequence of the tenacity with which the Hindoos cling to their superstitious systems of religion, to their systems of geography and astronomy, which they held as sacred as their theology. The rev. gentleman also stated, that the English language in India was in the same situation as was the Latin in this country at the time of the Reformation; it is the medium of receiving all knowledge; the English language is the reservoir of learning, and the native tongue was the medium of instruction; a demand has been created on the banks of the Indus for English books; the young Rajahs of Koor, besides many other persons of consideration, are now studying the English language; and, once let them get English books and English schools, they would no longer be Hindoos. Thanks to the committee and the speaker, and also to Mr Duff, were given from the Assembly. On the same day, the Assembly, by 186 against 13, affirmed a decision of the Presbytery of Dumbarton, degrading Mr John Crichton from his place as minister of Kilmarnock, and depriving him of his licence, on account of his habits of excessive indulgence in spirituous liquors.—Tuesday, May 26, the Assembly received the report of its committee on education, and agreed to re-appoint the same, to renew their recommendations to all the presbyteries, ministers, and congregations in Scotland, that they employ all the means in their power to keep up and improve the funds requisite for continuing and extending the blessings of a Christian education in our land, to approve of the suggestions of their committee with respect to the institution of model or training schools, the establishing of ordinary schools to a larger extent, not only in the Highlands, but in large and populous towns, and especially in the several districts lately erected, as parishes, to the Parliamentary churches in the Highlands and Islands—and to petition the House of Commons for such aid as may enable them to accomplish some very valuable and beneficent objects. Principal Duff moved that the Assembly rescind the resolution of last year, by which ministers of chapels of ease were appointed to the status of parish ministers; but the Assembly agreed, on the motion of Dr P. Macfarlane, by 107 to 10, not to disturb the operation of the act.—[It appears, that, during the last 100 years, 63 chapels of ease had been erected, that there are now petitions to the Assembly for 20 new ones, and that 20 more are in operation.]—On Wednesday, May 27, the Assembly, by 146 to 139, overruled an objection which had been made by the parishioners of Trinity-Gask to Lord Gray's sentence, Mr A. H. Gray, whose appeal they sustained, on the plea of informality in the objection, remitting to the Presbytery of Auchterarder to proceed with his trials, with instructions to receive from the heads of families any specific objections to Mr Gray, and to judge of them as if no moderation of a call had taken place.—Thursday, May 28, Dr Chalmers read the report of the committee on church accommodation, from which it appeared that donations to the amount of £68,677, 12s. 5d. had been lately received on this account, Glasgow furnishing no less a contingent than £23,200. The aim of the committee was to build churches from funds of this nature, but to look to the state for benefices to the ministers, so that whole families of the poorer classes might have gratis accommodation. Dr Chalmers stated that he and two or three ministers of the church proposed going to London, not as a formal deputation, but to converse with various members of the government and legislature respecting the contemplated grant. The Assembly agreed, by 130 against 129, to remit to the Presbytery of Irvine to endeavour to remove the prejudices of the parishioners of Dregghorn against Mr J. C. Jamieson, who had been presented to them before the act of last year respecting calls, but rejected; and if the dissents should be persevered in, to reject the call. [It was subsequently found that this decision was vitiated by a false vote, which some unknown person had given in the name of Mr Nivison of Robertson. The case was therefore remitted to the next Assembly.]—Friday, May 29, it was reported to the Assembly, that 47 presbyteries approved, and 27 disapproved of the overture respecting calls, and that of those which approved, 23 objected to the accompanying regulations, while 13 approved of the same. Lord Moncrieff moved that the overture become a standard law of the church, and that the regulations be remitted to the committee. Principal Macfarlane made an opposite motion, which was lost by 124 against 178.—Saturday, May 30, a committee was empowered to appoint a week day for fast and humiliation, in order to conciliate the favour of the Almighty to the church.—On Monday, June 1, the Assembly received reports respecting proposals which had been made for an union of the Synod of Ulster, certain English Presbyterian congregations, and the Original Burgher Synod of Scotland, with the church of Scotland. Steps were taken to further those objects.—The Moderator, in dissolving the Assembly, made a speech of considerable length, in which he characterised the times in which we live as times of trouble, and rebuke, and blasphemy. "A dark and portentous cloud," said he, "seems to be gathering and thickening around us. We see the spirit of daring blasphemy, and the spirit of bold infidelity, and the spirit of impious fanaticism, and the spirit of damnable heresy, and the spirit of open disregard to God's word and ordinances and Sabbath, pervading and increasing in the land. But this is not all. A meretricious charity or liberalism, of no definite principle, has taken hold on the minds of not a few influential and zealous Christians, which has either amalgamated them with unprincipled worldly professors of religion, or softened into utter weakness their zeal for the one faith which was delivered to the Saints, and for the vindication and maintenance of which so many holy men of whom the worthy suffered all the pains and horrors of martyrdom. These charitable or liberal Christians mean well, be it granted; they seek peace, and eschew it. But they consider not what every Christian of a well-instructed and well-regulated mind should consider, that peace is pursued and obtained criminally and sacrilegiously if it be at the expense of either sound doctrine or pure communion. And there is a banding together in the land, of men of the most opposite principles and professions—of believing men with infidel men—of evangelical men with heretical men—of Protestant men with Roman Catholic men—of men of great professing godliness with men of no godliness whatever—a banding together of them, heart and hand, to overthrow the Christian establishment of the country, and that Christian establishment especially which their own forefathers and others founded, and which was the palladium of Scotland's civil and religious liberty in the days of her perilous struggle. And of this strange, unnatural, mysterious banding, the bitter fruits are already appearing in our cities, and our towns, and our villages. There is a falling away of that distinctive spiritual Christianity which prevailed in these happy communities; and they are now torn by the spirit of controversy in points of no essential consequence to any one's spiritual benefit."

DAY OF HUMILIATION.

The General Assembly, May 30, appointed the 23d of July to be observed throughout the bounds of the church as a day of humiliation and fast; and an address subsequently published states the objects of the proposed observance to be—to seek to atone for the past negligence of the church—to deplore the alienation of a great portion of the people from religion—to seek the blessing of the Almighty on new efforts for the conversion of the heathen at home and abroad—and to reduce the minds of the members of the church into a state of more truly Christian kindness towards each other, and towards those who differ from them in opinion, than what has lately prevailed. The appointment of this solemnity originated with the more zealous party of the Scottish church, who, after more than a century of comparatively little influence, have within the last two years gained a complete ascendancy. It is stated that the observance would have been rather avoided by the moderate party, as they are called. The dissidents and other enemies of the church have very generally pronounced the proposed fast an insult, so far as they are concerned, seeing that they are called upon to interrupt their business, and accede to a number of external observances, on account of objects, which, however endeared to the leaders of the church, are conscientiously regarded by them as anti-religious and immoral.

The Central Board of Dissenters have accordingly memorialised government not to sanction the fast, which, on the other hand, it is stated the government does not design to do, the church aiming at no exercise of the civil power in their favour. A numerous meeting of the working classes was held on Bruntsfield Links, Edinburgh, on the 23d June, at which the following resolutions were passed:—"That the meeting view with regret the design of the General Assembly to impose upon the people of this country a fast for purposes at variance with the conscientious opinions of the people, and for reasons which the Assembly itself has not had the courage to admit.—That the meeting declare their determined opposition to the church endowment scheme, and directly deny the truth of the assertion of the necessity of additional church accommodation for the working population, who can and do support their own churches."

MR JOHNSTON, M. P. FOR THE CUPAR BURGHS.

THE majority of voters for Mr Johnston, who called upon him to resign, in consequence of his vote on the Irish education question, have expressed much indignation at the opinions given by the three statesmen to whom Mr J. referred his case, alleging that the affair was entirely between themselves and their representative, and that they were the sole judges in it. That he pledged himself unconditionally to resign when called upon by a majority of his voters to do so, has been attested before a magistrate of St Andrews, by six of his most respectable constituents, and also by a legal gentleman who acted as his friend, in mediating between him and some of the constituency during the canvass. Mr Johnston having persisted in keeping his seat, the subject was brought by petition before the House of Commons, who, though unable to consider it in their legislative capacity, seem, if any faith is to be placed in the following paragraph from the Courier, to have decided upon it in a very significant manner in their capacity of private gentlemen:—"Mr Andrew Johnston last night (June 18) hazarded an experiment upon the forbearance of the House of Commons, which he will not, we suspect, be rash enough to be tempted to repeat. He had given notice of a motion for an address for the consent of the crown to the introduction of a bill for abolishing the patronage of laymen in the church of Scotland. When called on by the Speaker, the house consisted of about one hundred and twenty members. The commencement of his address was the signal for departure. The members glided away at no slow rate. Still he proceeded with imperturbable gravity, composure, and self-complacency, until, on looking round, he found himself speaking in a house containing, perhaps, fifty members. He paused for a moment, and then, with a view to prevent the consummation for which all were longing, he appealed to his now diminished audience and to the empty benches, on his claims to their attention, from the importance of the subject, but, alas! Mr Andrew Johnston forgot who was the speaker addressing the house. He calculated without his host. The voices of none were raised in his behalf. Not one solitary cheer was heard to reassure him. He now obviously became shaken, and proceeded but languidly, until not more than thirty members were in the house. A motion was then made for counting the house, and strangers were ordered to withdraw. The tittering of the seceding members in the lobby proclaimed the result. The orator was completely extinguished. We have heard, or we are sure we ought to have heard, the last of the so-distant representative of the city of St Andrews in the Commons' House of Parliament. The deputations of the Scotch established, as well as of the Scotch dissenting clergy, who were present last night, expecting the conclusion of the debate on the Scotch church grant question, had an opportunity of judging of the estimation in which Mr Andrew Johnston is now held by the house. What course he means to follow, after what passed last night, we cannot conjecture. The best friend he has cannot even now give him sounder advice than he got from us a month or two ago. He must resign. Every day's delay will increase his embarrassment, and add to the miseries, discomforts, and discredit of his situation. Does he not possess one kind, sincere friend?"

—May 30. The Edinburgh Model Infant School was exhibited in presence of a respectable company, Lord Cockburn in the chair. The report stated that this institution—excellent and most useful as every one must consider it, who has observed its mode of operation—is not so prosperous as might be desired; for which we would account by simply pointing to the ignorance which still generally prevails respecting infant education.—Mark Devlin, convicted of rape at the Perth Circuit Court, was executed at Dundee, being the second individual who has suffered at that town for thirty-four years.

June 2. A young unmarried woman was accused, in the police court, Glasgow, of having committed various acts of cruelty upon her female child, of seven months old. Witnesses of her own sex deposed that the prisoner had been discovered some time ago in a state of intoxication, sitting near the fire-place, and the child lying among the ashes under the grate. On another occasion she was lifted off the child in bed, the infant's side being much discoloured, and its breathing greatly impeded, in consequence of the weight and pressure of its inhuman mother. She was afterwards seen holding the child towards the fire, uttering imprecations, and wishing it was dead, and never to trouble her more. In various instances, her faculties had been so much impaired by intoxication, as to render her unable to distinguish other children from her own; and her desire for whisky was so strong as to lead her to spend upon ardent spirits the money which she had received for the purpose of procuring bread and milk for the infant. Her extraordinary cruelty and neglect excited the sympathy and charity of the neighbours towards her offspring to such an extent, that it was suckled several weeks by individuals who were comparatively strangers, and was ultimately conveyed to the Town's

Hospital, so sickly and emaciated as to resemble a skeleton rather than a living child. The court expressed its utter abhorrence of the unnatural conduct of the defender, amounting, as it did, to almost the premeditated destruction of her infant. She was sentenced to sixty days' confinement in Bridewell.

— 4. A woman named Jessie M'Kay, from Peterhead, who came to Grantown in Strathspey in company with a man named James Cumming, was murdered by him in a public house in that village, by being thrown violently against the chimney, a projecting stone having given her a fatal blow on the forehead. They had been drinking and quarrelling from the time of their entering the village. The man has been lodged in Inverness jail.

— 7. This (Sunday) evening, a fire broke out in the machine-works of Mr William Dunn, High John Street, Glasgow. Owing to a difficulty in obtaining water, the whole building, containing property to a large amount, was destroyed before next morning. It must be mentioned to the honour of the proprietor, who is a man of extensive business and resources, that he has continued all the workmen of the manufactory in pay, notwithstanding their being thrown idle.

— 9. Between fifty and sixty convicts were shipped at Leith for the hulks, preparatory to transportation. Among the number was the notorious John Clarkson, who has for so many years evaded the vigilance of the various police officers in the three kingdoms, but who has at last paid the forfeit of his many crimes, thanks to the exertions of the Glasgow police.

— 13. The conservative party in Edinburgh celebrated the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo with a dinner, at which upwards of three hundred were present, Mr D. Macneill, advocate, in the chair.

Public meetings have taken place in various parts of the country, to form petitions in favour of the abolition of the taxes on knowledge. The most onerous of these is certainly the stamp duty on newspapers; but the paper duty, which is less brought under notice, is also a heavy tax. It amounts to 3d. per pound weight on all kinds of writing and printing papers—that is, about 25 per cent. on good paper, and much more upon the inferior kinds. Upon calculation, we find that the people of Scotland have, during the two past years, paid L.2355 of paper duty for what they have purchased of our periodical publications; a still greater sum must have been paid in England.

The Association for the Promotion of the Fine Arts, which some time ago mentioned to have been formed in Edinburgh, for the purpose of buying pictures and disposing of them by lot, collected funds in the first year to the amount of L.728, the greater part of which has been expended in pictures exhibited by the Scottish Academy. These pictures were, May 29, distributed among the members.

Mr George Moir, advocate, translator of Wallenstein, and author of many admired papers on foreign literature in the reviews, has been appointed, upon the commission of the late ministry, to the chair of Rhetoric in the University of Edinburgh.

Troop-sergeant-major Moorhead, of the 5th dragoon guards, at Piershill barracks, who was shot by private James Bell of the same regiment, in the stable, on Sunday the 17th May, died on the 25th. Bell was tried, June 22, before the High Court of Justiciary, when, a plea of insanity having been overruled, he was found guilty, and condemned to be executed on the 13th July.

Church Petitions.—Up to the 27th May, the total number of petitions presented to Parliament, in favour of the church, was 398; signatures, 95,419—against any grant, petitions, 161; signatures, 80,147.

The seventh Report on Highland churches contains the following particulars. In 1833, the sum of L.50,000 was granted by Parliament to build 40 churches in the Highlands, and government further undertook to endow the ministers at the rate of L.100 per annum. By a second act in 1834, the allowance to ministers was increased to L.120, and an addition of three was made to the churches. The expense of church and manse was not to exceed, and, except in a few cases, did not exceed L.1500. In all, 43 churches and ten manses have been built, one or other in some cases by the heritors. The amount of public money expended has been about L.60,000. This, however, says the Report, does "not represent the entire benefit conferred. The religious services of 42 additional ministers in perpetuity, have not been obtained for less than L.5000 per annum; that is, for a perpetual annuity, worth about L.120,000, which, with the above-mentioned grant and expenditure, amounts to no less than L.180,000, appropriated to the advancement of religion in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland." Of the new churches, 14 are in Argyre; 6 in Inverness; 10 in Ross and Cromarty; 4 in Orkney and Shetland; 3 in Perth; 3 in Sutherland; 2 in Caithness; 1 in Banff; 1 in Elgin. Seat rents, at very low rates, have been collected in about half these churches; but they are falling off, as the people, who are far from able, and by no means willing, think it hard that they should pay in the Parliamentary churches, while their countrymen in the parochial churches sit rent free.

Dr Bowring, M.P. for Kilmarnock, having requested instructions from his constituents in that town as to the way in which he should vote on the question of church endowment, the sense of the wards was taken; when 185 desired him to vote in favour of the scheme, and 179 that he should vote against it.

In consequence of the resignation of Mr Oswald, M.P. for Ayrshire (disabled for further duty by bad health), a new election will have taken place (June 27) before the publication of this paper. The candidates are, Mr Dunlop, a Whig, formerly member for Kilmarnock, and Sir John Cathcart of Carleton, a Tory.

The colony of the Eifer militia, vacated by the death of Mr J. T. Hope, has been bestowed, by the Lord Lieutenant, the Earl of Rosslyn, with the sanction of the government, upon Colonel Lyndsay, the defeated Tory candidate for the county.

Lord John Russell has refused to appoint a number of gentlemen, recommended by the Duke of Gordon, to be deputy-lieutenants of the county of Aberdeen.

The first week of June was marked by a series of thunderstorms of considerable violence, which overspread a great part of the island, and occasioned the death of about five or six persons in different places.

Notwithstanding that the spring was fully a fortnight more backward than last year, every species of crop is said to be looking well, except the potatoes, of which another failure is dreaded in many parts of the country.

The strange pranks sometimes performed by the electric fluid during thunderstorms are exemplified in a most singular, we might say amusing manner, on the 8th June, in a house in St Andrew Street, Leith. It forced its way into the house by a bolt-hole of a window, and directly opposite went into the wall, forcing its course up the inside, until it reached a door, which it pressed upwards and destroyed. The fluid then ran into one side of an adjoining window, from thence made a tour round the room, and went out at the other side of the window; it then ran up the house, and along the tiles, and after knocking away a piece of the gable, ascended into the atmosphere and exploded. Two women were sitting in the room where the lightning first entered, who fortunately escaped unhurt. They state that the noise and illumination it produced were beyond all description.

The schemes resorted to by persons of depraved habits in low life to procure whisky, are often of such a nature as would excite, were they known, the deepest surprise in those who, from their position in society, have no opportunity of observing them. The love of excitement caused by spirituous liquors frequently takes so strong a hold of their minds, that it creates a passion within them, almost amounting to frenzy, which no moral influence can be found strong enough to suppress, and which exhibits itself in schemes for meeting its cravings, often the most original and striking. The common practice of disposing of wearing apparel and household furniture for such purposes is too well known to be now wondered at. Pawning blankets in the morning which must be relieved at night is also known to exist to an awful extent. Women have been known, after disposing of every portable article in their houses, to sell the coals from their cellars, which ought to have been used in cooking the wretched victuals, provided, perhaps, by a husband for his starving children; and even these victims have not unfrequently been exchanged for the poison which has already destroyed every vestige of comfort within the poor man's dwelling. Our readers will perhaps scarcely credit the statement, that a female, not long ago, presented herself at the counter of a spirit-dealer in the suburbs, a few minutes before nine o'clock morning, and offered her husband's porridge in pawn for a glass of whisky. Such was, nevertheless, the fact, though the wretched offer was indignantly refused by the shopman. Tricks of every kind that ingenuity can devise are practised, chiefly by females, who, not having the same means at command as men, are compelled to resort to them more frequently, to gratify their debased appetites.—Glasgow Argus.

Lately, during the process of excavating the foundation of an old house, on the west side of the High Street, Montrose, belonging to David Gray, Esq., a very large assortment of ancient silver and copper coins was discovered—in number, we believe, upwards of 1400, principally of the reign of Queen Mary, and a few of her son, King James. The former bearing dates from 1555 to 1559. Many of these relics are in a state of high preservation, notwithstanding several centuries in all probability having elapsed since they were imbedded in the earth.

The government has converted the loan of L.20 to mechanics and labourers emigrating to Australia, into an unconditional bounty to the same amount.

Postscript.

June 19. Messrs Vigors and Raphael, reformers, were elected for the county of Carlow by majorities of respectively 627 and 626 against 572 and 571, the numbers for their opponents, Messrs Bruen and Canavanagh.

— 22. The House of Commons sat in committee on the municipal corporation reform bill, and agreed to the first five clauses. Next evening, a stand was made by the Conservative party upon the ninth clause, which provides that no person shall henceforth acquire the rights of a freeman in any borough except by occupancy and payment of rates, according to this act. Sir W. Follett moved as an amendment to this clause, that the rights which were preserved by the reform bill to freemen, and persons who should hereafter be entitled by birth and servitude to be freemen, should be continued; which, after a keen debate, was lost by 232 to 278.—24. Mr Wyse's education (Ireland) bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed that day three weeks.

20. At his seat, East Cowes Castle, Isle of Wight, in his 83d year, Mr Nash, the celebrated architect. In private life he was a warm-hearted and generous man; of his professional rank and talent it is more difficult to speak soberly and justly. He was, as is well known, especially patronised by his late Majesty, who had a somewhat strange and fantastic taste in architecture, and was certainly not a man to be dictated to or controlled. After all, these are matters of comparative unimportance, when it is remembered that to one or the other, probably to the one for suggesting and authorising, and to the other for elaborating out and carrying into effect, we are indebted for the magnificent improvements which have of late years taken place in London—improvements which contribute equally to the beauty and the health of the town—to the luxury of the rich, and the comfort and enjoyment of the poor.—Athenaeum.

24. At his residence, Portland Place, London, Thomas Earl of Longford, Baron Litchester of England, K.St.P., one of the representative peers of Ireland, in his 61st year.

25. At Hartree House, Jo'n Dickson, Esq. of Kilbucho and Hartree, aged 83 years.—At Vine House, Milborne Port, Somerset, Sir William Coles Medleycott, Bart. in his 68th year.

26. At Bruntsfield House, the seat of his brother-in-law, Major-General Sir John Dalrymple, Bart. of North Berwick.

27. Mr Allison, sen. the eminent vinegar-maker, Leith Walk.

28. At Cowes, the Right Hon. Mary Baroness Kirkcubright, wife of Robert Davis, Esq. R.N.

29. At the Manse of New Kilpatrick, the Rev. George Sym, in the 83d year of his age.—At her hotel, Rue de Monsieur, the Countess de Montesquieu Frenze, relict of the Grand Chamberlain of Napoleon. This lady filled with credit the station of governess to the king of Rome for several years.

30. Suddenly, at Glasgow, on his way to Leamington, Charles Gordon, Esq. wine-merchant, Provost of Forres.

31. At his house, in Blandford Square, William Smith, Esq. formerly one of the representatives for the city of Norwich.

June 2. In Addison Road, the Hon. George Barrington, captain in the royal navy, in his 40th year, second son of the late and brother to the present Viscount Barrington.

4. At Leith, Mr John Fogg, of the High School there.

5. At Brymbo Hall, Denbighshire, Alexander Murray, Esq., advocate, son of the deceased William Murray, Esq. of Polmaise.

8. At his house, Green Street, Grosvenor Square, London, George Watson Smyth, Esq. in his 87th year.

12. At the house of Thomas Russell, Esq. Croydon, the Hon. George Anderson Pelham, in his 49th year, only brother of Lord Yarborough.

14. At St Helens, near Melrose, Isaac Haig, Esq. of St Helens.—Judge Vandeule, of the Irish Court of King's Bench. It is said that the vacant seat on the bench has been offered to the Attorney-General, Mr Perring; but it is not certain that he will accept. Should he take it, however, it is probable that Mr O'Moynihan will be Attorney-General, and Mr Richards, a liberal member of the bar, in good repute as a lawyer, will be Solicitor-General. Mr Richards is also mentioned for an Indian judgeship, as it is said to be the intention of ministers to give Irish lawyers their fair share of colonial preferment.

15. At the house of his brother, the Hon. and Rev. R. B. St. John, Cloisters, Windsor Castle, the Earl of Courtown, K.P., in his 70th year.

16. The Duchess of Argyll, in her 61st year.

18. At Normandy Farm, in Surrey, at or above the age of 73, a celebrated political writer William Cobbett, in consequence of inflammation in the throat. He rose from the condition of a common agricultural labourer, through those of an attorney's clerk and a common soldier, to be one of the most conspicuous men of his time in England. His career as a political writer was commenced in America, on the Tory side, in which he continued some time after his return to England in 1801, the cause of change being a personal affront from Mr Pitt. His Register, published for thirty-three years, and, notwithstanding frequent repetitions of the same opinions, must be considered an amazing example of copious thought and ready writing. The language of Cobbett was perhaps the purest popular English that has been written since the days of Swift, and its nervous eloquence rendered it a subject of universal admiration; but Cobbett, with wonderful powers of special pleading, had not a generalising mind, and was therefore liable to such prejudices, inconsistencies, and blindnesses, as greatly reduced the value of his compositions.

In the Place Vendôme, Paris, in his 67th year, the Earl of Devon.

In his 31st year, the Rev. George Gray Stuart, son of the Hon. Archibald Stuart, of Balmerino, vicar of Milbourn Street, and Dalish, Dorset.

EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

A proposal now pending for applying the spare resources of the established church in Ireland to the education of the people, and Mr Wyse's bill for erecting a Board of National Education in that country, has attracted so much attention to this subject, that a brief outline of what has heretofore been done to train the young in Ireland cannot fail to be acceptable to the public.

In the dark ages, Ireland was remarkable above most of other countries for the number and excellence of its schools, which were then resorted to by students from various parts of Europe, and formed in some measure a fountain of light for England itself. After the Reformation, however, the conventual and diocesan schools, which had flourished there as in all other Catholic countries, were abolished, and an attempt was made by an act of Henry VIII. to establish parochial schools in their place, every rector and vicar being obliged by oath at his induction to keep up such an establishment, in order to instruct the natives in the English tongue, as the existence of the Irish was considered a main obstacle to the progress of civilisation, and to the establishment of English and Protestant supremacy. This, however, though confirmed by an act of William III., was never more than a dead letter. As proselytism to the Protestant faith was made the chief object, there were soon no scholars, and in no masters. "Parochial schools," says Mr Wyse in his speech on introducing the bill above mentioned, "were dispensed with in many cases—the statute itself was despised as 'obsolete,' 'impracticable,' 'superfluous,' but the oath (that the minister should either cause to be kept, a school within his benefice) was still taken, and the tithe, though subject to such a condition, retained. Neither penalty nor forfeiture was enforced: the bishops, who were the persons to see it, were copartners in the offence." "The spirit of the church, and therefore of the state, which was but its instrument, was not education, but proselytism. Not only did they shut up their own schools, but they would not allow of any other. From William III. down to George III., knowledge was almost as much interdicted to the Papist as liberty. Catholics not only were not permitted to endow schools, but parents were not permitted to educate their own children. It was penal to give them education abroad, and a penal to give them education at home, unless it came from the Protestant clergy. As in Scotland, so in Ireland, zeal for popular education is ascribed to the Reformation; but in the latter case the assertion is wholly incorrect. Nothing was allowed but what came through the hand, and bore the licence-stamp, of the taskmaster. This, it is true, was but one stain upon a statue all of blood, but it was a stain of a deep and cruel kind. It found where the soul chiefly lay, and attempted to crush it there. If the man became a Protestant, he could gavel his father's blessing. Well; the object of these Protestant schools was to make him a Protestant. Let us now see how the system worked for the social and moral improvement of the nation. Take a father, weak enough to rely on the authority of these institutions for which he paid—sending his son to one of these schools the old inheritance of the nation—fearful of the laws, but still more of ignorance—and awaiting with impatience the return. The child of his old age, loving and beloved, comes back with another creed and another character—corrupted by the very law itself, the guardian of domestic duty and public morality—despising his father, envying his brother, grasping in thought already the bribe which the state, the church—a Christian church—holds up to his avidity. These things seldom occurred, but only because they were seldom risked. The parent, who, after one example of the kind, could send his child to such a school, instituted to teach rebellion to parents, hatred to brothers, was no parent; he deserved the retribution of despised grey hairs, and unsupported old age brought down in sorrow to the grave. Nor if he took the alternative, and educated abroad, was the grievance less intolerable. His son outstrips, we will suppose, all competitors in some foreign university; he returns home crowned with every literary honour; how is he met on his first landing on his native shores? With the congratulations of his country? No, but with the brand and punishment of a felon. Yet, with all this, Protestantism did not increase, Catholicism did not diminish—the only effect the system had, was to destroy or to pervert education. If it gave any, it was miseducation: to the Protestant, the education of an arrogant master; to the Catholic, that of an indignant slave. This 'national education,' as it was preposterously called, this 'national education,' not more national than the education which was its handmaid, was to civilise each, and it barbarised both. Empty cathedrals and ruinous schools were its monuments; a coterie instead of a church, and a corporation assuming the name of a country were its administrators." Notwithstanding the disadvantages thus feelingly described, the Catholic Irish, who are nationally characterised by a desire to give their children education, have all along contrived to maintain a great number of the mean establishments called hedge schools, where a slender and imperfect degree of instruction was conferred on a considerable portion of the rising generation.

During the century between 1731 and 1831, various attempts were made by private associations, generally with the aid of government, to educate the people of Ireland. Almost every one of them, however, went to wreck upon the fatal principle that the religious instruction should be exclusively Protestant. The celebrated Charter School Society, commenced at the first of these dates, has continued up till a recent period to spend vast sums in the vain attempt to proselytise by means of education. Their plan was to get hold of children—the term is quite appropriate—to catch them, if possible, wild, or transfer them from the Foundling Hospital, and to immure them in schools where they also got food and clothing, so that they should never come in contact with their parents or with the Catholic religion, till they should be firmly established in the Protestant faith. As hardly any Catholic families would allow their children to be taken from them for such a purpose, the system has been signally unsuccessful. The society has never had above 50 schools or 2000 scholars, more generally about 40 schools and 1400 scholars; an amount so trifling as compared with the whole population, that it would not be worth mentioning, if it were not for the instructive lesson which the failure of such a plan holds forth. The expense of these few schools has been enormous. Besides all the private contributions, about £10,000 per annum has been voted to them by Parliament; the whole grants of public money amounting to £1,105,869. It is also alleged that the few scholars thus reared were striking examples of the utter folly of such an attempt. A horrible system of cruelty and coercion prevailed in the schools; all the natural affections of the pupils were suppressed; they were forbidden to see any human being related to them; and they grew up in total ignorance of nature and society. Hence, when they were sent abroad, they appeared stunted both in body and mind, and were found totally unfit to make their way in the world. In 1824, the society was found maintaining no fewer than 706 grown individuals, or about a half of their usual number of pupils, who had been unfitted, by their system, for procuring a maintenance in any other way. A more deplorable instance of human folly could not easily be found in any part of the world, than what is presented by the Charter School Society of Ireland.

The Incorporated Association for Discountenancing Vice, commenced in 1792, was the second of these societies, and made a great improvement upon the first. In the schools established by it, whilst the Church Catechism was used for Protestant children, nothing was required from those of Catholic parents but to read the Scriptures. In November 1819, it numbered 119 schools, attended by 4460 Protestants and 4368 Catholics; in 1824, 9578 of the former, and 6344 of the latter. The London Hibernian Society, established in 1806, was less liberal in its plan, and has not done so much good among the Catholics. In 1823, it had 653 schools, attended by 61,387 scholars; besides which, it had many Sunday schools.

In 1812, a society was formed, under the sanction of a Parliamentary committee, for the education of the Irish poor: it is usually called the Kildare Place Society, from the street in Dublin where its chief establishment has been built. Its grand principle was to afford education to every description of the lower class of the people, keeping clear of all interference with the particular tenets of any; and its specific objects were—to aid in the founding of new schools and the improvement of old ones, provided the principles of the society were adopted; to maintain two model schools for the exhibition of their plan, and the training of teachers; and to publish moral, instructive, and entertaining books, fitted to supersede the objectionable works then in use. The Kildare Place Society began to operate in 1817, and had prospered so much before 1825, that it then had 1490 schools, attended by about 100,000 scholars; in 1830, 1620 schools (two thirds of them in Ulster) and 132,573 scholars. The system of instruction was a combination from those of Bell, Lancaster, and Pestalozzi. Each child attending the model schools in Kildare Place paid one penny per week. In the course of the seven years ending 1824, the society had published fifty-two small treatises, of which the total issue had been 956,702 volumes; the loss upon the sale £650 per annum. Up to 1828, the Kildare Place Society had received £170,508 from the public funds, and there has since been a grant of £30,000, making the whole £200,508.

During the same recent period, something has been done for the instruction of the poor in Ireland by the Baptist Society, the Irish Society, and the Sunday School Society. The last has been particularly efficient.

From inquiries made in 1828, it appears that there were in Ireland 11,823 elementary schools, of which no less than eight-elevenths were pay-schools, conducted by private enterprise, and altogether unconnected with either the clergy or charitable societies. The number of scholars in 1824 was 560,549, of whom 394,730 (Protestants 87,328, and Catholics 307,402) paid for their education. The number of masters and mistresses in 1828 was 12,550, of whom 3098 professed the established religion, 1058 the Presbyterian, and 8300 the Catholic, while of seventy-four the religious denomination was not ascertained. Upon the whole, the proportion of school-attenders to the total population shows rather better in Ireland than in England; a fact probably attributable to the higher sense of the value of education which is allowed to prevail among the common people in the former country.

Such was the state of education in Ireland, when, in 1831, the government resolved to commence a national system, avoiding various errors which had operated against all former attempts. Perceiving that the usefulness of the Kildare Place Society had been much impaired by its introduction of the Bible without notes, to which there was a constantly increasing opposition on the part of the Catholic clergy, the Whig ministry of Earl Grey determined that the religious part of education should be kept separate from the literary, and be entirely under the control of the various denominations of clergy. Among the books to be employed in the literary education, they contemplated such extracts from Scripture as all creeds could sanction; but the great business of religious instruction was to be prosecuted on one or two days of the week set apart for the purpose. A commission was appointed by the Lord-Lieutenant, consisting of the Protestant and Catholic archbishops of Dublin, a Presbyterian clergyman of high character, and a few other individuals, who were to form a board of superintendence, and whose various creeds should form a guarantee for the liberal intentions of the government. As yet, the scheme has been prosecuted only as an experiment; but it has met with considerable success even in that limited character, and this in the face of a vigorous opposition from the church-ascendancy party. From the report of March 3, 1834, it appears that, from January 1832, 1548 applications had been made for aid towards schools, of which 789 had been attended to. The schools now in operation afford the benefits of education to about 140,000 children. The members of the board have conducted the business in perfect harmony. They have published several class-books, two of which contain Scriptural extracts. One day of the week besides Sunday is set apart for religious instruction, which is conducted by such pastors as are approved of by the parents and guardians of the children. "It shall be, as it has ever been," says the report in conclusion, "our constant object so to administer the system of education committed to our charge, as to make it acceptable and beneficial to the whole of his majesty's subjects; to train up and unite, through it, the youth of the country together, whatever their religious differences may be, in feelings and habits of attachment and friendship towards each other, and thus to render it the means of promoting charity and good-will among all classes of the people."

The bill introduced by Mr Wyse, and which we are glad to observe the ministry seems inclined to countenance, is evidently the result of much careful study of the subject of education, extensive knowledge of the circumstances of Ireland, and a disposition of that enlightened and philanthropic kind which, after bigotry and cruelty have failed, can alone be expected to succeed in the object. It provides for the permanent establishment of a board, to be composed of men of various professions, persuasions, and interests, three of whom shall be clerical, and six secular, the secretary for Ireland being president. This board is empowered to erect school-houses, and furnish every outfit; the ensuing and current expenses being left to the inhabitants of the districts in which schools are established. It is to erect normal or teachers' schools, and, from the young men there reared, to appoint fitting persons for the schools under its jurisdiction. It is also to form a code of educational regulations. The teachers are to be guaranteed a certain salary by the parish; to depend for the remainder of their subsistence on fees; and in order to render the body as respectable as possible, it is proposed that the board shall, in proper instances, give honorary distinctions and grant retiring salaries.

Mr Wyse, for the present, limits his views to elementary education; but he contemplates improvements in advanced schools also, and a change and extension of the university system. It is not probable that his bill will pass during the present session; but he is right in assuring himself that education reform cannot be much longer delayed by any species of obstacle. "The people," says he, "are beginning to comprehend their true interests, and have abundantly proved that they are no longer dependent upon any party. In one word, men will be educated, whether you like it or not. The only point is—how, or for what? That you can determine, but that only; and the sooner and more thoroughly you determine it—I say it not in menace, I say it not in dread, but with that awful conviction of responsibility which every man must feel who looks with attention to the present, and still more to the future aspects of society—the sooner and more thoroughly you determine it, the better for every man, from the highest to the lowest in the land."

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

EARLY in June, the Carlist forces had laid siege to Bilbao, the possession of which sea-port would have enabled them to land such stores and auxiliaries as the friends of that cause might have been able to dispatch to them from divers parts of Europe. The town, quite unprepared for defence, was about to surrender, when (June 15) Captain Henry, who commanded the queen's armed steam-ship La Reyna Gobernadora, and was cruising off the coast, was made acquainted with the desperate condition of the Royalists, and determined on an effort to relieve them. Accordingly, he landed twenty-five men, under the command of Captains Elsworth and Fitzpatrick, within two miles of Bilbao, which was as far up the river as the draught of water would allow his vessel to proceed. The party was furnished with two long eighteen-pounders, and some Congreve rockets and ammunition. They made their way up to the town, and took their station on one of the most important points of defence. The steamer proceeded to St Sebastian, took 1000 of El Pastor's men on board, with more ammunition, and next day returned to Bilbao, which they reached under a heavy fire from the Carlists. In the meantime, the gallant band of twenty-five had communicated fresh vigour to the besieged, and done prodigious execution upon the enemy. One of the rockets killed twenty-five men, and a shot from one of the marines mortally wounded the Carlist generalissimo Zumalacarreay in the thigh. This success was achieved with the loss of Captain Fitzpatrick and two private men. There seems to have been fighting on the 15th, 16th, and 18th June. On the 19th, the greater part of the Carlists withdrew to meet General Valdez, who was approaching with the bulk of the constitutional forces, for the purpose of raising the siege.

Zumalacarreay died on the 25th at Durango, after having submitted to amputation. His talents and vigour of character are allowed to have been of the first importance to the Carlist cause. Eraso, who was his immediate successor in command, is stated to have died a few days after, by a fall from his horse, the consequence of an infirm state of health. The command subsequently was given to Moreno.

On the 1st July, the constitutional army, no longer commanded by Valdez, reached Bilbao, from which the Carlists had previously retired. On the 5th, it left the town, under General Cordova, for the purpose of assuming offensive operations against Don Carlos.

The first battalion of the English auxiliary force, consisting of a thousand men, reached St Sebastian on the 10th July, and was welcomed with many joyful demonstrations. The second left London on the 11th.

The new administration at Madrid, being more accordant than any former one with the popular sentiments, is said to be proceeding prosperously, notwithstanding that insurrectionary movements had been attempted at Saragossa and at Mollo in Catalonia. They have taken the important resolve to suppress the Jesuits and sell their property. Upon the whole, the queen's cause wears an improved aspect.

On the 20th June, Don Carlos issued a decree, dated at Durango, proclaiming that all strangers whatever, who should enter his dominions and appear in arms against him, should be deprived not only of the benefit of the existing laws, but also of the convention lately signed for the exchange of prisoners. He evidently means this as a threat against the English auxiliaries. The British government has dispatched a messenger to Don Carlos, to inform him that if that decree be attempted to be carried into execution, or if a single British subject, fighting on behalf of the queen, be taken prisoner, and dealt with in any manner inconsistent with the convention, or with the ordinary rules of civilised warfare, Don Carlos himself shall be held by our government responsible for the act, and dealt with accordingly.

Mr Villiers has concluded a treaty with the Spanish government for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade. It has been agreed that vessels fitted out for the trade shall be liable to capture, and to be broken up and sold as old timber, although no negroes shall be actually found on board.

FRANCE.

THE trials of the Lyons insurgents have been proceeding under circumstances similar to those already detailed, and without the occurrence of any remarkable circumstance, except a resolution arrived at by the Peers, by a majority of 114 against 16, to try the refractory in their absence. On Sunday evening, July 12, twenty-eight of the prisoners escaped from the prison of St Pelagie. Forty-four of those who had taken part in the Parisian insurrection were confined in a new building there. Five or six of the most resolute worked a subterranean passage from one of the cells under the court to the outside of the prison, and as soon as it was known that the Court of Peers had decided on the separation of the Paris category from that of Lyons, all except three resolved to make use of this means of escape. Twenty-eight succeeded in accomplishing this object, leaving a paper in which they described the movement as one rendered necessary by the contempt of justice shown by their enemies, and said they would still be at the call of their countrymen when required for the work of liberty. The police have, apparently without the least ground, been suspected of favouring the escape of the prisoners.

In the first week of July, a conspiracy against the life of Louis Philip was discovered. The government had previously been apprised that several individuals were proceeding from the provinces to Paris, with such a design; and some of these men, having been traced to Versailles and Neuilly, were there arrested. It is said that the deed was to have been executed when the king was returning from Neuilly, where he has lately been residing, to the Tuilleries.

The health of the Duc de Bourdeaux is said to afford a speedy relief to the existing dynasty from the fear which they might entertain on his account. Others allege that the Emperor Nicolas is about to confer one of his daughters upon him in marriage, remarking that, whether he possess the throne of France or not, he will not be the less the first gentleman in Europe. In the event of the demise of the Duc de Bourdeaux and of his grandfather and uncle, the representation of the family of Bourbon would involve upon Don Carlos of Spain.

RUSSIA.

A CONSPIRACY to overturn the throne of the Emperor Nicolas was discovered in St Petersburg in the course of the month of May, and more than sixty persons were arrested on a charge of being engaged in it.

For some weeks great preparations have been making for a review of Russian, Prussian, and Austrian troops, at Kalisch in Poland, but for what purpose does not appear. It is stated that the Emperor of Austria shows an inclination to abstain from meeting the other sovereigns on this occasion, and to withdraw himself altogether from the Holy Alliance. A much more important military movement is stated in a letter from Constantinople to have lately taken place on the shores of the Black Sea, which are now occupied by forty thousand Russian troops, while a small armed fleet is equipped at Sebastopol, and the government is endeavouring to raise a loan of twenty millions of francs at Frankfort and Amsterdam. Another large Russian force has poured into Bosnia, in order to suppress an insurrection, and is said to have committed great cruelties. In reference, probably, to these events, the British government has sent out the Earl of Durham as ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to St Petersburg. His lordship left London on this mission, July 17, destined to proceed in the Barham, direct to Constantinople, and afterwards to Odessa or Sebastopol, the very objects of the operations just alluded to. It seems likely that the British government is at last in some measure alarmed at the increased influence which Russia has lately acquired over Turkey.

Letters from Van Diemen's Land, dated January, state that the last remnant of the black natives, consisting of three men, one woman, and some children, had been caught, and were to be shipped over to New Holland after being taught gardening and some other useful arts. The many depredations, and the occasional murders lately committed by the natives, render their entire extinction a most desirable object for the colonists.

During the 21st, 22d, and 23d of June, New York was the scene of violent and sanguinary rioting, occasioned by the lower Irish, who have of late years begun to abound in that city, and according to all accounts, in no agreeable addition to the usual population. They are about to organise themselves into a body styled the O'Connell Guards.

The Turkish fleet unexpectedly arrived at Tripoli on the 25th May, and deposed Sidi Ali, chief of the gentry, and carried him off to Constantinople. It is not known what the sultan means to do next, but he is supposed to have taken this step under Russian influence.

Don Miguel is at present living at Porto d'Anzio, a small unhealthy village on the coast of the Roman states.

A few weeks ago, the attention of the Parisian public was much more occupied with the details of a criminal trial lately concluded at the Palais de Justice, than with the affair of the April insurgents, or with any political matter whatever. The principal party accused was M. de la Ronciere, the son of a general officer of a name, who was charged with having broken into the bedroom of General de Morell, the governor of the military school at Saumur—to have entered the bedroom of Mademoiselle de Morell, the general's daughter, a young lady aged 17—and to have committed the most atrocious violence on her person, for the purpose, it is said, of revenge himself on her father for having turned him out of his house. The principal witness has ever since been subject to a sort of catalepsy, which left her only at intervals in a state when it was possible to obtain her testimony. It was, in consequence, after twelve o'clock at night, when she was brought into court and deposed to the facts, which M. de la Ronciere stood charged. The trial concluded on Saturday, July 4, with a verdict of guilty against M. de la Ronciere on the first count, with urged him with the violation, and also upon the second ant, which charged him with inflicting wounds on various parts of the young lady's body, but which wounds not occasion an indisposition of more than twenty days. He was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, and pay all the costs of the prosecution. The annual meeting of scientific men in Germany will hold this year at Bonn, and will begin on the 18th of September. It will last about a week, and is expected to be numerous attended both by German and foreign scientists. A society has been formed at Bonn to make arrangements for the accommodation of strangers, and provide rooms at a moderate charge for those who attend the meeting. On the 1st of June, the functions of the Greek republic having ceased, the young King Otho acceded to sovereign power.

An earthquake of extraordinary violence took place, on the 20th, in the southern provinces of Chili, destroying every building of the least importance except one in the city of Concepcion, and levelling other six large towns, besides a number of villages. By this great calamity 200,000 persons are left without shelter, while many others have lost their lives. This earthquake seems to have been connected with a series of volcanic eruptions of uncommon violence, which took place, at the end of January and throughout February, in a mountain near Coriguaina, to the north of the Lake Nicaragua. Ashes cast up by these eruptions travelled 500 miles to the westward, and 2500 to the eastward, covering the immediate space with a layer several inches thick, as to deprive the cattle of sustenance, and even appearing in a very fine and rare form in Jamaica.

Robert Gourlay, Esq. who is now residing in the United States of America, has intimated to the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, that unless the British Government atone for their wrongs imprisonment of a person in that country, by restoring to him his property and just rights, he shall think himself justifiable at all times to enter the province, there by force of arms to regain his property, maintain his rights, and avenge wrongs! This manifesto is dated from New York, 1st February 1834. Mr Gourlay has since written a letter to the King detailing his grievances, and another to the Duke of Wellington, requesting that his grace would advise his Majesty personally to visit the Canadas, where his presence might restore something like freedom and justice to the inhabitants, and which visit of William IV. "would be a spectacle worthy of the age, and emblazon the page of history till the end of time."

PARLIAMENT.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

The bill for the reform of the municipal corporations having been read a second time, June 15, the House afterwards sat in committee on the various clauses.—22. After a motion (which did not come to a division) by Mr PRAED for preserving their existing rights to freemen and their descendants, the three clauses were agreed to. Upon the fourth clause, which provides that the boundaries of certain boroughs shall be the same as the parliamentary boroughs, while others shall be settled by the King in Council, Lord DUDLEY STUART moved an amendment, that the boundaries should remain as they are till otherwise settled by act of Parliament; which was lost by 1 against 279. An amendment by Mr DIVETT on the sixth clause, that twelve months' residence and being a sufficient qualification, was lost by 97 against 321.—23. Clauses 6th, 7th, and 8th, were agreed to, without any material amendment. Upon clause 9th, which enacts that no person shall be entered as a burgess except by virtue of occupancy and payment of rates, Sir W. FOLLETT moved as an amendment, that the rights which were preserved by the reform bill to freemen, and persons who should hereafter be entitled by birth and servitude to be freemen, should be continued; as the clause itself could be considered in no other light than as a robbery of vested rights. Among other speakers in favour of the amendment was Sir JAMES GRAHAM, who expressed great alarm at the clause, as an advance beyond the reform bill. Hereupon Lord JOHN RUSSELL made some sportive allusions to the fears entertained by Sir J. Graham respecting all reforms beyond that point, and said that, for his part, he could see nothing of that rabid desire of change which so much alarmed others. His opinion was, that the people of England were bent, and seriously bent, upon reform; but that there never was a country in the world in which the feeling in favour of reform had been more fully formed, and in which every step taken to promote it had been discussed with greater shrewdness. When any thing was proposed which was calculated to endanger either the property of the country or the safety of ancient institutions, you had an instant rebound of public feeling against such a measure. Indeed, he did go the length of saying this, that, though the opinion of the people of England was made up in favour of great reasonable reforms, there was nothing of any violent feeling, any mad enthusiasm, in favour of any innovations which were likely to prove dangerous to the public peace or to the safety of our ancient institutions.—Mr O'CONNELL described the amendment as one which had no other object than to set up a set of voters who could be conveniently bought and sold.—On a division, it was lost by 232 against 278.—24. The committee sat on clause 10th, and adjourned.—29. Clauses 11th, 12th, and 13th, were agreed to, without any material alteration.—30. Clauses 14th to 19th inclusive were agreed to. On the 20th, which relates to the qualification of town councillors, Sir R. PEEL moved an amendment requiring them in boroughs divided into wards, to possess property to the value of L.1000, or be rated on a rental of L.40 a-year, and in boroughs not divided into wards, property and rental respectively of half those amounts; which, after a long discussion, was rejected by 267 against 204. On clause 22d, which enacts that every succeeding year a third part of the council shall go out of office, Lord STANLEY moved, as an amendment, that this should be done every alternate year; alleging, as reasons, the turmoil occasioned by frequent elections, and the want of steadiness in the conduct of affairs arising from repeated changes in the ruling body. This was rejected by 220 against 176.—July 1. On clause 24th, Mr GROTE moved, as an amendment, that the votes for members of town councils be taken by ballot, but was induced to withdraw his motion. On clause 30th, which relates to the division of towns into wards, Lord STANLEY moved "that, if it should appear to his Majesty in Council that the population of a borough, according to the last parliamentary census, exceeded the number of 10,000, it should be divided into a certain number of wards, not exceeding three; if the population of a borough exceeded 13,000, that it should not be divided into more than six wards; and if it should exceed 25,000, that it might be divided into any number of wards his Majesty might think fit." It was agreed that both the clause and the amendment should be postponed. Clause 36th was the last agreed to on this day.—2. Mr CAYLEY called attention to the fact, that, since the introduction of the bill, some corporations had granted long leases of their property on advantageous terms to the parties, and demanded that measures should be taken to render such proceedings null and void. Clauses 37th to 41st were agreed to. On clause 42d, Lord JOHN RUSSELL moved an alteration to render town-clerks removable by the town council at the expiration of every year; upon which Lord STANLEY (who spoke from the Opposition side of the house) moved an amendment, which would have the effect of giving them a tenure of their offices during good behaviour; a measure he deemed necessary in order to secure the services of respectable attornies.

Sir R. PEEL supported this amendment on the same grounds, and because the removability of the town-clerks every year would render them political officers.—During the debate, some words dropped from Mr O'Connell respecting Lord Stanley, which led to an explanation by the latter of his reasons for going over to the Opposition benches. He said he had endeavoured to preserve a neutral and independent place during both the last administration and the present, voting in every case according to his conscience and his feelings; but one night lately, after voting to the best of his judgment on one of the details of a measure on the principle of which he and the ministry were agreed, he had been assailed, on returning to his seat, by such ironical cheers as amounted to insult, and informed him that he was not fit for their society. The cheers of the night had been followed up by coarse and violent comments in the morning newspapers, and, seeing no longer occasion for hesitation, he had changed his place, still retaining, however, his former independence, for the movement was only personal, not political.—Lord Stanley's address drew from Lord John Russell a warm expression of regret for the pain which his lordship had allowed himself to feel on this occasion, and an equally warm attestation of the conscientiousness of all the noble lord's opinions. Lord Stanley's amendment was rejected by 125 to 65. An amendment on the 52d clause, by Sir James Graham, reserving to the magistrates the power of granting ale-house licences, instead of conferring it on the town councils, was lost by 166 to 211. Clauses 53d, 54th, and 55th, were agreed to.—3. The committee agreed to the clauses up to the 94th inclusive, reserving the 79th for future discussion.—6. All the remaining clauses of the bill, of which the total number is 115, were agreed to, including the 10th, 30th, and 79th, which had been postponed; the only important alteration being one proposed by Lord John Russell in the 10th, which will have the effect of dividing boroughs of 13,000 inhabitants into two wards; more than 13,000 and less than 24,000, into three wards; and exceeding 24,000, into as many as the crown shall see fit.—9. The schedules were agreed to, without the number of councillors being fixed; the crown being left to do this, after the division of boroughs into wards. The bill was then reported to the house.—13. The bill was re-committed; when, on the motion of Lord John Russell, several new clauses were inserted.—16. The house in committee went over the clauses down to the 48th, negating, by 262 to 234, an amendment of Mr Praed, which contemplated securing to the descendants of existing freemen the right of voting for members of Parliament. Two other amendments of the like nature were negated respectively by 234 to 203, and 234 to 165.—17. The remaining clauses passed with no material alteration; and on the 20th the bill was read a third time, and passed.

2. CHURCH IN IRELAND.

June 26. Lord MORPETH moved for leave to bring in a bill "for the better regulation of the ecclesiastical revenues, and the promotion of religious and moral instruction in Ireland." He proposed to divide it into two distinct heads—the first having reference to the settlement of the tithe question; the second to the future regulation of the Irish church. He reminded the house, that by Mr Goulburn's bill of 1823, compositions of tithes were to be made voluntarily and temporarily; that by Lord Stanley's bill the composition was made compulsory; and Lord Morpeth now, in the first place, proposed that composition should at once cease and determine. The amount of clerical tithes compounded for was L.500,000; of lay tithes, L.110,000. With the arrears of tithes due in 1831, 1832, and 1833, he would not meddle. The parties might have had the money, and many had taken it out of the million grant; but they who refused must undergo the penalty of their obstinacy. The remainder of the million grant, or L.360,000, he proposed to apply towards the discharge of the arrears of 1834; and he feared it would hardly suffice to discharge them. The Privy Council would be empowered to collect the remaining arrears from the landlords, subject to a deduction of 25 per cent. This plan would involve the giving up of the million grant, which it was now admitted could not be recovered from the clergy. He proposed that in future, for the composition of tithes, a rent-charge should be substituted, at the rate of L.70 for every L.100; to be paid by the owner of the first estate of inheritance. Sir Henry Hardinge's bill made the rent-charge L.75, and the bill of last year made it only L.60; but then there was in that bill no remission of the million. The rent-charge would be subject to the expense of collection, which would reduce it to L.68, 5s.; but the clergyman would receive L.73, 5s.; the difference to be made up by an advance from the public funds, to be charged on the perpetuity purchase fund: the lay tithe-owner would only receive his L.68, 5s. out of every L.100. Provision would be made for the revaluation of the tithes, whenever required. These were the leading provisions of his bill as regarded the settlement of the tithe question. With respect to the future appropriation of the church revenues, the principle he proceeded upon was that of Lord John Russell's resolution. His aim was to maintain the Protestant establishment in Ireland; but in so doing, he recognised the principle of "no work, no pay." Lord Morpeth then referred to the report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction, which he maintained to be sufficiently accurate for the purposes of legislation. From that report the vast disproportion of the revenues of the church to the number belonging to it was apparent; and the way he proposed to remedy the evil and injustice arising from this state of things, was, in the first place, to suspend the presentation to every benefice in which the number of Protestants did not exceed fifty. Where, however, there was even one member of the established church in a parish, his spiritual wants would be provided for by his being transferred to the minister of the next parish, who would receive L.5 per annum as a compensation, or by the appointment of a curate with a salary of not less than L.10 nor more than L.75 per annum; the amount to be fixed by the bishop of the diocese in conjunction with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Where there is a glebe house, the curate is to reside in it, cost free, and have the benefit of glebe land not exceeding L.25 per annum in value. In places where there are Protestants but no place of worship, a sum not exceeding L.150, or an annual sum of L.15, would be devoted towards providing one. Wherever the revenue in any benefice exceeded L.300 per annum, the fact would be reported by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the Lord-Lieutenant; and suitable reductions, if necessary, would be made. There were no fewer than 151 parishes in Ireland where there were no members of the established church; in 194 parishes the numbers were less than 10; in 193, less than 20; in 133, less than 30; in 107, less than 40; in 77, less than 50; so that the total number of parishes affected by the bill would be 860. A considerable fund would arise from the suspension of the presentation to the benefices in which these parishes were included, and from the reduction of livings above L.300 in yearly value; and Lord Morpeth calculated that this fund, after providing for the L.5 per annum to the ministers, and the salaries of curates, and the charge of hiring or erecting places of worship, would yield annually L.58,076—L.47,898 from parishes in royal or ecclesiastical patronage, and L.10,178 from parishes in lay patronage. This surplus of L.58,076 would be applied to the purposes of religious and moral education of the people, without distinction of sects, according to the principle of Lord John Russell's resolution adopted by the house.—Sir Henry Hardinge, Mr Shaw, Sir Robert Peel, and Lord Stanley, expressed themselves decidedly hostile to the principle of the measure.—Mr Shaw said it was intended to destroy the church; and Sir Henry Hardinge declared it was worse than he could possibly have anticipated.—Mr Hume, Mr C. A. Walker, and Lord John Russell, defended the plan.—The bill was then ordered to be brought in.—July 7. The bill was read a first time and laid on the table.—Sir R. PEEL then stated, that, while he concurred in most of that part of the bill which provided for the imposition of a rent-charge in lieu of tithes, he must oppose that portion which proposed the appropriation of ecclesiastical property to other than ecclesiastical purposes immediately in connection with the interests of the established church. On the motion to go into committee on the bill, he should move an instruction that it be divided into two bills, in order that he and his friends might have it in their power to oppose that part of which they disapproved.—Lord J. Russell expressed his determination to preserve the bill as it was.—13. The bill was read a second time, without opposition; Lord J. Russell having informed the house that his Majesty had been pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament all his interest in any benefices or ecclesiastical preferment in Ireland.

3. CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

July 1. The debate on Sir W. RAE's motion for a committee to inquire into the expediency of granting a sum of money to the church of Scotland, which debate was adjourned on the 11th of June, was resumed; Lord JOHN RUSSELL moving as an amendment, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that his Majesty will be graciously pleased to appoint a commission to inquire into the opportunities of religious worship, and means of religious instruction, and the pastoral superintendence afforded to the people of Scotland, and how far these are of avail for the religious and moral improvement of the poor and of the working classes; and with this view to obtain information respecting their stated attendance at places of worship, and their actual connection with any religious denomination; to inquire what funds are now, or may hereafter be, available for the purpose of the established church of Scotland; and to report, from time to time, in order that such remedies may be applied to any existing evils as Parliament may think fit." Lord John maintained that a commission of inquiry was necessary, in order to ascertain the amount of the actual wants of the Scotch population, and the available funds of the church. At present the statements were very conflicting. A committee would not be able to obtain satisfactory information, which both parties were perfectly willing should be the groundwork of any legislative measure.—The amendment formerly proposed by Lord Advocate Murray was withdrawn, and that moved by Lord John Russell put from the chair. It was opposed at some length, but in moderate language, by Mr CUMMING BRUCE, who expressed great apprehensions as to the kind of treatment that the church would receive from ministers, although Lord J. Russell spoke so fairly.—Sir R. PEEL supported the amendment, on the ground that it was too late in the session to proceed in the inquiry by means of a committee. He wished, however, that after the words "pastoral superintendence," the words "under the establishment of the church of Scotland" should be introduced; for it was important in principle to introduce some expression more distinctly recognising the claims of the church of Scotland.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL and Lord HOWICK opposed the insertion of the words. Lord JOHN RUSSELL said, that the wording of his motion had been approved of by several eminent members of the Scotch church; and Lord HOWICK said, that the words might be misinterpreted by the dissenters, and produce angry feelings.—Sir JOHN CAMPBELL, Sir GEORGE CLERK, Sir W. RAE, Mr SINCLAIR, and Dr BOWRING, each spoke a few words.—Mr ANDREW JOHNSTON attempted to address the house; but the members, by their interruption, appeared determined not to hear him, and he was obliged to sit down.—Sir WILLIAM RAE then moved to leave out the words relating to an inquiry into the "funds" of the church.—Mr HUME opposed this amendment; and it was negatived without a division; and the motion of Lord John Russell was then agreed to, nem. con.

4. IPSWICH ELECTION.

June 26. Pilgrim and Dasent, two of the individuals concerned in the Ipswich bribery case, were called before the house, reprimanded, and discharged. It was then agreed that no others should be so dealt with, until they had given all the information in their power relative to the election.—29. The attention of the house was called to the case of Mr O'Malley, the counsel for the ex-members before the committee, whose health was stated to be so delicate as to unfit him for enduring confinement, and whose family was stated by several members to be highly respectable in the county of Mayo.—Mr P. M. STEWART said that Mr O'Malley had been most active in baffling the efforts of the committee to have Pilgrim brought before them. It was finally agreed that evidence respecting the state of Mr O'Malley's health should be obtained from Mr Bransby Cooper, at the bar of the house next day. Mr Cooper was accordingly called for this purpose, but, on its appearing that he had only been taken once by Mr Kelly to Newgate to give a certificate respecting O'Malley's health, he was dismissed. On the ensuing day, upon proper medical evidence, it was determined to have O'Malley reprimanded and discharged; which was done. On the day above stated (June 29), Mr WASON moved that the Norwich magistrates, Bignold and Booth, should be committed to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, for their breach of the privileges of the house in the matter of the Ipswich election; but it was determined that they should only be ordered to attend at the bar of the house.—30. Bond, Clamp, and Cooke, agents of Dundas and Kelly, the unseated members, were reprimanded and discharged; after which a motion by Mr GISBORNE was agreed to, that the Attorney-General be instructed to prosecute all the parties who appeared from the committee's evidence to have been guilty of bribery.—The case of the Norwich magistrates was ultimately referred to a select committee.—10. The committee arrived at the following resolution, which the chairman announced was unnimously agreed to:—"That it does not appear to your committee that the conduct of the magistrates, Samuel Bignold and E. T. Booth, Esqrs., before whom the said John Pilgrim was charged, was a breach of the privileges of the house."

5. POST-OFFICE MANAGEMENT.

July 10. Mr WALLACE introduced the subject of the abuses of the General Post-Office. He made several statements implicating the conduct of Sir Francis Freeling's management. He mentioned the money-order office, which had been established for the purpose of enabling the poor to transmit, through the post, without expense, sums not exceeding L.5. Now, what said the return? It said the post-office knew nothing of this office, for it was not in their department. But was not, he would ask, this office founded with public capital for the benefit of the public? The account was kept at the post-office. He declared, therefore, that it was highly presumptuous in the post-office, under the circumstances, to refuse the house the information it desired. Their reason, however, he hesitated not to state, was, in his opinion, because this money-order office was a source of plunder to the persons employed, and not of fair emolument. He next proceeded to say, that the Duke of Richmond, in the course of his vaunted reforms in the Irish post-office, had done much mischief by suppressing the register-office in Dublin. This was an office wherein, as was the practice on the Continent, any money letter was put down in a register on payment of the postage. Now, he found that a saving of L.12,000 a-year to the banking interest had accrued through this office. He trusted that the office would be re-established in spite of Sir F. Freeling or any body else. He next, at great length, exposed the abuses of the mail-coaches. He was sorry the Duke of Wellington, the other day, when he took so many offices into his own hands, did not think fit also to take that of Postmaster-General. (Laughter.) He would not have suffered himself to be deceived by any set of officers. He would see that 10½ miles an hour was performed by one coach on one line of road, and see why it should not be in like manner done upon all. (Hear.) The duke would have taken the old peninsular mode to these gentlemen (loud laughter), and said, "If one set of you cannot go the pace, I must only get another set that can." (Continued laughter.) He was anxious to have the mails go out from the metropolis twice a-day. There were many coaches in England that went at a better rate than the mails; some went ten miles and a half an hour. He suggested that a great improvement might be effected in the line by which the Yarmouth mail was conveyed, and complained that the representations of a Mr Sted, who wrote to him and others, had not been attended to by Sir F. Freeling. He next objected strongly to the charge on newspapers in London and elsewhere transmitted by the twopenny post. It was unjust to put such a tax on the communication of knowledge, which was very burdensome and injurious to the poor. The hon. member then argued that letters might be delivered, in cases of emergency, on Sundays in London, as they were in Scotland and other places. Unless he was misinformed or mistaken, letters were at present sorted in London on Sundays, and a friend at court could get them delivered. Mr Wallace next adverted to the disgraceful system in the post-office, of plundering the letter-carriers through the superannuation fund. He next urged the consolidation of the two posts in London, the twopenny and general. Two establishments, he contended, were unnecessary. All that was now done might be done by one set of men as well as by two, as in other places, and at less expense.—and Mr Wallace concluded with moving that a select committee should be appointed to inquire into the management of the post-office.—Mr LABOUCHERE, after complimenting Mr Wallace, said, it appeared to him that this was one of those subjects which could be much better investigated by a commission, composed of a few persons, than by a committee of the house.—provided, of course, that the house would give the government credit that they and the commission would enter upon the inquiry with an honest determination to act fairly by the public. Mr Labouchere concluded by hoping that the hon. member would leave the subject in the hands of the commission, and consent to withdraw his motion. (Hear, hear.)—Other members of the government joined in this request, after highly praising Mr Wallace's endeavours.—After the debate had concluded, Mr WALLACE said he still was of opinion that a committee would investigate the matter better than a commission; but lest it might be thought that he mistrusted the promises of the present government, to whom he desired to show respect, he should not press his motion to a division. At the same time, he hoped that the suggestions which he had thrown out would meet with proper attention from the commissioners.—13. The Duke of RICHMOND called the attention of the House of Peers to the statements of Mr Wallace, and, with the Earl of Lichfield and Lord Maryborough, entered into a defence of Sir Francis Freeling and the existing system of management. His grace moved for a return of the gross and net revenue of the office, and of the charges of management for the last ten years, in order to prove the errors of Mr Wallace. Lord Maryborough and Lord Rosslyn spoke strongly as to the readiness of the officers of this establishment to grant information.—14. The above conversation was noticed in the House of Commons by Lord Lowther, who re-alleged the obstinacy of the officers of the post-office in withholding information and brought forward a number of facts to support what he said. He concluded by moving "for a return of papers from the office of the Postmaster-General, stating which of the recommendations of the commissioners had been carried into effect, and which not, together with the reasons for not carrying the latter into effect."—Mr Wallace said he was willing to prove what he had stated in any field of controversy, that his opponent might chuse, not excepting Exeter Hall.—Lord Lowther's motion was agreed to.

6. MINOR SUBJECTS.

June 22. Lord John Russell stated, in reply to some questions and observations by Mr Wilks, that it was the intention of ministers, early next session, to introduce measures for the establishment of a general system of registering births, marriages, and deaths, for regulating the mode of dissenters' marriages, and for the abolition of church-rates. Mr Wilks said that, from extensive communication with the dissenters, he could say that they were willing to postpone the settlement of their claims, in order to facilitate the progress of the municipal and Irish church reform bills.—Sir Robert Inglis presented a petition from Birmingham, complaining of the votes of Catholic members on questions respecting church-property such votes being violations of the oath taken by those members. Sir Robert Inglis made a long speech in concurrence with this view, and elicited from Messrs Shiel and O'Connell, not only a defence of the conduct of the Catholic members, but a severe retort upon the honourable baronet.

—24. Lord Mahon, having moved for papers relative to the armament for the Queen of Spain, expressed strong disapprobation, in which he was joined by Sir R. Peel and others, of the conduct of the government in allowing that armament. His lordship also commented severely on the motives of those who had joined the armament; which drew a sharp reply and defence from Colonel Evans. After a long discussion Lord Mahon withdrew his motion.

—25. A number of petitions were presented, praying for the remission of the sentence on the Dorchester labourers; among them, one from Manchester with 20,989 signatures. Mr Wakley then moved to address to the King, praying that these labourers might be pardoned and recalled. The motion was opposed by the ministers and the Conservative members, the crown lawyers maintaining that the conviction had been perfectly legal; that the good intention of the men, and their ignorance of the law, granting that they were well disposed and badly informed could never be received in bar of punishment for breach of the law; that their conduct had been very mischievous, and tyrannical towards those of their own class who did not unite with them; that to pardon them, would be deemed by ignorant men a confession that the sentence was illegal, and a triumph to the convicts; and lastly, that the House of Commons was a bad court of appeal from the decisions of the courts of law. The motion was rejected by 304 against 82.—Mr Maule's game bill, which provided that, in all future leases, the farmer should be entitled, under certain regulations, to destroy game which he found trespassing on his fields, and that in all existing leases the farmer should be entitled to compensation for the damage committed by game, was denied admission to the house by 76 against 50.

—29. On the motion for going into a committee of supply, Mr Praed moved, as an amendment, for papers respecting the recall of the appointment of Lord Heytesbury as governor-general of India. He contended that this recall must have taken place through political considerations alone, notwithstanding that political considerations were not usually allowed to have weight in Indian affairs. He also pointed to the different conduct of the late administration, who had not thought of disturbing the appointment of Sir R. Grant or Mr Macaulay, although with the conduct of the latter gentleman they had some reason for dissatisfaction.—Sir J. Hobhouse, while he allowed that, if Lord Heytesbury had sailed, there might have been room for hesitation, was clear that the nature of the office required a confidence between the domestic government and the head of the affairs of India; and the impossibility of that confidence with Lord Heytesbury was exactly the motive which had determined ministers in displacing him. Sir John also defended the conduct of Mr Macaulay. Mr Praed's motion was negatived by 254 against 179.

—30. In the House of Peers, Lord Brougham withdrew his resolutions on the subject of national education, and, July 3, presented a bill in which the chief points of those resolutions were embodied. It was read a first time and ordered to be printed.

July 1. Lord John Russell gave it as his opinion that the conduct of the military at Wolverhampton had been generally most praiseworthy, and had had the effect of protecting property and preserving tranquillity, though he did not doubt that one or two of the number might have acted with some degree of violence.

—2. Leave was obtained by Mr Hume to bring in a bill for allowing music and dancing in public-houses, on the professed grounds of encouraging the industrious classes to amuse themselves in this manner, in preference to indulging in liquors.

—3. A petition was presented by Mr H. Bulwer, from 6000 free inhabitants of New South Wales, raying for the establishment of a separate legislature for that colony, which contained 60,000 inhabitants, and had an annual revenue of £135,000. Sir George Grey stated, that in 1836 the act by which the government of the colony was regulated would expire; and in the meanwhile, he would give the subject his best consideration. Ministers were strongly desirous to give to New South Wales the advantages of civil institutions. Mr Hume and Mr O'Connell urged ministers to take the earliest steps possible to carry their intentions into effect.

— 6. The Irish linen trade bill was read a second time and passed through a committee with the sanction of ministers, whom Mr Hume charged with a violation of their free-trade principles on this occasion.—Mr Bannerman's bill for uniting the two Aberdeen colleges, and placing them under a new form of management, was read a second time.

— 7. A numerous signed petition from Fifeshire, against the appointment of Colonel Lyndsay to the command of the militia of that county, was presented by Mr Hume. Lord John Russell explained, that the appointment was made by the Lord-Lieutenant, with the sanction of the crown, and he had not thought it necessary to advise the withholding of that sanction.

— 8. Sir R. Musgrave moved the second reading of his bill for establishing a system of relief for the poor. The bill, he said, provided for the formation of committees and sub-committees in the various districts of Ireland, to investigate the condition of the poor, and that, in cases of extreme distress, if a resolution to that effect were signed by ten of their number, the magistrates should levy a rate for the relief of that distress. The bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed that day fortnight, with an understanding with ministers that it should be pressed this session. Lord Morpeth acknowledged the subject to be one which the administration could have to take up next session.

— 9. The seamen enlistment bill went through committee. It reduces impressment to a dead letter, and leaves the question resting upon the prerogative of the crown. A service of five years is to entitle a sailor to his discharge, and he is to be protected for the two ensuing years from being recalled to duty. On the breaking out of a war, he is to receive the usual bounty. Mr Hume and other liberal members expressed much satisfaction with the bill.

— 10. The prisoners' counsel bill was read a third time, and passed.

— 13. In voting the miscellaneous estimates, the house entered into a discussion respecting the granting of £135,000 for the advancement of education in Ireland, to be appropriated by the educational board. Sir J. Inglis and other members of the same party opposed the grant, on the ground that the system of education adopted by the board tended to discourage the growth of Protestantism, and that the board acted with gross partiality to the Catholics. These allegations were denied by Mr Shiel, Mr O'Connell, and others; and ultimately the house agreed to the vote of 143 against 41.—The house went into committee on the tea-duties, and Mr Spring Rice proposed that the system of charging duties upon particular kinds of tea, formerly adopted experimentally, should be abandoned on the 2d of July 1836, for an uniform rate of 2s. 1d. per pound; as the former plan had been and so inconvenient as to be nearly impracticable. Mr Hume regretted the necessity of laying a duty of 20 per cent. on the cheap teas used by the lower classes, and only 100 per cent. on the dearer kinds. The resolution was agreed to.

— 14. Mr Wason moved "that the petitions from Great Yarmouth (presented 26th and 30th June), alleging, among other things, that the sum of two pence has been lately paid to many of the voters at the house of one of the most active partisans in behalf of the sitting members, and humbly and earnestly praying that the house will cause an inquiry to be made into the circumstances stated in the petition, be referred to a select committee." This motion was met by a very sharp discussion, Sir R. Peel, Sir H. Baring, and other members, giving it a violent opposition. It was carried by a majority of 186 against 12. It was then agreed to refer a similar petition from York to a select committee.—The Earl Radnor moved, in the House of Lords, the second reading of his bill for prohibiting the subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles in certain cases at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. His lordship spoke of the absurdity of enforcing subscription to articles which the young men did not understand, and pointed out the greater liberality which prevailed in former times amongst ourselves, and is still practised in the reign universities. The Archbishop of Canterbury moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months, alleging that the subscription at matriculation was only a token of adherence to the church of England, and that the system had been fruitful of good. It was carried by 163 to 57.—Mr Ewart moved for the appointment of a committee "to inquire into the best means of extending a knowledge of the arts and of the principles of design among the people (especially among the manufacturing population) of the country; and also to inquire into the constitution of the Royal Academy, and the effects produced by it." After a debate which was of considerable length and interest, the motion was agreed to. Mr Wyse, Dr Whitting, Lord Francis Egerton, and Mr Spring Rice, were among the principal speakers, all in favour of the motion. Mr Wyse's speech was that of a warm admirer of the fine arts; and Mr O'Connell spoke a few eloquent and most impressive sentences on the advantages of decorating our churches with appropriate works of the first artists—such as would in St Paul's, for instance, be far more fitting to a temple intended for the worship of the Deity, than the warlike banners which rotted against the walls.

— 17. On the question that the house resolve itself into committee on the municipal corporations bill, Mr Hume introduced the subject of the recent affray at Belfast, observing that, being an Orange riot, it was one of great importance; that it appeared, by the evidence taken before the committee on Orange associations in Ireland, that Orange lodges not only prevailed throughout the country, but even extended to many of the regiments. Upon being called to order, Mr Hume said he would, if necessary, move an amendment to the effect that the evidence taken before the committee be laid before the house. His object was to have the evidence respecting Orange lodges in the army, and the orders of the commander-in-chief in respect of them, laid on the table, and when both were there he should then bring forward the subject. His object was to impeach an individual of great station of high crimes and misdemeanours. If it were agreed that the evidence to which he alluded should be laid before the house, he would not say one word more. Mr W. Patten, as chairman of the committee, begged to say that the number of witnesses was so great, and the testimony was of a nature so contradictory, that it would not be fair to publish the evidence already given, without suffering the case on the other side to be concluded. He begged to add, that the committee had observed with regret that communications the very reverse of truth, respecting the evidence and proceedings, had gone forth to the public. After some further conversation, Mr Hume gave notice that on the 20th he would move for the production of this evidence.

ENGLAND.

MINISTERIAL PROSPECTS.

THE durability of the Melbourne administration has become a matter of doubt among its supporters. It cannot be disguised that, though the King was under the necessity of replacing it in April, he regards the individuals who compose it, and the principles which it advocates, with strong dislike, and is personally surrounded by individuals of the opposite party. The Morning Chronicle of July 14th had a very remarkable article, in which the dispositions of his Majesty and the court were explained without scruple, and as freely commented on; some of the Conservative journals have even ventured to foretell the particular date (within two months) of the intended dismissal of the ministry. Meanwhile, the time and labour of both the ministry and the House of Commons have been for the last two months chiefly devoted to two measures (the municipal and Irish church bills) which can hardly be expected to find approval in the House of Lords; so that the session will probably come to a close, without gratifying the liberal part of the nation with the least advance of that process of reformation which they have so much at heart. If these bills be rejected, and the ministry be supplanted once more by a Tory cabinet, as seems to be expected by the latter party, the necessity of satisfying the nation on those and other points cannot fail to place the sovereign and his new advisers in as painful, and certainly as insecure, a position as under the late administration of Sir Robert Peel. On the other hand, a disposition in the Tory party to split into two divisions of greater and less moderation, has become very apparent during the latter discussions on the municipal bill; a measure which, if carried into a law, will, by disfranchising the freemen of the English boroughs, prove a very severe blow to the Conservatives, who depend greatly upon that class of voters, and throw a corresponding accession of influence into the hands of their opponents. Greater exertions have been made this year than on any preceding occasion, by both parties, for increasing their respective strengths on the registration books; and both parties appear well pleased with the result. These exertions have obviously been dictated by the general conviction, that, whatever party be in power, a dissolution of Parliament will take place before the close of the present year.

June 22. The steamers brought 2000 Irish labourers to Liverpool, all in the last stage of destitution; the passage money was 3d. a-head.—A dreadful riot took place at Great Bircham, in Norfolk, owing to the execution of that part of the poor-laws which enacts that relief should be given in kind instead of money. The peasantry rose in a body against the parish officers, refused to work for the farmers, and assaulted two men who were willing to work. Some of the parties were dreadfully bruised; and the house of Mr Kitton, the principal farmer of the parish, was broken open, and the furniture piled up and set on fire. The mob increased to the number of about eight hundred, and were only dispersed by the arrival of the military. The fire was extinguished before much damage was done. Two other houses were attacked in the same manner. The soldiery soon put down the rioters, without bloodshed; and most of the discontented then returned to their work.

— 24. The address of the church of Scotland was presented by a deputation from the General Assembly to the King, who was pleased to receive it on the throne. The royal answer was, "I rely with confidence upon the loyalty and fidelity of the church of Scotland; and I receive with satisfaction this renewed assurance of your attachment to my person and government. It is my anxious wish to extend the benefits of religious worship and instruction to all classes of my subjects; and my most serious attention will continue to be directed to the best means of effecting this important object."—Mr Alderman Lainson and Mr Solomons were chosen as sheriffs for the city of London. The latter gentleman is a Jew, and the first of his creed who has ever been elected in this capacity.

July 4. Between twenty and thirty persons were brought up before Mr Francis Twemlow and a bench of magistrates, at Stafford, charged with having been concerned in throwing stones at the military during the Wolverhampton riots. The chairman sentenced them respectively to six, five, four, three, and two months' hard labour. Several had been previously discharged on their own recognisances; and the bill was ignored in respect to one man (Edward Silvey) for throwing at the military; the principal witness being too ill to attend and give evidence before the grand jury.

— 6. During the absence of the Countess of Mexborough at an entertainment in Sion House, her house in Dover Street, Piccadilly, was robbed of jewellery to an amount variously stated at £5000 and £10,000. The loss was discovered on her ladyship's return. None of the servants had been alarmed or seen any stranger during the evening. Two of them, however, Samuel and Catherine Bandy, have been taken into custody on suspicion of a participation in the robbery.—The Marquis Camden was installed as Chancellor of the University of Cambridge. The ceremonies and attendant entertainments were similar to those which last year graced the installation of the Duke of Wellington as Chancellor of Oxford. In the senate-house, before the entrance of the chief persons, occurred a scene which has been thus described by an eye-witness:—"A young gentleman gave out a succession of loyal and constitutional names, which were responded to with a strength of lungs which I have never heard equalled. As 'The King,' 'The Queen,' 'The Chancellor,' 'The Duke of Wellington,' 'The Duke of Cumberland,' 'Lord Eldon,' 'Sir Robert Inglis,' 'Church and King,' 'The Irish Church,' 'Protestant Ascendancy,' 'The House of Lords,' and a great variety of other party names and party watchwords, were called out by this self-constituted functionary, the shouts, or rather roars, were absolutely deafening. Names of an opposite character were then given out for the purpose of being consigned to infamy. The words 'Lord John Russell,' 'Lord Brougham,' 'Lord Morpeth,' 'O'Connell,' &c., were the signals for hissing, hooting, groaning, and the utterance of wild and ferocious cries. This scene was interrupted only for a moment by the head of the procession of 'potent, grave, and reverend signiors,' who arrived from Trinity College. As soon as they had taken their places, the uproar broke out with (if possible) increased violence, and was witnessed by them with any thing but marks of disapprobation."

— 7. Mr Lees, a moderate Tory, was returned for Oldham in room of the late William Cobbett. The other candidates were Mr Fergus O'Connor, well known as a radical reformer, who retired early with 32 votes, and Mr J. M. Cobbett, son of the late member. The ultimate numbers were, Mr Lees, 394; Mr Cobbett, 383; majority for Mr Lees, 11.

— 8. Married, by special licence, at Fordhook, the residence of Lady Noel Byron, the Right Hon. Lord King, to the Hon. Augusta Ada, only daughter of the late Lord Byron. Report states that Lady Noel Byron gave her daughter a dowry of £30,000 in cash. Lady King will also inherit the considerable estates of the Wentworths in Warwickshire, which are possessed by Lady Noel Byron, as the heiress of the late Sir Ralph Milbanke Noel, by the Hon. Judith Noel, eldest daughter of Edward, first Viscount Wentworth.

— 10. About eight o'clock in the morning, as the workmen in the employment of J. Fletcher, Esq. at a pit called "The Aullart Hole," about four miles from Bolton, on the banks of the Irwell, were at their work, the water burst in from the bed of the river, about one hundred yards from the mouth of the pit, with such force, that seventeen persons (ten boys and young men, and seven adults) were immediately overwhelmed in the water and gravel.

— 12. Dr Elrington, Bishop of Ferns, died at Liverpool: his diocese will be added to that of Ossory, according to the provisions of the church temporalities act; and the Bishop of Ossory will now be Bishop of Ferns.—There were some serious disturbances among the Irish labourers at Liverpool. Reports had been circulated of the intention of the Orangemen to celebrate the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne; and the Catholics, being exasperated at this threat, assembled in considerable numbers, with the intention of attacking the procession; which, however, did not take place. Towards evening, they became very riotous; breaking windows with yellow blinds, and knocking down persons with yellow handkerchiefs, &c. They at length proceeded to bridewell, of which they partly gained possession; they released many prisoners, destroyed furniture, and arming themselves with a quantity of lamp-irons, made a desperate resistance to the watchmen who attempted to disperse them. Several of the watchmen were seriously injured. The mayor, however, with a strong police force and about two hundred soldiers, soon put an end to the riot, and secured between twenty and thirty offenders. There was a good deal of petty rioting during the night, and part of the next day, but no serious or extensive injury committed on persons or property after the dispersion of the main body of the mob. On Monday the 13th, several of the rioters were committed to prison.

— 15. The Vice-Chancellor dissolved, with costs, the ex parte injunction obtained by Mrs Norton, to prevent the publication of the Coquette, by Mr Churton. The August, 1835.

injunction had been granted on the affidavit of Mrs Norton, that, according to her verbal agreement with Mr Bull, Mr Churton's late partner, she was to have the right of republishing, in a collected form, her contributions to La Belle Assemblée. But it appeared that there was a written agreement between Mrs Norton and Mr Bull, which gave the lady no title to her contributions, for which she was paid at the rate of £300 a-year; after which they became the property of Mr Bull, from whom Mr Churton purchased them. Mrs Norton strangely forgot the existence of this written agreement, and relied solely on the verbal agreement with Mr Bull, who himself admitted that he had made such an agreement. The Vice-Chancellor observed, that the memory of persons constantly engaged in the production of works of fancy was often not very retentive of dry facts of business, and in this way he accounted for Mrs Norton's forgetfulness of the written agreement with Mr Bull.

— 17. An unstamped daily newspaper, at twopence, was commenced in London, with the avowed object of compelling, by the aid of the people, if they shall patronise it, the abolition of the newspaper tax. The publishers express an anxious hope that the other newspapers will be immediately published in the same illegal manner.

— 18. A numerous meeting was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, upon the subject of the repeal of the newspaper stamp duty, Lord Brougham in the chair. The noble lord proceeded to address the meeting, and, after contending that the tax upon newspapers was an injudicious one, urged the necessity of making endeavours to procure its repeal. When the noble and learned lord had concluded his opening address, Dr Birkbeck rose and moved the first resolution. The meeting was addressed by Mr Hume, the Rev. Mr Fox, Dr Bowring, Mr D. Wakefield, Mr Grote, Mr O'Connell, Mr R. Wallace, Colonel Evans, and Lord Brougham. The resolutions and speeches strongly condemned the present system of taxing newspapers, as tending to deteriorate the character of the press, by maintaining a monopoly of the daily papers among a few capitalists, and as depriving the working classes of the best means of obtaining useful knowledge. Petitions to both Houses of Parliament were agreed to by the meeting, which then separated.

On the account of the revenue for the year ending on July 4, there is a decrease of £1,758,886, and on the account for the quarter a decrease of £656,407. In the customs for the quarter, there is an increase of £384,420; and in the excise a decrease of £551,461. The teaduty has been transferred from the excise to the customs, and thus has swelled the customs, and in the same proportion lowered the excise. The repeal of the house-tax, and some other taxes, accounts for the decrease of £425,036 in the quarter's taxes.

The formation of new votes, by pretended divisions of property, has been very extensively practised, by both parties, in anticipation of the recently expired period of registration. It is stated that the Duke of Bedford has made forty votes out of a particular field, allotting one acre to each.

The Right Honourable Henry Ellis is appointed ambassador to bear the King's congratulations to the Shah of Persia on his accession.

At the late meeting of the council at which Sir George Grey, one of the Canada commissioners, was sworn in, after that gentleman had taken the oaths, his Majesty addressed the commissioner at some length upon the nature of the duties he was to discharge. If we are rightly informed, he pointed out to Sir George Grey how far his line of duty was marked out in his oath, and then, reminding the commissioner that the Canadas had been won by British valour, and improved and enlarged at the expense of this country, warned him that these provinces must not be lost or given away. "Remember, sir," said his Majesty, in words which we believe we quote literally—"Remember, sir, these provinces must not be lost or given away. Whatever others may say to you, I tell you this—the Canadas must not be lost or given away."—Standard.

The commissioners appointed by government to inquire into the state of the population and the church of Ireland, have presented their first report, from which it appears that the people of Ireland consist at the present moment of

When the news of the success of the petitioners against Messrs Kelly and Dundas reached Ipswich, the clergy refused the bells to the reformers; but on the arrival of Bond, Cook, and Clamp, just discharged from Newgate, they allowed the ringing of the bells to welcome them.

A general order has been issued from the Horse Guards, dated June 18, directing all soldiers who make use of their side-arms in private quarrels to be summarily tried, and every soldier convicted of so using his side-arms may, in addition to other punishment, be degraded on the public parade.

Proposals have been issued for a new society, to be called the "Foreign Society;" the principal objects of which are to collect a library of foreign literature, and keep the club constantly supplied with periodical publications of every description, whether literary, political, or commercial, that have reference to foreign countries, including the colonies. It is calculated that, with a society of 500 members, a greater yearly subscription than four guineas would not be required. This would enable such a society to expend at least £1,000 per annum in the formation of its library, which, in the course of a few years, would contain a more complete collection of works on foreign literature than is probably to be met with in England. There is to be no dining, but only the refreshment of tea and coffee.—Literary Gazette.

Lord John Scott, Captain Hamilton, and Col. Greenwood, of the guards, have sailed for the seat of war in Spain, in the Duke of Buccleuch's yacht the Flower of Yarrow. The party embarked at Portsmouth direct for Bilbao.

Two meetings of that class of Protestants who profess great alarm at the progress of Catholicism and the measures contemplated for reforming the church in Ireland, were held at Exeter Hall, respectively on the 20th June and 11th July, when several speeches, full of declamation against the Catholics, were delivered by various gentlemen, including two itinerating anti-Catholic orators named O'Sullivan and M'Ghee.

An order in council, of the 24th June, directed that the assizes for the county palatine of Lancaster, hitherto holden at Lancaster, shall in future be holden at Liverpool and Lancaster; the county to be divided into two divisions, northern and southern; the assizes for that part of the county to be called the northern division, including the hundreds of Lonsdale, Amounderness, Leyland, and Blackburn, to be holden at Lancaster, and those for the southern division, including Salford and West Derby, to be holden at Liverpool; and that the Castle of Lancaster be the county jail for the northern division, and the House of Correction at Kirkdale that for the southern.

The city of London sittings exhibit a great falling off in the number of causes; the King's Bench paper containing about 90, the Common Pleas about 80, and the Court of Exchequer not 40. This is advantageous to the suitors, many of whom have been enabled to commence and try their actions in the space of three months.

Lady Astley lately concluded an unfortunate career in the King's Bench prison. She was daughter of Sir Henry Dashwood, Bart., and married, in 1819, Sir Jacob Astley, Bart., who was about equal in years, and eminently qualified to render her lot a fortunate one. About nine years ago she became acquainted with the well-known Captain Garth, and an intimacy ensued, which terminated in her elopement with him. Since that period they have endured various vicissitudes of fortune, until at length Captain Garth was imprisoned in the King's Bench, where Lady Astley has also lived, until the scarlet fever has suddenly put an end to her sufferings.—Globe.

In 1820, the wife of a labouring man named Richardson, residing in the parish of Upton Warren, near Bromsgrove, was delivered of four girls at a birth. They all survived until the 23d June, when the first-born died.—Warwick Advertiser.

Messrs Trecoart and Oberhausen have presented to the French Academy, specimens of lenses for microscopes, formed out of precious stones—viz. one of diamond, another of sapphire, and a third of ruby. It took twenty-four hours to polish the surface of a diamond lens, with a wheel, which revolved at least 200 times in a second; so that, in that single operation, the lens was turned round seventeen millions of times. The diamond lens, in its simple state, magnifies 210 times; with a compound eye-glass (oculaire compose) it magnifies 245 times, and in the latter case, the sapphire lens magnifies 255, and the ruby 235 times.

On the afternoon of April 9, Mr Clayton, an American aeronaut, ascended in his balloon at Cincinnati, and without rising so high as has been done before, was carried to the unprecedented distance of 350 miles in nine hours and a half, landing at two in the morning in a forest on the top of a hill in Monroe county, Virginia. He was nine days in returning to Cincinnati, where serious apprehensions had been entertained for his safety.

The following account of the death of an emigrant family upon the Grand Prairie of Indiana, is taken from "A Winter in the Far West."—Having attempted to cross a broad arm of the prairie, with his family, in an open waggon, on a very cold day, "they were found," says the writer, "stiff in the road, the horses frozen in their traces, and standing upright, as if petrified, and the man leaning against the waggon, with a fragment torn from it in his hands, as if in the act of trying to make a fire. The mother sat erect, with an infant in her arms; but the children were curled about her feet in every position that an attempt to screen themselves from the cruel exposure would suggest."

The following communication has been received from the venerable Archdeacon Kirchner, of Sorau, in Lower Lusatia, in reference to a fossil human foot found in that place; one of the most interesting additions that have yet been made to geological science. "The anthropolite in question, a vestige of antediluvian time was found in the lime-pits at Sorau, on the 15th of January last, at a depth of ten ells (between 18 and 19 feet in conjunction with the petrified remains of several extinct animals, such as the trilodite, the orthoceras, mammoth, and particularly a unique nocturnal butterfly of which no living specimen is known to exist. This anthropolite, which is become a complete mass of limestone consists of a very short but extremely muscular foot, a perfect state of preservation, with all the toes adhering to it; and none are more distinguishable than the large toe, from which the nail is torn off; the vestiges of the latter were lying near it; the bones, heel, muscles, all other parts of the foot, are likewise extant; the shin-bone and knee, together with the main bone and knee-pai (aeppeln), were found at the same time. The most striking deviations from the human conformation of the present day, which are here observable, are, first, the disproportion between so extremely muscular a foot and its unusual shortness and thickness, in which respects it closely resembles a Chinese foot; secondly, the extreme shortness of the shin-bone (tibia); and, thirdly, the uncommon size of the knee. The foot itself is the right one. The skull and other bones have not yet been discovered, but great hopes are entertained that they will be found upon digging from the other side of the pit which is intended to be done very shortly. The Upper Lusatian Society of the Arts and Sciences, as well as the Society of Naturalists in Goerlitz, intend to publish authentic reports of this anthropolite, derived from careful investigation on the spot. As this, perhaps the most interesting remains of primitive ages, was discovered simultaneously with some of the earliest petrifications of existence, and as the bones are not only destitute of any trace of their gluten (in this respect different from those found in Guadalupe), but are completely petrified, and in part crystallised, it is not possible that a doubt should be entertained of their high antiquity; every party conversant with the subject who has seen them, has pronounced them to be of an age far antecedent to the deluge." The individual who writes these lines is the author of a memoir, accompanied by fifty plates, "On the Petrifications at Sorau and in the Adjacent Parts."

IRELAND.

THE ministry are fast filling the public department with their adherents. A number of liberal barristers have been appointed crown prosecutors on the circuits, and seven, namely, Curry, Mageire, Brady, Pigott, Stock, Cooper, and Dixon, have received silk gowns. Lieutenant Drummond, who was so serviceable with his calculations for marking out the boundaries of the parliamentary boroughs under the reform bill, has obtained the place of Sir William Gosset in the Castle; Gossett succeeding Mr Seymour as sergeant-at-arms to the House of Commons.

The Mayo central committee reported, at the end of June, that 80,000 persons were in a state of destitution, if not utter starvation, in the district adjacent to Westport and Newport, while 300 tons of grain were weekly exported thence, and the markets are plentifully supplied, potatoes, for instance, being about 3d. a-stone.

July 1. The Orangemen at Monaghan had an armed procession, and being opposed by a few of the inhabitants, fired and wounded three men, one of whom soon after died. The murderers were not arrested.

— 12. (Sunday) The Orangemen of Belfast celebrated the battle of the Boyne in a very outrageous manner, marching to the churches in procession. The town was in such a state of excitement, that about four in the afternoon, the police being found unable to control the mob, the military were called in. The Orangemen having refused to disperse, or pull down their arches, a charge was made upon them, which they resisted with so much violence, that the soldiers were at length ordered to fire, and a young woman was killed, and six of the rioters severely wounded. Similar demonstrations were made throughout the north of Ireland, notwithstanding the proclamation of the Lord-Lieutenant.

Archbishop Whately has proceeded to London, to confer with ministers respecting certain provisions of the Irish church bill recently introduced by Lord Morpeth; to which, it is said, he entertains strong objections. It is understood that his grace, although a member of the Irish board of education, disapproves of some minor details in the working of the new system.

The fifth meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science will be held in Dublin, and will occupy the week commencing on Monday, August the 10th. It is anticipated, that this meeting will not offer inferior attractions, or be less numerously attended by the cultivators of science, than those already held at Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh.

In a case recently tried in the Dublin Court of Common Pleas, an action was brought by an apothecary for medicines furnished and professional services rendered to an aged gentleman of 93; the bill was the object of much amusement. The bill of particulars for three years' attendance amounted to £4707, 15s. 3d.; for one of the years alone it was £3599, 15s. 3d.; and one of the months it reached the enormous amount of £485, 19s. 5d. or an average quantity of physic, &c. daily, of about sixteen pounds sterling in value; as many as eight enemas were charged for in one day; the number of visits in the bill was 1703. The jury found for the plaintiff, £800.

MISCELLANEOUS.

POMPEII AS IT IS AND AS IT WAS.—The truth is, Pompeii offers to our view only the skeleton, the mere wreck of a city; all exhibits devastation and confusion; every building is dismantled and unroofed. Whatever was portable has been carried away; and even mosaics have been taken up, and pictures painted the walls cut out and detached from them. The solid parts are standing, though denuded; and, according to remaining bits of ornaments and such ornaments for furniture and embellishments as are to be found in the Museum at Naples, architects have made restorations upon paper that convey a very lively idea of Pompeian atria and apartments, but of which here meet with no more than the rude materials and imperfect indications. It must be admitted that the singularity and strangeness of the scene takes hold the mind very forcibly; and as far as names alone, it is impossible to be dissatisfied, or complain that anything is wanting. If we require illusion and effect, it is better to stick to books and engravings. We are shown what are distinguished as vestibules, atria, triclinæ, exhedræ, tablinæ, triclinia, baths, ambulæ, &c. whose names make a promise to the ear, but which themselves do not keep to the eye. There hardly a closet or recess that has not some fine-sounding classical term appropriated to it; consequently there are far more verbal distinctions than perceptible differences. In my opinion, this specimen of an ancient city is not at all calculated to put us to the test of conceit with a modern one, the latter being far preferable in almost every respect. Admitting that the temples and other public structures were magnificent, a point that may be easily conceded, especially if they were set off to the greatest advantage by the sininess of every thing else, such buildings alone do not constitute a city. Neither do exceedingly narrow streets, with only open shops and the entrances into houses towards them, at all correspond with modern ideas of grandeur, convenience, or cheerfulness. On the contrary, so far from partaking of, they are directly in position, to such qualities. The houses were not at all better suited to any of our notions of comfort and accommodation, but were rather most ostentatiously inconvenient. Effect and display there certainly must have been: for, on first entering, nearly the whole of the interior was thrown open to view in successive courts, to such a degree as to destroy all privacy, and, besides, in very spacious mansions, to leave hardly any room for a tolerably-sized room of any kind. The respective effect on looking up a vista varied by colonnades and atria, by divisions now ceiled, now open to the sky, by parts now contracting and then again expanding, and by a court or garden at the extreme background, must have been pleasing and striking enough—quite scenic in its arrangement—although it could also be wished that greater variety had been shown in such arrangement, instead of its being made every case so nearly the same. Still the whole of it amounts to no more than what we should now include as one continued vestibule: there were divisions, but no separation, except such as might be occasionally made by curtains or draperies. The rooms appear to have been all detached, and must have been very badly lighted or else greatly exposed to the weather; which, let people say what they will about the extraordinary fineness of the climate, must have been attended with much inconvenience, more than would have been put up with had the inhabitants had the means of remedying it. In the rooms, for instance, which had a large unglazed window opening to the peristyle of the farther court, there could have been no privacy; because, unless the court itself was kept perfectly secluded from all intrusion, conversation must have been continually liable to be overheard. Although curtains might have been well enough to exclude eye-curiousity, they would have been a most treacherous defence against ear-curiousity, they would sometimes have screened listeners, to whom they would give a double advantage. The general smallness of the rooms, too, must have greatly increased the inconveniences just adverted to. Nay, the rooms on each side of the atrium seldom exceeded what in England would be termed mere closets: it is literally impossible "to swing a cat in them;" and they also resembled closets in being perfectly dark, unless they received some faint degree of light by means of an open space left between the door itself and the soffit of the door-case. Perhaps they were used as mere closets, after all; for to what other purpose such gloomy, ill-ventilated cells, all crowded together, could have been applied, it is not easy to conjecture.—Rae Wilson's Travels in France and Italy.

A GIFTED SPEAKER.—It is well known upon one of the English circuits that a leading barrister once undertook to speak while an express went twenty miles to bring back a witness whom it was necessary to produce upon the trial. But what is this to the performance of an American counsellor, who upon a sudden emergency held the judge and the jury by their ears for three mortal days! He indeed was put to the wit's end for words wherewith to fill up the time; and he introduced so many truisms, and argued at the utmost length so many indisputable points, and expatiated so profusely upon so many trite ones, that Judge Marshall (the biographer of Washington, and the most patient of listeners) was so far moved at last to say, "Mr Such-a-one!—(addressing him by his name in a deliberate tone of the mildest reprehension)

—there are some things with which the court should be supposed to be acquainted."—The Doctor, vol. iii.

CHANCES OF MARRIAGE.—The following curious statement by Dr Granville is drawn up from the registered cases of 876 married women. It is the first ever constructed to exhibit to ladies their chances of marriage at various ages. Of the 876 females there were married—

Years of age.	Years of age.	Years of age.
3 at 13	59 at 23	5 at 32
11 - 14	53 - 24	7 - 33
16 - 15	36 - 25	5 - 34
43 - 16	24 - 26	2 - 35
45 - 17	28 - 27	0 - 36
77 - 18	22 - 28	2 - 37
115 - 19	17 - 29	0 - 38
118 - 20	9 - 30	1 - 39
86 - 21	7 - 31	0 - 40
8 - 22

From this curious statistical table our fair readers may form a pretty correct judgment of the chances which they have of entering into the holy state of matrimony, and of enjoying the sweets of wedded love. They will observe that the chances are most in their favour at the ages of 19 and 20, after which the chances turn against them. So far this is all very well for the ages of 19 and 20. It would be erroneous, however, to infer that women never marry at 40, because Dr Granville's table says so. 36, 38, and 40, are their blank ages; but that is an accident: and there are various ways of accounting for it. Without offence to our fair readers or Dr Granville, we must state that we distrust all sorts of statistical reports where the ages of women are concerned; no marriageable woman ever reaches the age of 40, by her own confession; it is impolite to say so; and it is plain the doctor did not consult the register. Besides, the calculation is made for France, which makes a difference; for, in our country, such is the spread of the Malthusian doctrine, that marriages are now made upon a system, and the soberer part, assuredly, take place at the ripe age of 40. From the disparity of ages which we see unite in matrimony, one would imagine that our fair countrywomen were of the mind of Mrs Malaprop, who says that there is nothing so comfortable in wedded life, or likely to make it permanently happy, as a little reasonable aversion at the beginning. Upon the whole, the fair sex have no reason to complain on the score of "the chances of marriage." As compared with ours, their situation in this respect is highly enviable. Out of 1000 married men, not a dozen will be found beneath the yoke at the age of 20; by which time we find, by the table, that no fewer than 428 females out of 876 have been secured in domestic bliss! Up to 25, men drop off slowly from the ranks of celibacy; from that to 30 is rather a bustling time; from 30 to 35, serious men begin "to set their house in order;" and the greater number of marriages, for better or for worse, then take place. From five-and-thirty to fifty, a man may live very well and contentedly alone; but at the latter age he begins to be revisited by a few of the crotchets of his youth, and believes he may yet be happy. After fifty there are good chances of marriage, when men are comfortable in their circumstances. At 60 the subject possesses very little interest for the fair sex, and here we let it drop, having shown, as we hope, sufficient to remove any ill impression they may have received from the startling conclusions of Dr Granville.—Observer.

GHOST STORIES.—Ghost stories are absurd. Whenever a real ghost appears—by which I mean some man or woman dressed up to frighten another—if the supernatural character of the apparition has been for a moment believed, the effects on the spectator have always been most terrible; convulsion, idiocy, madness, or even death on the spot. Consider the awful descriptions in the Old Testament of the effects of a spiritual presence on the prophets and seers of the Hebrews; the terror, the exceeding great dread, the utter loss of all animal power. But in our common ghost stories, you always find that the seer, after a most appalling apparition, as you are to believe, is quite well the next day. Perhaps he may have a headache; but that is the outside of the effect produced. Alston, a man of genius, and the best painter yet produced by America, when he was in England told me an anecdote which confirms what I have been saying. It was, I think, in the University of Cambridge, near Boston, that a certain youth took it into his wise head to endeavour to convert a Tom-Painish companion of his, by appearing as a ghost before him. He accordingly dressed himself up in the usual way, having previously extracted the ball from the pistol which always lay near the head of his friend's bed. Upon first awaking, and seeing the apparition, the youth who was to be frightened, A., very coolly looked his companion the ghost in the face, and said, "I know you. This is a good joke; but you see I am not frightened. Now you may vanish." The ghost stood still. "Come," said A., "that is enough. I shall get angry. Away!" Still the ghost moved not. "By —," ejaculated A., "if you do not in three minutes go away, I'll shoot you." He waited the time, deliberately levelled the pistol, fired, and with a scream at the immobility of the figure, became convulsed, and afterwards died. The very instant he believed it to be a ghost, his human nature fell before it.—Cole-ridge's Table Talk.

SIR WALTER SCOTT and his CAT.—While Scott was reading, a sage grimalkin had taken his seat in a chair beside the fire, and remained with fixed eye and grave demeanour, as if listening to the reader. I observed to Scott that his cat seemed to have a black-letter taste in literature. "Ah!" said he, "these cats are a very mysterious kind of folk. There is always more passing in their minds than we are aware of; it comes, no doubt, from their being so familiar with witches and warlocks." He went on to tell a little story about a gudemann who was returning to his cottage one night, when, in a lonely out-of-the-way place, he met with a funeral procession of cats all in mourning, bearing one of their race to the grave, in a coffin covered with a black velvet pall. The worthy man, astonished and half-frightened at so strange a pageant, hastened home, and told what he had seen to his wife and children. Scarce had he finished, when a great black cat that sat beside the fire, raising himself up, exclaimed, "then am I King of the Cats!" and vanished up the chimney. The funeral seen by the gudemann was one of the cat dynasty. "Our grimalkin here," added Scott, "sometimes reminds me of this story, by the airs of sovereignty which he assumes; and I am apt to treat him with respect, from the idea that he may be a great prince incog., and may some time or other come to the throne." In this way Scott would make the habits and peculiarities of even dumb animals about him subjects for humorous remark or whimsical story.—Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey.

SCOTLAND.

June 23. The Argyllshire mountains were observed to be covered with snow, particularly a hill on the Drimsnyne estate, named Benevallo, the highest ridge in the mountains in Cowal, and Crigen Hill, or the Duke of Argyll's Bowling-Green, on the western side of Loch Long. On the 15th, four days previous to the above date, the thermometer was at thirty-two degrees at Inverness, during the night. The effects of the cold upon the fruits of the earth are said to be of a very serious nature in that district.

—25. A fishing-boat belonging to Fisherrow, with nine men on board, was lost to the east of the Isle of May. Six of these unfortunate fishermen have left families.

—27. A pilot boat belonging to Peterhead was overwhelmed by the sea near that port, when three men (all of them with families) and two boys, found a watery grave.

—29. Mr Campbell, younger of Fairfield, a fine youth, the only son of his parents, accidentally fell overboard the Ardincaple steamer, a few miles to the east of the Bass, and, though he rose to the surface, and every effort was made to give him aid, he sank to rise no more.

July 13. James Bell, a private in the 5th Dragoon Guards, found guilty of the murder of Sergeant Moorhead at Piershill Barracks, was executed at the usual spot near the County Hall, Edinburgh. On the same day, Elizabeth McNeil or Baulks was condemned by the High Court of Justiciary to be executed on the 3d August, for poisoning her husband, lately residing at Dewarston, in the county of Edinburgh. On the ensuing day, as if to show how ineffectual are capital punishments in preventing crime, a woman, residing in Leith, struck her husband, an old pensioner, several severe blows on the head with a coal-axe, while he was asleep; in consequence of which he is in a very dangerous state.—The celebration of the battle of the Boyne was in Scotland marked by events almost as outrageous and fatal as those in the sister island. Understanding that the Orangemen of Airdrie were to celebrate the victory of their party, a band of desperate Ribbonmen proceeded from Glasgow, armed, and resolved to come to blows with the celebrators. Disappointed in their main object by the retirement of the Orangemen into their lodges, the Ribbonmen engaged in a fight with the authorities by whom they were opposed, and were only subdued by a party of military conducted by the sheriff. Twenty were secured, and lodged in Glasgow bridewell, of whom six have since been committed for trial. The outrageous conduct of the Ribbonmen inspired the people of Airdrie with so violent an antipathy to the Catholics, that they resolved to work no longer in company with persons of that persuasion, all of whom had soon after to leave the town for the sake of their personal safety. Nor was this all, for, on the ensuing Monday, the 20th, a mob ransacked the house of one Canning, in which the Ribbonmen had first rendezvoused, and committed many other outrages. For several days, the agitation which prevailed in this little manufacturing town amounted to a degree almost feverish, and completely put a stop to all the ordinary courses of industry; circumstances happily very rare in Scotland, and which could not readily have been produced by other than external causes. The Catholic bishop of Glasgow has published a letter, repudiating in the strongest terms the persons professing his creed, who were concerned in this transaction.—Late in the same evening, a party of Ribbonmen to the amount of forty or fifty made a hostile incursion into the town of Port Glasgow for similar purposes, and, coming into violent collision with the peaceable inhabitants, stabbed several persons, and bruised many others.

—17. This being the anniversary of the passing of the reform bill, two public dinners were held in Edinburgh to celebrate the event, one attended by two hundred persons, the other by three hundred.

The commissioners for inquiring into the state of church accommodation, and funds available for religious purposes in Scotland, are the Earl of Minto, G.C.B.; the Hon. Mountstuart Elphinstone; John James Hope Johnstone, Esq. M.P.; Robert Bell, Esq. procurator of the church of Scotland; James M. Nairne, Esq. of Dunsinane; Thomas Henry Lister, Esq.; John Shaw Stewart, Esq. advocate; John James Reid, Esq. advocate; Andrew Coventry Dick, Esq. advocate; Henry Baxter, Esq. advocate; Edward Horsman, Esq. advocate; George Logan, Esq. W.S. secretary. The Edinburgh Advertiser, the principal Conservative journal in Scotland, expresses great disappointment with this nomination, characterising the individuals as, with one exception, Whigs, Radicals, and Voluntaries, who cannot be expected to treat the subject impartially.

The report of the select committee of the House of Commons on the state of Leith harbour, has been printed. It recommends that government shall abandon or suspend its claim on the dock dues, provided that adequate public objects can be accomplished by this remission; that the first step in any public arrangement must be a settlement of the town with its creditors; that the connection between Leith and the corporation of Edinburgh be dissolved; and that the property and management of the port be vested in commissioners; that the dues payable at Leith be simplified, and the mark per ton abolished, due compensation being given to the clergy to whom it belongs. We fear, that in these arrangements proposed by the committee, so many complicated and adverse interests are involved, that it would require years to bring about any settlement.

A bill introduced by the Lord Advocate for the explanation and amendment of the Scottish reform act, makes the following, among other provisions:—That no more than two joint owners or life-tenants shall be registered upon the same property; that no one shall be registered for counties who has not resided for six months within the shire, or within seven miles of it, and unless he be in actual possession of property producing £50 a-year clear of all charges; that no more than two joint tenants be registered on any property; and that a lease of ninety-nine years in burghs be held equivalent to ownership of the property.

TOLERATION.

TOLERANCE may be defined as an evil passion which acts us in reference to those who differ from us in opinion. In general, it is the more active in proportion to the speculativeness of the opinions, and to the importance which we attach to them. For instance, we are less apt to entertain malignant feelings towards those who dissent from us in regard to some approved fact in science, than in regard to those who profess opposite religious and political dogmas. Another source of intolerance is found in the dread of being affected in our worldly circumstances by a various class of opinions; another, in mistaken views of benevolence and piety, generally affecting those who may be called the Ignorant Sincere. A third source is our self-love: because an opinion happens to be ours, we regard every dissent from it as an insult—an insult to be avenged.

Like all other evil passions, it is one which requires experience of its own bad results, and the cultivation of better sentiments, to bring it into subjection. The first impulse is to extirpate the opposite doctrine by the extinction of the lives of the dissenters—murder being justified by the hope of preventing a greater evil. When the sword and stake are found repugnant to the spirit of the age, the friends of the truth—that is, of the predominant belief—usually resort to the next less severe punishment, such as transportation or imprisonment. After running through the gamut of felonious penalties, they can still do good deal by depriving the dissentients of the right to educate their own children, offering their estates to the first of their offspring who will profess a different faith, and other gentle persuasives. And even when these are exhausted, and the odious heretics are allowed to profess what they please without dread of positive annoyance, a few negative troubles are kept up, such as disqualifying them for office, marking them as of a meaner order in society, and so forth. Much intolerance can be exemplified in these and similar ways, long after the community has arrived at a conviction that it is as tolerant as any community can be.

Depending on ignorance, prejudice, false piety, and other most notable characteristics of an early stage of society, Intolerance has never been the exclusive feature of any particular religious profession, except in so far as any particular religious profession may have been predominant at an early period, or has been peculiarly exposed to danger. Thus, the Catholic persecutions of the sixteenth century display all the barbarism of that era; while the Protestant persecutions of the seventeenth, both in reference to the Catholics, and to various denominations of themselves, are marked by the milder, but still harsh features of that time. For a few illustrations of this proposition, we may quote an excellent article which appeared about twenty years ago in the Edinburgh Review:—There are two doctrines, purely speculative, which both Newton and Locke, though sincere Christians, and diligent searchers of the Scripture, did not believe; and there is at this day an eminent Protestant church, which directs all its congregations, minister and people, to sing or say, thirteen times every year, in the most unqualified terms, that 'no man believe these two doctrines, 'he cannot be saved,' and, 'without doubt, shall perish everlastingly.' In one of its public articles, the same church declares, 'They also are to be had accursed who presume to say that every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law and the spirit of nature.' And to these articles is prefixed a declaration of the king, as supreme head and governor of the church, in which we read the following words:—'Requiring all our loving subjects to continue in the uniform profession thereof [of the said articles], and prohibiting the least difference from the said articles, which, to that end, we command to be new printed, and this our declaration to be published therewith.' Now, we leave it to men of common sense to judge what the conduct of this church would have been in the darker ages, if it had been established without a rival in almost every nation of Europe. We are far, however, from meaning to insinuate that these denunciations of divine wrath against the antitrinitarians, and against the heretics who would save virtuous heathens from eternal misery, form any part of the faith of the great body of Christians who now compose this respectable church: But nothing can be more manifest than the intolerant spirit of the theologians by whom these denunciations were most unnecessarily introduced into its standards, where they are most unnecessarily retained, along with the royal declaration, to this day. At all events, we know for certain, that time was when this church brought heretics to the flames; that under the administration of its governess, Queen Elizabeth (so she is styled in the statute enacting her ecclesiastical supremacy), not fewer than one hundred and eighty persons suffered death by the laws against Catholic priests and Catholic converts; that the same 'most religious and gracious queen' (so she is styled in the Liturgy) instituted, with the advice of her clergy the English inquisition, the notorious Court of High Commission; and that, from the first establishment of the reformation in this island, whether we date it in the reign of Henry VIII. or of his son, till the accession of William, a presbyterian king—all toleration was expressly prohibited by law; and, although sometimes protected illegally by the Stuarts and by Cromwell, was uniformly opposed by the church of England.

With regard to the Protestant church, which was finally established at the revolution in Scotland, where, from the first introduction of the reformation, it had been fondly cherished by the majority of the nation, the vehemence of its intolerant spirit during a long period is well known. Its celebrated founder John Knox proclaimed the awful sentence, which was loudly re-echoed by his disciples, that the idolater should die the death; in plain English, that every Catholic should be hanged. The bare toleration of Prelacy, of Protestant Prelacy, was the guilt of soul-murder. It was this church that framed the solemn league and covenant for the extirpation of Prelacy by the sword, and enjoined it to be subscribed by all persons, under pain of excommunication. And during the negotiations for the union, it was this church, who, in a formal petition, besought the Parliament of Scotland, that, 'as they would not involve themselves and the Scots nation in guilt,' they should not consent to the establishment of the English hierarchy and ceremonies—where?—in Scotland?—that was perfectly understood. But no, not even in England!

It is but too easy to account for this extreme animosity of the Presbyterians. The Episcopalians had been astonished at their unpardonable obstinacy in separating from the English worship, which is so manifestly founded on the express word of Scripture, and conformable to the practice of the apostolic and purest ages. Accordingly, during the two reigns immediately previous to the revolution, the Presbyterians in Scotland were persecuted most unmercifully, and to death, not by the Papists, but by their Protestant brethren of the Episcopal church, which was then established in both kingdoms. What was the consequence? Not the conversion of the Presbyterians; not the security of the establishment: but the reverse. The schism became incurable; the former animosities were embittered and perpetuated; absurd fanatics were changed into desperate rebels; those who perished in the cause were revered as martyrs; the contagion became more general and inveterate; the great mass of the people united in the most invincible zeal for their own worship, hatred to the civil government, and abhorrence of Prelacy; till at last it was found necessary, in the settlement at the revolution, to change the establishment from the Episcopal to the Presbyterian church.

Whence does it happen that these fierce animosities are now so greatly allayed? Each of the two churches retains at this day the same doctrines, the same worship, and the same hierarchy; and is as much or as little conformable to Scripture as formerly. The churches are the same, at least externally; but the nation is wiser and more tolerant. The Episcopalians and Presbyterians of the present times do not resemble the bigots who conducted the inquisitorial tyranny of the high commission, or who imposed the test of the covenant; who visited the west of Scotland with the free quarters of the military, or who triumphed so brutally over the gallant Montrose. Episcopalians and Presbyterians now sit together in the Privy Council, and in Parliament; two Presbyterians in our own days have been Chancellors of England, Episcopalians are judges and commanders-in-chief in Scotland; and yet this strange medley has never interrupted the prosperity or peace of Britain."

In the present day we are arrived at a particular stage in the abolition of intolerance. We now neither burn nor hang. We have annulled every positive penalty which was once incurred by the profession of particular doctrines, and thrown every department of the public service open to the ambition of all except a very small denomination. But he who would say that, with this trifling exception, there is no intolerance in the land, would be asserting what is manifestly very far from the truth. The profession of particular opinions is still a source of advantage and disadvantage, not merely through the uncontrollable prejudice of individuals, but by the countenance and discountenance of the government, of the law, and of large bodies of the people. There may be less apparent hardship in the deprivation of some kind of honour which is conferred upon others, than in the actual infliction of pain upon the person; but we question if, in the present advanced stage of society, the former be not as great as the latter was at any by-past time. Till the accident of religious and political profession—for, depending so much on birth, temperament, and education, they must be considered as in a great degree accidental—shall cease to procure for any the least worldly advantage or disadvantage—till there be a total cessation from all anger as to what can be thought and fear for what may be expressed by our neighbours—it cannot be said that we enjoy the blessing of Toleration.

Foreign History.

FRANCE.

THE discovery of a conspiracy against the life of the king of the French, in the first week of July, and the precautions taken against it, were alluded to in our last. It appears that, towards the end of the month, rumours of an attempt on the royal person were still prevalent in Paris. Whether these circumstances were in any way connected with the event which we have now to record, it is impossible as yet to determine. The celebration of the Three Days commenced on Monday, the 27th July, and on that day nothing remarkable happened. But on Tuesday the 28th, as the king, surrounded by a brilliant cortege, was passing along the Boulevard du Temple, in the course of a review of the troops, and just as he had reached the Theatre des Funambules, a loud noise, resembling irregular platoon firing, was heard, and a number of those immediately behind the king fell dead or wounded to the ground. The cloud of smoke which burst at the same instant from a window in the third floor of a house marked No. 50 in the Boulevard, gave notice of the quarter whence the firing had proceeded; and the king, whose horse was shot in the neck, while he himself had received a wound in the arm, instantly rode up to the spot. The house was immediately surrounded and all its inmates arrested, including a man who was observed slipping down by a back window, and whose face was dreadfully wounded. On entering the room whence the firing had proceeded, an engine, consisting of twenty-five musket barrels mounted on a frame of wood, and pointing out of the window, was found. It was so contrived, that all were discharged at once by a train; but the assassin had overloaded them to such a degree with bullets and pieces of iron, that five of the barrels had burst, whereby his jaw had been lacerated. In two which had not gone off, were found six balls, the charge being in all eight inches deep.*

Previously to the explosion of this "infernal machine," as it is called, the king had been received by the crowd with very slight symptoms of cordial feelings; but shouts of "Vive le Roi!" "A bas les assassins!" now burst from all quarters. The king himself was remarked to look, for some time, extremely ghastly. No time was lost in attending to the unfortunate victims of the explosion, of whom thirteen were found to be killed, namely, Marshal Mortier, Duke de Treviso, struck in the heart by a ball; General de Lachasse de Verny, struck on the forehead by a ball; Captain Villate, aide-de-camp to Marshal Maison; Lieutenant-Colonel Rieussec, of the 8th legion, struck by three balls; Messrs Prudhomme, Ricard, Leger, and Benetter, grenadiers of the 8th legion; a colonel, not named; two citizens, a woman and a child. Twenty-eight persons were found to be wounded, some of them very severely; and of these one afterwards died.

The assassin seized by the police was a man about forty years of age, who gave his name at first as Auguste Girard, but was subsequently recognised as a Corsican named Fieschi, formerly in the guard of Joachim Murat, king of Naples, afterwards, on his return to Corsica, condemned to ten years' imprisonment for stealing a cow, and who had latterly imposed himself for some years upon the French government as one of those entitled to pensions for having suffered political persecution under the Restoration. The discovery of this imposture, and withdrawal of the pension at the close of last year, are said to have partly provoked him to this atrocious attempt, to which he is said to have further been induced by a Carlist bribe, though other accounts represent the act as an emanation of furious republicanism. The man himself preserves a dogged silence respecting his motives, and has not hitherto inculpated a single person as an accomplice.

Congratulations of the most cordial nature were poured from all quarters before the royal family of France, on the escape of the king and princes (for three of these had been present) from the attempt of Fieschi. The newspapers of every complexion, in both France and England, were loud in condemning the treason, and disclaiming all connection with individuals capable of perpetrating it. Funeral honours of the most solemn character were paid to the bodies of those who perished; and scores of both the extreme parties were arrested on suspicion, the republicans being observably treated with the greatest severity.

Favoured by the public feeling which such an event could not fail to excite, the French government immediately proceeded to take measures of unexampled severity with the press, to the licence of which they attribute much of their difficulties. At a full meeting of the Chamber of Deputies, August 4, after a preliminary speech by the Duke de Broglie, the Minister of Justice proposed a bill, comprising the following objects:—First, as to attempts against the safety of the State. To question the legality of the king's title, to attack the form of the government, or provoke the people to change it, is declared treasonable, and subjects the offender to the penalty of imprisonment, and a fine of from L.400 to L.2000. To ridicule the king's person or authority, or to introduce his name into discussions on public matters, renders the offender liable to imprisonment from one month to five years, and a fine, varying from L.20 to L.400. To avow Carlist or Republicanism, that is, to express an opinion that the right to the throne is in Henry V., or that a republic should be substituted for the existing government, subjects to imprisonment from six months to five years, and a fine of from L.20 to L.400.—Secondly, as to the Press. The "Gerant," or responsible conductor, is bound to sign every number of his journal —bound to reveal the real authors of inculpated articles—bound to publish in his journal, for payment, articles sent by government correctory of mis-statements appearing in a previous number, under the penalty of imprisonment from one month to one year, and a fine of from L.20 to L.400. For infractions of these laws, he is amenable to the correctional police. Lithographs and engravings are subjected to a censorship, that is, they cannot appear without the previous authorisation of the prefect or minister.—Thirdly, as to Juries. Juries on political offences are to decide by a simple majority of seven to five, instead of one of eight to four, as hitherto—they are allowed to deliberate in making up their verdict, but they are to vote by ballot, that is, in secret, and it is rendered penal to publish their names.—Fourthly, offences against the person or title of the king, or the form of the government, are to be tried, not by a jury, but by the Chamber of Peers. But, according to the prime minister, the measures of the government, the laws it proposes, its administrative acts, the proceedings of the Chambers, are all open to the strictures of the journals as heretofore; the new enactments only prohibit them from implicating the king, who, by the constitution, can do no wrong, in charges for which, if true, his ministers are responsible.

The French and British press have united in denouncing these proposed enactments as destructive of the remains of liberty in France, and giving a termination of despotism to the system created in July and August 1830. The French government is stated to be much troubled in consequence of the adverse sentiments universally expressed in Britain, and is expected to make some conciliatory modification of their project. In the meantime, one of their number, M. Persil, the Minister of Justice, has excited much sensation by declaring that the ministers were determined to remain within the limits of the charter, as long as the necessities of the country would allow them.

In the sitting of the Court of Peers on the 13th August, the cases of the Lyons prisoners were entirely disposed of. Seven of the prisoners were condemned to transportation (which in France means imprisonment for life), two to twenty years' imprisonment, and the remainder to various terms of imprisonment, such as one, three, five, seven, ten, and fifteen years. Nine of the prisoners were acquitted. The number of accused who had not surrendered is twenty-six, and the court retired to deliberate on the decision respecting their cases. They have since sentenced twenty-four of these. Three were acquitted, one condemned to transportation, and the rest to various periods of imprisonment, varying from ten to twenty years.

The French have experienced a severe defeat in the colony of Algiers. Their army, under General Frelzel, was surprised at Macta by Abdel Kader, an Arab chief who had previously been deemed an ally, with 15,000 men. Overwhelmed by this large force, the French lost 500 men in killed and wounded, with an immense quantity of arms and baggage; and it was with the greatest difficulty that the remainder could be embarked and conveyed to Oran. On the receipt of this intelligence at Paris, General Clausel was instantly dispatched to assume, as is supposed, the chief command.

SPAIN.

THE Carlist cause continues to suffer reverses. The army of that party experienced a serious defeat on the 10th July, on both banks of the Arga, at Larraga and Artajona; having to retire on both, with considerable loss.

Don Carlos has made good the threat of his proclamation at Durango, by causing to be shot, in cold blood (July 16), three English marines of Commodore Henry's party, who incautiously went beyond the walls of Bilbao. The messenger dispatched by the English government to remonstrate against this proclamation, has met with no concession on the part of the Spanish pretender, who alleges that, if any of his subjects (the Spaniards) were to join with the malcontent Irish, he could not find fault with their being subjected to military execution by the British government. In the meantime, a party of foreigners in his service, having fallen into the hands of the queen's troops, have been put to death in revenge, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the English who were present.

About 1500 of the English auxiliaries are now in readiness to commence warfare in Spain, and more are on their way thither. The interest of the military proceedings has, however, been suspended by the greater importance of some popular movements in Catalonia. A decree for breaking up all the monastic establishments containing less than twelve inmates, was lately issued by the queen-regent. In Barcelona, the most of the monasteries, containing more than this number, were allowed to remain. This so much exasperated the people of that city, that they destroyed six monasteries and killed about seventy of the monks. On the 4th August, the scenes of violence were renewed, and were not suppressed without difficulty, nor till one commander of the government troops, Lauder, had been obliged to take refuge for his life in a fortress, while another, Bassa, was killed, and his body tossed about on the streets. In destroying the monasteries, the populace are said to have displayed a remarkable superiority to all temptations of plunder, but at the same time the most brutal hostility against the monks, some of whom were pined, others burnt, others beaten to death with sticks and stones, notwithstanding every effort of the humanitary to save them. Twelve hundred religious houses were suppressed by the decree, and the revenues applied to the liquidation of the national debt. According to the latest intelligence, the popular movement spread into Arragon and other three provinces, and was of a decidedly ultra-liberal character.

PORTUGAL.

THE Portuguese government has made a communication to the British ambassador, stating that, according to a provision in the treaty of 1810, the Portuguese government considered it suspended from the 10th January 1836. This had been accompanied by an intimation that the Portuguese government was willing and desirous to open a negotiation for the purpose of establishing a new treaty founded on principles of reciprocal advantage. The same government has issued a very long decree, establishing a new administrative division of the kingdom. In lieu of the seven provincial governments now existing, some of which are very large, and others very small, there are to be 17 "administrative districts," corresponding apparently to the French departments, each containing nearly an equal population: these districts are to be divided into 799 communes (exclusive of 23 in the Azores, Madeira, and Cape Verde Islands), each of which will comprehend two or three parishes; and the chief officer of the district or commune is to be assisted by a junta or council elected by the inhabitants. This introduction of the elective principle into the local government, is one of the fruits of the late revolution. Portugal, like England, at this moment receiving her municipal reform bill, rather the former is obtaining a more extensive benefit for the Portuguese decree carries the elective principle into what may be called county, as well as borough government. A quantity of national property, houses and land, was sold on the 21st and 22d July; the estimated value was L.390,000, but it brought L.580,000. The higher price realised than was anticipated, gives an increasing confidence in the stability of the government.

MEXICO.

THE struggle in Mexico has ended. The army remained faithful to the president, Santa Anna, and the use he has made of his victory over the states of Zacatecas, has been to overturn the federal constitution, which, as president, he had sworn to defend, and to establish, in its stead, a central government, of which, whether under the name of dictator, or emperor, he is to be the absolute ruler, and which, being adverse to the interests of the northern states, can only be maintained by military force; and therefore the Mexican republic is now to be considered under the rule of a military despot.

It is strange that at such a time we should have announced that these South American states (formerly colonies of Spain) are at last to be recognised as independent by the ministers of the queen. This assurance, so long delayed, has come at a time when wisdom and justice may be little felt. Already, however, a passport has been expedited to his excellency Senor Santa Maria, by the Spanish minister, Minister of the Republic of Mexico, &c. Senor Santa Maria, adds the Globe, which made the first announcement of this, will, we hear, leave London a few days for Madrid, to put his hand, with that other minister of Venezuela, already there, to the great and beneficent act of Spanish American independence and amity with the parent country.

Advices from the Cape of Good Hope to the 30th announce the death of the restless Chief Hintza, who had on the 28th April sued for peace, and undertaken to pay 25,000 cattle and 500 horses, as compensation for the outrages his tribe had committed; Hintza, Crellin, and his relation Bookoo, being also detained as hostages with himself until that promise was fulfilled. On the 12th of May, Hintza proceeded under escort of a detachment, commanded by Colonel Smith, to join out where the first portion of the cattle was collected. The party having dismounted to ascend a very steep ascent, Hintza sprang suddenly on his horse and galloped forward. Colonel Smith endeavoured to shoot him, but his pistols missed fire; he pursued, however, and caught up with him, threw him on the ground. Hintza endeavoured to stab the colonel, but failing, got up, and ran down a precipice. He was followed on foot by Mr. Southey, jun. who shot him in the ribs. He escaped a second time, however, but being still pursued by Mr. Southey, was discovered concealed under a rock. He threw an assagai at his pursuer, who, closing with him, blew out his brains. It appeared he had sent a messenger to hurry off the cattle beyond reach which he had promised to deliver up. His infant son, having signed the treaty with the British, has been recognised as his successor. About 7000 square miles of the Caffre territory have been declared confiscated, and that restless tribe are now cooped up in a quarter of their former land, not adequate to subsist the half of their number; so that farther outrages, to be followed by other confiscations, may be expected. Up to the 25th May, the colonists had recovered 30,000 head of cattle.

The conditions for making an iron railroad from Brussels are settled, and the expense is estimated at

* The whole machine bore some resemblance to one of those square sloping desks mounted on a frame, so common in schools and counting-houses, the barrels pointing downwards along the slope, so as to hit in the middle of the road.

1,000,000 francs. The application has been made for permission of both governments.

The cholera at present prevails to a frightful extent in south of France. At Toulon, down to the 8th August, there had been 1401 deaths, nearly all the cases being fatal. At Marseilles, previous to the 23d July, there had been eighty deaths.

On the 31st July, a brutal attack was made on the Jews at Hamburg. On the previous evening, about six or eight Jews had been thrust out of the Alster Halle—a place of public resort; and the next day, about forty of them, young men of respectable character, went to the same place, prepared to defend themselves. They were attacked by about two hundred and fifty "Christians," and a battle ensued, which appeared likely to end in favour of the Hebrews, when the police interfered. On the ensuing evening, the same scenes again occurred; and the rabble broke the windows of about twenty Jewish houses. For some time after, the Jews did not dare appear on the public streets.

A riot occurred at Berlin on the 3d August, the king's birthday. It was occasioned by a police regulation for preventing the discharge of fire-arms on rejoicing days. The prohibition, it seems, irritated the populace, who, determined to have their usual amusements, began firing at night. The police interfered, but they were speedily overborne and severely handled by the mob. It was necessary to employ the regular troops to suppress the riot, between the cause and the consequences of which there is a singular contrast; for it was provoked by the attempts of the police to prevent the usual mode of celebrating the king's birthday, and ended in an attack on the royal residences. Much damage was done to houses, lamps, &c. and a few persons were wounded.

PARLIAMENT.

I. ENGLISH MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

The bill for the reform of the English municipal corporations was brought up from the House of Commons to the House of Lords (July 21), where it was read a first time. On the 27th and 28th a number of petitions were presented for and against the bill, and on the latter evening Lord STRANGFORD moved, in compliance with one from the mayor, bailiffs, and commonalty of Coventry, that counsel be heard at the bar in defence of their privileges, which were threatened by the bill with destruction. This was opposed by Lord MELBOURNE, who said that the object of the measure was to adapt the governing body of towns and boroughs to the advanced and enlarged condition of those places which had outgrown the old institutions. No proposal had been made to hear counsel at the bar in defence of the privileges of the forty-shilling freeholders or of the Scottish corporations, both of which bodies had been deprived of similar privileges without a division of the house. He warned the house against trifling with a subject in which the people felt a warm interest. Lord BROUGHAM proposed that two learned counsel—for instance, Sir C. Wetherell and Mr Knight—should be heard in behalf of the corporations cumulatively; with which Lords RIPON and WHARNCLIFFE concurred. On an understanding that the bill should have a second reading without a division, and proceed as speedily as possible, Lord MELBOURNE agreed to his proposal, and the bill was accordingly read a second time.—30. Sir Charles Wetherell and Mr Knight were called in, and the former gentleman delivered a long, rambling, and in some parts grotesque speech against the bill, which lasted about three hours, and was resumed next day, when Mr Knight commenced a speech, which was also broken off in order to be concluded afterwards.—August 1. Mr Knight's speech being concluded, the Earl of WINCHELSEA delivered himself in an impassioned and somewhat manner against the bill, which he characterised as the offspring of a democratic spirit, and as making an attack not only on property, but on the liberties of the country.—The Duke of NEWCASTLE spoke in a similar strain, and said that, if no other person could be found to impeach the minister for so atrocious a measure, he himself should.—3. After some confusion, arising from the violent feelings of several of their lordships, Lord MELBOURNE moved the order of the day for going into committee on the bill. In the course of a long speech, described by the liberal papers as one of great ability, he adverted to those boroughs, Nottingham, Leicester, and Derby, which were respectively under the control of the Liberals, the Tories, and the family of Cavendish, and yet the same evils were found in all, the exclusion of one-half of the inhabitants from all participation of authority. In Coventry, where the corporation was usually divided between the two parties, fraud, corruption, and violence, prevailed in elections. In Bristol, the inhabitants had shown themselves willing to have the town laid in ashes, so that the mayor and justices might incur blame. He had never felt so much fear in the late troublous times, from Manchester and Birmingham, as from towns where there were corporations. One monstrous evil was the impossibility of obtaining justice from the magistrates; and it which inspired all who were liable to it with the most violent and dangerous feelings. His lordship so adverted to the establishment of an efficient police as one of the happy results contemplated in the bill.—The Earl of CAMARON declared himself of opinion that some measure of corporate reform should be effected, but it was inconsistent with justice to pass the present bill, without first hearing evidence in disproof of the allegations in the commissioners' report; and he therefore moved "that evidence be taken at the bar of this house in support of the allegations of the several petitions, praying to be heard against the bill, before the house be put into a committee of the whole house on the said bill."—Lord WINCHELSEA, after declaring his hostility to a measure grounded upon an illegal commission, read, without moving, an amendment to that effect.—Lord BROUGHAM delivered a long speech in favour of the measure, and Lord LYNTHURST one of the opposite character. After other noble lords had spoken on various sides, Lord MELBOURNE denounced the amendment as a breach of the agreement made on the 28th of the preceding month, and as tending to establish a precedent which would deprive their lordships of one of their most important legislative privileges.—On a division, the numbers for the amendment were 124, for the motion 54; majority against ministers 70. It was then agreed that their lordships should assemble daily at eleven o'clock, to hear evidence.—4. Mr Carter, town-clerk of Coventry, was examined at considerable length by the house, and gave a favourable account of the corporation of that town. He complained of the evidence in the commissioners' report as incorrect. Similar evidence and similar complaints were heard this day from the town-clerks of Oxford, Worcester, Grantham, Sutton-Coldfield, Leicester, and several other official persons belonging to some of those corporations.—On the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th, the examinations were continued, and were all to the same effect: their lordships then agreed to go into committee on the bill on the 12th.—On the 10th, Lord MELBOURNE laid a petition upon the table, which had been hastily prepared at Manchester, and signed in twelve hours by 22,832 persons; it prayed their lordships to pass the bill without mutilation.—The Duke of NEWCASTLE read a letter, in which it was alleged that the petition had been signed by boys and others, who knew nothing of its object, and could hardly scribble their names. Thirty other petitions, including one from Leeds with 16,000 signatures, were presented in favour of the bill.—On the 11th and 12th, other petitions for the bill, and a few against it, were presented.—Lord MELBOURNE delivered another speech in favour of the measure, warning the house against opposing the general wishes of the community.—The Duke of NEWCASTLE then moved that the house go into committee on the bill that day six months.—The Earl of MANSFIELD differed with the noble duke, as did the Duke of WELLINGTON, who said he could not close his eyes to the fact that the discontent with the corporation system was general, and that the time had come for a change.—The amendment was then negatived without a division, and the house went into committee.—13. The house being in committee, Lord LYNTHURST moved the insertion of a new clause for preserving to freemen and their descendants, in perpetuity, the rights they now possessed in corporation property, but providing that in future freedom should not be acquired by gift or purchase.—Lords SEGRAVE and SKELMERSDALE (heretofore supporters of ministers) spoke in favour of the clause.—Lord PLUNKETT denied what had been alleged by so many lords opposite, that the rights of freemen were equivalent to rights of property. They had nothing in them indefeasible, hereditary, or acquired by industry or labour: they devolved on them in their political and not in their private character—as portions of a public body, not as individuals. They were not direct rights; therefore they were only incidental to their public capacity. If the bill went to take away the direct rights of property, Lord Plunkett should feel it his duty to concur entirely with Lord Lyndhurst, however dependent these rights might be even on the select body or corporation. In that case, he should say that to adopt the principle would be to admit a very dangerous precedent, which in the end would be subversive of all tenure of property and all rights thereto. Property, if held in a direct right, however precariously it might be circumstanced, should never be infringed on. But the bill before their lordships did no such thing. It was introduced for a totally different object. It was not for taking away rights of any kind, direct or indirect, but for regulating the internal constitution of corporations. If the indirect rights of freemen were incidentally affected by it, it was only because the possessors were members of these corporations, and it affected them only in their corporate capacity. . . . The same argument urged in favour of incidental rights in this instance, and their inviolability, might be urged with equal force and efficacy in the case of any alteration in any department of the state, whereby the interests of individuals would be injured. The rights in question were public rights, derived to the possessors in their politic character; and, as such, subject to the public good. He spoke as a lawyer on the subject. Unless they could be dealt with as the legislature saw fit, there was an end to all improvements in public matters.—The committee divided on the clause, which was carried by 130 against 37; majority against ministers, 93.—Lord LYNTHURST then moved the insertion of a clause to continue to the descendants of existing freemen the right to vote for members of Parliament; which, after a brief discussion, was agreed to.—Lord MELBOURNE declining, with such a force against him, to divide the committee.—On the motion of Lord LYNTHURST, another clause, containing some regulations for the keeping of a roll of freemen by the town-clerk, was then inserted.—On the motion of the Duke of WELLINGTON, the clause which provided that the boundaries of parliamentary boroughs should be the boundaries of the new municipal boroughs, and that the boundaries of others should be fixed by the king in council, was altered to the effect that the boundaries of such as were not parliamentary boroughs should remain as they are, until otherwise determined by Parliament.—Clause 5th was postponed, and clauses 6th and 7th were agreed to, with an alteration on the 6th, which makes the payment of the borough-rate in addition to the poor-rate, necessary to qualify a person to vote for town-councillors.—14. Lord LYNTHURST moved to strike out the second proviso of the 8th clause; the effect of which would be to allow persons in indifferent circumstances to be placed on the list of voters.—Viscount MELBOURNE was unwilling to offer fictitious opposition to the bill of Lord Lyndhurst, and would not oppose the motion: he should prefer retaining the proviso notwithstanding.—After a few words from Lords LYNTHURST and PLUNKETT, the proviso was struck out, and the clause agreed to. Clause 9th was agreed to; clause 10th was struck out; the 11th was passed; but clauses 12th and 13th, being superseded by Lord Lyndhurst's clauses of the previous night, were expunged; the 14th and 15th clauses were passed. On the 16th clause being proposed, Lord LYNTHURST proposed an amendment, with a view to establish a qualification for the office of town-councillor. A pecuniary qualification did not always insure the election of competent persons, but it had a tendency to that effect. There were considerable difficulties in the way of fixing a qualification, but it occurred to him that the following plan might be adopted:—He proposed that the rate-payers should be divided into a certain number of classes, and that from the highest of these classes the persons should be chosen who should be selected to administer the affairs of the borough. Acting upon this principle, he proposed that the rate-payers should be divided into six classes, and that the one-sixth of those who paid the highest amount of rates should be those from whom the councillors should be selected.—This proposal met with strong opposition from Lord BROUGHAM, Lord MELBOURNE, and others, as oligarchical in principle, and a dangerous novelty in municipal affairs, but, on a division, was carried by 120 to 39; majority against ministers 81. Other clauses down to the 23d were then passed.—17. On the 24th clause being put, Lord LYNTHURST proposed, as a guard against the democratic principle, that one-fourth of the town-councils should be elected for life, under the name of capital burgesses or aldermen, and that this portion of the council should be, in all possible cases, composed of the aldermen already existing.—Lords BROUGHAM and MELBOURNE opposed this alteration as destructive of the bill, and as an anomaly in municipal government. It was carried by 126 to 39; majority against ministers 87.—Clauses up to 33 were agreed to, after some formal amendments.—18. Clauses 33 and 34 were agreed to. On the proposal of clause 35, Lord LYNTHURST moved an amendment, having for its object the continuance in office of the present justices of peace in boroughs.—Lord MELBOURNE said that it was now vain to present opposition to any amendment; but it might afterwards be a matter of consideration whether to advance farther with the measure.—The amendment was then agreed to.—After some discussion on clause 36, it was struck out, and a new one, moved by Lord ELLENBOROUGH, was agreed to, providing that all towns having 6000 inhabitants, and fewer than 9000, should be divided into two wards; that all towns having more than 9000 inhabitants, and less than 13,000, should be divided into three wards; that all towns having upwards of 13,000 inhabitants, and less than 18,000, should be divided into four wards, and so on in the same proportion; and that those having between 55,000 and 80,000, should be divided into eight wards; and that the power of dividing these boroughs (which the original clause left to the king in council—that is, the ministers) should be delegated to the magistracy of the neighbouring districts. Clauses 37 to 46 inclusive, were, with a few formal amendments, agreed to.—On the motion of the Marquis of BUTE, clause 47, which imposed fines on those refusing to serve as mayor and councillors, was struck out. Clauses 48 to 64 inclusive were agreed to. On the proposal of clause 65, Lord WHARNCLIFFE proposed and carried an amendment, leaving the power of licensing with the magistracy, instead of giving it, as the bill proposed, to the town-councils. Clauses 65 and 66 were accordingly struck out. The clauses up to 99 were then agreed to, without any important alterations. On 101, Lord LYNTHURST proposed and carried an amendment, leaving recorders in their offices. The remaining clauses, with some trifling verbal amendments, were then agreed to. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE wished to ask the noble and learned lord (Lyndhurst) whether the principle of qualification which he had proposed was intended by him to apply to those corporators who, having been self-elected, were to hold their offices for life?—Lord LYNTHURST said, that, in consequence of what had passed since he proposed that amendment, he should probably find it necessary to make some alteration with regard to the qualification of the town-councillors.—The bill was ordered to be recommitted on the 21st.

2. CHURCH IN IRELAND.

July 21. On the motion, in the House of Commons, to go into committee upon the Irish church bill, Sir ROBERT PEEL moved as an instruction to the committee, to divide the bill into two parts, in order that a separate consideration might be given to that portion of it which referred to the settlement of the tithe question, and that which provided for the appropriation of church property to other than ecclesiastical purposes. He supported this amendment by an elaborate speech, which chiefly went to prove that the total revenues of the church in Ireland were not too great for the total protestantism of the kingdom.—Mr SPRING RICE took the lead among the ministerial party in opposing the instruction, meeting Sir Robert Peel's arguments by alleging that there could be no hope of peace for Ireland, if the Catholics of Cashel and Tnam were to be called on to support the Protestants of another part of the kingdom.—After several other speakers had given their opinions on different sides, the debate was adjourned.—22. Mr HUME made a long speech, in which he said that he took the present measure as an instalment towards the complete extinction of the evils of the Irish church.—Mr PUSEY, formerly an opponent of ministers, expressed his resolution to vote with them on this occasion.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM spoke for, and Lord HOWICK against, the instruction.—23. Another adjournment having taken place, Lord Stanley, Sir R. Bateson, and Mr Jackson, delivered speeches in favour of the instruction, and Mr Shiel, Mr O'Connell, Mr Ward, Lord John Russell, and Lord Morpeth, against it. On a division, Sir R. Peel's motion was supported by 282 against 319; ministerial majority, 37.—27. The house having gone into committee on the bill, Lord MORPETH proposed an alteration which had been called for, he thought erroneously, in order to prevent any disastrous consequences which might arise from a desire to get quit of the superfluous incumbents in order to obtain the use of their revenues for educational purposes. He proposed that these revenues be payable to the consolidated fund, and that L.50,000 be paid annually from the same for education in Ireland.—On this evening the first forty-nine clauses of the bill were, after some discussion, but without any division, agreed to.—28. Clauses between 50th and 100th were ordered to stand part of the bill. On clause 101st, a stormy debate arose, in consequence of Mr Shaw asking Mr Walker (member for Wexford) whether he returned himself to the commissioners as a Catholic. The question was condemned in severe terms by Dr Lushington and Mr Hume, the latter of whom also called Mr Shaw to account for classing the movement party with infidels in a late speech elsewhere. This clause being adopted, the house resumed and reported the bill, which was again committed. The money clauses were then taken into consideration, and, after some discussion, agreed to.—Aug. 3. The house went into committee on some postponed clauses, which were agreed to; a motion by Mr HARVEY, for omitting that which authorises the remission of the money advanced out of the million loan, being lost by 252 to 25.—7. Some new clauses were added.—12. The bill was read a third time, and passed the House of Commons.—Having been introduced into the upper house, it was there read a second time on the 20th, and ordered to be committed on the 24th.

3. ORANGE SOCIETIES.

On a motion by Mr WILSON PATTEN, July 20, that the committee on orange societies be permitted from time to time to report their evidence (which was agreed to), a debate took place, in the course of which it was alleged by Mr Jackson and Mr H. Maxwell, that the Duke of Cumberland had never signed any order, as grand master, for the formation of such societies in regiments—the former gentleman speaking upon what he called the highest authority.—Aug. 4. Mr HUME brought forward a series of resolutions founded on the report of the committee—to the following effect:—

1. That it appears, from the evidence laid before this house, that there exist at present in Ireland more than fifteen hundred orange lodges; some parishes containing as many as three or four private lodges, consisting of members varying in number from 16 to 260, acting in communication and correspondence with each other, and having secret signs and pass-words as bonds of union, and all depending on the grand lodge of Ireland.

2. That the orange institution of Ireland is unlimited in numbers, and exclusively a Protestant association. That every member must belong to a private lodge; to which he is admitted under a religious sanction, and with a religious ceremony, carrying a bible in his hands, submitting to certain forms and declarations, and taught secret signs and pass-words.

3. That no lodge can be constituted without a warrant of the grand lodge of Ireland, signed by the grand master and office-bearers for the time being, and having the seal of the grand lodge thereto affixed.

4. That it appears by the laws and ordinances of the orange institution in Ireland, dated 1835, that the secretary of each private lodge is directed to report to the secretary of the district lodge; the secretary of each district lodge to report to the grand secretary of the county lodge; the grand secretary of the county lodge to report to the deputy grand secretary of the grand lodge in Dublin; and the grand lodge to hold meetings at stated periods, to transact the ordinary business of the society; and the deputy grand secretary of the grand lodge to communicate half-yearly to each lodge in Ireland, and also to the grand lodge of Great Britain.

5. That orange lodges have individually and collectively addressed his Majesty, both houses of Parliament, the lord lieutenant, and others, on special occasions of a political nature—such as on the subject of the colonies, the change of the ministry, the education of the people, the repeal of the union, Catholic emancipation, and reform of Parliament.

6. That the grand lodge of Ireland has interfered in political questions, and expelled members for the exercise of their constitutional and social rights; has interfered at elections, and defended criminal prosecutions, as appears from the evidence and from the minutes of proceedings in the book of the grand lodge, produced before the select committee.

7. That it appears by the books of the grand lodge of Ireland, produced by its deputy grand secretary, before the select committee of this house, that warrants for constituting and holding orange lodges have been issued to non-commissioned officers and privates of the following regiments of cavalry and of infantry of the line, at home and abroad; to non-commissioned officers of the staff of several militia regiments; to members of other corps; and to the police. [Then follows a list of the regiments.]

8. That such warrants are sent privately and indirectly to such non-commissioned officers and privates, without the knowledge or sanction of the commanding officers of such regiments or corps; and every lodge held in the army is considered as a district lodge.

9. That the general orders of the commander-in-chief of the forces, addressed in the years 1822 and 1829 to commanding officers of regiments and of depôts, and to general officers and other officers on the staff, at home and abroad, strongly reprobate the holding of orange lodges in any regiment, as "fraught with injury to the discipline of the army;" and "that, on military grounds, the holding of orange lodges in any regiment or corps is contrary to order and to the rules of the service;" and "that a disregard of this caution will subject offending parties to trial and punishment for disobedience of orders."

10. That these resolutions, and the evidence taken before the select committee on orange lodges, be laid before his Majesty.

11. That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying that he will be graciously pleased to direct his royal attention to the nature and extent of orange lodges in his Majesty's army, in contravention of the general orders of the commander-in-chief of his Majesty's forces, issued in the years 1822 and 1829, which strongly reprobate and forbid the holding of orange lodges in any of his Majesty's regiments; and also, to call his attention to the circumstance of his Royal Highness Ernest, Duke of Cumberland, a field-marshal in his Majesty's army, having signed warrants, in his capacity of grand master of the grand orange lodge of Ireland (some of them dated so recently as April in the present year), which warrants have been issued for constituting orange lodges in the army."

On the first resolution being put from the chair, Mr PATTEN moved, as an amendment, "that an address be presented to his Majesty, praying him to direct his royal attention to the nature and extent of orange lodges existing in his Majesty's army, in contravention of the general orders existing in 1822 and in 1829, and also to cause investigation to be made into the existence of other secret societies." In answer to the statement that the Duke of Cumberland knew nothing of the existence of orange lodges in the army, having only signed blank warrants which the other officials filled up, Mr WARD reminded the house of a series of resolutions adopted at a meeting of the grand orange lodge held last year at the house of Lord Kenyon, a meeting at which his royal highness was in the chair. These resolutions exempted non-commissioned officers and privates from the fees of 15s. on admission.—Colonel PERCIVAL maintained that orange societies were institutions of a purely defensive character.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL regretted that Mr Hume had brought forward the subject at this time, but allowed that it must occupy much of the attention of Parliament next session. He conceived that the Duke of Cumberland must be aware that it was not consistent with his duty to retain the situation which he now filled; but he could not agree to a vote amounting to censure on his royal highness at the present stage of the proceedings. He had no objection to an address to the crown upon the subject.—The debate was adjourned to the 11th.—On the 6th, Mr PATTEN presented the last report of the committee, to which was added a letter from the Duke of Cumberland, dated the preceding day, and denying that he had issued warrants for lodges in the army, though he had signed blank warrants placed before him by the subordinate officials.—11. On the motion of Mr HUME, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the origin, nature, extent, and tendency of the orange institutions in Great Britain and the colonies; after which he moved that the adjourned debate on his resolutions should be resumed.—Mr FINCH opposed the resolutions, maintaining that the Duke of Cumberland was totally ignorant of the existence of orange lodges in the army, and that these societies were the main stay of the English connection and of the existence of Protestantism.—Colonel VERNER could state that the report of the meeting at Lord Kenyon's had been made up by junior members, and that the Duke of Cumberland had been ignorant of the resolutions which seemed to fix his acquaintance with the existence of military lodges.—Mr SHIEL then delivered a long and by his own party much admired speech, on the mischiefs produced by orangeism in Ireland. Mr Patten's amendment was withdrawn, and Mr Hume agreed to the omission of clauses 5th and 6th in his own resolutions, and, finally, of the last also.—Mr HORACE TWISS then moved the omission of the passage censuring the Duke of Cumberland, which was negated by 183 to 40. The resolutions, with the exceptions stated, were then adopted.—15. Lord JOHN RUSSELL appeared at the bar of the house, with the following reply to the address which had been presented to the King in terms of the last resolution:—"I have received your dutiful address, committing to me certain resolutions on the subject of orange lodges in the army. My attention has been directed to the subject, and I shall continue to be directed to practices contrary to the regulations and injurious to the discipline of my troops. I owe it no less to the dignity of my crown than to the safety of the country, and the welfare of my brave and loyal army, to discourage and prevent every attempt to introduce secret societies into its ranks; and you may rely upon my determination to adopt the most effectual means for this purpose." 19. Colonel Fairman, deputy grand treasurer of the Loyal Orange Lodge of Great Britain, was summoned to the bar of the House of Commons, where he was examined, and ordered to deliver up a book containing copies of letters referring to the business of the association, which he had refused to exhibit to the committee. Having positively refused to surrender this volume, which he said contained private papers, Colonel Fairman was next evening, in his absence, ordered by a vote of the house to be committed to Newgate, but, on search being made for him, was found to have absconded.

4. SCOTTISH CHURCH COMMISSION.

Aug. 3. Sir WILLIAM RAE presented a petition to the House of Commons, relative to the Scottish church, and took occasion to complain of the manner in which the commission had been made up—ten of its members, out of eleven, being decided adherents of the present government. One of them had even printed his hostility to the established church. No confidence could be placed in the report of a commission so composed.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL said, that the subject which the commissioners would have to inquire into had nothing to do with party politics, and maintained that the selection of the commissioners had been fairly made. What objection could be made to the noble earl (Minto) who was one of the commissioners, a man of great ability, great knowledge, and as great impartiality? The same might be said of Mr Mountstuart Elphinstone, a gentleman of whose aid the government would be glad; and he believed that there had been more than once solicited to take office. Other members were known to be firmly attached to the church of Scotland. The procurator of the church was also one of the commissioners, and the brother of two honourable members, who had so far taken part with Sir William Rae as to have voted for the committee. It was fair to presume, therefore, that there existed among the commissioners no feeling unfavourable to the church of Scotland. With regard to the individual who had printed his hostility to the church, he had understood from those who were anxious for an investigation of the subject, that it was only fair that some person attached to the dissenters of Scotland should belong to the commission—that it would be taken by the dissenters as an evidence of impartiality, as far as they were concerned.—17. The same subject was discussed in the House of Lords.—Lords HADINGTON and ABERDEEN having mentioned that the commission was the subject of increasing discontent in Scotland, Lord MELBOURNE said he felt satisfied, from what he observed of the two parties in Scotland, that no constitution of the commission could have given general satisfaction. He was sorry for the discontent, and, if any measure could be found to make the commission more generally satisfactory, without impairing its efficiency, he would be glad to adopt them.

5. THE BUDGET.

Aug. 14. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in a committee of ways and means, brought forward his financial statement, "the budget." By the April balance-sheet, the income was L.46,087,000, and the expenditure L.45,185,000, leaving a surplus of L.902,000; but by the balance-sheet up to July, the income appears to have been L.45,539,000, and the expenditure L.44,334,000, leaving a surplus of L.1,205,000, instead of L.902,000. Lord Althorp anticipated an income amounting to L.45,778,000, whereas the income has been L.45,539,000, showing a falling off of the sum L.239,000; but then he had calculated the expenditure at L.44,800,000; whereas it did not exceed L.44,334,000, so that there was a diminution of expenditure of L.466,000 to meet a diminution of income of L.239,000, being a surplus of L.227,000 beyond Lord Althorp's calculation. So much for the present year. The right honourable gentleman then calculated the income of the country, for the coming year at L.45,550,000, and the expenditure at L.44,715,000, leaving a surplus of L.835,000. But from this surplus certain deductions were to be made. It had been decided on Thursday night to provide for the interest due to West India proprietors, from the period that they suffered a pecuniary loss by the abolition of slavery. This interest has not yet been voted, and it is to be provided for from the 1st day of August 1834. The total possible charge for the present year on account of the West India loan, is L.1,010,000, against which there can only be set the surplus of L.835,000, so that there may be a deficiency of L.175,000. This is stating the liability at the utmost possible amount; but he was of opinion that the amount would not exceed between L.600,000 and L.700,000.

SEPTEMBER, 1835.

that there might be a surplus of from L.150,000 to L.200,000. The right honourable gentleman then went into a variety of statements of exports and imports, of consumption of commodities in general use, the increase of manufactures, &c., to show that the country was rapidly improving. The alteration in the poor-laws had greatly reduced the expenditure of a country, and particularly the agriculturists, while it had greatly benefited the working classes. Having stated the income and expenditure for the year, he remarked that there is little room for the reduction of taxes. The duty on flint glass is to be reduced from 6d. to 2d. a pound—the drawback in proportion. A loss to the revenue from this reduction he estimated at between L.60,000 and L.70,000 for the present year. In future years the loss would be made up by increased consumption and the diminution of smuggling. An alteration in the duty on spirit licences, which is to be fixed on a scale graduated according to the consumption, would cause a reduction about L.40,000 at the utmost. The repeal of the stamp duty on awards in Ireland would at the utmost amount to L.500. These are the only reductions. In conclusion, Mr Rice declared that he was warranted in asserting that the credit of this country surpassed that of any country in the world.—A long and desultory discussion followed, in which many liberal members, among them Mr C. BULLER and Mr HUME, expressed their extreme dissatisfaction at the reductions proposed, and at the absence of all notion of any reduction of the stamp duty.—Mr BULLER said there was contempt in the way it had been passed over. The Tories, on the other hand, by Mr GOULBURN, said they were satisfied with the measure.—Mr RICE then rose, and with regard to the reduction of the duty on newspapers, the right honourable gentleman said it amounted to L.450,000. He had not a surplus to that amount, but supposing that he had, would the house consent to its being applied to the reduction of the stamp duty on newspapers? The advocates of the reduction declared that it would be worse than nothing, unless the whole duty were repealed at once. He hoped the house would be disposed at some fit and convenient time to consider the subject of the stamp duties on newspapers, with a view to a better arrangement ultimately; after which the resolutions were agreed to, and the report ordered to be brought up.

6. MINOR SUBJECTS.

July 22. The Ipswich election committee having reported the guilt of T. M. Keith in procuring the presence of Pilgrim, Mr Hume moved that he be committed; but the motion was adjourned to the 24th. On the 23d, Mr Sparrow was called to the bar, reprimanded by the Speaker, and discharged.—30. Mr Merton was reprimanded and discharged, and Mr Keith called to the bar, and committed to Newgate.—27. 3. Mr Hume moved that Keith be allowed to go on to Norwich to give evidence on Pilgrim's trial, which Lord Stormont moved an amendment that he be reprimanded and discharged. Lord John Russell supported the latter motion, on a plea that enough had now been done to mark the sense of the house on the subject of bribery; but on a division, Mr Hume's motion was carried by 110 to 102. On the 14th, Keith appeared at the bar, was reprimanded, and discharged.

23. Mr Hume presented a petition from nearly 400 printers in London for the repeal of the "taxes on knowledge." Sir John Campbell avowed his resolution, while these taxes remained, to take every means for causing the law to be respected by all.—In reply to a question by Mr Tooke, Sir J. Campbell said that he had prepared two charters, which he thought would be in complete concurrence with the address from this house, and with his Majesty's gracious answer. One of these charters was for the University of London—not as a university, but as a college; it proposed that it should be called the London University College. No power, however, of granting academical degrees was to be conferred by this charter; it would only enable that body to conduct all their own affairs, in the same way as they had hitherto done. The other charter was for the purpose of establishing a Metropolitan University, with power to grant academical degrees to those who should study at the London University College, or at any similar institution which his Majesty might please hereafter to name.

27. Mr John Maxwell moved for leave to bring a bill for the establishment of minimum rates of wages, to prevent the condition of the working classes being deteriorated any further by their employers. The motion was seconded by Sir M. S. Stewart, and opposed by Mr P. Thomson, who endeavoured to show that the idea was entirely a delusion, and would operate to the serious disadvantage of those who desired to see it realised. The house, by 129 to 40, refused admission to the bill.

30. Colonel Leith Hay moved that the report on the Trinity harbour bill should be considered. Mr Spring Rice opposed the motion, on the ground that the property of the Leith docks, on which a former government had advanced a loan of L.240,000, would be deteriorated, if a new harbour was formed. Adjoining, Sir William Rae, and Mr Labouchere, also opposed the motion. Mr Tooke, Mr Hume, and Colonel Leith Hay, spoke in favour of it, on the ground of the new harbour being wanted, and that no sufficient reason had been assigned for postponing a great public improvement. Sir John Campbell was for putting off the bill till the next session. The house divided; and refused to consider the report, by 55 to 22. The bill is thus lost.—On the motion of Mr M. O'Connell, which was carried against the sentiments of ministers, by 57 to 49, the house agreed to appoint a select committee to inquire into the conduct of General Darling—particularly in reference to the grants of crown lands made by him; his treatment of the public press; the case of Captain Robison; and alleged instances of cruelty towards two soldiers, Sudd and Thompson, and other persons.—Aug. 7. A majority of 89 to 46 agreed to an instruction moved by Lord J. Russell to this committee, precluding it from inquiry into the proceedings of the court-martial on Captain Robison.

31. Mr Perrin, Attorney-General for Ireland, obtained leave to bring in a bill for amending the bural corporations in Ireland. He detailed at considerable length the abuses of the present system, by which 13,000 corporators had the uncontrolled management of the affairs of 900,000 inhabitants of corporate towns. The bill he intended to bring in was in most respects the same as the English one. The principal difference related to the franchise. In towns the population of which reaches 20,000, the occupancy of a house valued at L.10 a-year would confer the right of voting; in towns with a smaller population than 20,000, occupancy of a L.5 house would entitle a person to vote. There would be no wards in towns with a less population than 12,000. There would be no revising barristers or auditors, but the mayor would revise the burgess-roll, and be liable to a penalty of L.10 for improperly admitting or excluding any person. In this bill the city of Dublin would be included.—Lord Morpeth introduced a bill for the prevention of offences against the peace in Ireland. It provided that the Lord Lieutenant should call together the quarter-sessions, in lieu of issuing a special commission, on any emergency, and empowered the court of these sessions, on the representation of the grand jury, and with the approbation of the Lord Lieutenant, to warn inhabitants of the disturbed districts to keep within their houses, but without the power of entering the houses in search of suspected persons.—Mr O'Connell said, the bill would give satisfaction to every rational person in Ireland.

Aug. 3. Mr Spring Rice explained the terms on which he had negotiated the loan of fifteen millions wherewith to pay off the slave proprietors. It had been obtained from Messrs Rothschild at L.3, 7s. 6d. per cent. which was unprecedentedly low. He then moved that the commissioners for the compensation should be directed to pay accordingly, which was agreed to.

4. Mr Grantley Berkeley moved that the house agree to the report of the committee recommending that accommodation should be made for ladies in the gallery of the house. But, upon a division, there appeared a majority of 89 to 83 against the motion. So the ladies will be excluded, as heretofore.

11. In the House of Lords, the second reading of the Roman Catholic marriages bill was moved by the Marquis of Clanricarde, and opposed by Lord Carberry, who moved that it be read that day six months. On a division, the bill was lost by 42 to 16.

13. On the motion of Mr Hume, the House of Commons agreed to a string of resolutions for regulating the size, cost, and numbers of parliamentary papers. The object of the resolutions is to insure a more regular supply at a cheaper rate; and it is provided "that the Acts of Parliament and Statutes at Large should be printed for sale at one uniform price throughout the United Kingdom, in as convenient a form, and at as low a charge, as is consistent with the ordinary profit of trade, and no more."

17. The English bill for abolishing imprisonment for debt was read a first time in the House of Lords.—Lord John Russell, when questioned by Mr Lynch, informed the house, that next session ministers intend to propose a measure for the appointment of a permanent judge of the Chancery Court.

21. Mr E. L. Bulwer moved for a committee to inquire into the expediency of reducing the newspaper stamp duty to one penny. He supported the motion by a long speech, but, after some discussion, agreed to allow the motion to be negatived, on Mr Rice pledging himself to repeal the tax next year, if the condition of the revenue would allow of it.

ENGLAND.

POLITICS OF THE MONTH.

PUBLIC attention has been chiefly directed, during the past month, to the treatment of the municipal reform bill by the House of Lords, and the disclosures respecting Orange societies. Notwithstanding petitions, numerous signed, from all the large towns, entreating the Lords to pass the corporation bill as it came to them from the House of Commons, they have deliberately deprived it, in committee, of most of its liberal features, the majorities against ministers being usually about 90 in a house of 160 members. An opposition so decided to the representative part of the legislature has naturally caused much excitement throughout the nation. The liberals in general seem to desire that the Commons, to whom the bill will now return, should restore it to its original condition, and leave to the Lords the responsibility of giving it an ultimate rejection. It seems to be understood that the Lords are resolved to give the same reception to the Irish church bill, the imprisonment for debt bill, and all the other liberal measures of the session; so that Parliament, which is expected to rise early in September, will not have a single act to look back upon, as the result of all the harassing labours of the year.

The most conspicuous agent in the business of altering the municipal bill was Lord Lyndhurst, who is now acknowledged by all the less compromising Tories as their principal man of skill and talent. The Duke of Wellington, having evidently been more inclined than the most of his party to pass the bill, is said to have lost a considerable part of the influence he formerly possessed with them; while Sir Robert Peel is looked upon as one whom they have nearly altogether lost. The latter statesman is said to have opposed or absented himself from all the councils by which the conduct of the majority of the House of Lords was determined upon.

The municipal bill is, at the time we write (Aug. 25), expected to revisit the House of Commons on the 31st. The proceedings of that house respecting it may in the meantime be considered as in some degree shadowed forth by what passed on the 21st, when Mr Spring Rice made a motion for postponing the order of the day for going into committee upon the appropriation bill; grounding the delay upon the circumstance that he was obliged to wait the return of the militia staff reduction bill from the other house. This motion was generally considered as intended to overawe the Peers; in this sense it was avowedly understood by Mr Hume, Mr Tooke, Mr O'Connell, and others of that class, who stated "that it would be improper to grant money until it should be seen what course the House of Lords would take." Mr Gladstone charged the Chancellor of the Exchequer with acting in this matter in compliance with the wishes of the Radical faction; this charge Mr Rice indignantly repelled; but he did not contradict the assertion of the hon. members for Middlesex and Dublin, or say any thing to show that he disapproved of the construction they put upon his motion.

The disclosures which have been elicited by a parliamentary committee respecting Orange societies, are of a most important character. There are about 1500 societies, embracing 220,000 individuals, who are bound together by secret oaths, have secret signs of recognition, and possess arms and common funds for the purposes of the institution, the chief of which is the ascendancy of the Protestant party in Ireland. The importance which the House of Commons attach to at least the existence of such societies in the army, is proved by their vote, by 183 to 43, of an address to the King, directing his royal attention to the fact of his brother, the Duke of Cumberland, having issued warrants to such bodies, in his capacity of grand master, the said prince being himself a field-marshal.

July 20. The foundation-stone of a new mechanics' institution was laid at Liverpool by Lord Brougham, who, at an entertainment which afterwards took place, addressed a large assemblage of gentlemen, and took occasion to deny that he had been concerned in any plot for turning Earl Grey out of office, and that there was any impropriety in his attending public dinners. His lordship also avowed his resolution to "stand by the people" until they obtained a cheap government, and said that he felt more at his ease, and thought he should be able to do more for the people, since he had ceased to hold a ministerial situation.

22. One of the engines of the Liverpool and Manchester railway left the latter place at five o'clock, with three waggons attached, containing about ninety packages of goods, principally intended for shopkeepers in Liverpool and Glasgow. On approaching the Whiston inclined plane, about nine miles from Liverpool, the waggons were discovered to be on fire; and before any effectual assistance could be given, all the goods were destroyed, amounting, it is supposed, in value to L.2000. It has not yet been ascertained correctly how the accident originated, but it is supposed to have been from friction, owing to the great speed at which the train was travelling. The railway company intend paying the respective owners of the goods the full amount of their losses.

30. This morning, the Princess Victoria was confirmed at the Chapel Royal, St James's. The King, the Queen, the Duchess of Kent, the Duke of Cumberland, the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, the Princess Sophia, and the Duchess of Saxe Weimar, were present at the ceremony, which was performed by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Bishop of London, Dean of the Chapel. The Duchess of Kent

— 31. At the Bury St Edmund's assizes, Samuel Brown, aged 80, was indicted for the wilful murder of James Ayton, in the year 1817. The particulars of this very singular case, as proved on the trial, were these:—Mr Ayton, the murdered man, was an innkeeper, and possessed considerable property in the neighbourhood of Woodbridge, in this county. About 10 o'clock on the night of the 8th of October 1817, a tradesman residing in that town, named Hurd, was returning home on foot, and when he arrived at a place called Drybridge Mill, he met the prisoner running fast. Hurd went on, and in the road opposite the garden of a Mr Howard, he saw a man lying in the road; upon examining the state of the man, Hurd found that he was bleeding from the head, and insensible, but he was not quite dead. A few yards farther on stood a horse saddled and bridled, and the saddle turned nearly round on the right side. Mr Hurd immediately called Howard up, and upon examining the body of the dying man, for such he evidently was, they found that it was Mr Ayton. He had some silver in one of his pockets, and a handkerchief in his hat, which was lying two yards off, and none of his pockets appeared to have been rifled. They put the body of the man into an outhouse, where they left him for the night, and Howard went to bed. At five in the morning, Howard went to his outhouse, and finding that the wounded man was yet living, he sent for a surgeon, by whose desire Mr Ayton was removed to the Swan, where he died in four hours. He never spoke from the time of his being found on the road by Hurd. Having deposited the body in the outhouse, as before mentioned, Hurd went on his way, and again met the prisoner, who had a large stick in his hand and a dog with him, and to whom he spoke without receiving any answer. Upon examining the body after death, it appeared beyond all question that the unfortunate man had been murdered. An inquest was held, and, after a laborious investigation, the coroner's jury found that the man was "murdered by some person unknown." Suspicion had fallen upon the prisoner, but no sufficient proof had been adduced, and he was suffered to go at large. Thus this dreadful matter remained wrapped in mystery and doubt for eighteen years, and the circumstance had nearly been forgotten, when the public attention was called to it in a very singular manner. One William Green, a notorious thief, was in Ipswich jail in the month of June, in the present year, under sentence of transportation for sheep-stealing. He was very ill, and fancying himself in great danger of speedy dissolution, he sent a note to a magistrate to come and receive his "penitent confession" upon "a matter which hung very heavily on his mind." This matter related to the murder, of which he had been an unseen witness. While in a hedge in ambush, he saw the prisoner turn round, stop Mr Ayton's horse, and with a heavy club give Ayton a tremendous blow upon the head, which knocked him off his horse. The prisoner then put his hands into some of Ayton's pockets, and afterwards ran away down the road towards Woodbridge. His story was singularly confirmed, by a variety of circumstances. Mr Baron Parke, in a very elaborate and clear statement, summed up the evidence; and the jury, after an absence of some hours, returned with a verdict of guilty of manslaughter. This verdict caused the greatest surprise in court, every body having believed that the only question was whether the prisoner was the hand which inflicted the blow of which Mr Ayton died; and there being no circumstances of provocation, if he did give the fatal stroke, to reduce the crime below that of murder.

Aug. 1. A grand dinner was given at Fishmongers' Hall to his Majesty's ministers. Alderman Wood, as prime warden, presided; and among the company were the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord John Russell, Lord Albemarle, Lord Plunkett, Mr Spring Rice, Lord Glenelg, Mr Poulett Thomson, Lord Howick, Sir John Campbell, Lord Brougham, Mr Hume, Mr O'Connell, Mr Grote, Mr Bonham Carter, and Mr Crawford. The usual routine toasts were drunk; and the health of ministers was then given and received with loud cheering. Lord Lansdowne apologised for the absence of Lord Melbourne, who was obliged to be present in the House of Peers watching the proceedings on the municipal bill. Lord Brougham's health was very well received; and the orator spoke his thanks at length, and in his best manner. Lord John Russell, Mr Spring Rice, Mr Poulett Thomson, and Sir John Hobhouse, also addressed the company in their turns.

— 5. General De Lacy Evans, commander-in-chief of the English auxiliary force destined for the service of Isabella II., left England on his way to assume his command.

— 6. Considerable excitement took place in the neighbourhood of Wanstead, a few miles from London, in consequence of a discovery that the flats, a piece of waste and mossy ground used as a common, had taken fire. The ignition is said to have commenced three weeks before, probably from the embers of a tobacco pipe; but it only now attracted serious attention, a space of twenty-five acres being found in the process of conflagration, so as to threaten a great part of the subsistence of the neighbouring people. Watering carts were used in vain, and on the 9th it was found that thirty acres were on fire. Next day, a large party of sappers and miners, who had been sent for from Woolwich, commenced a trench for the purpose of cutting off communication with the rest of the ground, in which they succeeded perfectly; but the burning parts were not expected to be exhausted or cooled for some weeks.

— 10. This evening, between 11 and 12 o'clock, many of the inhabitants of Chichester were awakened from their sleep, and much alarmed, by two shocks of earthquakes. It is nearly a twelvemonth since the last of those awful visitations, and people began to hope they had entirely ceased. These shocks, however, were considered generally to have been less violent than most of those which occurred last year.

The great expense of the late installation festivities at Cambridge, coupled with the recent falling off in the amount of the corn-rents of the different colleges, will, it is said, cause a serious deduction from the incomes of most of the fellows for the present year.

Mina has written a letter from Montpellier to a friend in England, denying indignantly that he ever perpetrated the cruelties charged against him in the London newspapers, and, on their authority, by Mr O'Connell and Mr Grove Price in the House of Commons.

Lord John Russell has appointed Mr Charles Lechmere deputy-keeper of state papers, in the room of the late Robert Lemon, Esq. deceased. The Chronicle says that this office was first offered to Mr Thomas Moore, who refused it as involving too great a sacrifice of time, besides rendering a constant residence in London indispensable.

In a report made by Mr Rennie, of the effects produced on the Thames by the removal of London Bridge, it is stated that the drainage of the districts bordering on the river has been greatly improved; that barges, which used formerly to be towed up from Putney to Richmond by horses, are now carried by the current in one tide; and that the fall of water has been so considerable as to cause ships in many instances to ground in their tiers.

Lord Brougham has promised to deliver a lecture in the Sheffield Mechanics' Institution at the termination of the present session of Parliament. A deputation waited upon the learned lord at Manchester lately, when the pledge was given.

The ship Walter Scott, from New Orleans, and on her voyage to Liverpool, was struck by lightning, on the 21st June, off Charleston. The crew took to the long-boat, and landed at Norfolk. The ship, together with her cargo, consisting of upwards of 1700 bales of cotton, were entirely consumed by the fire. The value of the cargo is estimated at about L.25,000, the whole of which was insured in Liverpool.

The Hon. J. J. B. Ponsonby, son of Lord Duncannon, and member for Derby, will shortly lead to the hymeneal altar the beautiful and accomplished daughter of the Earl of Durham.

Two meetings have been held in London to promote the construction of a railway through the great manufacturing districts of the midland and northern counties, from London to Edinburgh, by way of Coventry, Ashbourne, Derby, Rotherham, Barnsley, Wakefield, Leeds, and York. This plan, which has the support of a number of persons of great property and influence on the line, is recommended by the consideration that the line to Coventry, which is already in the course of construction by the Birmingham and London Railway Company, will complete nearly half the distance to Leeds, and by the farther consideration that it will pass through a country abounding with minerals, traffic, and population. Communications are now holding by the provisional committee with the capitalists, and merchants, and manufacturers in the towns, and in the country along the projected line, as well as with the principal landed proprietors. Mr Stephenson is charged with the duty of making the survey and forming the plans.—Leeds Intelligencer.

A public notice has been placarded in the Portsmouth dockyard, specifying that the Lords of the Admiralty, having heard that in cases of election the officers and clerks of that department have been in the habit of endeavouring to influence the workmen, are determined that on all future occasions they will visit with their highest displeasure any officer or clerk who shall presume to influence a voter in the dockyard employ; and it is especially directed to be a standing order of the yard, that Parliamentary candidates in future are to be allowed to canvass in the yard only such officers as reside therein.—Hampshire Telegraph.

A circular has been issued by the Lords of the Treasury, intimating that certain clerks in one of the revenue departments having interfered in elections, such interference being in contravention of the 22d Geo. III., c. 41, § 1, and injurious to the public service, it has been deemed incumbent to supersede the parties who have so offended; hoping that the circumstance will operate as a caution to all officers in the several departments of the revenue. Any party who may in future presume to interfere, in any way, in the election of members of Parliament, will be visited with the severest displeasure of their lordships.

The government has at length resorted to decisive measures for the suppression of unstamped political papers. The daily newspaper announced in our last as having been commenced, seems to have been the immediate cause of these proceedings. July 31, a seizure of illegal sheets was made at the shop of Mr Hetherington, in the Strand, and at a shop in the Borough.

From the British Museum Annual Report to Parliament for 1828, giving an account of the receipt and expenditure for that year, it appears that the total cost of printing the fac-simile of that ancient codex of the Bible called the Alexandrian Manuscript, including the various sums paid to the printer, engraver, editor, transcriber, and bookbinder, was L.9286. According to the returns to Parliament in 1833, it seems that three perfect copies only of this great work have been sold, forty-eight distributed in conformity to the copyright act, and as presents, and retained for the use of the library, and one hundred and thirty-four remained in stock.

A magnificent present from the King of Oude to King William IV., was landed from the Duke of Argyll East Indiaman, at the beginning of the past month. A bedstead and table of solid gold, two chairs of solid silver, formed in the most tasteful manner, were among the articles composing this splendid gift. There were also two elephants, two Arabian horses, and two dwarf buffaloes; one of the first has been sent by the king to the Surrey, and the other to the Regent's Park Zoological Gardens. The horses are removed to Windsor. The value of the whole is L.80,000.

Mr Thomas Gill, son of Mr Gill, of the French Horn Inn, Sarum, was married on the 28th of June at St Ed-mund's church, Salisbury, to a Miss Angell, late of Newfoundland, by which marriage he will shortly come into the possession of estates and money, amounting in value to L.1,000,000, left by a Mr Angell, who died some sixty years since. The Chrois estate, near Lambeth, forms part of the landed property, and to possess which he must bear the name and arms of the Angell family. He is at present the mail-cart-man on the line of road from Warminster to Sarum.—Devizes Gazette.

IRELAND.

July 21. There was a performance at the Dublin Theatre for the benefit of poor Banim, the author of the O'Hara Tales, who has been for some weeks in this city in a state of extreme physical debility. The parties cordially united on this occasion to test their esteem and sympathy for the suffering author. The Lord-Lieutenant and a considerable number of the leading gentry were present. The house was very well filled. The profits of the benefit will be about L.200.—Times correspondent.

— 30. The Rev. John Walsh, Catholic priest of Borris, was killed at Kilgreany, in the neighbourhood of Carlow, while returning on horseback from a dinner party in that town. The Orange newspapers presented his death as having been occasioned by a fall from his horse, while those of an opposite kind alleged that he must have been murdered by an Orange colony planted in the neighbourhood by Lord Berford. The coroner's jury have given a verdict favourable to the latter surmise.

All the bills against magistrates and others, who were brought in under the coroner's inquest as guilty of manslaughter at the Rathcormac affair, have been thrown out unanimously by the grand jury of County Cork, composed of freeholders of all descriptions.

After a very minute investigation, continued for nearly three days, into the circumstances of the Orange riots in Belfast on Sunday the 12th July, when a female was unfortunately killed, and several persons wounded, the jury came to the following verdict:—"That the deceased, Anne Moore, came by her death, in consequence of a gunshot wound inflicted by one of the military, while in the execution of duty in quelling a dangerous riot, under the orders of the civil magistrate." As the jury was composed of individuals, the majority of whom hold Tory principles, the Orange party can have no just ground to complain that they have been unfairly dealt with.—Northern Whig.

A deputation from the synod of Ulster have presented a congratulatory address to Lord Mulgrave, couched in terms which disprove the recent allegations as to the disapproval by that body of the proceedings of the Melbourne ministry.

The fifth annual meeting of the British Association for the Encouragement of Science took place at Dublin during the week commencing August 10. Amongst the visitors were Thomas Moore, Esq.; R. Lardner; Captain Sir John Franklin, R.N.; Sir John Ross; Sir Thomas Brisbane; Sir George Mackenzie; G. B. Greenough, London; T. S. Traill, professor of medical jurisprudence, Edinburgh; Professor Alison, Edinburgh; Dr Thomas Coulter; John Taylor, treasurer of the British Association, London; R. W. Fox, Falmouth; T. Jameson Tor, Edinburgh; William Nicol, Edinburgh; Thomas Graham, professor of chemistry, Glasgow; John Taylor, junior, Edinburgh; H. Westmacott, Edinburgh; J. E. Peitham, Berlin; H. Woolcombe; John Kerrick, delegate from York; Charles C. Babington, of John's College, Cambridge, &c. On the 8th, a very numerous Scotch and English professors from the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh, assembled in the theatre of Trinity College, to meet their literary brethren of our own country, who had arrived in town in great numbers. At the first meeting on Monday, Sir Thomas Brisbane demitted the office of president to Dr Lloyd, provost of Trinity College, Dublin, and the annual report was read by Professor Hamilton. Twelve hundred and twenty-eight new members were enrolled on this occasion, whose payments amounted to L.1750, being a large sum than any yet drawn at any annual meeting of the association. When Thomas Moore's name was mentioned as a candidate, the provost rose at once and proposed the poet, without the usual formalities of fees. The nomination was seconded by one hundred voices, and carried with acclamation. Scientific meetings were held daily during the week, at which many interesting papers were read, and three evening meetings were held. At these, individuals of every religious and political denomination mingled amicably in a rare scene in Ireland. As in Edinburgh in 1830, one universal feeling of gratification prevailed on the occasion throughout the society of the Irish capital. The Lord-Lieutenant attended several of the meetings, and was always well received. On Saturday the 15th, the proceedings were brought to a close at the Rotunda, and the next meeting appointed to be held at Bristol in the second week of August 1834. Three hundred of the more distinguished members of the society this day received a farewell banquet from the provost and senior fellows of Trinity College, in the examination hall, when the Lord-Lieutenant conferred the honour of knighthood on Professor Hamilton.

logists have had a field-day of discussion about it. Doctors differ. "Mr Combe of Edinburgh," says a Courier correspondent, "described the skull as seamed, it being matter of history that Swift died young, and he said that the forehead had shrunk from old age and disease, and did not represent Swift's head in a state of health, and at the maturity of his understanding. Dr Graves, a decided anti-phrenologist, denied that the skull exhibited marks of disease. Mr Combe said further, that the organs of the animal propensities, particularly combativeness and destructiveness, were very large, as also amativeness and self-esteem, adding, that if the forehead had matured age been as deficient as it now appears, the propensities been what are indicated by the skull, Swift, if uneducated, might have died on the scaffold. The organ of amativeness gave rise to great discussion. Swift was fond of women, and possessed the affections of two of them, yet he never consummated marriage. The phrenologists say that his phrens indicate the feeling to have been strong, and at his not marrying must have had another cause. He might argue that because he was not married, the cerebellum is a refutation of phrenology. One of the best informed phrenologists remarked that the skull proves nothing for or against their study, because they exclude cases of old age and disease from a class of evidence, on account of the changes which the skull undergoes in both of these conditions."

PAPER DUTY.—An "Edinburgh Publisher" has communicated the following letter to the editor of the Scotsman, in reference to the paper duty:—"I cannot agree with you in regarding the paper duty as a light tax, or as one which does not greatly impede the attempts which are made to diffuse knowledge. The paper duty, in the first place, renders the business of the paper-manufacturer a kind of monopoly, in consequence of its requiring all who enter that business to possess a larger capital than they would otherwise require. Then, the trouble and annoyance which it occasions to the manufacturer, are, according to all accounts, dreadful. Every paper-maker I have ever conversed with speaks of them as such. These cause a regular outlay to him, altogether over and above his duty, and which is of course charged by him to the public. The sum which he actually pays as duty is about a fourth of the price of most printing papers. But the manufacturer of course charges more, in order to cover his risk. That this surcharge is considerable, I know from several circumstances which have come under my notice, in transacting business with the manufacturers, variously on credit and by ready money payments. I have known some pay at such a rate on the former principle, as rendered the paper duty to them a fourth, while to others it was only two-sevenths on the ready-money system. Upon the whole, it cannot be unfair to calculate that the most of the paper used pays 4d. in account of duty. In the case of books of almost all sorts, this is a very grievous tax. The 4d. paid by the publisher comes to something much greater before the work gets into the hands of the public. I allow that in the highest class of books, the greater part of the expense of which arises from copyright, or from the comparative fineness of the paper, it is a matter of little consequence. But, take the average of book calculations, I assure you it is very considerable, and says the more so the lower the class of books, or the more hazardous the enterprise. A great proportion of the books published do not sell to the extent of more than a third or a half of the impression, unless the price be reduced below cost. The tax upon the remainder paper must accordingly be added to the tax on that which has actually gone off at a remunerative price. The duty here, you must observe, operates powerfully for the prevention of publication. In cheap reprints, where the amount of the impression is well calculated for demand as to secure against the kind of loss, the duty is not apparently so much reared; but if you compare it with the price of the book, it is equally grievous. For one thing, it prevents the production of those cheap homely papers, which the French use so much in their republicans. The utmost advantage you can get by taking a coarse paper is about one-eleventh or one-twelfth of the duty; which is not worth while. Hence we can see here none of those nice little volumes which cost you up at a franc a-piece; our cheapest volumes would be double or triple that price. In consequence of the production of a cheap work of any kind, the work must be offered at such a rate as to require a large number of purchasers, otherwise it will answer as a cheap work. Now, I can confirm what Brougham in what he has advanced upon this subject; for I have known designs of cheap publications which would have tempted the devisers into execution, if the paper duty had not added so much to the cost of production as frustrated all hope of the attraction of a sufficient number of customers. In the case of Chambers's Journal, which has been fortunate in obtaining an uncommonly large circulation, the £2500 which I have been assured that work pays annually in the shape of paper duty, may be a very small trifle each copy, and no obstruction upon the whole. It is still £2500 drawn from the pockets of the middle and working classes, as a tax upon what every discerning government would be glad to get its subjects to take without tax. But, for one work thus successful, there are multitudes, and these, too, works of utility and talent, which struggle miserably against the price of their paper (the principal part of the cost), or through the same cause are extinguished. In short, with the paper duty, a cheap work, which will not pay under a sale of perhaps 15,000, might do so, were there no paper duty, at 10,000, or even less. And even in the case of works already established, although the duty upon each is too small to allow a reduction of price, I am very sure that its remission would produce other benefits. It might enable the publisher to give a larger profit to the retailer, and thus cause the work to be propagated to places where it was formerly unknown. It might enable him to give a better and more lasting paper, or a better class of literary and scientific articles, or to extend the size of his work. It would also be of great service in allowing a reduction of the price of schoolbooks, which might then be more easily bought by the poor. But, indeed, the partiality with which this tax now presses upon the industrious classes, and the advantage which they would derive from its remission, are matters too obvious to be worthy of farther discussion. It is, in my opinion, the only tax on knowledge worthy of being seriously considered: for, while the newspaper duty only causes a man to content himself with a sight of that, of which, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, no more is desired, or would be serviceable, this prevents the people from obtaining those vehicles of knowledge, which it is of importance to them at all times to possess."

THE DUKE OF TREVISO.—The Athenæum publishes the following most gratifying anecdotes of Marshal Mortier, Duke of Treviso, the chief victim of the assassin of the Boulevard du Temple:—"After the battle of Talavera, the Duke of Wellington (then Sir Arthur Wellesley) being under the necessity of withdrawing his army from that place to meet the corps of French advancing on his left, was obliged to resign his hospitals to the protection of a Spanish force. The very morning of Sir Arthur's departure, the Spanish general informed the English commandant that the French corps, which had been defeated a few days before, had rallied, and was now in full march towards Talavera. In consequence, it became necessary to clear the towns; and such of the sick and wounded who had the power to march, were removed across the Tagus, a number of military and medical officers being left with those who were unable to depart. On entering Talavera, Marshal Mortier, Duke of Treviso, then commanding that corps, immediately sent for the senior medical officer, and told him he wished to visit the different buildings in which the British sick and wounded were placed. The marshal, in this inspection, entered familiarly into conversation with the poor sufferers, assuring them, that, as the fortune of war had placed them in his hands, he would endeavour to make their captivity and sufferings as little painful as his means would possibly allow. He likewise cheerfully exhorted them to bear their misfortunes with patience, intimating that they then might calculate upon being speedily exchanged. The marshal desired Mr Macdowal, the senior medical officer, to make him a daily report of the state of his patients, courteously adding, he should be glad to receive it at the hour of five, when he should be always happy to see him at dinner, because he would be certain then to have an opportunity of suggesting any measures calculated to promote the welfare of the sick. His first proclamation, inviting the country people to bring provisions to the town, announced that they would be paid for every thing in ready money; he also gave directions that the English hospitals were to be supplied before the French. Mr Macdowal informed the writer of this article that the marshal expressed himself in these words:—"Although I have no authority to command the military chest, I am master of my own purse; and therefore I present you with this sum (amounting to 400 or 500 napoleons, I do not remember which). This I beg you will lay out in the way you judge most profitable for your people; the amount I may, perhaps, recover ultimately from your government, but if not, I shall feel pleasure in recollecting the way in which it was expended." These words made a strong impression on my mind, and I feel it a duty due to the memory of that gallant officer to make them known to the public. The marshal spoke English fluently, and this accounts for his addressing himself so handsomely as he did to our poor wounded soldiers; his sympathy for their sufferings was really magnanimous, and proves how much the brave are ever honoured by the brave."

SAVAGE LIFE.—In "Wanderings and Adventures in the Interior of Africa" (Longman and Co., London, 1835), the author, Mr Andrew Steedman, gives the following traits of a misery which often afflicts savage life. He refers to the Caffres, near the Cape of Good Hope:—"Owing to the late unsettled state of the country, the present is a time of great distress. Many hundreds of people are living in the bushes on roots, without any fixed habitation, and almost driven to desperation from extreme distress. In riding a few miles, Mr Painton counted above three hundred people seeking roots for food: there are a great many eatable roots which will support life, but they are not very nutritious; they cause the people's bodies to swell to an enormous size, and the striking contrast between their emaciated limbs and swollen bodies is very painful to behold. In consequence of this scarcity of food, many men are driving from their kraals their least-valued wives, and the old and infirm who cannot go far to seek roots are left to starve. A great many people, especially women, come every day, hoping 'to be picked up.' We do what we can for the most distressed objects, but our stock of food will require very good management, and some self-denial on the part of ourselves and people, in order to make it hold out until the harvest-time, which is yet six weeks or two months off. * * Three weeks ago, Faku's sister-in-law died; four persons were immediately tortured, and then beaten to death by sticks, for having caused her death by witchcraft. The charge was substantiated by the following evidence:—"The poor creatures had been seen to wave their hands as they passed by the sick woman's kraal." Six weeks after a great captain died near the Umgazi, six persons were tortured and then burnt to death, on the same charge, on similar evidence: the witch-doctors pretended to find a piece of wood called chaka buried in their kraal, which as it rotted would cause the deceased to rot away: they were accused also of having burnt a lizard in their garden, in order that the deceased might have no corn to eat, and so die of hunger. In addition, John Burton, my interpreter, informed me, 'that on his return from Butterworth (to which place he accompanied me when I went to the district meeting) he arrived in the evening at a kraal near the Bashee, and found the place in great confusion. On inquiring the cause, he learned, that food being scarce, the people had buried a child of seven years old alive, because they did not like to see it starve before their eyes: the grave being not very deep, and the soil light, the child struggled hard, and its crying was heard by the mother, whose feelings prompted her to dig the child up again: the people were holding a consultation as to the propriety of burying the child again. John Burton reasoned with them, gave up the little food he had, and the people promised to let the child live.'—Another extract from the same work gives an anecdote of discomfort from a different source, but not less alarming:—"The whole country is alarmed, and the petty chief, So Barilli, has sent his cattle to feed upon the station for safety, owing to the following occurrence. A male child has been born to Faku lately, which, from the rank of its mother, is the great son or heir of its father. According to a custom which has prevailed from time immemorial among the Amapondas and Amatembu, it was deemed necessary for a great chief, of a particular family, in which the honour is hereditary, to be put to death, so that his head might be used as a vessel to hold a decoction of roots, with which the new-born child was to be washed: this charm, they imagine, will prevent Faku's family from becoming extinct. Umcwengi, the chief who was to have been put to death, fled with his cattle to the mountains; and being supported by several powerful clans, refused to submit, and contends that the doctors are mistaken in supposing him to be the person who ought to suffer. Every petty chief is now alarmed, as they say some one must be put to death."

HALEY'S COMET is going from the Taurus through the lower part of Auriga, towards the foot of the Great Bear. October 2, it is near iota in the Great Bear, and during all the first part of the month it will be running along directly under Charles's Wain, and direct into Bootes.—From October 10 to October 18 it will be in the Serpent, whence it will proceed to Scorpio, where it will be about Nov. 11.—It will then move slowly to between alpha and beta in Scorpio by December 21, from whence it will advance towards the shoulder of Centaurus till February 7, 1836, after which it will disappear. The times of appearance and disappearance are given only as probable. The best time to look for it (with the naked eye) will be in the first ten days of October, directly under or in the line skirting the constellation of the Great Bear. It is then moving very quickly; and any little nebulous appearance may be distinguished from it by observing whether it changes its place sensibly in three or four hours.—This may be done by finding two stars which are in a line with the supposed comet, and observing whether it continue in that line.—British Almanac.

SCOTLAND.

July 21. An infant of eight months old, whose parents reside in Morocco's Close, Edinburgh, fell over a window, four stories high, without being in the least injured.

—22. The annual competition of pipers, under the patronage of the Highland Society, took place in the Theatre-Royal, Edinburgh, in the presence of a crowded and brilliant audience. The chief prize for the bagpipe (a gold medal) was awarded to John Mackenzie, piper to the Marquis of Breadalbane; the chief prize for dancing, to Peter MacLaren, piper to Mr Stirling of Kippendavie; and the chief prize for dress, to Donald M'Innes, piper to Macneil of Barra. An elegant silver vase was also presented to Mr Murray, patentee of the theatre, in testimony of the sense which the society entertained of his liberality in granting them the gratuitous use of the house for so many years.—A meeting of the Relief Congregation of Dumfries was held in the chapel, for the purpose of deciding a question previously agitated, whether the congregation should remain as they were, or connect themselves with the church of Scotland. After a lengthened discussion, which was, on the whole, conducted in the spirit of candour, a vote was called, when ninety-seven communicants voted in favour of union with the church, and seven against the proposition.—On the 4th August, Mr Fife was admitted by the Presbytery of Dumfries to full communion with the establishment. The Relief Presbytery afterwards ordered his name to be struck off their list, and appointed one of their number to preach his church vacant.—The materials of the tower in Carlisle Castle, containing the apartments occupied by Mary Queen of Scots immediately after her fatal entrance into England, were sold by auction; and although it rained heavily, the interest excited on the occasion brought together a pretty numerous company, and caused considerable competition. The wood, which was fine old oak, brought very high prices, some beams of no great dimensions fetching as much as L.5 each; several old planks also sold very high. One gentleman, we understand, bought a large lot of wood, with which he purposes to fit up and furnish a room, to board the floor, cover the walls with wainscot, and have the chairs, tables, &c. all made of it; thus making the apartment a perfect "Queen Mary's Room." The new building, on the site of Queen Mary's Tower, from which the materials were taken, is now in an advanced state.—Carlisle Patriot.

—23. This being the day appointed by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland for a fast and humiliation, it was generally observed throughout the country with every external mark of respect. In the towns, large as well as small, the shops were with few exceptions shut, and the churches were well attended. At the same time, partly owing to the temptation of the remarkably fine weather, vast crowds flocked from the large towns to enjoy themselves in the country. The Edinburgh and Dalkeith railway carried 7247 passengers, and in Glasgow about 10,000 persons were calculated to have gone on board the steam-boats at the Broomielaw.

—24. About six o'clock in the evening, as the Earl Grey steamer was about to leave the quay at Greenock, on her voyage from Dunoon to Glasgow, the boiler connected with the engine, which was of the high-pressure kind, burst with the sound of a cannon, and breaking up great part of the deck, carried many of the passengers high into the air. Some falling in the water, were drowned; and others alighting on the quay, were killed. The lives lost in the first instance were six, afterwards increased to eight, and about fifteen were severely scalded or otherwise injured. It is stated that accidents of this kind might easily be prevented, by the use of a very simple instrument which denotes the degree of pressure.

Aug. 3. Elizabeth Baulks or M'Neil was executed at Edinburgh for poisoning her husband.

—7. A public dinner was given by about one hundred gentlemen of Edinburgh, for their gallant townsman, Brigadier-General Charles Shaw, who has distinguished himself so much by his conduct in the late Portuguese contest. Brigadier-General Shaw is at present recruiting for the service of Isabella II. of Spain, and daily sends detachments of young men down the Clyde to be shipped for that country.

—13. At an unusually full meeting of the Commission of the General Assembly, Dr P. Macfarlan entered into a consideration of the qualifications of the gentlemen composing the church commission, about one-half of whom he characterised as unfit for the business proposed, either from their youth, or their hostility to the church. In conclusion, the reverend gentleman moved, "That the Commission of the General Assembly feel it incumbent upon them, in discharge of their duty to the church of Scotland, to state to the government the sentiments they entertain of the constitution of the commission; that they do not consider it entirely friendly to the church, individual members having publicly professed opposition to the connection between church and state; and further, that, with few exceptions, it does not contain the names of individuals of experience, or men interested in the church, and that on these grounds the commission is not entitled to the confidence of the church." Sir James Gibson-Craig opposed the motion, on the grounds that the business of the commission was not to debate the question of the connection of church and state, but simply to ascertain some statistical facts respecting the church, and that the appointment of a few gentlemen opposed to the church was necessary, in order to assure the dissenters that its inquiries would be conducted with impartiality. On a division against Dr Macfarlan's motion, it was supported by 90 out of 93 votes; only Sir J. G. Craig, Mr William Bell, W.S., and Mr J. W. Mackenzie, W.S., dissenting from it. A petition against the two university bills was unanimously agreed to by this body.

The inhabitants of Montrose have followed the example of those of Edinburgh, Kirkcaldy, and Dunfermline, by establishing an association for the purpose of obtaining lectures at a cheap rate on useful and popular sciences. It was instituted at a public meeting on the 23d of June, and is entitled "The Montrose Mechanics' Scientific and Literary Association."

The liberals of Edinburgh have resolved to give a public dinner to Mr O'Connell, and have received his assent to the proposal. It will take place immediately after the close of the session of parliament, and will be followed by a similar demonstration of feeling at Glasgow. The inhabitants of various parts of the country have resolved to send delegations.

The poor's funds of the large and populous parish of St Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, were, previously to 1833, managed by the clergyman and their elders. In the year mentioned, the management was with some difficulty transferred to a lay directorate, who immediately proceeded to make all possible reformation in the pauper system of the parish. The saving effected by this body in 1833-4 amounted to L.2014, 19s. 5d.; in 1834-5, to L.2017, 10s. 2d.; in all, during two years, to L.4032, 9s. 7d. The assessment has been accordingly reduced from one shilling to eightpence in the pound. The savings have chiefly been effected in the workhouse department of the expenditure; the inmates being now supported at a rate little exceeding six shillings a-month each, and that in a much more comfortable manner than formerly. The assessed annual rental of the parish is above L.180,000.

Great excitement has lately been caused at Dunoon, on the Firth of Clyde, by an attempt on the part of Mr James Ewing, who has a villa there, to enclose the neighbouring mount, on which formerly stood a castle belonging to the kings of Scotland. A wall with which he attempted to enforce the legal title he supposes himself to have acquired, was repeatedly pulled down by the villagers, chiefly the female part of them, who justly set a great value on the hill as an attraction for visitors to their beautiful sea-bathing hamlet. Some of these rioters have been arrested and forced to give bail; but, however improperly resisted, there seems little reason to conclude that Mr Ewing will succeed in his design.

By a letter dated July 28, Mr Colin Dunlop, one of the representatives of Glasgow, informed his constituents that ill health would oblige him to demit his seat at the conclusion of the session.

BIRTHS.

On the 25th September 1834, a weaver's wife in Queen Street presented her husband two sons, and a few weeks ago she presented him three more, thus giving birth to five sons in less than eleven months, while she herself has only just completed her 19th year! One of the three children was still-born, and the other two died on the day of their birth. It may be further added, that the husband himself is one of twins, and that last month his twin sister gave birth to twin daughters. What would Malthus have said to this?—Paisley Advertiser.

At Wisbech, Mr Thomas Hill, widower, aged 84, to Mrs Longthorn, widow, aged 82. A very considerable number of people assembled to witness the ceremony. On the part of the Goodman, it may be pure love; but on the lady's part, it is more doubtful, as her spouse has the good fortune to live in an almshouse. As soon as the youthful couple came out of church, it was found necessary to protect them, and they were escorted home by two or three constables. Having seen them safely housed, the doors and shutters were closed, and the crowd dispersed.—Bury and Suffolk Herald.

5. At his house in Salisbury Place, Edinburgh, the Rev. Dr Thomas M'Crie, well known as the chief ornament of that branch of the secession church to which he belonged—the Associate body of Original Seceders. His first great mental effort was his "Life of John Knox," which placed him in the very first rank of ecclesiastical historians. The "Life of Andrew Melville" followed; and his "History of the Suppression of the Reformation in Spain and Italy" showed that his learning was equally extensive, whether the question turned on the iniquities of the Inquisition, or on the spirited and irrepressible exertions of the first great Scottish Reformers. His theology was the old theology of Scotland, and his sermons had about them an air of the antique, which carried the auditor, accustomed to the refinements of modern diction and philosophy, back two centuries, and placed him in the immediate presence of the times of his covenanted forefathers. His loss will be much and long regretted.—Caledonian Mercury.—At 16, Comely Bank, Lieutenant Joseph Fowler, one of the military knights of Windsor.

6. At Brighton, Louisa Anne, eldest daughter of the late General Patrick Alexander Agnew, late of the Hon. East India Company's service.—At Ilfracombe, aged 80, Catherine, widow of the Rev. John Roget, and sister of the late Sir Samuel Romilly.

11. At Kirby Lonsdale, William Wright, better known as "Billy Reet," aged 67. He was a truly eccentric character. Although never married, he inhabited a small room in the Mill Brow in the above town the whole of his life, but scarcely ever admitted his nearest friends within his doors. He lived principally upon charity, although never known to beg. After his decease, his domicile was examined, and such a variety of articles was exhibited as astonished every one who saw them, viz.—200 pairs of shoes, upwards of 100 hats, 40 pairs of shirts, 40 pairs of stockings, 40 suits of clothes, in different stages of decay; and such a variety of pots, pans, ancient china and other crockery, as would supply half a parish. Notwithstanding the extent of his wardrobe, he wore nothing but rags. He never would engage in any regular employment, except gathering nuts, and collecting wreck wood in the time of high floods, and had in his house several cart loads at the time of his decease.—Kendal Mercury.

13. Suddenly, at Edinburgh, Captain Alexander Grant, Hon. East India Company's service, third son of the late Robert Grant of Wester Elchies, Esq. Morayshire.

15. At Edinburgh, Mrs Jane Massie, wife of George Monro, Esq. advocate.

At an advanced age, Mrs Montague Cribb, daughter of Lady Jane Courtenay, niece of the Earl of Bute, and relict of the late Major Cribb of the 79th foot.

27. At York Place, Sarah Bates, wife of Mons. N. H. Le Dieu. At London Terrace, Hackney Road, in his 68th year, Mr Benjamin Marshall, the animal portrait-painter.

Lately, at his residence in Bridge Street, Westminster, John M'Cance, Esq. M.P. for Belfast.

The venerable Dr Usher, archdeacon of Raphoe, aged 69. At Plumbon, near Annan, Mrs Dalgliesh, relict of Mr John Dalgliesh, farmer, the mother of William Dalgliesh, Esq., for many years rector of Annan, and afterwards of Eskbank Academy, aged nearly 100 years.

The New York papers announce the death of Enoch Crosby, in his 87th year. He was the original of Mr Fennimore Cooper's character of Harvey Birch in the novel of "The Spy," and rendered the most important services to General Washington during the American war.

At Chelsea, aged 40, Gilbert Stuart Newton, Esq. late of Boston, U.S. This is the accomplished painter, whose melancholic loss of reason the arts have so long had occasion to deplore. He passed the last years of his life in poverty and grief.

The Paris papers mention the death of the celebrated novelist, Pigault Lebrun, author of "Jerome," "Monsieur Botte," "Mon Oncle Thomas," "The Barons de Felsheim," and a score of other unvalued novels, at the age of 83. It is now sixty years since Pigault began to write. He was the best novelist of the day during the revolution, and in his own peculiar department, the best after it. Unmindful of the warfare of politics and the dethronement of kings, he has pursued the even tenor of his way, scoring folly wherever it was to be found, and narrating, in simple and unaffected language, the loves, the sorrows, and the frailties of the poor.

Lately, at Chamarande, near Paris, T. R. Underwood, Esq. Fellow of the Geological Society of London. He was an excellent artist, and a perfect judge of the arts; of much patient industry, and indefatigable research. Geology seems to have been his principal study, but his attention was by no means confined to it; for, as a naturalist, he had accumulated an immense variety of observations, which, if placed in some able hand, would contribute largely to the general stock of knowledge. Mr Underwood was so great an enthusiast in science, that he wished only to live that he might witness the return of Haller's comet; and would have consented to an excruciatingly painful operation, if his surgical friends could have given him hopes that his life could have been prolonged by it only for a few weeks.

THE IRISH CHURCH.

THE Irish Church, as the term is at present used, means simply the Protestant Episcopal Establishment in Ireland; similar to that of England "in doctrine, worship, discipline, and government" (as expressed by the fifth article of the act of Union); meant, like that of England, to comprehend the great mass of the Irish population; endowed for that end, and upon that plea, with the funds possessed by the Catholic church, at a time when the congregation of the faithful was one and indivisible; but differing from that of England, in the fact that it never has comprehended the bulk of the population, but has continued, from its introduction up to the present hour, the religion, not of the majority, but of a small minority of the Irish people.

The causes which have led to results so different in countries so nearly similar, may easily be pointed out, and we shall enumerate a few of them, premising that, as Protestants, we hold them to be wholly unconnected with the relative truth or merits of the two religions. In England, the seed of the reformation was sown in a country prepared and willing to receive it. The doctrines of Wickliffe had paved the way for those of Luther, and the rejection of the papal power by Henry VIII. merely consummated what the constitutions of London had begun. In Ireland, from the conquest of 1168, up to 1546, the whole influence of the crown was employed to enhance the authority of the papal system. It was upon a papal bull that the king's title rested—it was by a gift from Rome that Ireland was united! Excommunication was a weapon employed against the king's enemies at a time when, amongst more civilised communities of Europe, it had fallen into contempt. It was, in short, one of the many anomalies of the British rule in Ireland, that, up to the very last moment, the people were taught to obey with reverence that power which the Reformation had upon them to condemn and abjure. But this was not all. Ireland, though nominally conquered, had never been identified with the British empire. The conquest itself was a partial conquest. The authority of England was confined to the English pale. The laws of England were granted only to the Norman settlers and their descendants, and to the five borough families with which they first contracted alliances. All the rest of the native population was deemed aliens or enemies. Down to the reign of Elizabeth, they could neither sue nor be sued in any court of law; and as late as 1607, under James I., an Irishman might be killed with impunity, if it could be proved that he was what was then termed a "wild Irishman," and not one of the five bloods. Exclusion of the rights and privileges of Englishmen was, as it too long continued, the principle of our government. All the institutions of the Irish were untouched, yet their desire, often and ardently expressed, to be received under the protection of the English law, was rejected. They were condemned to be a distinct and degraded race, with whom intermarriage was pollution, and to conform with whose laws was declared by the statute of Kilkenny, in 1534, to be a crime equivalent to high treason itself.

We have thought it necessary to dwell upon these things, because they contain the germ of much that follows. The Reformation only widened the breach between a cruel and impolitic laws had created. It added a new distinction to the distinctions which existed before: it converted the war of races into a war of religions. Espoused by the higher clergy, whose interests had always been identified with those of England,* and by the settlers of the pale, it became, on that very account, an object of suspicion to the parochial clergy, and to their Irish flocks. They rejected it. We think that in doing so, they closed their ears to the voice of truth; but how much was wanting in Ireland which endeared that truth to ourselves! If there be one thing that tended more than another to open the hearts of Protestants to the doctrines of the Reformation, it was the privilege of praying to God in their native tongue. That privilege was denied to the Irish. The Liturgy was never translated. It never has been translated, down to the present day. The people were told of two strange languages to choose the one least familiar to them, and which, in lieu of being endeared by old associations, was the symbol of little else than humiliation and conquest. Then, the clergy sent to replace the old Catholic priesthood, were strangely and culpably negligent. The only proof of their zeal was the destruction, by armed bands, of churches, which they said had been polluted by the mass. In place of those great and good men who founded Protestantism in Scotland, in Germany, and amongst ourselves, Ireland was given in prey to the refuse of the English church. We wish no stronger evidence upon this point than that of contemporary Protestant writers, such as Spenser—men who saw with indignation the excesses which they have recorded—and we ask, Whether it was by instruments such as these that a great moral revolution could be accomplished? Whether, if the Reformation had been entrusted to similar hands elsewhere, it would have produced the rich harvest which has sprung from the labours of Latimer and of Ridley, of Calvin, of Melancthon, and of Knox?

In Ireland, penal enactments took the place of that rational conviction which was all-powerful amongst ourselves. Without taking one single step for the conversion of the people, the Irish legislature proceeded to lay the foundations of that system of coercion which has since been worked out with cruel though fruitless perseverance. The country was treated as a Protestant country, though Catholic in all but the name. The funds of the Catholic church were transferred by act of Parliament to the ministers of the new creed, and an establishment founded upon a scale befitting a nation, although but a fraction of that nation was included within its pale. History tells us how this experiment has succeeded, and how dearly we have expiated the original sin of conceiving that an establishment could be maintained which did not rest upon the belief of the majority of the people. In all the dissensions and disturbances which have distracted Ireland, the claims of that establishment have been mixed up. They have served to perpetuate the old distinctions of Englishry and Irishry amongst her population; they have stood as a barrier between the two countries, rendering any identification of their interests impossible, and forbidding even any kindly approximation of feeling. They have added bitterness to political animosities, and infused a more deadly spirit into political feuds. In vain have we endeavoured (to use the words of an eloquent writer) "by one of those daring fictions, in which law leaves poetry far behind it," to deny to the Catholics a legal existence; in vain have we striven to crush them by penal laws. They constitute the great mass of the Irish people.

The population of Ireland, according to the returns

* Tithes were introduced into Ireland by the synod of Cashel, and it was always supposed that this departure from the simpler usages of the primitive Irish church, was the connecting link between the higher clergy and the Norman invaders.

made by the Commissioners of Public Instruction, amounts to 7,943,940 souls. Of these, 6,427,712 are Catholics; 642,356 are Presbyterians; 21,808 are Quakers, Baptists, or other Protestant dissenters; and 852,064 are Protestant Episcopalians, or members of the established church. Among these, however, are included the whole body of the Wesleyan Methodists, whose numbers we can only infer from facts to be 99,092, leaving 752,972 Episcopalians as the total number of Protestants included, bonâ fide, within the pale of the established church. For the benefit of these 752,972 members of the establishment, Ireland has been divided into four ecclesiastical provinces, Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam. Armagh contains ten dioceses; Dublin five; Cashel eleven; and Tuam six. In Armagh (we speak of the province) there are 502 benefices; in Dublin 311; in Cashel 469; and in Tuam 103; making a total of 1385 benefices, amongst which the 2348 parishes of Ireland are very unequally and anomalously distributed. We know not upon what principle many of the larger benefices, which are called "unions," have been formed. There are 478 of these unions in all, and in 87 of them it does not appear that contiguity has been thought a necessary condition of the alliance, although one can hardly see how it can be dispensed with, where parishes are united for the avowed purpose of receiving in common the benefit of religious instruction. Thus, in the union of Kilcooly, we find ten parishes thrown together, one of which is six miles, and a second ten miles, from the rest. In the union of Ballymakill, which consists of nine parishes, one is twenty-seven miles from the church. In the union of Burnchurch, which is composed of fourteen parishes, three of them are stated by the commissioners to be "at opposite extremities of the county of Kilkenny, many miles from each other, and from the body of the union."

We fear that it is less the spirit of Christianity, or the desire to facilitate the religious instruction of the people, that has presided over the formation of these unions, than the wish to provide for some favoured incumbent, towards whose wants the Catholic population, in the more distant parishes, have thus been compelled to contribute. We think them wrong in principle, and mischievous in practice. They would not have been endured in England or Scotland. Is it surprising that in Ireland they should have been the cause of excitement and complaint? What would the people of Scotland say, if, for the benefit of the 100,000 or 120,000 Episcopalians who reside amongst them, the Presbyterian parishes were to be formed into unions, varying in extent, not according to the wants of the Presbyterian population, but of the Episcopal clergyman; eking out at once his congregation and his income, by throwing in half a dozen Episcopalians in the small parish, and all the tithes, without a single Episcopalian in the large parish?

But it is not to the unions, unfortunately, that the disproportion between the Protestant church and the wants of the Protestant population are confined; it pervades every part of the establishment in a greater or less degree, from the mighty ecclesiastical staff, which is kept up for the purposes of Episcopal superintendence, and the deans and chapters, without cure of souls, down to the 895 parishes, without 50 Protestants, the 496 parishes, without 20 Protestants, and the 155 parishes, without either Protestants, or clergyman, or church!

The dignities and prebends of the Irish church, without taking account of the benefices with cure of souls, which are occasionally attached to them, have revenues amounting to L.40,323. The report states ninety-four of these dignities "to be mere sinecure offices, save and except the duty of preaching occasionally in their respective cathedral churches." In seventy-five instances, the returns made to the commissioners by the individuals themselves, state that they have "no duties whatever to perform." Yet for these "no duties," the dean of Raphoe receives L.1491 per annum, the precentor of Lismore L.448, and the archdeacon of Meath L.723. Others are not equally fortunate in this ecclesiastical lottery, some receiving only L.90, others L.60, others L.30; but in all, the remuneration is totally independent of the work to be performed, or of the population, which, if there be any reason in church establishments, ought to benefit by that work.

So it is, too frequently, with the parochial benefices themselves, not from the fault of the clergy, but from the vice inherent in a system, the first principle of which was to form an establishment without any regard to the creed of the majority of the population. Those close and touching ties which unite in England and Scotland the clergyman with his flock, are every where wanting. Under such circumstances, how is it possible for the clergyman, however good his intentions, or unexceptionable his conduct, to surmount that feeling, which pervades the great mass of the Catholic population around him, namely, that he lives at their expense; that he is the representative of a system founded upon their depression; and that, without the possibility of deriving from him any spiritual instruction or aid, he engrosses a fund, which would be sufficient, if distributed as it is distributed in every other part of the world, to diffuse the blessings of education over the whole mass of the population?

These feelings, and they are feelings which are inherent in human nature itself, are greatly enhanced by the disproportion which exists between the parochial endowments and the duties to be performed. We annex a table of seven benefices, taken from different parts of Ireland, and containing in all sixty-two Protestants, in which there is no church, and no resident clergyman, while the parochial income from tithes amounts to L.2888 annually:—

	Protestants.	Resident Clergymen.	Church.	Tithes.
Modeligo (Union)	4	0	0	L.440 0 0
Seskeineane	3	0	0	335 0 0
Clenne	17	0	0	559 19 0
Effin	10	0	0	320 0 0
Gilbertstown	8	0	0	250 0 0
Mahonagh	8	0	0	500 0 0
Killeedy	12	0	0	484 12 0

We have another table before us of 50 parishes, the united revenues of which are L.11,897, while the whole Protestant flock consists of 527 individuals; and, as if to aggravate the evil of such a state of things, in these 50 parishes there are 42 without a resident clergyman, and 41 without a church.

In the diocese of Emly, the population of which amounts to 98,363, there are only 1246 members of the established church, to whose exclusive benefit the tithe composition, amounting to L.7969, is appropriated; in addition to which the diocese has received L.5670 in parliamentary grants, and L.4320 in loans. The expense, therefore, of imparting spiritual instruction to the 1246 Episcopalians, is about L.6, 7s. 6d. for each man, woman, and child belonging to the establishment; and yet so inefficiently is this duty performed, that out of 17 benefices there are 10 in which the incumbent is non-resident, and five in which divine service is not performed at all.

In the bishopric of Cloyne there are eight parishes, the tithe composition of which amounts to L.4660 per annum, while the number of Episcopalian Protestants is precisely 173. The cost, therefore, of each member of the establishment is L.28 a man.

	Members of Established Church.	Tithe Composition.
Killatty	13	L.400
Ballybea	15	400
Templeracrigy	27	498
Ballyvourney	30	500
Ardagh	14	600
Whitechurch	20	784
Mogeesha	19	809
Clonfriest	35	869
	173	4860

In the whole province of Tuam, containing six dioceses, and 275 parishes, with 1,234,336 inhabitants, and an ecclesiastical revenue of L.60,000, the members of the establishment, including the Wesleyans, amount only to 44,599: the Presbyterians and other Protestant dissenters are 1169; while the Catholics alone are 1,188,568; thus constituting 28 parts out of 29 of the whole population, while the provision intended for the religious instruction of the 29 parts is engrossed and absorbed by the one.

We might multiply instances, ad infinitum, to prove that every thing in the church of Ireland is anomalous and arbitrary; that there is no proportion between its duties and its revenues; no connecting link between the clergyman and his nominal flock; did we not feel it to be unnecessary after the facts which we have already adduced.—Abridged from a pamphlet lately published by Ridgeway.

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

THE insurrectionary movements which took place early in August, at Barcelona and Saragossa, spread to the capital, where, on the 15th, the urban militia declared themselves against the ministry, and took up a fortified position in one of the principal squares, being supported, apparently, by the bulk of the inhabitants. The ministers Toreno and Los Amerillas were the chief objects of the popular vengeance, and the general cry was for the restoration of the constitution of 1820. During these tumults, the inmates of the convents were only protected from massacre by guards of the troops. On the 16th, the Queen Regent met the emergency by declaring Madrid to be in a state of siege, and sending troops for the suppression of the insurgents. Her purpose was effected with much address by the liberal senator Quesada, who, having hemmed the militia in on all sides, easily persuaded them to lay down their arms, and retire. Thus the insurrection was quelled without a single drop of blood being shed.

The insurrectionary movements of the provinces have nevertheless acquired increased strength, so as to be nearly as formidable on the one hand as the Carlist proceedings on the other. In Cadiz, Barcelona, Saragossa, Granada, Malaga, and other places of the first importance, juntas have been chosen, who act independently of the government, and, while they profess loyalty to the Queen, demand the convocation of a National Cortes—a sort of states-general—for the establishment of a new order of things, on thoroughly liberal principles. One motive of these proceedings seems to be a dread of French interference, France being now considered apparently as one of the powers adverse to popular liberty. This cause of offence is now, however, removed, in consequence of the positive refusal of Louis Philip to contribute troops. The provinces in which the ultra-liberal spirit is strongest, are Estremadura, Andalusia, and Catalonia; but it is said that all, except the capital and its immediate environs, are more or less affected by it; so that Spain may now be described as a country thoroughly under the influence of the spirit of reform. Popular feeling seems to receive additional irritation from the private conduct of the Queen Regent, who is represented by popular rumour as spending her time at La Grange, near Madrid, in a dissolute and shameless manner, and as having recently brought a child into the world without the sanction of matrimony. The spirit of the army is eminently ultra-liberal.

The addresses of the revolutionary juntas were met by the Queen Regent with orders couched in no timid terms, but which were every where disregarded. At length, about the beginning of September, her government showed symptoms of giving way to the popular clamours; and though the obnoxious Toreno was still retained at the head of the ministry, Amerillas, the minister of war, was changed for an old politician named Castro de Toreno; Alava, the minister of marine, for Saratorio, a person of inferior note; and Alvarez Guerra, minister of the interior, for Herrera, a deputy from Burgos. On the 6th, M. Mendizabal arrived, and, after some conferences with the Queen, was commissioned to form a new ministry, with Alava at its head, in place of Toreno. This great concession to popular feeling took place on the 15th September.

As there can be no doubt that the difficulties in which the Spanish government has thus become involved arise in no small measure from the languid manner in which Carlos has been opposed, so there is some reason to expect that they will henceforth be lessened, as some victories of considerable consequence were gained over that national enemy about the time when the disturbances were at their height. The arrival of General Evans and Alava at Santander on the 12th August, was mentioned in the postscript of our last paper: they were received with an enthusiastic welcome, and lost no time in drilling and preparing their troops for action. Towards the close of the month, the Queen's party in the northern provinces were reduced to the defensive, and a considerable body of Carlists pressed on Bilbao, where the communication between the British consul and Lord John Hay of the Castor frigate was interrupted, one of the lieutenants of that vessel (Mr Pike) being seized, and a boat sent for his release fired upon in the river and two men killed. On 30th August, General Evans made a reconnaissance with his raw and half-disciplined troops against the Carlists on the mountains near Hernani, when, the Carlists retiring, the other party was drawn into action, and conducted itself in such a manner, both in the actual engagement and in retiring, as gained the entire approbation of the British commander. "Some of the troops," says General Evans, "were scarcely above ten days embodied, none above six weeks;" and he expresses a doubt if "such steadiness, spirit, and formal regularity under fire, in very extended movements, were ever before displayed by troops so recently brought together." The loss of the British in this affair was 33 killed, wounded, and missing; of the Spaniards 99. A large force, under Don Carlos himself, was overthrown on the 2d September, at Los Arcos, by General Aldam with the loss of 150 prisoners, 180 killed, and about 400 wounded. Another engagement took place between the Queen's troops and the Carlists in the vicinity of St Sebastian, on the 4th, and was still more disastrous to the insurgents, who, it is said, left 140 prisoners in the hands of General Evans, besides a large number of killed on the field of battle. The British auxiliary legion suffered severely, having 160 men killed. The consequence of these victories was the withdrawal of the Carlists from before Bilbao, into the fastnesses of the Amescoas. On the 11th, a body of Spanish troops, 8000 strong, left Bilbao to proceed southward. About four miles from town they met with the outposts of the enemy, who they drove back. The Carlists were believed to only in small force; but it was soon discovered that they had a large body of men present, and had strengthened their position by creating every sort of obstruction to the advance of the Queen's troops. The action was maintained with much spirit for some time; but the Queen's generals, finding that they had not sufficient force to carry the strong position occupied by the enemy, ordered a retreat, in the course of which one small party was thrown into confusion in crossing a river. By this time General Evans being informed of the unexpected difficulty encountered by the Spanish troops, arrived on the field with one or two regiments of the British, and repulsed the Carlists, who finally retired to their original post. The loss of the Queen's army is estimated at 300, and that of the enemy is supposed to be much greater. The British troops behaved with great gallantry. Reports had reached Bilbao that General Cardova with the main army of the Queen was within two or three days' march of Bilbao; and if so, the retreat of the Carlists may soon be expected.

General Evans has raised a soldier, who had especially distinguished himself, from the ranks to an ensigncy, and has published a proclamation, in which advancement is promised to all privates whose conduct was deemed worthy of such reward, notwithstanding they might want the advantages of birth and education, which are deemed essential for an officer in the British army.

FRANCE.

AFTER passing in detail through the Chamber of Deputies with little alteration, the law for the restriction of the press was sanctioned as a whole, August 29, 1835, 226 against 153, the vote being taken by ballot. The only material concession was obtained by M. Diez, the celebrated printer, in the substitution of L.400,000 as the amount of security to be deposited by the Paris daily newspapers, to answer for possible fines. The law passed quickly through the House of Peers, and on the 9th of September received the royal assent. A considerable number of the newspapers, chiefly in the provinces, have consequently ceased to be published, while caricatures have entirely disappeared. The effect of the law extends to plays, which must now be approved of by the minister before they can be acted. The obnoxious jury law has also been passed.

Immediately after these transactions, the Chambers were prorogued, and the upper house was reinforced by the creation of thirty new peers, almost without exception subservient to the government.

At the close of August, an ex-captain of the national guard, named Pepin, said to be a confederate of Fieschi, was arrested in Paris. He was examined for six hours; and it was rumoured that among his papers some important memoranda were found, indicating many persons in the conspiracy. Much was expected from the further disclosures of this man; but before his second examination, he contrived to escape from custody, and has not been discovered. Gisquet, the prefect of police, now lost the little credit he had gained, and gave in his resignation, which was accepted.

PORTUGAL.

A DIFFERENCE has arisen between the governments of Sardinia and Portugal, in consequence, it is said, of the rejection by Donna Maria of the Prince of Carignano as a suitor. The Portuguese minister of Turin having been ordered out of the Sardinian dominions, the Queen, by the advice of her minister Palmella, has suspended "from their functions all consular agents of the Sardinian government in the Portuguese dominions, and prohibited the entrance of all vessels under the flag of that country into the ports of her kingdom and of its dominions." The exclusion is to commence in two months from the date of the decree (Aug. 31), in order that time may be allowed for the notification of the resolution to Italy, and the prejudice which commerce might suffer from ignorance of its existence be avoided.

The sales of the national property have been proceeding favourably, and from the fact of some large purchases being made by the Miguelites, the stability of the existing government is argued.

UNITED STATES.

TUMULTS of a very painful character have recently taken place in this country, chiefly in consequence of the efforts made in the eastern states to effect the abolition of slavery in the southern. These efforts would appear, had excited in the slaves themselves feelings inconsistent with the preservation of peace, and the consequence was an excitement among slave-holders, partaking of that savage character which usually results from extreme terror. According to the Charleston Courier—"On June 29th, a conversation was overheard by two gentlemen between some negroes, of an intended insurrection. Information was immediately extended to the citizens, and expresses sent to the adjoining counties. The citizens of Madison, on the 30th, held a meeting at Livingston to concert together. Upon examination of the report, it was deemed alarming, and two negroes were examined on the 1st July. On the 2d, many of the citizens becoming sensible of the great danger and guilt of the two who were examined, seized and hanged them without further ceremony, they confessing that white men were the leaders and instigators of the plot. Forthwith a committee of thirteen of the most respectable and wealthy farmers was organised, and invested with full authority (extending to life, over black and white) to try, condemn, and execute all suspicious persons brought before them—the citizens unanimously pledging themselves to support the committee in all their acts. The first two white men brought before the committee were Drs Joshua Cotton and Sanders (steam doctors), who were, on the 4th August, tried, convicted, and executed. Cotton confessed his guilt, and implicated many white men and negroes, and said that there were some negroes attached to his cause, on nearly every plantation in the state. Parties of horsemen were detached to arrest many white men and negroes, and until the present time, were, at all hours of the day and night, arriving at Livingston with prisoners. Two more white men, Dean of Connecticut, and Donovan of Kentucky, were convicted, and on the 8th expiated their crimes under a rude gallows, in the centre of the village. A large number of blacks have been executed in the different colonies."

During the excitement which produced these dire events, the inhabitants of Charleston arose en masse, and, breaking into the post-office, seized a large quantity of abolition tracts, which they burnt on the open street. It was the unanimous resolution of a meeting of planters, held at Charleston on the 11th of August, "to break up the union than allow any interference on the part of the eastern states with their slave population. These circumstances appear to have produced a reaction in the eastern states. A large public meeting, held at Boston on the 21st August, strongly reprobated all attempts to coerce any of the states to abolish slavery by appeals to the terrors of the master or the passions of the slave. The postmaster-general has also instructed the Charleston postmaster not to circulate any tracts, or publications of any description, in favour of the abolition of slavery. The postmaster of New York, with the approbation of the authorities at Washington, has likewise assumed the liberty of stopping all such publications on their passage through the post-office; measures which we cannot suppose likely to have been adopted in such a country, except under the influence of a pressing sense of danger.

Contemporaneously with the slavery-abolition disturbances, others have taken place in consequence of totally different circumstances. At Vicksburgh, in Kentucky, five persons connected with a gambling-house, having infuriated the people by a course of conduct outraging every better kind of feeling, were at length seized, and, in virtue of a custom called Synch's law, which prevails, it seems, in various rude and half-settled parts of the country, hanged without ceremony of any kind. About the same time, an attack was made by an armed force, commissioned by the authorities of Michigan, on the inhabitants of Toledo, in Ohio, who were maltreated by the aggressors. On the 10th of August, a dreadful riot took place at Baltimore. A bank, called the Bank of Maryland, had stopped payment, with many of their notes in the hands of the people. Measures had been taken to deprive certain trustees of the bank of the management of its concerns; but, owing to the illness of the chancellor of the state, some delay had occurred in their completion. In the meanwhile, the forbearance of the populace was exhausted. They assembled in large numbers, set the civil authorities at defiance, and destroyed the houses and furniture of several of the shareholders in the bank. Martial law was proclaimed by General Smith, who, at the age of eighty-four, headed a body of the citizens and a detachment of the United States infantry. Fifty-five of the rioters were taken into custody; and it was in contemplation to establish a powerful police, which should prevent the recurrence of such outrages.

Decided symptoms of improvement are beginning to show themselves in the affairs of Greece. Though Etolia and Acarnania, wild and thinly inhabited districts, are infested by bands of robbers, the other parts of the country seem to enjoy abundance and prosperity. A bank with capital (it is said) of two millions sterling, has been established at Athens by English speculators, and is to make advances at eight per cent. The interest charged present in Greece is, we believe, about two or three per cent. monthly.

The Emperor Nicholas and the King of Prussia met at Sigmund on the 31st August, and were soon after joined by the Austrian Archdukes Francis and John, Prince Frederick of the Netherlands, and several German princes. On the 5th September, the royal and imperial party accompanied the King of Prussia to the camp at Spandorf, whence, after reviewing the troops, they were proceeded by the way of Breslaw to Kalisch. The Emperor and Empress of Austria arrived at Suchenthal on September 2, on their way to Kalisch. On reaching the Bohemian frontier, they were received with great pomp by the authorities, and it appears also with enthusiastic rejoicings on the part of the people. Much is said in the German papers of a house which the Emperor of Russia has ordered to be prepared at Kalisch for the reception of his father-in-law. The arrangements of the apartments and the furniture are, it seems, precisely the same as in the palace at Berlin. The servants who usually attend on the king have been brought to Kalisch, and he will even find at the gate the porter by whom he was usually received on alighting at his palace in Berlin. Englishmen are generally refused permission to visit the camp, but an exception has been made in favour of the Duke of Gordon.

It appears from the speech of the Marquis of Sligo to the Jamaica House of Assembly, that the crop of this year, though defective to the amount of one-sixteenth, has been all cut down, the apprentices almost without exception working for wages without demur.

A private of the 84th regiment, named Pilkington, has been shot at Jamaica, by sentence of a court-martial, for stabbing a corporal in the execution of his duty.

A large tract in North America, extending between sea and sea in the parallel of North Carolina, and involving that province, has just been discovered to possess great abundance of gold. The precious metal is generally found in a matrix of quartz, and in veins, often running in the direction of N.E. and S.W. there being generally one leading vein, and on each side a parallel satellite. In some cases, rich branches pass off at right angles; or, in others the ore is ramified in every way. It is sometimes enveloped in a rake of talcose slate, passing through the auriferous quartz; in other instances, disseminated in minute particles through oxide of iron; and contrary to what might have been supposed, judging from the effect of other metals, the sulphuret of iron, or martial pyrites, usually indicates a rich locality. The proportions of the precious metal to the quartzose, or other matrix, are amazingly great, the minimum yield of the ore affording a large profit upon the capital invested; while some of the richer sorts gave almost incredible results.

Mr Tinker, one of the American missionaries, has established a newspaper at Honolulu, on the island of Oahu, in the Sandwich group; a town of 7000 inhabitants, and where three presses are now established.

Letters from Lombardy say that the approach of the cholera is already indicated at Milan, as it was at Genoa, by numerous cases of apoplexy; which, from observations made in other countries, are considered as precursors of the disorder. Extreme alarm prevails throughout Italy at the prospect of cholera.

PARLIAMENT.

1. MUNICIPAL REFORM BILL.

Aug. 25. This bill was recommitted in the Upper House. Among other alterations effected in it by the majority were the following:—That persons possessing L.1000 of real or personal property in towns divided into four or more wards, and L.500 in those divided into fewer than four wards, be eligible as councillors; that town-clerks hold their offices during life; and that councillors belonging to the established church should alone be entitled to vote in questions touching ecclesiastical patronage.—27. On the report of the bill being brought up, Lord MELBOURNE expressed the strongest disapprobation of the alterations, though he thought it necessary that the bill should go back in its present state to the House of Commons. After a long debate, his lordship moved the erasure of the passage constituting life-aldermen, but it was retained by a majority of 160 to 89.—28. On Lord MELBOURNE moving the third reading of the bill, the Earl of WINCHELSEA moved an amendment that it be read that day six months. On a division, the original motion was carried by 69 to 5; the ministers and their friends declining to vote.—On the same evening the bill was taken down to the House of Commons, where Mr SPRING RICE moved that it might be printed in its altered form, and taken into consideration on the 31st. He deprecated discussion on the present occasion, as tending to impede the fair, calm, and deliberate, but resolute—(great cheering)—decision upon the subject.—Mr HUME protested against being supposed in the least inclined to receive the bill as altered; and Mr O'CONNELL said that "the period was now come, in which public opinion could not be trifled with—(loud cheers)—in which the wants of this great country could not be looked at slightly—and in which, if great organic questions, affecting the constitution of the country, came to be considered, the blame would fall on those who had given rise to such a convulsive discussion, if he might use the expression, and not on those who had endeavoured peaceably to ameliorate its institutions."—31. [On this day, a meeting of the members of the House of Commons friendly to the ministers, took place at the Foreign Office, when it was agreed to receive the bill with a portion of the alterations made by the Lords. Consequently, at the house, that night] Lord J. RUSSELL made the following proposals respecting the bill:—I. To agree that freemen should retain their right of voting for members of Parliament; that the numbers of the councillors be apportioned to the different wards in conformity with Lord Ellenborough's clause; and that the licensing of alehouses remain with the justices, instead of being transferred to the councils. II. To retain the exclusive privileges of the freemen, except their exemption from toll; instead of a third of the town-council being composed of aldermen for life, nominated by the existing aldermen from among the members of their own body, to enact that the councillors should elect from among themselves a third of their number for six years, one half to go out at the end of every three years; instead of dividing boroughs of 6000 inhabitants into wards, to have no ward-divisions in cases where the population was less than 9000 (the difference between the Lords and Commons being thus divided); the business of dividing the boroughs, which the Lords had transferred from the King's Commissioners to the Revising Barristers, to be still liable to the revision of the Privy Council; instead of Lord Devon's amendment, which required persons of L.1000 property in the first, and L.500 in the second class of towns, to be eligible as councillors, to enact that either this qualification or the being rated at L.30 or L.15 respectively, should be sufficient; instead of excluding dissenting members of council from the right of voting in matters concerning church patronage, to enact that the church patronages possessed by the councils should be sold. III. To reject all the other alterations made by the Lords, including the retention of aldermen, life town-clerks, and justices. The noble lord concluded his speech by saying that, though this attempt at a convention with the House of Lords should prove unsuccessful, it would never be matter of regret to him that he had done his best for reform and social improvement in a spirit of conciliation, and with a deference to the forms of the constitution.—Sir R. PEEL expressed a general approbation of the bill as it would now stand, being decidedly opposed to some of the Peers' amendments.—Messrs HUME, O'CONNELL, and the ultra-liberal members in general, excepting Mr ROEBUCK, professed, though with much reluctance, a readiness to sanction the modified bill. The house then went into committee on the various clauses in succession, and agreed to a considerable number of them without any material opposition. The business of the committee occupied the two ensuing evenings (Sept. 1 and 2).—On the 3d, Lord JOHN RUSSELL brought up the report, and moved that a conference with the House of Lords should be desired, which being agreed to, and a similar proposal agreed to in the House of Lords, the conference took place accordingly.—4. The re-amended bill was taken into consideration by the House of Lords, who, by 144 to 82, struck out the clause replacing the power of nominating justices with the councils, enacted by 79 to 33 that Barnstaple should be divided into wards, and struck Alnwick and Yeovil out of the list of towns affected by the bill. A strong disposition was shown by the house to retain the life town-clerks; but ultimately this was got over, on an understanding that these officials should receive compensation for being displaced.—7. [After another private meeting of the friends of ministers in the early part of the day] Lord JOHN RUSSELL proposed to the House of Commons, that, notwithstanding the unexpected renewal by the Lords of some of their most objectionable amendments, the bill should now be received, and passed, though not as a final measure; its amount of good being, he said, too great to be rejected, while the subject being thus so far put out of the way would allow of other measures being more promptly entered upon next session. The ultra-liberal members having expressed an unwilling assent to this proposal, the bill was passed by the House of Commons.—9. It was taken back to the Lords, and there received the royal assent.

2. IRISH CHURCH REFORM.

Aug. 24. The House of Lords went into committee on this bill. Clauses 10 to 21 inclusive were omitted. On clause 40, which enacted that tithe compositions should be increased or diminished according to the price of corn during the last seven years, the house decided that it be omitted, by 126 to 35; majority against ministers, 97. Clauses 61 to 87 inclusive, which embraced the appropriation principle, were, upon the motion of the Earl of Haddington, struck out, notwithstanding a declaration by Lord Melbourne, that, in the event of their doing so, he would consider the bill as lost, and proceed no further with it; the division on this amendment gave 138 to 41.—Sept. 3. A conversation took place in the House of Lords in reference to this bill, which the ministers, it appears, had abandoned. Lord Lyndhurst, the Duke of Wellington, and other Opposition peers, arraigned Lord Melbourne and his colleagues for not proceeding with the part of the bill which the Lords had sanctioned, and thereby pacifying Ireland.—Lord MELBOURNE re-asserted, that, without the appropriation clause, the bill would entirely fail in its object; and Lord HATHERTON prognosticated that the bill of the ensuing session would come before their lordships with still more unpalatable conditions.

3. SCOTTISH CHURCH COMMISSION.

Aug. 28. The Earl of Aberdeen called the attention of the Lords to the Scottish church commission, the composition of which had, he maintained, given universal dissatisfaction, on account of the unfriendly sentiments entertained by some of the members of it to the established church. He particularly complained of Mr Dick being on the commission, and read a passage from his work on the subject of religious establishments. The powers entrusted to the commission were perfectly illegal. He denied that the king had any authority over the Scottish church. He was not even a visitor; and it was not competent for him to issue a commission with such powers as were conferred on this. If matters had gone too far to allow the commission to be withdrawn, he hoped that, at least, Lord Melbourne would improve its composition.—Lord Melbourne defended the commission, and the impartiality with which the members of it had been selected, of which the alleged universal dissatisfaction might be taken as some proof. He had read Mr Dick's book, which seemed to be a very cautious and temperate production; and the author of it, he should think, must be a very proper person to conduct the inquiry into the funds of the church. He altogether repudiated Lord Aberdeen's doctrine, that the state had no control over the established church of Scotland. He would ask Lord Aberdeen, if he seriously meant to say, that, if there was an allegation made of any abuse in any of the vital and fundamental principles of the church of Scotland, that it would be beyond the powers of the King or of Parliament to issue a commission to inquire into such an allegation. That was a reductio ad absurdum. It was holding out higher pretensions for the church of Scotland than was ever attempted by the Roman Catholic church in her proudest days. It was precisely the objection which the Roman Catholic church brought against the Reformation; for the Roman Catholic church then said, the laity cannot reform the church, but the church must reform itself. (Cheers.) It was precisely the doctrine of the church of Rome in regard to the Reformation; it was no other, and no less. He considered that such a proposition was not only against law, but against reason and common sense. The same might be said with regard to the property of the Scotch church. ("No, no!" from the Earl of Aberdeen.) Well, the subject was a good deal mixed up with Scotch law, and he did not exactly follow the statement of the noble earl; but at all events he understood that the property of the Scotch church was as liable to inquiry as any other property.—Lord Hadington and the Duke of Buccleuch spoke against the commission, which was defended by Lord Minto and the Marquis of Breadalbane. Lord Aberdeen said a few words in reply, and the discussion was closed.

4. THE PROROGATION.

Sept. 10. The business of the session having been concluded, the King proceeded in state to prorogue the Parliament. The following was the speech delivered by his Majesty on the occasion:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen—I find with great satisfaction that the state of public business enables me to relieve you from further attendance, and from the pressure of those duties which you have performed with so much zeal and assiduity.

"I receive from all foreign powers satisfactory assurances of their desire to maintain with me the most friendly understanding; and I look forward with confidence to the preservation of the general peace, which has been, and will be, the object of my constant solicitude.

"I lament that the civil contest in the northern provinces of Spain has not yet been brought to a termination; but, taking a deep interest in the welfare of the Spanish monarchy, I shall continue to direct to that quarter my most anxious attention, in concert with the three powers with whom I concluded the treaty of quadruple alliance; and I have, in furtherance of the objects of that treaty, exercised the power vested in me by the legislature, and have granted permission to my subjects to engage in the service of the Queen of Spain.

"I have concluded with Denmark, Sardinia, and Sweden, fresh conventions, calculated to prevent the traffic in African slaves. I hope soon to receive the ratification of a similar treaty, which has been signed with Spain.

"I am engaged in negotiations with other powers in Europe and in South America for the same purpose; and I trust that ere long the united efforts of all civilised nations will suppress and extinguish this traffic.

"I perceive, with entire approbation, that you have directed your attention to the regulation of municipal corporations in England and Wales; and I have cheerfully given my assent to the bill which you have passed for that purpose. I cordially concur in this important measure, which is calculated to allay discontent, to promote peace and union, and to procure for those communities the advantages of responsible government.

"I greatly rejoice that the internal condition of Ireland has been such as to have permitted you to substitute for the necessary severity of a law which has been suffered to expire, enactments of a milder character. No part of my duty is more grateful to my feelings than the mitigation of a penal statute, in any case in which it can be effected consistently with the maintenance of order and tranquillity.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons—I thank you for the readiness with which you have voted the supplies. You have provided not only for the expenses of the year, and for the interest upon the large sum awarded to the owners of slaves in my colonial possessions, but also for several unexpected and peculiar claims upon the justice and liberality of the nation.

"It is most gratifying to observe, that not only have these demands been met without additional taxation, but that you have made some further progress in reducing the burdens of my people.

"I am enabled to congratulate you, that the terms upon which the loan for the compensation to the proprietors of slaves has been obtained, afford conclusive evidence of the flourishing state of public credit, and of that general confidence which is the result of a determination to fulfil the national engagements and to maintain inviolable the public faith.

"My Lords and Gentlemen—I know that I may securely rely upon your loyalty and patriotism; and I feel confident that in returning to your respective counties, and in resuming those functions which you discharge with so much advantage to the community, you will recommend to all classes of your countrymen obedience to the law, attachment to the constitution, and a spirit of temperate amendment, which, under Divine Providence, are the surest means of preserving the tranquillity and increasing the prosperity which this country enjoys."

5. BILLS DELAYED AND THROWN OUT.

The Lords have agreed (the dates are immaterial) to delay till next session the bill for giving prisoners the benefit of counsel, and the bill for abolishing imprisonment for debt; and have thrown out the bill for the reorganisation of the Irish police (by 51 to 31), the bill for improving the mode of registering voters in Ireland, the Dublin police bill, the music and dancing bill, and the witnesses bribery indemnity bill. [The reason assigned for throwing out the bills respecting the Irish police and the mode of registering voters in Ireland, was, that they tended to increase the power of Mr O'Connell in Ireland. The Irish police bill was also objectionable from its containing a clause to exclude from that body all members of secret societies—that is to say, Orangemen.]

The appropriation act, necessary for finally sanctioning the application of the public money as previously voted by the House of Commons, and upon a rejection of which some members of the house calculated as a means of stopping the supplies, was passed (Sept. 3), the house having found that the supplies could not be stopped by any such means.

ENGLAND.

POLITICS OF THE MONTH.

PUBLIC attention has been chiefly occupied during the past month with the legislative proceedings of the House of Lords. Contrary to expectation, the House of Commons, in compliance with the request of ministers, agreed to take back the municipal bill with some of the most important alterations made in it by the Lords. The reforming party has, nevertheless, expressed the strongest disapprobation of the conduct of the Upper House, both in reference to this bill and to several others, which the Lords have either delayed or thrown out; and as we are now seldom without some great cry or watchword, the present seems to be, "What is the use of the House of Lords?" In correspondence, apparently, with sentiments prevailing out of doors, several of the ultra-liberal members of the Lower House have given notice of motions for next session, to the following effect:—Mr Roebuck, for leave to bring in a bill to take away the veto now possessed by the Lords, substituting a suspensive power, "so that, if bills which have been passed by the House of Commons be rejected by the House of Lords, and again during the same session be passed by the Commons, such bills shall become law, on the royal assent being thereunto given;"—Mr Hume, for a committee to inquire into the numbers, qualifications, and privileges of the Peers, into the constitution of the House of Peers, and the manner in which it fulfils the functions of a legislative body;—Mr Rippon, for leave to bring in a bill to exclude the Bishops from the House of Peers. Mr O'Connell has also made this the principal subject of agitation in his tour through the provinces.

It is not now anticipated that there will either be a change of ministry or a dissolution of Parliament during the ensuing winter. The Conservative party, it is said, does not feel itself to have improved so much in strength during the past season, as to afford a fair hope of forming a more powerful or permanent administration than that of Sir R. Peel. On the other hand, though anxious for a greater strength in the House of Commons, which they are assured a dissolution would give, the ministers feel the impropriety of again so soon taxing their friends with the exertions and expenses of a general election. It is also said that an exalted personage has become convinced of the impossibility of resisting the impulse of the nation towards a general revision of the existing institutions, and is now reconciled to the services of a reforming administration. "It is creditable," says the Morning Chronicle, "to the good sense and constitutional feeling of the illustrious personage to whom we thus respectfully allude, that he has calmly weighed and frankly admitted the influence which the declared wishes of his people ought to exercise upon his mind, in this respect. The strenuous—the incessant—the almost overwhelming efforts made to urge the illustrious personage in question into a very different course of thought and action, have completely failed in their object; and the intercourse between the sovereign and his ministers may now be considered as established upon a footing, not only constitutional in every point of view, but as gracious and as kindly as ever it was during the time when Lord Grey was at the head of the government. We sincerely congratulate the country upon this event. We look upon it as the harbinger of that repose of which the United Kingdom, after its many severe struggles, stands so much in need."

DINNER TO SIR ROBERT PEEL.

A DINNER was given (Sept. 3) to Sir Robert Peel at Tamworth, by about two hundred gentlemen of the town and neighbourhood. Sir Robert delivered a long speech, in defence of his conduct as Premier, and of his more recent proceedings in Parliament. He said that his expectation of carrying on the government had been thwarted by the unexpected coalition of parties whom he supposed to be irreconcilable. Had he been allowed, it was his intention to propose extensive measures of reform, "not merely for the sake of conciliating popular opinion, but in order to adjust measures that had been left by former governments in such a state, that their final settlement was absolutely necessary." He believed he would thus have satisfied all except those who prefer grievance to redress. Without any wish to depreciate the Irish or Scottish representatives, he should always esteem it as a matter of pride that he had a majority of English members on his side. He deprecated the reform with which the House of Lords was threatened as most unconstitutional and dangerous. Any attempt to legislate by one body would end in the establishment of military tyranny, as it had done in France. He had been told that the democratic principle was successful in America; but the recent proceedings there showed something very different. Even the recent revolution in France had ended very differently from what had been expected, though he did not blame Louis Philip for the measures he had been obliged to take. He trusted that the people of this country, in seeking for further advances, would take care not to peril those which they already enjoyed.

ORANGE SOCIETIES.

THE extensive organisation of these secret and therefore illegal societies has continued during the past month to excite much attention. Early in September, the committee made its report to the House of Commons, and this document, notwithstanding the disappearance of Colonel Fairman with the most important papers, presents matter to prove, in its own language, the existence of an organised institution pervading Great Britain and her colonies to an extent never contemplated as possible, "and which is declared by the committee to be highly injurious to the discipline of his Majesty's army, and dangerous to the peace of his Majesty's subjects." The numbers in Ireland are believed to exceed 200,000. The Duke of Cumberland is Grand Master, Lord Kenyon Deputy Grand Master, the Bishop of Salisbury Grand Chaplain, and "the clergy of the church of England have engaged to a considerable extent in the affairs of the institution." The lodges are always opened with prayer. Since 1821, when the act against secret oaths was passed, members have been admitted with a religious ceremony calculated to have the same solemn and binding effect on persons of pious feelings. The powers of the Grand Master are "discretionary, illimitable, and absolute." The influence of the dignitaries has been used to obtain places of various kinds—in the police, in the dock-yards, pension in the artillery, and public-house licences, for the poorer members of their fraternity. Votes of thanks have been passed to the Tory press; Liberal electors have been expelled from the body on account of their politics; large bodies of armed Orangemen have interfered at elections; and they have been mustered in vast numbers in Ireland to pass Tory addresses and resolutions. In a letter dated August 1832, Colonel Fairman states to the Duke of Gordon, Grand Master for Scotland, that he thinks "we inculcate the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance too religiously by far." In another letter in the ensuing year, he hopes they will speedily have "such a moral and physical force as will strike with terror and dismay the foes of our country." The lodges are in all four hundred and seventy-four, whereof thirty-two have been instituted by English warrants in regiments, besides others instituted by the Dublin Grand Lodge. The colonies, particularly New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, are deeply imbued with Orangeism, as also the military stations at Gibraltar, Corfu, and Malta.

A letter from Corporal M'Kee, of the 17th regiment, quartered at Sydney, is given by the committee, and particular notice called to it. It is a report to some dignitary in England of the flourishing state of a lodge in the writer's regiment, which he says is increasing rapidly, "and contains, at present, seventy-three regular, good members." But the important passage is that which follows: "I was ordered, previous to embarkation, if I had, or held a warrant of the Orange system, to send it back to the Grand Lodge, which I did not think proper to do. This I must own was direct disobedience of orders to my commanding officer; but I wrote to Mr Chetwoode Eustace, the Deputy Grand Secretary, and he informed me not to do in the least afraid, for no harm would be done me." It appears that Colonel Fairman was lately deputed to propagate the system in Scotland, and a Mr Nucella in the colonies. The committee call particular attention to the fact that the latter gentleman "was sent under a foreign warrant of the Duke of Cumberland, Imperial Grand Master, to Malta and other places, and that warrant could not have been signed blank. He reports to the Deputy Grand Secretary his progress, and the state of Orange Lodges in the regiments from time to time—his letters are read in the Grand Lodge—notice of them taken in the printed reports—and, finally, he received from the Deputy Grand Secretary a letter of thanks from the Imperial Grand Master."

That the extension of lodges into the army was likely to become known to all classes of the superior office-bearers, is attested by the 41st rule of the institution, granting an exception from the usual fee to soldiers and sailors. In reference to the Duke of Cumberland's assertion that it was in contravention of his declared determination that warrants were granted for military lodges, the committee observe: "It would have been very easy for his royal highness to have published the document by which, and the time and place where, he issued any order, or made any declaration, against Orange Lodges in the army, instead of a general disclaimer; as no such declaration, verbal or written, has come to the knowledge of your committee in a manner to be relied upon; whilst, on the contrary, the numerous facts stated in this Report and in the Appendix, and taken from official records of proceedings of the Grand Lodges, during the time the duke was present and conducting these proceedings, are in direct opposition to such declaration."

The Duke of Cumberland was invited by the committee to give evidence, but declined. Lord Kenyon was examined, and reluctantly owned that he knew of the corruption which had been going on in the army. An official proclamation was consequently published, August 24, by the duke and his lordship, withdrawing all warrants from the army, and attributing their having been given to "indiscretion and negligence" on the part of Kenyon and other officers. On the 31st August, the commander-in-chief issued a general order, threatening with trial before a court-martial every officer and soldier who shall be connected with Orange Lodges. Next day, September 1, at a meeting of the Grand Orange Lodge, in the house of Lord Kenyon, Portman Square, the Duke of Cumberland repeated his declaration of utter ignorance as to the existence of the military lodges, though he still thought they could do no harm. On the motion of Lord Wynford, a series of resolutions approving of his conduct was passed. [His royal highness immediately after left the country, for Berlin.]

MR O'CONNELL'S LETTER TO THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

THE Duke of Wellington having taunted ministers with the support of Mr O'Connell as one who had been convicted of a misdemeanour and afterwards been promoted by the government; and having described that gentleman as one who possessed greater power than any man since the Revolution; Mr O'C. addressed a letter to his grace, dated from London, September 8; denying that he had ever been convicted of a misdemeanour—stating at the honour of the silk gown which he obtained from Lord Grey's government had long been due to him on account of his standing at the bar—and tracing the influence which he possessed to the misgovernment of Ireland the Duke of Wellington and his party. "You and on like you," says the learned gentleman, "have always governed Ireland in a sinister spirit. You have encouraged a party, and discouraged the people. This has been the course of British government for six hundred years. * * It is the insulting misgovernment—the audacious preference of the blood-stained Orange to the Catholic population of Ireland—it is the partial administration of justice by partisan magistrates, petty sheriffs, prejudiced judges, and bigoted, factious juries—it is the establishment and insolent triumph of a secular church—it is the exaction of tithes from an impoverished people, to support clergymen whom they never see, and whose spiritual assistance they are far from requiring—it is the still more insulting insolence towards the clergy who serve the people, and who are persecuted and vilified under your auspices; these, and one thousand other crimes committed towards Ireland, and the myriads of additional evils which they generate, are the originating causes of the popularity and influence which you attribute to me, and which I believe enjoy. Allow me to add, that the Irish nation know to be sincere and honest. They confide in my moral integrity and indefatigable perseverance. They know I never will cease to agitate whilst one grievance remains redressed. They are certain that my untiring energies are devoted to the good of my native land. * * The question remains, how is the influence, or—if you please call it so—the power I possess to be terminated? * * DOING JUSTICE TO IRELAND.—Do what you please, to the complexion you must come.—There is no other method of obviating irregular influence and power—JUSTICE TO IRELAND—FULL, COMPLETE JUSTICE TO IRELAND. You try any other method you please, but you will not, I cannot succeed. We fear not your swaggering words; we care not for your exaggerated report of the number of Orangemen; they are not altogether one hundred thousand, including the over old and over young, the halt, the blind, the lame. Suppose them, however, a hundred thousand fighting men: there are six million five hundred thousand Catholics; there could be, if absolutely necessary there would be, one million fighting men in the field—ay, in the field: men—a legion of men—who would be delighted to get 'leave to die.' But this is a subject I hate to dwell on; I mention it only to show how futile and foolish any reliance on the physical force of the Orangemen must be, now more especially that the conspiracy—the treasonable conspiracy amongst so many of the underlings of that body, to support the succession, and to supersede the Princess Victoria—has, in despite of the concealment of the official dial, exploded; and that the most noble Grand him has borne his blushing honours and gray whiskers the meeting of crowned despots at Kalisch." The Duke then adverts to the lost Irish church reform and threatens one less palatable next year. He then gives a satirical enumeration of those lords, who, he says, have visited him with personal abuse. An enumeration of the arts by which the House of Lords have recently added to his power, follows:—"1st, You have vilified the Irish church reform bill, and wisely indicated that the Irish Protestant establishment should be set up to the most superfluous extent of inutilty. 2d, I have rejected the Irish constabulary bill, which would have effectually converted the Irish police from a man into a protective force, diminished its expense and increased its efficiency; and this you did on the very worst principles of partisanship, that is, because the bill contained an oath prohibitory of Orange or other illegal societies. For this most insufficient reason, Ireland is deprived of an economic and most useful measure. 3d, You threw out the Irish marriage bill, and left the guilty parent to revel in his iniquity with impunity, whilst you inflict all the punishment upon the innocent and defenceless children. Oh! what heads and hearts there are amongst you Tories, lay and episcopal! 4th, You rejected the city of Dublin police bill, and left that city to the protection of a most inefficient and expensive police; the expenditure over £48,000 a-year, the utility below zero: and this was done lest the bigoted and beggarly corporation of Dublin should have any of its blushing honours tarnished. 5th, You effectually cushioned the Irish corporation reform bill, and left the hornets to enjoy, for one year more, the plunder and the venom of their own corruptions. You have given them another year of impunity and speculation, although you are aware that there are but 13,000 corporators of all sorts and sizes to manage the municipal affairs of cities and towns comprising more than 900,000 inhabitants. Lastly, You have rejected the Irish registry of voters bill, one of the wisest, the most impartial, the most useful measures to the purposes of economy and justice, that ever was brought into Parliament. It is quite true that if that bill passed into law, no more seats in the House of Commons would be disposed of by the oaths of Tory committees—to you a deplorable consequence."

TOUR OF MR O'CONNELL.

BODIES of reformers in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and finally in Manchester, having invited Mr O'Connell to public festivals, in testimony of their admiration of his public conduct, he left London as soon as the business of the concluding session would allow, and entered the town last mentioned on Thursday, the 10th of September. Attended in his carriage by his son Morgan, Mr T. Potter, Mr C. J. S. Walker, and the Rev. D. Hearne, he made his way with great difficulty through crowds of acclaiming spectators to a hustings in Stevenson Square, where he addressed the multitude in a long speech. He announced that what he now most immediately intended was to direct public attention to the House of Lords, which, in contradiction of what Sir R. Peel had stated at Tamworth, he said he only wished to be reformed by making it in some way elective and responsible. Sir R. Peel had talked, he said, of the late outrages in America: had he forgot the slaughters of Manchester, of Wallscourt, and Rathcormac, where the emissaries of government, and, in one case, a clergyman, had massacred the people? In the reforms yet to be effected, he earnestly hoped that the people would avoid violence, as it was both wrong in itself, and strengthened the hands of the enemies of reform. No revolution had ever been achieved by blood which did not make the country infinitely worse than before. Violence would be productive of most evil to the working classes: what would be, to them, the result of a stoppage of payments in Manchester for ten days!

In the evening, he was entertained at dinner by 250 gentlemen, Mr Walker in the chair. In replying to the toast of his health, he professed himself assured that the Lords would make a worse bargain for the Irish clergy next year. The present ministry would remain in power, and afford justice to the dissenters. Ireland, with every natural advantage, had been blighted by the English power; but let this be thoroughly understood by Englishmen, and oppression would be at an end. He concluded by calling on all present to aid in bringing about a reform in the Upper House of Parliament.

On Monday the 14th, Mr O'Connell entered Newcastle, and, according to appointment, addressed the people from a platform in St Nicholas's Square, where various addresses were presented to him. In the afternoon, 340 gentlemen, presided over by John Fife, Esq. entertained him at the Music Hall, Blackett Street. In his speech on this occasion, he again alluded to the irresponsible power of the Lords, and to the speech of Sir R. Peel at Tamworth. Sir R. Peel said that he did not expect to see an union between the Whigs and the Irish members. If they had not coalesced with Melbourne, they would have had to submit to Peel: the choice their heads dictated was now confirmed by their hearts, for, since the Melbourne administration came into power, every thing that could tend to promote the welfare of Ireland, to relieve her distresses, to soothe her sufferings, and to mitigate her oppression, had been done freely and actively.

At Berwick, where Mr O'Connell spent the night of the 15th, he next day received an address from the inhabitants. On Thursday the 17th, he advanced from Haddington to Edinburgh, which he entered about one o'clock, preceded by a long range of the trades, with their banners and insignia. Along the whole line of street from Newington to the Calton Hill, a vast multitude had assembled to see a man who, by peculiar talents and still more peculiar circumstances, had attained so much historical importance. A hustings having been erected on the Calton Hill, a little to the north of the unfinished National Monument, Mr O'Connell proceeded thither from the Waterloo Hotel on foot, and there received an address from the trades. He replied to this in a speech which took upwards of an hour in the delivery. As a proof of the resolution of the people of Scotland to keep out the Tories, he accepted the manner in which they had that day received himself—"An humble and personally insignificant individual, with an accent which must grate upon your ears, and a Popish creed which you have been taught to hate: yet here," said he, "have I been received with an enthusiasm which I have never seen exceeded even in the green valleys of my own lovely land." He was sensible, however, that it was for his cause, and not for himself, that he had been thus received: the people were only now testifying their sympathy with his exertions for religious freedom. He had not struggled for sectarian triumph, but for the sacred principle of religious freedom to all. The Roman Catholics had first struggled for the emancipation of the Protestant dissenters. "I have long been of opinion that man cannot have too much or enough of religion between himself and his God. It is a question of awful concern, not limited by time or space, but involving an eternity of weal or woe. I have long been impressed with this feeling, and I respect those who feel with the same intensity, leaving the question between themselves and God as to who is in error. With these sentiments overpowering me, I insist that human law shall be confined to human action, and I call that man a blasphemer who interferes between the created and the Creator, whose name be blessed for ever. (Immense cheering.)" He then advocated his views in favour of universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and triennial parliaments. The conclusion of his speech was in the following terms:—"From you my thoughts wander to the oppressed land of my birth. I remember her romantic valleys and her splendid hills; the ever green verdure of her plains; the sound of her mountain streams falls on my ear; the rush of her waves against the cliffs, announcing with the voice of eternity that that nation is not to be enslaved nor degraded. My country will hear with delight the manner in which I have been received in England and in Edinburgh. (Cheers.) That shout shall reach from one end of Ireland to the other; and many a true-hearted Irishman will feel his heart animated and uplifted within him, when he hears how Scotland has received the humble individual now before you. Many an Irish mother, while she hugs her babe to her breast, and sings it to repose with an Irish air, will mix the noble strain with 'Auld Langsyne' or 'Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled'; and as the accents lull her babe to sleep, will raise a prayer to God to bless the generous people who stood by Ould Ireland in her days of need."

In the evening, fifteen hundred and forty gentlemen entertained Mr O'Connell in the large room at the Portable Gas-work, Canonmills; James Aytton, Esq. advocate, in the chair. Among the gentlemen present were Dr Bowring, M.P.; Mr Ruthven, M.P. for Dublin; Mr Gillon of Wallhouse, M.P.; several of the town-councillors, and a number of dissenting presbyterian clergymen. This festival was remarked to be conducted with more propriety than the Earl Grey festival of 1834, and at the conclusion there was not one intoxicated or disorderly person. Mr O'Connell's speech on this occasion received unqualified praise in the liberal newspapers. He repeated what he had formerly said oftener than once respecting the House of Lords, and enumerated all the reforming bills of the session which they had thrown out or delayed. He also once more assailed Sir Robert Peel for his Tamworth speech, remarking with particular bitterness on the praise given by that statesman to Louis Philip, in reference to his recent unpopular proceedings. In conclusion, he expressed the gratification he felt in having ascertained the friendly sympathy entertained by the Scottish people for Ireland.

On the 19th, the Society of United Irishmen presented Mr O'Connell with a silver cup; and at two o'clock, the trades' delegates entertained him at what was, somewhat ludicrously, called a soirée.

On Monday the 21st, Mr O'Connell proceeded to Glasgow by Falkirk, at which town he breakfasted, and received a congratulatory address. Owing to the delay thus unexpectedly occasioned, he did not arrive in Glasgow till four o'clock P.M., fully two hours later than the time appointed for his entry. Accompanied by a procession of the trades, he proceeded to the Green, where he was surrounded by a multitude, variously calculated at from 50,000 to 200,000. Having mounted the hustings, he received a general address of the trades, couched in an ultra-liberal strain, and to which he replied in a speech, containing the same severe animadversions upon the House of Lords which he had uttered at Manchester and Edinburgh. In the evening, he was entertained at a soirée in the Bazaar, by the trades, 2000 persons being present.

Next day, Sept. 22, Mr O'Connell attended the dinner to which he had been invited, in the Town Hall. Owing to the smallness of the room, which was the largest that could be got, the company numbered only 270, among whom were Captain Spiers, M.P. for Paisley, in the chair, Mr Graham of Whitehill, Bailie Fleming, Professor Mylne, Mr Dundas Spiers, Sir John Maxwell, Mr Charles Tenant, Councillor Ure, Mr Wallace of Kelly, Dr Bowring, M.P., Mr Ruthven, M.P., and the Rev. Mr Brewster, one of the established clergymen of Paisley. The only remarkable feature in Mr O'Connell's speech was his assailing the House of Lords in a strain of much more poignant and comic sarcasm than on any former occasion.

On Wednesday, the 23d, Mr O'Connell obeyed an invitation to Paisley, where the Reformers met in the Old Low Church, with the Provost (Hardie) in the chair, and presented to him a very flattering address, to which he made a suitable reply. Mr O'Connell received an invitation to a public banquet at Belfast, and to another at Carlisle, but declined attending either.

[Mr O'Connell's tour in Scotland is remarkable as proving the great influence which politics and other causes have had, during late years, in altering the public feeling respecting the professors of opposite creeds. In the year 1779, when the government proposed to repeal the penal statutes against the Scottish Catholics, the popular spirit was so decidedly opposed to the measure, that there was hardly a public body or a cluster of population in the whole country, which did not petition against it, while both in Edinburgh and Glasgow chapels and houses belonging to professors of the creed of Rome were destroyed by the populace. On the present occasion, a large portion of the middle classes, and nearly the whole of the lower, have manifested, by their warm, it may almost be said enthusiastic reception of Mr O'Connell, that they have ceased to regard Catholicism and its adherents with the abhorrence of their fathers. The ancient spirit appears, however, to be still entertained in some degree by a portion of the community, including the established clergy and their most zealous supporters in the rural districts; as is denoted by a resolution in the presbyteries of Kirkcudbright and Edinburgh (and which will probably be more extensively adopted) to celebrate the 4th of October by a thanksgiving for "the blessings of the reformation from Popery" (with a particular reference to the translation of the Bible into English, of which transaction that day is the third centennial anniversary), and by the leading Whigs having abstained from attending the dinners given to Mr O'Connell, acknowledgedly through a fear of thereby injuring their interest at the next county elections.]

Sept. 4. Mr Stanninought, who kept a library and newspaper office in the Edgeware Road, cut the throat of his son, a boy nine years old, and then endeavoured to put an end to his own life. He had for some time been in low spirits; but the proximate cause of the horrid deed is said to have been a visit which the unfortunate man paid the night before to the representation of Fieschi's Infernal Machine in Coventry Street. He was committed for trial. Mr Bales, an auctioneer in the same road, was so much excited by this tragical event, that he fancied he was always followed by the murderer. Sept. 7, he said to his wife, to whom he had only been married three weeks, "Helen, see how he glares at me!" and immediately dropped down dead.—The Birmingham Political Union was re-organised at a meeting in the Town Hall, when the former council was appointed. The tone of the speakers was favourable to ministers, but deeply minatory against the House of Lords.

—8. Captain Back, who was sent in search of Commander (now Sir John) Ross, arrived at Liverpool on his return from the expedition. It is announced that he reached the northern shore of America, and has ascertained the course of the Great Fish River.—This day took place the Great Doncaster St Leger Race. Eleven started, but only four were placed. Lord Oxford's Ascot came in fifth. Won by a length.—On this and the two following days, the York Musical Festival took place in presence of the Duchess of Kent, the Princess Victoria, and a great assemblage of the neighbouring nobility and gentry. The principal vocal performers were Grisi, Knyvett, Claude Novello, Kemble, Postans, and Masson, amongst the ladies; and Braham, Rubini, Lablache, Phillips, Machin, Hawkins, and Bennet, amongst the gentlemen. Mr F. Cramer led the morning performances in the Minster, and Mr Mori the evening at the Great Concert Room. Dr Camidge presided at the organ, and Knyvett conducted. The orchestra consisted of upwards of 600 performers, of whom about 400 were singers. The selection consisted of Handel's "Israel in Egypt" and "Messiah;" Haydn's "Creation;" Spohr's "Last Judgment;" a MS. Cantata or anthem by Neukomm, and other compositions by Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini, Pergolese, Himmel, Marcello, &c. for the morning performances; while Beethoven's and Mozart's sinfonias, Weber's and Mendelssohn's overtures, formed the attraction for those who delighted in combinations of modern orchestra.

—18. The new Board of Admiralty was gazetted, and consists of the following names:—The Right Hon. Gilbert Earl of Minto, G.C.B.; Rear-Admiral Sir Charles Adam, K.C.B.; Rear-Admiral Sir William Parker, K.C.B.; Captain the Hon. George Elliot, C.B.; Captain Sir Edward Thomas Troubridge, Bart.; and Archibald Primrose, Esq. (commonly called Lord Dalmeny).

Singular Occurrence.—About twelve years ago, a cottager who lives on Coningsby Moor, of the name of Anthony Cox, had a son named Abraham, who enlisted into the army and was sent to the Indies. For several years he kept up a correspondence with his friends, but after an absence of six or seven years he ceased to write, or, if he wrote, the letters never came to hand, and it was thought he was dead. About four years since, a man was committed to Spilsby House of Correction, and there being two persons from Coningsby in the prison at that time, they challenged him for the said Abraham Cox, and told him that if his parents were aware of his situation they would relieve him. He denied all knowledge of them, or of Anthony Cox; but they sent over to Coningsby, and the man was claimed as their son by both Anthony Cox and his wife. On his being released, they took him home, and clothed him; he has ever since lived with them as their son, and got married. About a month since, however, to the surprise of his father and mother, the real Abraham Cox came home; upon which their adopted son took himself off, leaving a wife and a family (who have no idea whence he came or what are his connections), and has not since been heard of.—Lincoln Mercury.

Consumption of Spirits.—A return, just published, gives the consumption of spirits in Britain and Ireland as follows:—

	1833. Gallons.	1834. Gallons.
Home-made spirits	21,874,000	23,397,000
Colonial do. (rum)	3,492,000	3,345,000
Foreign do.	1,387,000	1,420,000

The increase in the consumption of home spirits is chiefly in Ireland, and arises no doubt from the reduction made in the rate of duty a year ago, of 1s. per gallon. It is an instructive fact, that, notwithstanding this reduction, the produce of the duty was greater in 1834 than in 1833 by L.8000.

Communication with America.—The government has appointed Captain Evans, R.N., to commence forthwith a survey of the harbours on the western coast of Ireland, with a view to the selection of the most eligible site for a packet station to communicate with America. Captain Evans is to make his survey in the Trinity-house steam-frigate, which is daily expected at Kingstown. It is in contemplation to run a railway from Dublin to the harbour which may be chosen; and it is understood that some aid, in the way of grant or loan, will be made from the Treasury for that purpose.

The Empress of Russia has within these few weeks presented to Sir John Ross, through the Russian ambassador, a gold snuffbox set with diamonds, valued at a thousand guineas.

The George the Third, a convict-ship, Captain Moxay, was lost in April last, at the mouth of the Derwent, Hobart Town; one hundred and thirty-two persons perished, mostly convicts.

The plan which has lately been adopted by the metropolitan magistrates to prevent prisoners under sentence from holding conversation with each other, is likely to prove abortive, so far as communication is concerned. Papers have been circulated at one penny each, to instruct persons in the system of conversation by signs, as at the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb; and some of the more expert thieves have thoroughly learned it, and become schoolmasters to their brethren of the craft. As the restriction does not extend to prisoners committed for trial, an excellent opportunity is afforded of their becoming proficient in the art, so as to enable them to converse with each other when undergoing the punishment which awaits them on conviction; and they might thereby form the most diabolical plots without chance of detection. The system has begun to work already; for prisoners who never see each other except at chapel, embrace that opportunity of making their wishes and determinations known.—Evening Paper.

At the commencement of 1700, the population of London, within the walls, was calculated at 110,000, as deduced from the parish-registers; and the annual mortality was as one to twenty of that number. In 1750, the population had decreased to 87,000; and, fortunately for the health of the citizens, space continued to become more and more valuable for warehouses and counting-houses than for human habitations; so that the population of the city, within the walls, became 78,000 in the year 1801, and is now diminished to 55,778, the mortality being now less than one in forty.

The Gazette, Sept. 11, contains an order in council, by which the election of the town-councillors under the municipal bill is postponed from the 1st of November to the 26th of December next, and the first meeting of the councils from the 9th of November to the 1st of January. This delay has been rendered necessary by the length of time occupied in the discussion of the bill, and by the amendment of the Lords which transferred the division of boroughs into wards from the commissioners named by the Crown to the revising barristers, whose duties in the Parliamentary registration will be unusually onerous this year.

In consequence of the abandonment of the Irish church reform bill, an act was introduced by ministers, and passed, for the purpose of relieving them from the necessity under which they otherwise lay, of prosecuting the clergy for the sums advanced under the million loan act.

The third centenary jubilee of the reformation was celebrated at Geneva with much enthusiasm. The fete commenced on the 22d August, and lasted four days. Several members of foreign Protestant churches were present, and the whole passed off with general satisfaction.

MISCELLANEOUS.

HALLEY'S COMET.—We are indebted to the kindness of Professor Airey for the following interesting account of this remarkable body:—The time of perihelion passage calculated by M. de Pontecoulant is November 7; the observations of right ascension would correspond better with the time of perihelion passage November 10, and those of declination would be best represented by supposing the time of perihelion passage November 16. The latter determination is liable to a much smaller error than the former; and we may probably, with much confidence, fix on November 15 as the day when the comet will be nearest to the sun. On that supposition the comet will be nearest to the earth about October 11, and its distance will then be less than one-fourth of the sun's distance. For the first ten days of October, the comet will not set to this country; and on the 6th or 7th of October it will probably be seen within the square formed by the four principal stars of the Great Bear, or Charles's Wain. The yet imperfect observations make it impossible to predict its place at present with greater accuracy. It is remarkable that, from the accounts of all the observers, the comet at present exhibits no tail; in all its former appearances it is described as having a tail of considerable length. There is, however, reason to believe that all comets diminish in splendour on each successive appearance. The comet is only visible at present with a telescope of at least six inches aperture. The near agreement of the observed time of re-appearance with the predicted time (the error not exceeding nine days in seventy-five years), must be considered an astonishing proof of the accuracy which has been introduced into astronomical calculations. The neglect of the most trifling disturbing cause would have many times increased this error, as is evident from the circumstance that the periodic time of this comet has once been increased more than a year by the attractions of the planets. The nearness of the agreement also proves that there is no unknown planet of great bulk (as has sometimes been suspected) near which the comet has passed. The next inquiry among astronomers will be—what is the cause of the trifling disagreement which exists? It is probable that it is entirely due to small errors in the observations at former appearances.—Cambridge Chronicle.

APSLEY HOUSE BANQUETING ROOM.—The banquetting room of Apsley House, as it appeared at the last commemoration of the battle of Waterloo, is thus described in the letter of a private gentleman, quoted in the Cumberland Packet:—"Any thing more superb I never saw, nor could have formed any conception of. Fancy a room two hundred feet by eighty, lined throughout with yellow silk, and covered with pictures of the old masters; the cornices and ceiling profusely gilded, yet relieved by oblong plates of plain round glass; at either extremity an oaken sideboard with six silver gilt shields of immense magnitude, emblematical of the duke's conquests, and presented by the crowned heads of Europe. On the dining table, spread for seventy of his companions in arms, and his Majesty, stood two marble tripods for lights of about seven feet high, passing through the table, and supported by griffins elaborately carved in ormolu: three others of gold, though of smaller dimensions, but particularly magnificent (the gift of the citizens of London), representing in bold relief, and as large as life, a foot soldier (with his standard) of each company that signalled itself on the field. A solid gold vase, the tribute of the noblemen of England, beautifully portraying the guards forming a square. Between every second guest there was a wine-cooler of Dresden china, with an exquisite painting of some engagement, or some general officer that was in it; going through the entire series of his victories, and those who participated in them, in India, the Peninsula, and Waterloo. One of his servants stated that the plate was estimated at L.300,000, and he must have been tolerably correct, for the table on which it principally stood, was held up by thick wooden levers from head to foot. The earthenware, perhaps, struck me most, save that at the bottom of his staircase stood a gigantic figure of Napoleon, in Parian marble, under a dome of painted glass; but the whole view was so unique, so splendid, from the soup tureens and candelabras down to the salt-cellars (for these were supported by silver elephants), that I could scarcely believe but that it was the effect of enchantment by which I had been transported from this dingy metropolis into this fairy palace of Aladdin."

MR O'CONNELL'S IDEAS RESPECTING CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.—Civil liberty is nothing but justice reduced into action. It drives the unjust, the peculator, the underworked public officer, the partial judge, the squanderer of the public purse, from power, from station, from the opportunities of doing wrong. It gives to the people equal laws, good laws, cheap laws. It leaves to every honest man the full enjoyment of all his property not indispensably required to defray, in the most economic manner, the general government of all. It scruples to levy a tax almost as it would scruple a robbery; and it has its basis in the utmost possible extension of popular control over all public functionaries, with one only, and a safe exception. Religious liberty is, I own it, more dear to me still. Religion is the most important and awful concern of human existence; but its tenets are matters between man and his Creator. It is the great Creator who alone can see the hearts of men; and he alone can judge how far each of us is sufficiently sincere, and sufficiently cautious in the adoption and maintenance of his religious belief. Our fellow-men have nothing to do with it. The law of man is impious, I would say blasphemous, when it usurps the province of God, and in the pride of its usurpation dares to coerce conscience and attempt to compel belief. I feel that in vindicating freedom of conscience I vindicate our common Christianity from the foul stain of persecution.

STEAM-ENGINES IN FRANCE.—From an account of steam-engines in France, made up under the direction of the Administration des Mines to the end of 1833, it appears that there were 947 steam-engines, possessing together a force of 14,746 horse power—a single horse power being estimated at 75 kilogrammes, or 165lbs. avoirdupois, raised to the height of a metre, or nearly four feet, in a second. Of these engines, 759 were made in France, and 144 abroad, the place of manufacture of the remaining 46 not being ascertained.

MUSICAL TASTE.—A clever caricature has lately appeared representing a young lady (at her piano-forte) and her Cockney beau, between whom the following dialogue takes place:—Lady: Pray, Mr Jenkins, are you musical? Gentleman: Vy, no, Miss; I am not musical myself, but I have a very hexcellent snuffbox vot is.

AN INDIAN'S REPLY TO A CHALLENGE.—I have two objections to this duel affair; the one is, lest I should hurt you; and the other is, lest you should hurt me. I do not see any good it would do me to put a bullet through any part (though even the least dangerous part) of your body. I could not make use of you when dead for any ordinary purpose; but I could of a rabbit or a turkey. As to myself, I think it more sensible to avoid than to place myself in the way of anything harmful. I am under great apprehension you might hit me. That being the case, I think it more advisable to stay at a distance. If you want to try your pistols, take some object—a tree, or any thing else about my dimensions; if you hit that, send me word, and I shall acknowledge that, if I had been in the same place, you might have hit me.

ADVANTAGE OF DRINKING WATER.—It is a great mistake to think that beer is necessary for a hard-working man. At the time I write, there are a set of men employed in draining, by task work, in Richmond Park, who are patterns of English labourers. Hard as they work from morning to night, and in all weathers, they seldom drink any beer. They boil a large kettle of coffee in their little bivouac in the park, and drink it hot at their meals. This costs them but little; but they do as hard a day's work upon it as any labourers in England, and have continued to do so for three years past, under all the disadvantages arising from wet and cold to which a drainer is subject. A proof of this may be found in Captain Ross's recent voyage to the Arctic regions. He says, that on a journey attended with great difficulty and hardship, he was the only one of the party whose eyes were not inflamed, and he was the only one who did not drink grog. He was also the oldest person amongst them; and, for the same reason, he bore fatigue better than any of them. He adds, that he who will make the experiment on two equal boats' crews, rowing in a heavy sea, will soon be convinced that the water-drinkers will far outdo the others. No better testimony to this is required than the experience of the men who work at the iron-foundries. That is the hardest work which falls to man to do; and so well do the labourers in this department know that they cannot perform it if they drink even beer, that their sole beverage during all the hours of this hot and heavy labour is water.—Jesse's Gleanings in Natural History, Third Series, 1835.

ANECDOTES OF GEORGE III.—When I was last at Kew Palace, I was shown over it by Betty Snosling, one of the last of the breed of old-fashioned housemaids. Betty was a neat, trim, short old woman, somewhat antiquated in her attire, but the very picture of tidiness. She was, moreover, somewhat loquacious; but then her anecdotes were interesting, for they chiefly related to those whom she had faithfully and honestly served in that palace some sixty years ago. She was a great favourite with their late majesties, and talked of their goodness and kindness to her with the utmost delight and affection. She spoke also of the princesses in the same grateful manner; one, she said, had sent her last Christmas a handsome thick shawl to keep her warm; another, a fine turkey and chine; and a third, I forget what. These little tokens of regard to an old servant show a kindness of heart which it is pleasant to record; and I question much whether Betty did not receive more pleasure from them than she would from any sum of money which could have been given her. "Here," said Betty, "is his majesty's walking-stick, and there is his backgammon-board; this is the chair he sat upon, and in that small room he every morning and evening said his prayers: I used to hear him when I was in the next room, and he prayed very earnestly. Do you know, sir," said she, "that in his own private prayer-book he had scratched out 'our most religious and gracious king,' and had written instead, 'a miserable sinner.'" The old housemaid showed me a harpsichord which had belonged to Handel, on which the king sometimes played: his fondness for Handel's music never left him, and it was an instance of his fine taste. Among other anecdotes of the good old monarch which were related to me, the following affords a proof of his kind consideration for his old servants. Sitting by himself one day in the library, the king rang the bell for some coals; it was answered by a page, who, on being told what was wanted, rang the bell himself. On being asked his reason for doing so, he said it was for some one (naming an old footman) whose duty it was to bring the coals. The king immediately got up and desired the page to show him where the coals were kept. On coming to it, he took up a coal-skuttle, carried it himself to the library, and threw some coals on the fire: "There, sir," said the king, giving the page the coal-skuttle, "never ask an old man to do what you are so much better able to do yourself."—Ibid.

PROFIT AND LOSS ON THE COLONIES.—The Scotsman has shown, by calculations from Parliamentary papers, that the colonies cost to the mother country, for military, naval, and civil establishments, L.2,346,000. The declared value of our exports to these same colonies was, in 1830, L.10,581,000, the profits on which cannot be more than L.1,800,000. Upon this ground, instead of gaining by our colonies, as is generally supposed, we must lose half a million annually, not to speak of the vast additional loss incurred by paying a higher rate for sugar and other colonial produce than would otherwise be necessary. "It is useful," says the Scotsman, "to state these facts, as they tend to disabuse the public of a widely prevalent error. The time must come when Britain will see the wisdom of divesting herself of her colonial incumbrances. A very large proportion of our countrymen, however, think with Napoleon, that the kingdom is enriched by what is really a source of impoverishment; and a minister who in these days should make the perilous proposition to sever Canada, Jamaica, or Gibraltar from the Crown, might be said to come forward, like the reformer in some ancient republic, with a rope about his neck! India pays its own expenses, and its retention is recommended by high moral considerations—the vast means it places in our hands for spreading civilisation and benefiting mankind. One naval and commercial station, such as Malta, would be useful in the Mediterranean; one in the West Indies, such as Barbadoes; and the Cape for the accommodation of our India shipping. The other colonies might be given up with advantage to both parties; for the most humble of them are enamoured of independence, and, in order to obtain it, would probably make concessions which would secure to us all the commercial advantages we now enjoy."

SCARCITY OF LINEN.—According to Naude, linen was so scarce in France in the time of Charles VII. (who lived about the time of our Henry VI.) that the queen was the only lady who could boast of possessing two shifts.—[To this may be added the fact that the Archbishop of Glasgow used to change his shirt only once a-week.]

HINTS FOR THE SHOOTING SEASON.—In September partridges may generally be met with feeding in stubble fields from sunrise until about nine o'clock in the morning; in October from sunrise until ten. During the middle of the day, when clear and fine, they will be found basking in rushes, fern, heath, potatoes, turnips, vetches, or beans, or under a tree, bush, or hedge. They return to the stubbles in September, between four and five, and in October, between three and four in the afternoon, where they remain till sunset. In wet and foggy weather they will remain in the stubbles all day long, and sometimes even in the hottest days they will return to the stubbles about noon for a short time. As long as corn remains standing, birds will seldom leave it. During a wet day, however, they will not lie in standing corn, but generally remain in the same field close to and ready to run into it on the least alarm. Whenever birds are disturbed near a field of standing corn, the old ones will fly to it. During the early part of September, birds bask in potatoes and turnips, or on the side of a sunk or bank fence, adjoining, or contiguous to the stubble in which they feed; but later in the season they more frequently bask at a few fields' distance from the stubble to which they belong. After the month of October, birds are more irregular in their habits, it being then more difficult to guess at any hour where a covey may be found, except very early in the morning or very late in the evening, when the birds are feeding; and then, if there be more than one stubble field within half a mile from the one they frequented at the commencement of the season, it is quite an uncertainty in which they will be found.—New Sporting Magazine for September.

DEPTH OF MINES.—The following is a statement of the depth of some of the principal mines in Europe:—

	Feet.
Kit's pühl copper mine, Tyrol mountains	2764
Sampson mine, Andreasburgh, in the Hartz	2230
Valenciana mine, Guanajuato, Mexico	2170
Pearce's Shaft, Consolidated Mines, Cornwall	1650
Monkwearmouth Colliery, Durham	1600
Wheal Abraham's mine, Cornwall	1452
Dolcoath mine, Cornwall	1410
Ertown mine, Staffordshire	1380

The deep mines in the Tyrol, the Hartz, and the Andes, above described, are all in high situations; the bottom of the Mexican mine, for instance, is 6000 feet higher than the top of the Cornwall shafts. The deepest perforation beneath the level of the sea, consequently the nearest approach to the earth's centre, has been made at the Monkwearmouth colliery above described. Pearce's shaft, Cornwall (1338 feet below the level of the sea), was, until lately, the deepest in the world; the superiority of depth, however, must now be ceded to Monkwearmouth, which is 1513 below the surface of the German Ocean.—Mining Journal.

THE NURSE OF WASHINGTON.—Joice Heth, a slave, represented as a hundred and twenty years old, and the nurse of Washington, is now attracting the attention of the curious at New York. She is described as a kind of living mummy, with little vitality except in one limb, but able both to hear and speak. She was in her seventeenth year at the birth of Washington, and put on his first clothes. She is a Baptist, and was dipped in the Potomac upwards of a hundred years ago.

SWIMMING.—Eight of the best swimmers of the Austrian garrison of Bregenz engaged for a wager to swim across Lake Constance, from that town in the Tyrol to Lindau, a distance of six miles. They started at ten o'clock, and at three minutes before three o'clock a private soldier, named Tutaja, reached the bridge at Lindau. In thirty-two minutes afterwards he was followed by Lieutenant Cepharrowitsch. The six others only went about half the distance, and then were taken into the boats that attended them. The wind was blowing from the west, and the temperature of the water was 17 degrees of Reaumur, or 70½ of Fahrenheit. This is perhaps the greatest distance ever traversed by swimming in fresh water. The two men who completed their task were perfectly blue when they landed; their pulse was scarce perceptible, and several hours elapsed before their bodies resumed their natural heat.—Paris Advertiser.

A REMEDY FOR GRIEF.—The Marshal de Monchy maintained that the flesh of pigeons possessed a consoling virtue. Whenever this nobleman lost a friend or relation, he said to his cook, "Let me have roast pigeons for dinner to-day. I have always remarked," he added, "that after having eaten two pigeons I rose from the table much less sorrowful."

The French Medical Gazette announces a new caustic for cancerous affections, discovered by chance. A jeweller, who had a cancerous pimple of a very decided character on his cheek, had occasion to dissolve some gold in nitro-muriatic acid, and during the operation rubbed the pimple, which gave him pain. After several touches with the impregnated fingers, the pimple changed its appearance, and shortly disappeared. M. Recamier, suspecting the cause, has made experiments of the same nature on several patients, and always with the same results. The proportions he adopts are one ounce of the acid to six grains of chloruret of pure gold.

SCOTLAND.

NEW VOTERS.

The following is an abstract of the information conveyed by newspaper paragraphs respecting the voters just admitted in the Registration Courts:—

	Conservative.	Liberal.	Doubtful.
Edinburgh (city)	295	642	73
Leith	84	144	—
Peebles*	35	42	—
Falkirk†	35	13	—
Dunfermline‡ (Fifesh. district)	47	27	—
Kirkaldy (Fifeshire district)	34	84	—
Cupar	68	89	—
Aberdeenshire	178	82	24

The Liberal prints claim a majority of 50 on the Stirlingshire, and a considerable ascendancy in the Paisley and Banffshire registrations. In the counties of Edinburgh and Selkirk, a sufficiency of new Liberal voters has been obtained to turn the scale at the next election against the present Conservative members. In the city of Aberdeen the new voters are 363, two-thirds of whom are Liberal. In the Kirkaldy district of burghs, there are 100 new voters, four-fifths of whom are said to be of the same complexion. Of the new voters in the Melrose district of Roxburghshire, the Liberals claim a majority of 12; in the Hawick district 30; while, in the Kelso district, the Conservatives have a majority of 9.

* Another statement, subsequently contradicted by the above, gave the Conservatives a majority of three.

† Another statement, taking into consideration the expunged voters, gives the Liberals a majority of 33.

DECREASE OF CRIME IN SCOTLAND.

[From the Dumfries Courier.]

On concluding the business at the Ayr circuit, held on the 15th September, the Lord Justice Clerk, in addressing the sheriffs, expressed himself as follows:—

"It afforded him very peculiar pleasure to congratulate them on the apparent diminution of crime in the districts over which they presided. He had the same satisfaction here this time twelvemonth; and he believed that in Dumfries and Jedburgh, to which he had now to proceed, he had the prospect of a similar decrease in the number of cases compared with the business of former circuits. This improved state of things he would mainly ascribe to the faithful, able, and zealous manner in which the sheriffs had discharged their duty; nothing being so much calculated to put down crime as the knowledge on the part of the breaker of the law, that the authorities would use every means in their power to bring him to justice. There was another cause to which the diminution of crime might very properly be attributed; namely, to the general good conduct and morality of the districts. The reflection was indeed a source of gratification, that the virtue, honesty, and sobriety of the country, continued to improve, notwithstanding the increase of manufactures, and other causes, which not unfrequently gave facility to the commission of crime, particularly where due attention was not paid to the moral and religious instruction of the population."

Similar remarks fell from his lordship in this town. There are other causes steadily at work in producing a state of things which is giving so much satisfaction to the judges of the land, and the country at large. The diminished number of thefts and petty delinquencies of every sort is mainly owing to the present most prosperous condition of the British nation. Nor is this all. The general decadence of theatricals is to us a proof that the people are more addicted to reading than ever they were before, and, perhaps, it is not too much to allege (for we do not affirm) that Chambers's Journal, the Penny Magazine, and many similar publications—publications that are circulated by hundreds of thousands—have had some effect in originating or accelerating the present reformed state of the "Porteous Roll."

Aug. 25. The foundation-stone of the marble monument, at Greenock, in memory of James Watt, was laid with much ceremony, by Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, assisted by the Provost and Magistrates of Greenock, and a procession of the masonic lodges.

—30. A sermon, commemorative of the struggles of the Covenanters, was preached on the ground close beside Bothwell Bridge, by the Rev. Mr. Carslaw of Airdrie. On the lowest part of the ground, gracefully shaded by rows of tall trees, stood "the tent;" around it, and on the opposite ascent, was a multitude calculated to be not less than seven thousand in number, many of whom showed in their countenances the solemnity of religious feeling, and of the pious associations connected with the spot. When the preacher announced the first psalm—

"God shall arise and mercy have, the effect was beyond description. The sermon, from Rev. ii. 10, "Be thou faithful unto death," contained many eloquent allusions to the faithful body of Christians who, in 1679, had shed their blood for religion's sake upon this spot.
Upon his Zion yet,"

Sept. 10. Hugh Davidson, engineer of the Earl Grey steamer, the explosion of which at the end of July occasioned the death of ten persons, was tried for culpable homicide by the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Glasgow. Evidence having been brought, which satisfied the jury that the accident was chiefly owing to the insufficiency of the boiler, he was acquitted. The court approved of the verdict.—The Circuit Court at Glasgow found John Buckley and —M'Kelvie guilty of rioting and mobbing at Airdrie, on the 13th of July. On the ensuing day, the court found William Ramsay guilty of the same offence, committed on the 19th or 20th July, but acquitted John M'Ewen on a verdict of Not Proven. The offences of these men had proceeded from an insane terror entertained respecting the Catholics, some of whose houses and a chapel were broken into by them and their companions, and the property destroyed. Ramsay was sentenced to fourteen, and Buckley to seven years' transportation, and M'Kelvie to eighteen months' confinement in Bridewell. The judge (Meadowbank), in passing sentence, remarked severely upon the heinous character of the offences, which, instead of being redeemed, were only aggravated, by the religious motives from which they sprang. His lordship also condemned in strong terms the disgraceful conduct of the magistrates of Airdrie, some of whom, it appeared, had mingled with the crowds, without attempting to assuage their fury.

—17. The Rev. Mortimer O'Sullivan delivered a long lecture against the Catholics, in Hope Street Gaelic Chapel, Glasgow; Mr. Colquhoun of Kilmont in the chair. A similar meeting took place on the ensuing day, when Captain Gordon, formerly M.P. for Dundalk, delivered a long speech for the purpose of showing that the Catholic priesthood is as grasping as ever. The harangues of these gentlemen were respectfully listened to by crowded audiences.

It appears from a return made to the Town-Council of Edinburgh, that, in the period between January 1834 and July 1835, three hundred and eighteen prosecutions for ministers' stipend took place within the city. The aggregate sum pursued for amounts to L.637; the expenses to L.176; the portion recovered to L.161; that is, fifteen pounds less than the expenses. From a feeling of mercy to the poorer classes, the Council have recommended the agency of the clergy to abandon the system of hounding and caption, and proceed in all possible cases in the Small Debt Court.

In answer to an allegation that the members of the new town-councils are inferior in respectability to the old, the Scotsman has given a calculation of their respective rents, from which it appears that the reverse is the case. Of twenty-nine members of the old council who served between November 1832 and November 1833, and lived within the bounds of police, the average house-rents was L.41, 13s. 9d.; while of thirty-two of the present council, who live within the bounds of police, the average rent is L.45, 16s. 3d. The aggregate shop-rents of the old council was L.1056; of the new, L.1556.

At no period since the memorable year 1825, has there been so much building going on in Glasgow as at present. According to some computations which we have heard, there are at present five hundred more operative masons employed than ever before, and still there exists a great demand for workmen. In every quarter of the town new houses are in process of erection; but it is to the north-west that the city appears to be extending most rapidly, and in that direction the new buildings will vie, in point of elegance and comfort, with those of any city in the kingdom.

The admirers of Burns cannot fail to learn with regret that his sister, Mrs. Begg, is now in a state of great affliction and destitution. Her husband was killed by a fall from his horse, leaving his widow and two daughters totally unprovided for, and now in circumstances of distress. These facts are vouched for by the minister of the parish of Tranent, near Edinburgh, who also mentions that Mrs. Begg and her daughters reside in his parish, and are most deserving persons.

Fracas among the Bees.—Lately, a live of bees, belonging to a farmer in Gleniericht, came off and alighted on the side of a pig, lying at its ease in the sty. The pig became alarmed, and turning over, crushed the bees, who stung him so unmercifully that he roared with pain, and attempted to get through the enclosure. Failing in this, he made a desperate leap and got over, when he upset four other hives. The air was presently filled with bees, and the poor animal was again beset by them. The owner, on the alarm, came out, and was instantly covered, and so much stung that his head and face immediately swelled to an enormous size. Two sawyers, who were at work on the spot, were also set upon by the enraged insects, and forced to run for some miles to be out of their way; and a few sheep that happened to be near were stung about the face, and ran off furiously to the river, where they took shelter. In short, the dog, cat, pig, and hens, all shared the same fate; and dismal was the uproar before the bees could be again collected into their hives.

Sept. 26. Consols for Account, 91½.

He is a stout active man, and travelled from Belfast to Antrim, and back (a distance of 24 miles), only a few months since. He recollects occurrences which took place a century ago.—Northern Whig.

- Nov. 1. At Montreal, the Rev. Walter Roach (late of Edinburgh), to Miss Mary Rutherford, of Yorkshire.
July 15. At St. George's, Exeter, Mr. Joshua Stokes, of Sidbury, to Mrs. Ann Drake Patridge, of Exeter. It is not a little singular that these parties, who are now getting in years, were acquainted in their youth, and about to be united in the bonds of wedlock; a difference, however, took place, and they parted. After a while, each got married, and in the lapse of years became single, when the courtship was again renewed, with precisely the same result as before, a quarrel and second separation. Each again married, and having become once more single, they resolved to put it out of the power of caprice, or aught but death, to separate them more, by indissolubly uniting themselves in the silken bonds of Hymen.

15. At St. Marylebone Church, Sir John Rennie, of Whitehall Place, to Selina Garth Colleton, youngest daughter of the late Charles Garth Colleton, Esq. of Haines Hill, Berks.

In the month of January 1817, Mr. Harry Rockwell and Esther Niles were united in the bands of matrimony at East Hampton. In October 1819, business called Mr. Rockwell to Savannah, from which place he intended to return in about six months; but unforeseen circumstances prevented his return until a few weeks ago, having been absent about 16 years, 8 months, and 27 days. During his absence, Mrs. Rockwell obtained a bill of divorce, and was a second time married. With her second husband she lived until his death, which happened the 12th of March 1831, and from that to the present time she has remained a widow. Mr. Rockwell lately arrived in Chatham, East Hampton Society, and found her that was once his wife in the same house in which he had left her in the year 1817, and in a few days thereafter they were again united in the bands of matrimony.—New York paper.

13. At Allan Park, Stirling, Edward Alexander, Esq. much regretted.

14. At Dublin, Dr. Brinkley, Bishop of Cloyne. The name of Dr. Brinkley is well known throughout Europe as that of one of the most distinguished among modern astronomers. This is the sixth of the suppressed bishoprics that has become vacant since the passing of the act.

Lately, at her palace at Bruchsal, the Dowager Margravine of Baden.

At the end of August, Dr. McCulloch, the celebrated geologist. He was at Penzance, according to the account given, and proceeding in his gig to visit a friend, when the horse, from some unexplained cause, took fright, and in attempting to escape, his foot was caught in the wheel, by which his leg was broken in two places, and also some of his ribs. Amputation was resorted to, but in a short time mortification ensued, and terminated in death. Dr. McCulloch was one of the most distinguished geologists of the day. To a careful study of rocks, he joined great skill in mineralogy, and a considerable knowledge of chemistry, two accomplishments of the highest value to the geologist. He had not paid much attention to the tertiary deposits; but he had studied the primary and older secondary formations with great success; and his two principal works, the Geology of the Western Isles, and System of Geology, are an invaluable mine of information on this branch of the science. He was acute in tracing the causes of phenomena, bold in speculation, and distinguished as a writer by an extraordinary command of language. His general knowledge was great and various, and in the intervals of his geological inquiries, his mental activity expended itself in numerous contributions to periodicals. It is stated that he was latterly occupied in arranging the materials which he had been collecting during many years, for a geological map of Scotland; and it will be matter of much regret if they are left in a state unfit for publication.

At the end of August, Mr. R. Barker, of the Edinburgh Theatre Royal, usually called Old Barker. Mr. Barker, although his personal appearance by no means bespoke such an age, had reached within a few months of the extreme period of fourscore, thirty of which were spent in connection with the Edinburgh stage. He made his debut in Scotland at Montrose in March 1792, at which period he was the intimate friend of Willoughby, afterwards known on the Edinburgh boards; but the two were at the extreme points of their profession. Willoughby led the business both in tragedy and comedy, while Barker, on the stage, never got beyond the character of a servant. Behind the scenes, or out of the theatre, he was quite an original; voluble, smart, and witty, and was also "the cause of wit in others," but on the stage he was little better than a mute. He was the cicerone of all the stars who visited our northern hemisphere, and was perhaps as useful an appendage of the drama as the stage ever possessed.

Lately at Lakefield, Inverness-shire, Mr. Grant of Corimony, the father of the Scottish bar, in his ninety-third year. Mr. Grant was an accomplished scholar and antiquary, and, what is not often united to these qualities, he was a first-rate musician, both vocal and instrumental; he was author of a work on "The Origin of the Gael," and he also wrote treatises on the Origin of Language and Society; he was early distinguished for his liberal political principles, and associated with the celebrated Henry Erskine and other eminent men of that day, and subsequently with Sir James Mackintosh, Mr. Homer, &c.; he retained his faculties to the last, and, from the extent and variety of his attainments, was a delightful companion.—Inverness Courier.

Lately, a woman, 110 years old, at Fayence, in the department of the Var (France). She was born at Digne in 1725, and had lived in service at one house since 1745.

CHAMBERS' HISTORICAL NEWSPAPER

CAUSE AND PRETEXT.

THERE is a curious paper on this subject in D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature. "It is an important principle," says Mr D'Israeli, "in morals and in politics, not to mistake the cause for the pretext, nor the pretext for the cause, and by their means to distinguish between the concealed and the ostensible motive." Were history written anew upon this principle, it would not often, he thinks, describe circumstances and characters as they appear. "We shall find," says he, "in the study of secret history, that some of the most important events were produced from very different motives than their ostensible ones. Leo X. projected an alliance of the sovereigns of Christendom against the Turks. The avowed object was to oppose the progress of the Ottomans against the Mamelukes of Egypt, who were more friendly to the Christians; but the concealed motive with his holiness was to enrich himself and his family with the spoils of Christendom, and to aggrandise the Papal throne by war; and such, indeed, the policy of these pontiffs had always been, in those mad crusades which they excited against the East. The Reformation, excellent as its results have proved in the cause of genuine freedom, originated in no purer source than human passions and selfish motives: it was the progeny of avarice in Germany, of novelty in France, and of love in England. By the Duke of Nevers, in a work printed in 1590, and by Francis I., in his Apology in 1537, it is considered as a coup d'état of Charles V. towards universal monarchy. The duke says that the emperor silently permitted Luther to establish his principles in Germany, that they might split the confederacy of the elective princes, and by this division facilitate their more easy conquest, and play them off one against another, and by these means to secure the imperial crown hereditary in the house of Austria. The famous League in France was raised for religion and relief of the public grievances; such was the pretext. After the princes and people had alike become its victims, this league was discovered to have been formed by the pride and ambition of the Guises, aided by the machinations of the Jesuits against the attempts of the Prince of Condé to dislodge them from their 'seat of power.' The people were led on by the cry of 'religion;' but this civil war was not in reality so much Catholic against Huguenot, as Guise against Condé." In the British civil wars there was perhaps as great a difference between the causes and the pretexts. The motives of Charles I. in imposing Episcopacy upon Scotland, was not so much the advancement of what he considered the truest faith and most reverent form of worship, as the establishment of a hierarchy disposed to be his instruments in completing the political thralldom of his subjects. There was certainly a general dislike to the new establishment; but there can be no doubt that the lay leaders in the resistance were not animated so much by religious scruples as by a fear of the revocation of the church lands. Charles himself, in his Large Declaration, brings forward facts to prove that religion was only used by him as a cloak to other views. It is not less apparent in the conduct of the resistance, that the dread of Popery, which seemed to be the chief animating motive of both leaders and people, was in a great measure a mere pretext, held forth to screen and palliate motives which the parties did not find it convenient to confess. "There was a revolutionary party in France," continues D'Israeli, "which, taking the name of the Frondeurs, shook that kingdom under the administration of Cardinal Mazarin, and held out for their pretext the public freedom. But that faction, composed of some of the discontented French princes and the mob, was entirely organised by Cardinal de Retz, who held them in hand, to check or to spur them as occasion required, from a mere personal pique against Mazarin, who had not treated that vivacious genius with all the deference he exacted. * * * We have smiled at James I. threatening the States-General by the English ambassador, about Vorstius, a Dutch professor, who had espoused the doctrines of Arminius against those of the Calvinists; the ostensible subject was religious, or rather metaphysical-religious doctrines, but the concealed one was a struggle for predominance between Pensionary Barnevelt, assisted by the French interest, and the Prince of Orange, supported by the English. Dio-dati the Swiss divine, and Brandt the ecclesiastical historian, could see nothing in the synod of Dort, but what appeared in it; and gravely narrated the idle squabbles or phrases concerning predestination and grace. Hales of Eaton, who was secretary to the English ambassador at this synod, was more penetrating. 'Our synod,' says he, 'goes on like a watch: the main wheels upon which the whole business turns are least in sight; for all things of moment are acted in private sessions; what is done in public, is only for show and entertainment.'

The cause of the persecution of the Jansenists was the jealousy of the Jesuits; the pretext was la grace suffisante. The learned La Croze observes, that the same circumstance occurred in the affair of Nestorius and the church of Alexandria; the pretext was orthodoxy, the cause was the jealousy of the church of Alexandria, or rather of the fiery and turbulent Cyril, who hated Nestorius. The opinions of Nestorius and the council which condemned them, were the same in effect. I only produce this remote fact, to prove that ancient times do not alter the truth of our principle.

When James II. was so strenuous an advocate of toleration and liberty of conscience in removing the test act, this enlightened principle of government was only a pretext with that monk-ridden monarch; it is well known that the cause was to introduce and make the Catholics predominant in his councils and government. The result, which that eager and blind politician hurried on too fast, and which therefore did not take place, would have been, that 'liberty of conscience' would soon have become 'an overt act of treason,' before an inquisition of his Jesuits."

In another paper, entitled Political Religionism—a striking phrase borrowed from Dugald Stewart's Dissertations prefixed to the Encyclopædia Britannica—Mr D'Israeli traces the history of a number of "contests for religion, in which a particular faith has been made the ostensible pretext, while the secret motive was usually political. The historians," says he, "who view in these religious wars only religion itself, have written large volumes, in which we may never discover that they have either been a struggle to obtain predominance, or an expedient to secure it. The hatreds of ambitious men have disguised their own purposes, while Christianity has borne the odium of loosening a spirit among mankind, which, had Christianity never existed, would have equally prevailed in human affairs. * * Whether the reformed were martyred by the Catholics, or the Catholics executed by the reformed; whether the Puritans expelled those of the established church, or the established church ejected the Puritans, all seems reducible to two classes, conformists and non-conformists, or, in the political style, the administration and the opposition. When we discover that the heads of all parties were of the same hot temperament, and observe the same evil conduct in similar situations; when we view honest old Latimer with his own hands hanging a mendicant friar on a tree, and, the government changing, the friars binding Latimer to the stake; when we see the French Catholics cutting out the tongues of the Protestants, that they might no longer protest; the haughty Luther writing submissive apologies to Leo X. and Henry VIII. for the scurrility with which he had treated them in his writings, and finding that his apologies were received with contempt, then retracting his retractations; when we find John Knox, when Elizabeth first ascended the throne, crouching and repenting of having written his famous excommunication against all female sovereignty; when we find his recent apologist admiring, while he apologises for some extraordinary proofs of Machiavellian politics—an impenetrable mystery seems to hang over the conduct of men who profess to be guided by the bloodless code of Jesus; but try them by a human standard, and treat them as politicians, and, the motives once discovered, the actions are understood!"

Mr D'Israeli then enumerates many of the great struggles of modern European history, in which religion was used as a means of gaining or securing political predominance: it were unnecessary to quote any of them here, as we of the present day have struggles of the same kind going on before our eyes. The people have indeed been at all times remarkably liable to be deceived through this sentiment—one in which they are always sincere, while few politicians, secular or ecclesiastical, ever are so. They are thus made the blind instruments for working out the purposes of men, who either are themselves blind, or, if they possess intellectual vision, contemplate no object but self-exaltation. It is to be hoped that the time will soon arrive, when religion, ceasing, by the common consent of mankind, to be a means of power, will have only its proper effect upon the minds of men, awakening all their better feelings, and soothing and suppressing, instead of rousing, the worst.

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

THIS country may at present be said to engross the attention of Europe. Its miserably reduced resources, its long subjection to the worst species of ecclesiastical and secular rule, and the benighted character of its general population, are circumstances every where well known. It has been for upwards of a year the theatre of a contest carried on by a pretender to the crown, who, though he has never gained possession of more than the mountainous northern frontier, seems to have too much strength in actual adherents and in the nature of his position, to be easily repelled. While this individual appeals to the unpopular principles of legitimacy, and derives a certain share of his strength from that source, nothing can be more clear than that the general population, more particularly the population of the towns, is advancing rapidly towards extreme liberalism. Since the death of Ferdinand, ministry after ministry has given way under the pressure of popular clamour, each being succeeded by one more thoroughly imbued with the principles of liberalism. The recent administration under Toreno was appointed on the 14th of June in the present year, as an improvement in this respect upon that of Martinez de la Rosa. But it had not been in power two months when it became an object of popular dislike—chiefly, it is said, on account of its enjoying the countenance of the French cabinet. The insurrection of the Madrid urban militia on the 15th of August was easily put down; but the general discontent was not allayed. In every province of the kingdom, excepting the Castiles and Leon, juntas were erected, for the purpose of opposing the government; these bodies, composed of the chief military and civil authorities, and supported by the people at large, demanded from the Queen Regent a change in her advisers. Toreno (Sept. 3) issued a proclamation against them, but was immediately after compelled to give way and resign the reins of government. On the 15th September, as related in our last sheet, he was replaced in power by M. Mendizabal, a liberal of deeper dye, who lost no time in acquainting the nation with the line of policy he meant to pursue. The objects of his government, according to a letter addressed by him to the Queen, are—"to bring to a speedy and glorious end, without any other than national means, that fratricidal war, the shame and disgrace of the age in which we live, and depressive of the will of the nation; to settle at once, and without degrading them, those religious corporations whose reform they themselves require in accordance with the public interest; to commit to wise laws all the rights which emanate from and are, so to speak, the sole and steady support of the representative system; to reanimate, invigorate, or rather to create and establish, the public credit, the wonderful force and magic of which may be studied in prosperous and free England; in short, to succeed in reconciling with the prerogatives of the crown the rights and duties of the people; for without this equilibrium, all hope of public felicity is illusive." The British resident minister has approved of this measure; but it is said to be viewed with much dissatisfaction by the French cabinet, which regards the administration of M. Mendizabal as the only thing between government and anarchy.

According to the first scheme of the new ministry, Mendizabal was to take the department of Finance, while Alava, heretofore English resident minister for Spain, was to be premier. It was finally settled, however, about the 27th September, that the ministry should be as follows:—M. Mendizabal, President of the Council and Minister of Finance; General Alava, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Gomez Bellara, Minister of Justice; M. Ulloa, Minister of Marine; M. Almodovar, Minister of War; Martin de Los Heros, Minister of the Interior. All of these individuals are extreme liberals, Bellara and Almodovar having been respectively the chiefs of the Juntas of Saragossa and Valencia, while Ulloa is member of Procuradores for the city of Cadiz (in a political point of view, the Birmingham of Spain). The first step of the new ministers was to summon the Cortes for the 17th of October. Satisfied with the new arrangements, the Juntas lost no time in dissolving themselves, while Las Novas, a general who had commenced a march on Madrid with about three thousand troops, for the purpose of hastening the progress of liberalism, gave in his adhesion to the ministry.

The two great difficulties which the ministry has to encounter, are the reformation of the monastic establishments and the suppression of the Carlist insurrection. An article which appeared in a Madrid government paper gives some prognostication of what will probably be done with the monks. It recommends that a portion of them should be converted into parochial clergy, in order to supply the great local deficiencies of the means of public worship which are said to exist; the rest to be provided for out of the funds of the church, guaranteed by the state, and, as they die out, the property to be bequeathed by them to their relations, so as to increase the number of small proprietors. It is evident that the conciliation of the monastic body, whose influence over the people is much dreaded by the government, is intended by this proposal.

For some time after the unsuccessful attempt of the Queen's troops to march from Bilbao to St Sebastian, and their repulse by the Carlists on the 11th of September, the actions between the contending parties were of no great importance, and very obscurely related. Don Carlos displayed the character of his mind, and of the troops he commands, by proclaiming the Virgin Mary as the generalissimo of his army, and causing the embalmed body of Zumalacaregui to be carried in sight of the men, wherever they went. His second-best human general, Eraso, died on the 22d September. Upon the whole, the late political collision and changes seem to have been favourable to his cause. A considerable force, acknowledging his sovereignty, has established itself on the north-east coast of Catalonia, probably with a view to opening a communication with the Mediterranean. Mina, however, being on his way to take the command of this province, will probably soon interfere with the designed arrangement, which must be of importance to the Carlists, as they are said to draw support from the northern sovereigns through the king of Sardinia. After all, the power of Don Carlos extends over a much less proportion of Spain than that of the British pretender in the year 1715, when the tranquillity of the kingdom could hardly be said to be disturbed by the forces of the Earl of Marr. Several British prisoners have been killed in cold blood by Don Carlos, but the great bulk of them have been spared. Almodovar, governor of Valencia, has threatened to revenge the immolation of every single prisoner by the death of two Carlists, of whom he has many within his power.

FRANCE.

FRANCE remains quiet under the new regulations respecting the press and juries, though one or two editors have suffered fine and imprisonment for articles interpreted into sedition. Some new regulations respecting commerce, arguing the eventual establishment of a more liberal system of duties between Britain and France, have been resolved on. The duties on Cashmere shawls, indigo, salad-oil, flax-seed, salt-petre, iron, and coal, are slightly reduced. One-fifth of the present duty is taken off iron, and rails for railroads may be introduced at the same rate. The reduction upon coal is from a franc per hundred kilogrammes to thirty centimes; but it only relates to ports between the sands of Olonne and Bayonne, and along the shores of the Mediterranean.

The French government is preparing a new and powerful armament for Algiers.

Some weeks since, three hundred electors of a department gave M. O'Dillon Barrot a dinner at Thorigny, at which the mayor, and the members of the municipal council, being electors, assisted. M. Barrot spoke but the calm language of constitutional opposition; but such language is deemed a crime, and the home minister suspends the mayor of Thorigny from his functions; and the reasons assigned were, that the mayor was guilty, first, of attending a public banquet; secondly, of not having warned the prefect that the said banquet was about to take place; thirdly, of having made use of the Municipal Hall for the purpose of giving a dinner to a deputy of the constitutional opposition. The entire municipal council of Thorigny, learning the suspension of their mayor, and the causes assigned, instantly resigned their functions. In the letter which they addressed on this occasion to the prefect of the department, they said that they took the step, "as a warning to government, engaged in an anti-national system." * * "May our countrymen," say they, "open their eyes to the abyss to which doctrinarian obstinacy is leading. Increasing taxes, the revolution spit upon, the restoration praised and imitated, the jury in disgrace, honour in the background, the enemies of freedom and the country caressed, its friends and those of the king disowned and persecuted—such are the grievances which separate, by all their turpitude, the ministry from the nation, and which provoke us to the resolution which, M. le Prefect, we beg to communicate to you."

The French government is stated to be taking measures for clogging the introduction of English newspapers into France.

JAMAICA.

A SERIOUS difference has arisen betwixt Lord Sligo and the Colonial Assembly of Jamaica, and the latter was, on the 10th August, abruptly dissolved. The details given indicate more of hot temper and ill humour than substantial difference of opinion. His lordship in his address, stated that the island remained in a state of undisturbed tranquillity; that the sugar crop of the year had fallen a little short, but had been got off the ground in a more satisfactory manner than could have been expected, considering "the extraordinary change in the social state of the colony;" that "so general is the habit of working for wages, and so very few the instances where it has been refused, that the idea once generally entertained of the apprentices being likely to decline labouring at all in their own time, must be abandoned;" but that a new mode of managing estates is now necessary. The Assembly, in their reply, disputed many of his assertions. They spoke of a prevailing reluctance in the negroes to labour; of negligence, thefts, and outrages increasing; of their cane-fields being overrun with weeds, and a large extent of their pasture ground returning to a state of nature; and with these facts before their eyes, they could not "divest themselves of the painful conviction that the progressive and rapid deterioration of property will continue to keep pace with the apprenticeship, and that the termination thereof must (unless strong preventive measures are applied) complete the ruin of the colony." Lord Sligo had recommended the union of the Cayman Isles with Jamaica, and the expediency of providing funds for the maintenance of the police, before the existing act expires. The Assembly, in its reply, demurs to take any step to promote a union with the Caymans; and states that it considers the obligation contracted under other circumstances to provide for the support of a garrison, as annulled by the change which the emancipation act had made in their property. The governor also alluded to the "frightful mortality" among the white labourers imported from England, and recommends some regulations upon the subject. The Assembly replied that his lordship had exaggerated the evil. Such are the topics upon which a misunderstanding has arisen, apparently of no great consequence, but which has been taken up so seriously by the governor, as to induce him to dissolve the Assembly.

The conference of sovereigns at Toplitz, which was looked to with considerable apprehension by the European liberals, as prognosticating measures for the interruption of the progress of liberty, broke up on the 1st October, without political conferences of any kind having been detected by the numerous spies with which the sovereigns were surrounded. Their intercourse seemed entirely of a personal and friendly character. The King of Prussia remained behind, to drink the Toplitz waters. The Inverness Journal says—"The Duke and Duchess of Gordon were received with the most marked attention and hospitality by the King of Prussia and the Emperor of Russia. His grace had the honour of dining with both monarchs; and the emperor, in presenting him to the empress, introduced her as the person 'who for nineteen years had constituted the happiness of his life. The domestic circles of those illustrious princes are described as presenting a picture of simplicity an mutual affectionate intercourse which could not be exceeded in the family of any nobleman in Britain. Seven of the King of Prussia's family, all married were present at the detached camp, which consisted of 40,000 men."

At the opening of the States-General of Holland on the 15th October, the king, in his speech, confined his remarks almost entirely to the internal state of the country, which is described as highly prosperous. The king informs his subjects, in fact, that the advances made in their national manufacture during the last two years exceed all reasonable expectations. The finances are likewise spoken of in terms of high gratification. The budget about to be presented to the Parliament will propose a reduction of taxes. The fisheries, the commercial and colonial interests in both the Indies, are sensibly extending and improving.

Lord Durham arrived at Constantinople on the 3d of September. The Barham was escorted through the Dardanelles by two Turkish gun-boats. Lord Durham was received with due honours, and a guard was offered him by the sultan, which he declined. He had his audience of the sultan on the 11th, and was most politely received. On the 13th, he sailed in the Pluto, and, so far from being stopped by the Russian fleet, was saluted by it as he passed the Dardanelles. Thus the alarming prognostications upon this subject have been completely falsified.

The assembly of the states of Denmark is now in session at Copenhagen; but a royal decree has prohibited the publication of their debates. It is understood that the finances of the kingdom are in a most disgraceful plight, owing to the profuse expenditure of the sovereign. It would appear that for some years past the government had rendered no kind of account of the disposal of the revenue.

The project of a marriage between the Queen of Portugal and the son of the reigning Prince of Saxe Coburg, has been again spoken of. In Lisbon, it is understood that the negotiations on that important matter are already in a very forward state. But the German papers in the interest of the absolutist power deny most positively that any such alliance is likely to take place.

Cholera prevails to a dreadful extent in Piedmont and Tuscany. At Genoa, up to October 2, the total cases had been 2999, the deaths 1506; a proportion which shows the inadequacy of the means of prevention and cure. At Leghorn, the daily amount of deaths was about 100, and it was sensibly increasing. A letter from that city, of the 3d October, has the following:—"It is scarcely possible to imagine the disasters occasioned by the cholera. All species of commerce and industry are annihilated. The disease is invariably fatal. Such families as remain in town have shut themselves up in their houses as in a time of plague. Provisions are collected for a consumption of three, and even of six months in some instances, and all communications with their most intimate friends are interrupted. The daily supplies of meat, water, and other provisions, are put into the windows, and are even raised to those of the third and fourth stories. The eating-houses, coffeehouses, and shops, are closed. Foreigners are in want of necessities, or pay for them enormously high."

Fieschi is to be tried on the 10th November, and preparations on an extensive scale are making for the occasion. He is said still to keep up his spirits, and to manifest the same dogged and imperturbable stoicism as formerly. Pepin, the grocer, who was arrested on suspicion of having furnished him with the money necessary for purchasing the muskets, is ill; and Morey, another suspected accomplice, has nearly succeeded in destroying himself by self-imposed starvation. From Fieschi's private memorandum-book, he seems to have received many large sums, amounting in all to 30,000 francs; but the donors are unknown. The French journals mention the following curious circumstance:—Two travellers, who passed through a village of Savoy on the 28th of July, wrote in the register of an inn words which seem to refer to the attempt committed on that day in Paris, and consequently to prove that Fieschi's crime was not an insulated one. One traveller, after the name of Louis Philippe and his sons, wrote Requiescat in pace. A rogatory commission having been sent to the village from Grenoble, found the registry and the phrases, and infer that the persons who wrote them instigated the commission of the crime, but put themselves in safety before its execution. The register has been sent to the Court of Peers.

The Temps says—"The situation of the prisoners at Ham is lamentable. They are all, more or less, indisposed. The Count de Peyronnet has an acute rheumatism, which compels him to keep his room. M. Guernon de Ranville, the youngest, is threatened with spitting of blood, resulting from five years of captivity without exercise. As to M. de Chantelauze, it is certain that his reason is greatly impaired, but he is not in that maniacal state which has been spoken of Prince de Polignac, who is more accustomed to a prison, is in a better state of health than his fellow-prisoners." We learn from a variety of hints thrown out in the Paris journals, that the doctrinaire ministers intend to terminate the imprisonment of Prince Polignac and his colleagues. Upon the general ground of the due admixture of mercy with the administration of justice, we should not hesitate, had we a voice upon the subject, to give it in favour of the liberation of these gentlemen, who have now suffered an incarceration of five years.—Morning Chronicle.

Lord Gosford and his colleagues in the Canada Commission of Inquiry reached Quebec on the 21st of August. They landed on the 23d. Lord Aylmer and Captain Doyle, A.D.C., have returned home in the Pique.

The preparatory proceedings for the election of a new president for the United States are commenced, though the election will not take place till March 4, 1837. It is said that of the number of presidential electors already chosen by the various states, 95 are opposed to, and 127 in favour of, Van Buren, the candidate favoured by Jackson. A keen contest is expected.

A bloody revolution is described in the American papers as having broken out at Para, in the Brazils. The Tapoiers (native Indians), headed by Antonio Vinaigre, attacked the city on the 14th August, and, after several days of desultory fighting, accomplished their purpose, in gaining possession of the place, and massacring all the white male inhabitants who fell into their hands. Of the whole white male population (25,000) one half obtained protection on board the English and American ships lying in the harbour; but many of the rest must have been butchered. The authorities are blamed for their pusillanimity in this dreadful affair.

Mr George Thomson, who lately proceeded to America to preach the abolition of slavery, is stated in the Times' correspondence to have been received so unfavourably, even in the non-slave-holding states, that he can hardly venture to show himself, much less to attempt the execution of his design. The authorities are not supposed to be competent to protect his person from the popular indignation. In reference to a state of things so horribly outraging all our ideas of the sacredness of the person, and freedom of opinion, the Spectator, a newspaper which cannot well be suspected of partiality for slaveholders, presents some remarks tending to show that the continuance of slavery in the Southern States involves to such an extent the feeling of self-preservation in the whites, that their violence is at least no fit matter for surprise. The cultivation of the soil in Louisiana, South Carolina, and even in Virginia and Georgia, is so extremely disagreeable, that no human beings would submit to it unless by compulsion, especially while so much unoccupied land remains upon that continent, to tempt the free labourers to seize and cultivate for themselves. "Supposing that all the slaves in America were to be changed into freemen, it would be as certain as any thing in this world can be, that they would, with one accord, quit the Southern plantations for the more genial climate and comparative ease of Ohio, or some other of the Northern and Western free states. What, then, would become of their late masters? Absolute ruin would be their portion, and desolation would overspread their property. It is because they are fully aware of the utter destitution of labour which would arise from emancipating the blacks, that the proprietors in the Southern United States never will consent to the abolition of slavery—never, that is, until the whole of North America shall be peopled, the price of land be indefinitely raised, and the market fully stocked with labour. Until this shall be the case, to deprive the planter of his slaves, is to devote him to ruin. It may be said that the Eastern, Northern, and Western States, may, in defiance of the Southern people, effect the abolition of slavery, or that the negroes themselves may conquer freedom in a servile war. To this we reply, in the first place, that the prosperity of East, North, and West America, greatly depends upon that of the South. Cut off the exports of tobacco, cotton, sugar, and rice, and what becomes of the foreign-trade of the country, its shipping, and its revenue? Besides, there is scarcely a village in the South in which the enterprising and industrious men of the North have not established some store or warehouse for the sale of imported goods or home manufactures. The existence of this profitable traffic depends altogether upon the maintenance of the present state of things. Under these circumstances, it is much worse than useless to preach emancipation doctrines in the United States. The efforts of the missionaries only irritate the masters, and add to the sufferings of the slaves."

The immense number of English visitors assembled in the city of Baden for the benefit of the baths, has just been broken up, although a great portion had previously determined on making a long stay at that watering-place. The following occurrence has led to this unexpected departure:—A young English nobleman had brought with him two sporting dogs of considerable value, which were seized by a field ranger, for a supposed breach of the game laws. The officer, instead of taking possession of the animals, shot them both in the presence of their master. We understand that one of the dogs had cost a hundred and the other fifty guineas. The young nobleman, supported by the whole body of the English residents, presented a complaint to the Grand Duke of Baden, and insisted on the dismissal of the over-officious gamekeeper. This request was instantly complied with, and the English visitors seemed perfectly satisfied. However, strange to say, two days had hardly elapsed when the gamekeeper was publicly reinstated in his former employment, without any reason being given for this singular revision of the grand duke's decision. The English residents viewed this as an insult offered to them generally, and they accordingly came to the determination of quitting Baden forthwith; they set out in various directions, and a considerable number have arrived here.—Frankfort Correspondent of the Times.

A dreadful hurricane occurred at Barbadoes on the 3d of September. No particulars are given, except that the Spitfire vessel of war was forced to slip her cables and put to sea; and after losing her mainsail, and suffering other damage, put into Grenada for repair.

ENGLAND.

REFORM OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

DURING the past month, the reform of the House of Lords has continued to be the chief political topic throughout the country. While it is advocated with zeal by the ultra-liberal party, the ministers seem inclined to oppose it, or at least to remain content with the present constitution of the upper house. This is shown by an article in the Edinburgh Review, by the speech of Sir John Campbell at Edinburgh, and by the following extract from the reply of Lord John Russell to an address from some of his Devonshire friends:—"In common with the rest of his Majesty's ministers, I have endeavoured to prove my attachment to the cause of civil and religious liberty, not by words only, but by acts. The principal measures which we have proposed, during the short period which has elapsed since Lord Melbourne and his colleagues have been recalled to power, were calculated, in our opinion, to strengthen the bonds of union between different parts of the empire; to solve perplexing difficulties; to secure the participation of the people in the benefit of institutions intended for their use; to promote freedom, order, morality, and religion."

Some of these measures, after receiving the sanction of the House of Commons, have been defeated by the resistance of another branch of the legislature. They exercised their undoubted privilege, whether wisely or no, it is for you, and not for me, to determine. I may, however, be permitted to observe, that the same party which prompted and led this resistance, have been opposed to every liberal measure which has been proposed for the last seven years, and that, upon all the most important of those measures, their resistance has ended in a confession that the struggle was hopeless, and that, though darkness was still to be desired, light was no longer to be excluded.

This inherent weakness of their cause has appeared, even in the present year, upon the bill for the regulation of municipal corporations. The denunciation of robbery, the imputation of calumny—the cry of revolution, however loudly uttered and valiantly sustained, have all ended in a concession of five-sixths of the main provisions of that bill. For the remainder, likewise, we are not precluded, as you justly observe, from proposing such alterations as experience may require.

Fortified, therefore, by past victories, relying firmly on future progress, I earnestly recommend you to look for the triumph of farther measures of reform, rather to the effect of public opinion, enlightened and matured by knowledge and discussion, than to organic changes, which cannot be proposed without causing division, nor carried without risk of convulsion, and which, even if carried, would be of very dubious benefit, indeed, to the popular cause, but of unquestionable danger to the monarchy.

For my own part, in my address to you upon taking office, I declared my resolution with respect to such fundamental alterations. To the great landmarks of our liberties I must steadily adhere; of the principles which pervade our primitive institutions, I am an ardent admirer; to the constitution of the country, in all its branches, I stand pledged by feeling, by opinion, and by duty."

As an indication of the ultra-liberal views on this subject, the following extract from the Westminster Review may be presented:—"The single intelligible utility of a second chamber is, that since a first chamber elected by the people for short periods (without which the first chamber is itself incompetent for its professed purposes), must from its composition be a transcript, to a great extent, of the feelings of the people for the time being; and since the feelings of the people for the time being may not always be the right ones, it may be useful to check the proceedings of the first chamber, by those of another chamber, which shall represent the feelings of the people spread over a greater extent of time. Hence the great distinction between the two chambers, on the grounds of common sense and sound reason, would be that the members of one should be elected for rather short terms, and the other for rather long; and for carrying out the principle proposed, it would be further necessary that the second chamber should never be dissolved, but the elections take place in succession, as the old members arrived individually at their appointed term. There might be some difficulty about setting such a system in motion; but it might, apparently, be accomplished with sufficient exactness by dividing the first elections by lot into divisions of one, two, three, &c. years, and so on to the greatest number that are ultimately to compose the term; the elected for the shorter periods to go out at the expiration of the period, but all the elections after the first to be for the entire term. The jumble created by deaths and resignations would soon cause this to be as perfect a system of continuous and incessant succession, as if the succession depended upon deaths. This, without at present debating the length of the term, would be the beau idéal of a second chamber for use."

Sept. 29. Alderman William Taylor Copeland was chosen Lord Mayor of London. After the election, the livery passed, without opposition, a vote of censure upon the Lord Mayor Winchester, for his unbecoming conduct during his mayoralty, and for his breach of his word.—The Duchess of Kent and the Princess Victoria arrived in Ramsgate, for the purpose of meeting their relative, the King of Belgium, who, accompanied by his youthful Queen, landed in the course of the day from a steamer which had brought them directly from that country. The object of the meeting of these distinguished persons was at first suspected to be of a political character, but it was afterwards ascertained to be purely domestic. Leopold merely wished to introduce his consort to his sister and niece; a matter which could not have been otherwise brought about without some trouble, as the Princess Victoria could not leave the country without the permission of Parliament. The royal party spent a week at Ramsgate, paying a visit on the 5th October to the Duke of Wellington at Walmer Castle. The King and Queen of Belgium re-embarked at Dover for their own country on the 7th.

—30. The sheriffs' inauguration dinner was given at the London Tavern. Two hundred and fifty gentlemen sat down to table. Among them were Sir John Campbell, Mr Pattison, Lord Dudley Stuart, Mr George Byng, Mr D. W. Harvey, Sir J. Key, &c. The Lord Mayor presided. The loyal toasts were well received. Sir John Campbell apologised for the absence of the Cabinet ministers, who, he said, were especially anxious to have been present on an occasion which would be considered an epoch in the annals of religious liberty. The Duke of Sussex was unable to attend the dinner, owing to the malady in his eyes, but he wrote a letter in reply to his invitation, expressing strong gratification at the victory over religious prejudice obtained in the election of Mr Solomons.

Oct. 3. At the annual dinner of the farmers and agriculturists of Buckinghamshire, held at Aylesbury, Lord Chandos, in returning thanks for the toast of his health, said that, though as yet unsuccessful, he hoped, if supported by the entire agricultural class, ere long to procure for them some relief. Their interests, he could assure them, were looked upon with great favour by the King, who was himself a farmer. It was necessary, however, now to seek relief by some other means than the repeal of the malt-tax. The times were difficult. "When I see one House of Parliament censured, and even sentenced to destruction, because it does not agree in opinion entirely with the other, I think that is a course contrary to the principles of the constitution, and by adopting which the legislature could never insure confidence or respect from the people. Are we to change the House of Lords? Are we to make them dependent on the Commons? Are we to deprive them of liberty of thought, of action, and of speech? Why, if we were to do so, we might as well say that even juries ought to be changed, and so constituted as to make them always suit the wishes of those who are dependent on them for their verdict." He trusted that Sir Robert Peel would soon be again at the head of the government, with Lord Stanley and Sir James Graham to help him. He hoped soon to see enlisted under the farmer's banners every one who wished well to the country. "Before I conclude, I cannot help going back and adverting to an extraordinary statement I have lately seen in the newspapers. This statement is contained in a public document, and is signed by Sir Henry Parnell and others, and those gentlemen state it to be their opinion that one-half the duty on malt can be taken off. It is an extraordinary circumstance, but a gratifying one, to see persons connected with the government making such a recommendation." [His lordship has been reminded by some of the papers, that this recommendation was accompanied by a condition which would at least fully neutralise its effects—namely, that the ports should be opened for the importation of foreign barley.]

—19. The Queen paid a visit to Oxford, where the Duke of Wellington was present as Chancellor to do her the proper honours. After spending an hour in the Angel Hotel, she proceeded to the Theatre, the floor of which was filled with Masters of Arts and their friends, the lower gallery by ladies, and the upper gallery by the under-graduates. Before the arrival of her Majesty, the young gentlemen in the upper gallery had enjoyed their usual amusement in calling over names and expressing their feelings respecting those who bore them. "The Ladies," was received with tremendous applause, as were the names of the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Eldon, Lord Lyndhurst, Sir Charles Wetherell, the Bishops, Church and King, and many others. Then came "A groan for Brougham." "His Majesty's Ministers." (Groans.) "Lord John Russell and Stroud." (Groans.) "The Majority of the House of Lords." (Cheers.) "The Ladies again." (Cheers.) "The Ladies' Maids." (Loud laughter.) "Lord Radnor and his Fox-hounds." (Cheers.) "Lord Radnor and the Dissenters." (Groans.) "The King of the Cannibal Islands." (Laughter.) After the Queen had entered and taken her seat, the Duke of Wellington presented her an address of welcome, to which she read a gracious answer. Some degrees were then conferred upon the distinguished persons in attendance upon her Majesty.

There are no fewer than twenty-three plans for railroads now on the tapis, including those in progress. The total amount of capital invested and required is £21,000,000; and the distance they will extend, if completed, is upwards of 1200 miles.—Standard.

The Admiralty have recommended Captain Back to his Majesty for promotion, and he has been promoted accordingly by an Order in Council, as he had not served the requisite time as a commander to enable the Board to do it in any other way.

The account of the revenue for the year and quarter ending on the 10th of October, exhibits a decrease of £1,084,000 on the former, as compared with the previous year, but an increase on the latter of £334,000 over the corresponding quarter of 1834. The reduction of 1s. a gallon on Irish spirits, and the repeal of the house-duty, have lessened the receipts of three quarters of this year, but only operated on one quarter's revenue of 1834; and this accounts for the decrease on the year: but it is satisfactory to perceive, that on comparing the two quarters ending the 10th of October 1834 and 1835, there has been so considerable an improvement. The principal gain is on the customs and excise.

Halley's comet became visible to the naked eye on Thursday, the 8th of October, but in a very faint state. It was next evening seen more clearly, immediately above the two stars in the front of Charles's Wain. It then appeared like a faint and watery spot of light on the dark ground of the sky. On the evening of Sunday the 11th, it had advanced to a point above the two central stars of the Wain, as far above the uppermost as that again is from the lower one. It now displayed as much light as a star of the second magnitude, but dim, diffused, and watery, while a tail streamed upwards to a considerable distance, but so faintly that the eye could not readily catch it. Owing to the state of the weather, the comet was only visible for another evening, the 13th, when it had advanced to the constellation Hercules. Its progress across the northern sky was surprisingly rapid.

An important alteration in the conveyance of letters has recently been made by the post-office authorities. Letters to and from ports in Scotland can now be forwarded, if so directed, by all the regular steam-ships trading between the metropolis and Dundee, Leith, and Aberdeen. Each letter from those ports, on arrival at the General Post-office, London, is stamped "London Ship Letter," and is only charged eightpence, thus effecting a saving to correspondents of 6d. on each letter received from Dundee, 5d. on each letter from Leith or Edinburgh, and 7d. on each letter received from Aberdeen. In addition to the pecuniary advantage given, the privilege conceded is rendered the more important, from the circumstance that the steam-ships to those ports almost invariably make the journey much earlier than the mail overland. For instance, the magnificent and powerful steam-ship Dundee, Commander Wishart, lately made the passage from London to Dundee in thirty-eight hours, whereas the mail takes fifty-three hours; thus making a difference of not less than fifteen hours in favour of the London correspondence by steam. Government ought to procure, without delay, more powerful and faster-sailing steam-vessels for the transmission of letters to and from Hamburg and other ports on the Continent.—Spectator.

Cleopatra's Needle, it is understood, is at length arrived in this country, and is to be erected in Waterloo Place.

The convict-ship George the Third was wrecked on a reef at the mouth of the river Derwent, on its way to Hobart Town, on Sunday the 12th of April. There were 220 prisoners, 29 soldiers, 3 officers, 22 women and children, besides the captain, officers, and crew of the vessel, 32 in number. There were two children born during the voyage, and sixteen persons died; thus leaving on board the vessel when she was wrecked 292 souls, of whom no fewer than 132 perished; of these 128 were prisoners.

A line of telegraphic communication between London and Paris is in process of completion, for the purpose of transmitting the prices of the funds at periodical times in the different stock markets. Mr Ricardo and a French gentleman are the managers of the undertaking. There are to be nine stations in England—the first in St George's Fields, and the last at Folkestone in Kent; and fourteen stations from the coast to Paris. Although it is at first to be confined to transmitting the prices of the funds, it is intended hereafter to apply it to the conveyance of other intelligence. The news will be conveyed from London to Paris in an hour and a half.—Morning Chronicle.

In a lecture to his class at the Royal Institution, Professor Brande gave a very curious instance of adulteration, practised even to a great extent in the article of soot. He had paid a visit to a chemical manufactory near Battle Bridge, where large quantities of sawdust were charred in a certain process. On inquiring to what purpose it was applied, seeing a large heap of it in one corner of the yard, he was informed that it was long before any market could be obtained for it, but that it was now sold to sweeps for the purpose of adulterating soot.

Late in the evening, at the dinner of the Liverpool Agricultural Society, Oct. 8, "the health of Lord Stanley," which had been previously drunk, was proposed a second time by Mr Jones, one of the judges of the cattle exhibited, who connected with it "the Aristocracy of England." In acknowledging this toast, his lordship on rising said—"You must forgive me, gentlemen, if I again trespass on your attention, having been called upon in this manner, and having my health drunk coupled with such a toast as the aristocracy of England. Gentlemen, I hope that the use of that word excites in this, as it ought to excite in all parties in England, this feeling, that the aristocracy is not an exclusive body, separated from the rest of the country by an impassable barrier, but is composed of those whom their birth, their station, their fortunes, have placed at the head of the people, and having placed them at the head, have placed them in a doubly arduous and responsible situation; that the use of the words 'aristocracy of England' suggests this farther reflection, that to no class of the community, however humble their origin, however insignificant their birth, is that aristocracy inaccessible. (Cheers.) This county alone could furnish innumerable instances of this, and perhaps there is none more generally known than that which is found in the history of a man who has, by the exertions of his father and himself, risen from the humblest class of society to rank with the aristocracy of the land. (Cheers.) God grant, gentlemen, that it may long be the pride and boast of this country that there is a body of men so raised by their station, and yet amenable for all their actions to public censure and opinion, and though so raised in station, yet so approaching by imperceptible degrees the lower classes of the community, that the body is inaccessible to none who join successful talent to honest industry. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, it is because I feel the inestimable benefit of such a motive to exertion, of such an object set up on high for others to aim at, and for others to carp at and criticise if they please, that I am proud of having my name coupled with the aristocracy of England; but if the day ever comes when that aristocracy shall forget that duties as well as privileges are imposed upon them by their situation, better will it be that aristocracy should cease to exist. I trust that that day will never come; I trust that all classes will feel the mutual dependence which each has upon the other; that the landlord will never think himself independent of the tenant, nor the tenant of the landlord; that all classes will be convinced of the great truth, that in the concord and welfare of each class consist the prosperity, the glory, and the happiness of the whole." (Loud cheers.)

In reference to the important subject of the registration, we find the following in the Spectator, which, though expressed in party language, being unopposed by any thing from the other side, may be here presented:—"The revision of the lists of voters in England and Wales is now very nearly completed; and after a careful reference to public and private sources of information, we can state with confidence, that the reformers have obtained a decided advantage over their opponents. In many boroughs, and in several counties, now represented by Tories, they [the reformers] have established the means of success at the next election. It does not appear that they have lost the superiority they possessed last year any where—not even in Middlesex, notwithstanding the vapouring of the Opposition journals. We are assured, and we believe, that the liberals, if united, can return any two candidates they may select for the metropolitan county. This is the cheering result of exertion. The battle has been fought and won by the liberals, in the registration courts. The boast of the Tories, that they have a majority of English members in the House of Commons, must now be considered as groundless and harmless: their majority exists upon sufferance, and does not truly represent the registered electors of the country."

The multiplication of railways in the neighbourhood of Newcastle is remarkable. There are not less than four at this moment actually in progress—namely, the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway, the Hebburn and Blaydon Railway, the Sunderland and Durham Railway, and the Durham Junction Railway; and there are four more in contemplation—namely, the Brandling Junction Railway, which is estimated to cost £110,000; the Gateshead, South Shields, and Monkwearmouth Railway, which is estimated at £150,000; the Morpeth and Shields Railway (formerly Morpeth and Newcastle, with a branch to Shields), estimated at £70,000; and the Newcastle and North Shields Railway, the expense of which is calculated at £120,000. Two of these, the Brandling Junction Railway, and the Gateshead, South Shields, and Monkwearmouth Railway, are rival schemes, both companies proposing to go over, as nearly as may be, the same ground. Mr Thomas Parkin is taking out a patent for improvements in the construction of railroads. The invention, which is approved by one of the most eminent civil engineers in London, will combine economy with simplicity.

There is now every reason to expect that the Great Northern Railway will speedily be undertaken. A company has been formed, with provisional committees in London, York, and Norwich, consisting of most respectable and well-known individuals; the whole line has been surveyed, and the expense found to be less by the proposed line, than by adopting any other direction. The capital required will thus amount to a much smaller sum than was originally contemplated. The measure will, therefore, we have no doubt, be sanctioned by the legislature, and will, we hope, be followed, at no very distant period, by the extension of the railway to Glasgow and Edinburgh.—Courier.

Lately, one of the most curious circumstances in the history of locomotive engines occurred at the depot of the Leeds and Selby Railway, at Leeds. The firemen had lighted a fire under the boiler of a locomotive engine which was to be attached to a train, and then left it. The steam got up sooner than they had anticipated, and the engine set off without either guide or train; and, being unencumbered, it proceeded with fearful rapidity. The astonishment of the firemen may be easily conceived, when they found the engine gone, and out of sight. The persons who saw it in its flight were astonished beyond measure, as it seemed literally to fly. At length, when the fire abated, and the steam lessened, its dangerous speed gradually slackened, and it finally stood still in the Milford cutting, a distance of twelve miles from Leeds.

The first news received of the whale fishery is of the most disheartening nature. Two noble vessels are complete wrecks in the ice, and the number of fish taken is so insignificant as scarcely to be worth mentioning. The Isabella whaler, the ship in which Sir John Ross and his companions were saved and brought to this country, was wrecked in the ice in June last, in the Greenland fisheries.—Hull Packet.

A company has been formed in New York, denominated "The Atlantic Steam-packet Company," the object of which is to establish a line of steam-packets between New York and Liverpool. The company is about to apply to Congress for a charter of incorporation. The steam-packets will be vessels of twelve hundred tons burthen, and it is confidently expected that the passage between the two ports may be accomplished in twelve days.

Lately, a workman in the employ of H. Kelsall, Esq., who was engaged in sorting a bag of New South Wales wool, discovered in it a parcel containing four letters. They were wrapped in part of an old newspaper; each letter was sealed and directed, and there was a slip of paper, and on it the following appeal:—"Friend, who-soever thou art, please to forward these letters to their destination, for unfortunate prisoners, who have no other means of sending, and are desirous of hearing from their relations. By so doing you will greatly oblige the unfortunate prisoners, and we shall ever be in duty bound to thank and pray for you. Please to put them into the nearest post-office.—Your humble—Prisoners." Two of the letters were for Sussex, one for Ireland, and one for Staffordshire. They were sent as directed.

After some controversy in the Ecclesiastical Court, the will of the late William Cobbett has at length been proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and the effects of the deceased sworn to be under the value of £1500. There are no specific legacies, but the testator bequeaths the copyright of his works and all his other property to his eldest son, William Cobbett, and desires to be buried near his father and mother in the churchyard, Farnham, Surrey. The will is dated the 14th of December 1833, and has been inspected at Doctors' Commons by many persons anxious to see the last testimonial of this extraordinary character.

A man named James Symons, seaman on board the brig Mary, then lying in the Penzance pier, bound for Wales, quitted the vessel a few days ago, and could not be prevailed on to go the voyage. On being asked his reasons for leaving, he said, in the presence of several persons, "I dreamt, last Wednesday, that the brig was gone to sea, and I was drowned; 'twas only a dream, but I will never go in her again." The Mary sailed on Wednesday forenoon, and before she was out of sight from the pier head, Symons accompanied a man named Benson on an excursion in a small pleasure-boat, which they upset within five minutes afterwards, close to the pier head, owing to improper management on the part of Benson, who was with difficulty saved by a boat from the pier, whilst poor Symons sank to rise no more.

Mr Dean, who has engaged to raise, by means of his submarine apparatus, a stone-vessel sunk some time since in Babbacombe Bay, has paid a visit to the Venerable, 84, sunk in Torbay thirty years since, and succeeded in bringing up several portions of the wreck. A few days since Mr Dean gratified the inhabitants by the practical use of his diving apparatus, by walking across the harbour to Torquay at high water. He was greeted with loud cheers by the assembled multitude on his regaining the surface, and he again intends gratifying them by taking a cool walk under water some distance across the bay, or to Tor Abbey sands, according as the weather may admit.—Western Luminary.

In 1795 died the Rev. Mr Mattison, for sixty years curate of Pattendale, in Westmoreland. The first infant he christened was afterwards his wife, by whom he had one son and three daughters, all of whom he married in his own church. His stipend for the first forty years of his curacy was £12 a-year, and for the last twenty not quite £20. Yet he died, at the age of eighty-three, worth £1000, of which he had saved four-fifths out of his stipend.

IRELAND.

THE Lord Lieutenant lately excited great indignation in the Orange party, by refusing to sanction the election of Mr R. Deane, a zealous Orangeman, to the mayoralty of Cork, as well as the election of sheriffs for that city. The corporation returned another Orangeman for mayor, and the same sheriffs; and the election has been confirmed.

In the course of September, various clergymen of the established church made preparations for collecting their tithes by force. In particular, the Rev. Mr Ryder, who last year occasioned the deplorable slaughter at Rathcormac, posted notices on his church doors, intimating that all defaulters for the tithes of 1834, would, after the 1st of November, be proceeded against for the amount. The Rev. Mr Croker, of Croom, accompanied by a large party of police and military, seized forty sheep and three cows on the lands of Mr M. O'Flaherty, near Limerick, and brought them into that town for sale. A large crowd collected, but nobody would bid, and the reverend gentleman himself then bought them up at a nominal price, and presented them to the House of Industry. An application by a clergyman in Limerick to the government, for military aid, was favoured, on the 30th September, with a note from Lord Morpeth, stating that the subject was then engrossing their attention. The Irish government finally came to a decision, which was expressed in the following language:—"That the government does not deem it expedient, in the enforcement of civil rights by distress, that the military or police should be called out, unless in cases of actual riot, or breach of the peace; and that in such cases the military and police will receive orders to attend, under the guidance of the local authorities, and the utmost endeavours will be used to repress and punish all violations of the public peace." This resolution, though alleged by the liberal papers to be strictly consistent with the law, has given much annoyance to the friends of the church establishment, the funds of which it virtually leaves at the mercy of the Catholic population. The force of the anti-tithe spirit may be calculated from the following resolution lately passed at a public meeting at Clannorris, county of Limerick:—"That the payment of tithes for the support of individuals from whom we receive no religious benefit is contrary to every principle of justice and equity; and that, therefore, we will continue every opposition which the law of the land and the spirit of the constitution can warrant, until we are totally relieved from the load which has so heavily pressed on the industry of the people, and has been the greatest curse that ever afflicted this heretofore misgoverned country.—Resolved, therefore, that to neither parson, nor landlord, nor agent, nor driver, nor any other menial, shall we make a voluntary tender of this hateful impost; and that, should any of the above classes attempt to appropriate to the account of tithe what is paid in the shape of rent (as we are informed is the practice of some), we will invariably insist upon an acknowledgment of our money for rent, conformably to our expressed resolution; and that, should our money be detained and such acknowledgment refused us, we will consider such persons as swindlers, and proceed against them accordingly." The practice here alluded to was denounced in equally strong terms at a meeting of the united parishes of Kilcolman and Robin, in the county of Mayo.

The Dublin Packet contains a long letter from the Rev. Mr W. B. Soney, rector of Borrischoole, giving an account of a brutal outrage committed on the steward of the Rev. Mr Stoney of Newport, in Mayo, on the 16th September, at Castlebar. The offenders were several Catholics, who kicked and trampled on the poor fellow in the most merciless manner, calling him a "new light, a jumper, and a Bible-reader." Mr Stoney attributes this violence to the preaching of Dr M'Hale and thirteen other priests, who, he says, have been exciting the hatred of the Catholics against the Protestants by violent addresses.

A railway is about to be formed between Dublin and Drogheda. The provisional committee held a meeting a few days ago in Dublin.

Dr Murray, the Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, has addressed a letter to the Protestants of Great Britain, published in the Dublin papers, in which he emphatically and positively denies that "persecution, on account of religious opinions, forms any part of the Christian dispensation. If, therefore," he says, "the doctrine which I thus deny be a tenet of the Catholic church, I, by this denial, separate myself from its communion, and to all intents and purposes become a Protestant."

After a brief visit to Greenock, and spending some time with Mr Wallace, M.P. at Kelly House, Mr O'Connell returned to his native country, having previously refused an invitation to a public dinner by the way at Belfast, on the plea of a dread lest the opposite party might interfere to such an extent as to disturb the peace. He made a triumphal entry into Dublin, September 29, preceded by a procession all the way from Kingstown, six miles; but, at his own request, no standards or emblems were exhibited. On the same day, he addressed the Dublin Trades Union in a speech full of very coarse and severe invective against the House of Lords, particularly the Duke of Wellington, whom he characterised as designed by nature for a "stunted corporal," and the Duke of Cumberland. There is hardly a newspaper of any kind in the three kingdoms which has not deprecated or condemned the terms in which Mr O'Connell has spoken of the Duke of Wellington, so far as his military character is concerned; and the use of such terms by Mr O'Connell must be regarded as a strange exception from the tact which he displays on most occasions. He next day dined with the Lord Lieutenant; a mark of vice-regal attention paid to him, it is said, simply in conformity to a custom in reference to distinguished members of the legislature, but which, though balanced by the entertainment next day of some leading Conservatives, gave great offence to the Orange party, and has been the subject of much unfavourable comment in other parts of the empire. October 13, Mr O'Connell entered the room where the commissioners upon his election were sitting, when a strange scene took place. According to the Spectator, "one of the commissioners, Mr Joy, appears to have conducted himself more like a partisan than an impartial judge. He is said to have been seen whispering with the agents of the petitioners, chuckling, and winking at them, when any point was gained for West and Hamilton. He was especially delighted, the other day, when the court decided that they would not hear evidence to prove the agreement alleged to exist between some hundreds of Mr O'Connell's voters and their landlords for the payment of the municipal taxes—the voters in question having been struck off the poll in consequence of non-payment of these taxes. The pretence for this refusal was a qualified admission by the petitioners' agent of the existence of this agreement." Mr O'Connell was of opinion that the admission, as made, was useless; and, on the day mentioned, he demanded to be heard in defence of his right to bring forward the evidence in question. The commissioners refused to hear him; assigning no law, nor any instruction from the Parliamentary committee, as a reason for their refusal. O'Connell persisted, and the court was adjourned. The next day, a similar scene occurred; and the court was again adjourned.

A third time the court assembled, and was once more interrupted by Mr O'Connell.—This gentleman has been appointed a justice of peace in his native county (Kerry). He is to be entertained at dinner in Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and other large towns in Ireland. If the conspicuousness in newspapers be any indication of importance, he may now be considered as the most important man in the empire, for, during the six weeks ensuing upon the rise of Parliament, there was no man more discussed and adverted to in those sheets, Conservative as well as Liberal. His character, at no former period, has been the subject of so much vituperation to the one party, or so much praise to the other.

It is said that all the soldiers stationed in Ireland who held Orange warrants have returned them to the Orange functionaries.

A phenomenon similar to the movement of the Solway Moss, in 1771, has taken place in Ireland. The Sluggan Bog, near Ballymena, measuring 1200 acres, being the largest in the county of Antrim, and the property of Lord O'Neill, suddenly broke up with a noise like thunder on the evening of the 19th of September, striking the inhabitants with panic, and causing birds and hares to fly in all directions. "A person who was near the ground was surprised to hear a sort of rumbling noise, as if under the earth; and immediately after his surprise was not a little increased on perceiving a part of the bog move, pretty rapidly forward, a distance of a few perches. It then halted, and exhibited a broken rugged appearance, with a soft peaty substance boiling up through the chinks. It remained in this state till the 22d, when it suddenly moved forward at a quick rate, covering corn-fields, potato-fields, turf-stacks, hay in ricks, &c.; not a vestige of which now remains to be seen. So sudden and rapid was this movement, that the adjacent mail-coach road was covered in a few minutes, or rather moments, to a depth of nearly twenty feet. It then directed its course towards the River Maine, which lay below it; and so great was its force, and such the quantity of matter carried along, that the moving mass was forced a considerable way across the river. In consequence of the late heavy rains, the river has again found its channel through the matter deposited in its bed; otherwise the water would have been forced back, and immense damage done to the land on the banks. The fish in the river have been killed for a considerable distance. The damage done by the mossy inundation has been very considerable. About 150 acres of excellent arable land have been covered, and rendered totally useless. Down the middle of the projected matter a channel has been formed, through which there is a continual flow of a dark peaty substance over ground where, only two weeks ago, the reapers were at work. A house close by the road is so far overwhelmed that only a part of the roof is to be seen. Besides the actual damage sustained, the utmost alarm prevails; and the people living adjacent to the place have been removing their furniture, &c. to a distance."—Northern Whig.

From the returns made by the commissioners of national education in Ireland to the orders of the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr Andrew Johnston, it appears that, in the 789 schools to which the board have granted aid, the number of scholars is 107,042; that the grants for building (exclusive of fittings up) have amounted to somewhat less than L.3000, the rest being for half-price for requisites and for salaries, varying from L.3 to L.60 (most being from L.8 to L.10), except the male and female model schools, and the mendicity school, Dublin, where the grants for salary were L.198, L.130, and L.100. A return of the grantees, in aid of schools, distinguishing their religious tenets, shows that, in the province of Ulster, where there were 373 grants, only 35 were to clergymen of the established church; the rest were Presbyterian and Roman Catholic, the majority of the latter class; in Munster, out of 184, only 16 were clergymen of the established church, and one a Presbyterian clergyman—the rest were Catholics; in Leinster, out of 305, the established clergymen were 19, the Presbyterians 4, the rest Catholics; in Connaught, number of grants 100, to clergymen of the established church 4, to Presbyterian 1, the remainder Catholics. In some cases the grants were made to the same person for more than one school. The lesson books distributed or used under the direction of the board are such as have been recommended by the commissioners for educating the poor in Ireland, or are used in the Irish national schools. The number of schools connected with or under the superintendence of any nunnery, monastery, or religious institution, is 25—amount of grants, L.1800. Grants to about L.1000 have also been made to 20 schools kept in Roman Catholic chapels. A correspondence is printed which took place between the Board of Education and the Synod of Ulster, which shows that a difference of opinion exists between them on the subject of the religious discipline in the schools.

SCOTLAND.

THE late manifestations, in Parliament and elsewhere, against the Irish church, the disappointment of the Scottish clergy with the composition of the Church Inquiry Commission, and the favourable reception experienced by Mr O'Connell in his progress through the country, have roused a strong anti-Popery feeling in the church, and in the circle of its more zealous supporters. On Sunday, the 4th of October, when the third centenary of the completion of the first English version of the Bible was celebrated, many of the clergy did not confine their discourses to an exposition of the blessings which have arisen from the diffusion of the Scriptures in the vernacular tongue, but directed the indignation of their hearers against the Catholic faith and its professors, and, in some instances, against the existing ministry, whose Irish church reform scheme they hold to be an encouragement of Popery. In the progress of Mr O'Sullivan through the country, and in his harangues at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Greenock, Perth, and Aberdeen, he has been supported exclusively by the established clergy, the episcopal ministers, and the old light dissenters, while the advocates of the voluntary principle, so far from expressing any dread of Catholicism, coalesce with its professors.—Oct. 13. The Synod of Glasgow and Ayr recommended that Protestant associations should be formed in every parish; and the Synod of Aberdeen on the same day issued a declaration, expressing the strongest sympathy with the distressed church in Ireland, and the greatest indignation against the ministry and the Catholics.

LETTER FROM DANIEL O'CONNELL, ESQ. TO MR BUCHAN OF KELLOE.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour."

Merion Square, Dublin, 12th Oct. 1835.

SIR—The catechism which I was taught contained the exposition of the last word of that Divine commandment thus:—

Q. Who is meant by your neighbour?

A. All mankind—including as well all those who differ with us in religion, as those who actually injure us.

Without more preface, I come to the cause of my thus addressing you. The newspapers represent you to have said, at a special meeting of the Assembly, "That I was an impious person, and had polluted the soil of Scotland." Such was your testimony against me.

I deny both parts of your accusation. I deny that I am an impious person—and I utterly deny that I have done any mischief to the soil of Scotland. The latter, to be sure, is figurative language—and I readily forgive you your "poetic imagining." I merely caution you against using other than the language of sobriety when you address a grave and sober assembly.

But that which I complain of is, your gratuitous charge against me, of my being an impious person. You made that accusation in an assembly of persons of undoubted worth and respectability—in the solemn assemblage of clergy and reverend elders of the Scottish church. You made it without any provocation from me. I had never assailed your church or your religion—nor indeed did I ever speak discourteously of the religion of any man—still less did I ever accuse you or any other man of impiety.

I know, sir, that it is forbidden to me to judge of the servant of another master. I would, therefore, not presume to pronounce judgment upon the piety of any fellow Christian—the servant of that God who sees the secrets of hearts, and who alone can pronounce a judgment with full knowledge of all the merits.

I do, therefore, complain of your condemning me—you who are not my judge, and have not heard me in my defence. Yet, without jurisdiction, or authority, or knowledge of the cause, you fulminate your anathema, and pronounce me accursed—that is, an impious person.

I have no means of knowing your character, save from finding that you are a member of the General Assembly of your church; I therefore am warranted in considering you a respectable person. The charge was made against me in a body entitled to respect. Judge, then, how painful it ought to be to me, who have all my life been the decided advocate of freedom of conscience, to find myself treated as if I were an infidel, by a fellow Christian, in an assemblage of the heads of a national church.

However, I am so accustomed to every species of vilification, that I would not make this appeal to you to retract your unjust charge, but that I am actuated, I firmly believe, by higher motives than any which could attach to my personal feelings. If I understand you right, you have, in my person, assailed that religion of which I am a member. Your charge against me is, I conceive, a charge against the Catholic faith, which I profess, and most sincerely believe.

The impiety you accuse me of, is the profession of the Catholic faith. If you disclaim that intention, and mean to confine the charge to me individually, then it is not worth while to discuss the matter further. I readily forgive the personal calumny, and will speedily forget that it ever existed.

Let us understand each other. What I call "the Catholic faith"—simply because I am convinced it is so—you probably call "Popery," or "Romanism," or some other insulting denomination. Be it so. It is intelligible to both of us. I will not complain of, though I protest mildly, but firmly, against the insult. One thing is certain, that I never will imitate the example of those who rail at the religion of others. I never will call your religion by any name which you disclaim or disavow. I may not be able to call it by as flattering a denomination as you may claim for it, but I never will denominate it by any term which you deem to be an insult.

These preliminaries being understood, I proceed to expostulate with you upon the calumny you have uttered against my religion. I do so in the total absence of harshness or violence of language. I can be harsh and violent enough upon political topics, but I deem either the one or the other totally unsuited to religious subjects.

Let me then ask you, whether it be befitting, or even decent, to stigmatise as impious the religion of the great and overwhelming majority of the Christian world—the only religion known or recognised in Christendom for many, very many centuries—the only religion of Scotland for many ages—the only religion of Great Britain for at least eight centuries, as I am warranted in saying, even by the Book of Homilies of the Church of England?

I conjure you to recollect, that this charge of impiety is made by you against a great proportion of your existing fellow-subjects in Great Britain and Ireland. In Ireland alone, the Catholics—the impious, as you are pleased to call us—are proved to be six millions and a half. The Catholics of England, Scotland, and Wales, probably amount to one million and a half. If you take the trouble of looking at the list of Catholic chapels built and building in Great Britain, you probably will not deem this an over-estimate; but take them at only one million—and they certainly amount to that number at the least—they make for Great Britain and Ireland seven millions four hundred thousand. Is it really not too bad to charge such a number of your fellow subjects and fellow Christians with impiety?

But the Catholics are, I do believe, more numerous in the United Kingdoms than any other Christian persuasion. I doubt much whether there are seven millions and a half belonging to the established church of England. One would say, certainly not more. Of your religion—that is, of persons in communion with the established church in Scotland—there are not more than two millions and a half. Ought you then so lightly and idly to accuse us of impiety? We Catholics of the present day do not accuse you Presbyterians of impiety; and yet we are three for one. This does not make us insolent. Why, then, will you hurl affronts at us? You revile my religion. I never will revile yours; and yet I am as firmly convinced that you are in error as you are that the error is mine. But my conviction of your error is only a reason why I should pity and pray for you; not any reason why I should abuse or calumniate your creed or yourself.

I should indeed hope that the time was come when Christians of every persuasion would attend more carefully each to his own religion, than to the censure or condemnation of the faith or religion of others who differ with them. It is time to give up vituperation, and abuse, and calumny, upon our respective creeds, and to think and speak of one another in terms of mutual forbearance and reciprocal charity.

After all, I ask you, sir, what is the use of abusive epithets on the subject of religion? You do not convince or tend to convince me of my error, by calling me impious. Nay, if you were to use language ten times more abusive, it would present no argument to my mind against my religion, or in favour of yours. The contrary is the natural consequence—go farther, and use blows and personal violence, still you do nothing to persuade or convince. You may make a hypocrite and renegade, but you do not make a convert—go farther still, and punish “impiety” with death, you make a martyr, but you also exhibit a persecutor—and on his part no Christianity at all.

The time is come when persecution, verbal as well as corporal, should cease—when argument should be substituted for invective in matters of religion—and benevolence and charity preside over the indifferences and discussions of Christian men.

In this spirit, I invite you to withdraw your calumnious charge of impiety, or to sustain it by proof. I am ready to meet you in fair argument, and to defend, without heat or passion, that faith on which my hopes of eternal happiness rest. I do not provoke the controversy—but infinitely less do I shrink from it. I do not invite it—but I do not dread it, and I am quite ready for it. If you embark in the controversy, it shall certainly be conducted on my part in the total absence of any thing which could violate that Christian charity which it is my first and most ardent desire to see prevail amongst Christians of all denominations.

It may be thought and said that it would be preferable that I should leave your charge of impiety unnoticed. My opinion is otherwise. I owe too deep a debt of gratitude to the people of Scotland, not to repudiate the charge of impiety upon the man whom they have so honoured. I have too great a respect for the integrity and intelligence of the Scottish people, not to be persuaded that they will esteem me the more for the sensitiveness with which I seek to expel from the vocabulary of Christians, terms of reproach and obloquy, as addressed to their creeds and modes of faith.

Besides, the last remaining hope of the oligarchs and monopolists of abused power is to be found in exciting rancour, animosity, and strife, amongst the different sects and persuasions of Christians. The forward march of improvement in our social state—the attainment of equal rights to all—the shifting of the fiscal burdens of the state from the operative classes to the possessors of property—the amelioration of our institutions until the machine of the state partakes of the improvement of all other species of machinery; all those tranquil alterations which are destined to produce cheap government and good government—all this mass of public and private utility, is now sought to be retarded, and stayed, and stopped by the obtrusion of bigotry and religious jealousies. It is an oft-repeated experiment, by which a combination of all the oppressed against the oppressors has been many a time prevented. But the cry of “No Popery” is almost exhausted. Its last efforts are pu-ling and paltry; but they are perseveringly made. The Hero of Waterloo has now little of other resource. The more practised hypocrite of Tamworth is literally at his last prayers. The minions of Toryism, anxious for public plunder, and for a restoration of those happy, happy days, when favouritism supplied the place of talent and of worth—and, lastly, the lordly majority of 170, “our most potent masters,” are now defended by their last bulwark—the animosity, jealousy, and rancour, which formerly subsisted, and now are sought to be re-animated between the various sects and persuasions into which the British and Irish people are divided.

This, therefore, is the time to discountenance every thing that tends to assist the common enemy of our country's welfare—to repudiate every thing that tarnishes or stains our common Christianity. On the contrary, let us proclaim “the peace of God” amongst Christians of all persuasions, and that combination of good men which can easily extinguish hypocrisy and injustice, and establish in their stead constitutional liberty.—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient humble servant, DANIEL O'CONNELL.

To Mr Buchan of Kelloe, Member of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

THE SCOTTISH BURGHS.

THE following passages from the Report of the Royal Commissioners on the subject of the Scottish Burghs, will be read with interest:—

“Almost all the Scotch burghs had originally extensive possessions, of which the greater portion is now lost to the community. A few examples of alienation may be given. The city of Aberdeen formerly possessed lands of great extent, the greater part of which were alienated for very small feu-duties, in virtue of powers contained in a charter from the crown, dated 4th March 1551. Fishings, now producing about L.10,000 a-year, were about the same time alienated for an annual feu-duty of L.27, 7s. 8d. Again, about 1581, Banff obtained a charter, giving power to the corporation to feu the property of the burgh to burgesses and their heirs male, under condition of a forfeiture, if alienated to any other than a resident burgess. The condition having never been observed, or soon disregarded, the greater part of the property was acquired by the neighbouring noble families of Findlater, Fife, and Banff. The whole parish of Ayr, at one time, belonged to the burgh. It fell into the hands of the crown by a feudal casualty. But James IV., by a charter dated 16th February 1507, again granted it to the burgh, with a power of alienation, which has been so freely exercised, that nearly the whole has been granted in feu. It has been already mentioned, that permission was, in 1691, given to the Corporation of Glasgow, by the Convention of Royal Burghs, to sell lands of great value, because heavy burdens had been ‘occasioned by the vast sums that have been borrowed by the late magistrates, and the misapplying and dilapidation of the town's patrimony, in suffering their debts to swell, and employing their common store for their own sinister ends and uses.’ These lands were accordingly sold, avowedly in consequence of the malversation of the magistrates. Had this not happened, the burgh would now, in addition to its present estate, have been in the possession of lands worth from L.100,000 to L.150,000, a sum sufficient to have relieved the inhabitants of almost all the burghal taxes that now press on them.

In modern times the same system has prevailed. From 1812 to 1817, numerous superiorities in Mid-Lothian were sold by the town-council of Edinburgh to members of its own body and their friends. The sales were made without advertisement, or notification of any kind, and without evidence of value: and although the transactions were immediately beneficial to the city, and have proved ultimately unprofitable to the purchasers, they were so conducted as to deprive their authors of the credit of having acted on any public principle. One of the town-council of Inverness, in 1797, privately purchased, for an inadequate price, and a small feu-duty, lands close to his residence, which, although represented in the minutes of council as ‘barren and of no use,’ were improved at a small expense, and let for a yearly rent nearly equal to the consideration given. In Tain, from 1774 to 1816, there were numerous alienations to members of council, by private bargains, and for inadequate prices. The burgh of Renfrew made four different sales to the provost; and, in every instance, the proposal for the sale originated with that magistrate himself, and was sanctioned by his official signature. In one instance, it is expressly stated in the minutes, that the only reason for the sale was that it would be beneficial to the provost; and in no instance does there appear to have been any necessity for the sales, in order to raise money for the use of the burgh. Several instances of improper alienation in the burgh of Lochmaben were of more difficult detection, as the records had been kept with great irregularity; but it is certain that in 1801 a considerable farm was sold to the father-in-law of the provost for the time, no entry of which transaction appears in the records. Other instances, though of minor importance, have been found in Dumbarton, Lanark, Tain, Annan, and Wick.

The fishings of Dumbarton had, for several years, been privately let for L.170 to a tenant, two of whose relations were members of council; but when they came to be let by auction, a rent of L.385 was obtained.

In examining the present state of burghal property, and in considering the estimates of its value which have been communicated by the officers of different burghs, we have been strongly impressed with the mischief which has been already produced, by exaggerated estimates, and the dangers that still impend over many burghs, in the reckless contracting of debts, without any just ascertainment of the means by which they may be ultimately discharged. Erroneous valuations have been of three kinds. A value has been put upon mere revenue, as if it were property; property which is regarded as not available to creditors, such as churches, court-rooms, and similar buildings, has been included in valuations; and the available property has been rated at too high a value. Edinburgh gives a remarkable example of the first; for ‘the gross annual amount of all the various heads of revenue receivable by the city, including the jail fees, and money collected in the box, was taken at twenty years’ purchase as assets, without deducting either the expense of collecting the average of sums lost by bad debts, or abatements or deductions made, without considering whether the revenues are saleable or not, and without allowing for the annual charges with which they are burdened, or for some of them which are about to cease, and others which cannot commence for several years to come.’ In many of the burghs, the customs, market dues, and even the street manure, are included as property.

The excess of expenditure beyond the amount of ordinary revenue has arisen in part from outlays on public buildings, or on works for public purposes, from the expense of obtaining acts of Parliament, and not unfrequently from the costs of litigation, and the expense of public entertainments. Although the erection of works for public use must, in many cases, have been either necessary or so beneficial as to warrant extraordinary expenditure, there are numerous examples in which this apology is wanting. Thus, improvements were executed by the magistrates of Aberdeen, which, although affording great additional comfort and convenience to the citizens, were yet executed on a scale of expense so disproportionate to the real means of the city, that it was at one time reduced to insolvency. In Edinburgh, churches were built at an exorbitant expense; and recently a school-house was erected at the cost of L.33,000, three-fourths of which sum was paid by the city. In Dumbarton, some property belonging to the burgh was improved on so extensive a plan, that debt was necessarily contracted; whereas, under good management, the expenditure might have been defrayed out of the revenue. In Banff a market-place was erected, which, although useful, and making a certain return, was more expensive than the revenue warranted, and consequently caused an increase of the debt. At Cupar much money was injudiciously expended on a jail, in which accommodation and utility were sacrificed to external appearance; and with this must be combined considerable sums laid out in opening up new streets. It is needless to multiply examples, as even in burghs, the affairs of which are now, in general, well managed, there is a strong tendency to undertake expensive public works, without duly considering the adequacy of either the means or the return.

Although, of late years, the lavish expenditure on civic entertainments has been diminished in many burghs, it cannot here be altogether overlooked. In Edinburgh, the cost of entertainments in 1819 was L.782; in 1820, L.1066; and in 1821, L.755. In Inverury, the revenue of which was very small, upwards of L.600 had been expended, between the years ending 1805 and 1817, in paying tavern bills for entertaining the council, to an innkeeper, who continued to be the resident chief magistrate until the election under the burgh reform act in 1833. In Lanark, the expenses for entertainments amounted, during 1815, to upwards of L.108. In other burghs, as in Tain, Pittenweem, Selkirk, and Renfrew, there has been evident excess in this department.

In the contracting of debts, the managers of municipal corporations appear to have possessed facilities which have proved most mischievous to all parties. Relying upon the credit of public funds, the true value of which was ill understood, or skilfully misrepresented, private individuals have been but too easily induced to become lenders: and magistrates themselves, being frequently the trustees of public charities and endowments, have seldom scrupled to avail themselves, for burghal purposes, of funds which were thus placed within their grasp. Borrowing in this manner from themselves, it is unnecessary to prove that those rules by which prudent men are guided in pecuniary transactions, would not be very strictly observed. Accordingly, it has repeatedly happened, either that no specific security was given, but the trust funds were blended with those of the burgh, or the security on which they were ostensibly borrowed was of little or no value. Thus the magistrates and council of Edinburgh borrowed the funds of a trust, of which they were the sole managers, and implored the ale-dues for repayment, though these duties were greatly inferior in amount to the debts with which they were already burdened, and were to expire in five years. In Aberdeen, the magistrates and council not only borrowed funds on the security of heritable property belonging to charities, of which they were the sole trustees, but sold part of that property, to the amount of nearly L.35,000, and applied the whole in payment of the debts of the city.

Edinburgh has lately become insolvent; and while there has been much dispute as to the real value of the assets, it seems certain that the debts amount to upwards of L.633,648. The disclosures made before the committee of the House of Commons in 1819, were sufficient to have satisfied men of ordinary prudence that the affairs of the city were in so dangerous a state, that the utmost economy was necessary to avoid bankruptcy; but, nevertheless, a system of profuse expenditure was continued; although, according to the evidence of the accountant, he repeatedly acquainted the corporation of the peril to which they were exposed. Devices of various kinds were adopted, in order to satisfy the demands of pressing creditors, and to avoid a declaration of insolvency; and, even when that declaration had become unavoidable, states of affairs were exhibited, which, upon examination, were found to be fallacious.

In Dumbarton there has been a gradual increase of debt, which has terminated in bankruptcy. In 1819 the records of the burgh exhibit, for the first time, a statement of debt, which then amounted to upwards of L.10,000, but for the year ending at Michaelmas 1832, it was upwards of L.19,000. Throughout attempts were constantly made to conceal the real state of affairs, by framing the annual accounts in a mode so complicated as to render investigation extremely difficult; and, as the debt increased, the value of the property was fictitiously enlarged in proportion, so that there was always an apparent balance in favour of the burgh.

In some burghs the funds vested in the magistrates and council for charitable purposes, which are usually called mortifications, have not been properly administered. Mention has already been made of the gross mismanagement which occurred in Edinburgh and Aberdeen, and of the practice of the magistrates or council borrowing, in their corporate capacity, the funds vested in them as trustees. A striking example of malversation, with relation to the property of Trinity Hospital in Edinburgh, has been observed. The town council of Edinburgh are the administrators, and they consented to the imposition on its funds of a debt of L.4000, for making a road, and building a bridge near the city, by neither of which any part of the property of the hospital was benefited. Without actual malversation, there is sometimes carelessness. Thus, in Banff, a fund, of which the magistrates were administrators, was vested in government stock, in the names of four of the burghesses, without any declaration of trust. Two of them being now dead, and a third lately bankrupt, there remains only one in whom the trust is confided."

TRIAL FOR CRUELTY.

Oct. 14. David Kennedy, weaver, Lauriston, Stirlingshire, was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment by the sheriff of that county, for cruelty to two apprentice girls named Duncan and Thomson, who had been consigned to his care by the Edinburgh House of Refuge. The evidence of the two girls in this case, displays one of the most remarkable instances of malignant cruelty which ever fell under our notice, that of Mrs Brownriggs scarcely excepted. After having been bound to him about six months ago, he had used them pretty well for the first two weeks, but then began to beat them for alleged impertinence in their work. The evidence of Mary Anne Duncan, aged 12 years, was to the following effect:—That about four or five weeks after he began to beat them, witness ran away, and went to a Mr Ramsay's, but was taken back a short time after by the pannel. She was beaten every day from that time till the people of the village rose up and took her from the prisoner, which was in August last. That when he first began to beat her, he used a weaver's dressing-brush, and struck her with it on the back, shoulders, and arms—and so severely, that she cried with the pain. Being interrogated why he did so, she said, if she happened to stop to knot a broken thread, he beat her for taking too long time, so that the hurry made her make a bad knot, which looked ill in the cloth, and then he would beat her for bad work; she was repeatedly beaten in the same day for this fault. The prisoner was in the habit of beating witness more severely than the other girl. He one day broke a weaver's brush upon her back. Witness was beaten every day, both with the brushes and with rolling-pins, "except one day, which happened to be a fair day," until the people rose and rescued her from further violence. There was one day he called on Mary Thomson, who was in the kitchen, to bring a rolling-pin from the shop, and though Mary got a pin, she said she could not get one, on account of the darkness of the place, and Mrs Kennedy cried out to lock her in the shop. He did not do this, but went to it himself, and beat Mary Thomson with the rolling-pin into the kitchen, and then returning, he ordered witness to sit down till he examined her cloth, and for every fault or knot in it, he beat her in the knees until they were black and blue, witness screaming all that time, and crying murder. He also struck witness with ropes, his fists, and kicked her with his feet. He beat her with a stick one morning until her head began to bleed, and some blood falling in the web, he removed her to prevent it. She then went into the kitchen to get the blood from her head, when he saw three threads awanting in the web, upon which he called his wife to come and look at what he had done. His wife said, that if beating would not make her work right, she would give her salts for her breakfast and dinner. He then made witness lie down "with her face to the floor," when he beat her with a rolling-pin, the witness crying and screaming out murder. She had no sleep all night on account of the inflamed state of her back, and next morning, Mary Thomson told her she had been moaning all night. He was also in the habit of making her hold out her feet until he would stamp upon them, which he frequently did until the blood sprang from her toes—he holding her mouth all the time to stifle her cries, lest the neighbours should hear her. She never was free from bruises; before one was healed, another was made. He was very severe before the mob rose. He struck her one day on the eye which was a little black before, and the new stroke made it completely black and swelled; he then intended, as he could not get a leech, to prick it with pins, and make Mary Thomson suck it, so that the neighbours might not notice it. Mary Thomson, however, refused to suck it. When she was discovered and taken away by the people, her back was very much inflamed on account of being beaten with brushes, which the prisoner was accustomed to do when dressing Mary Thomson's web, if the witness stooped for a moment to sort her web—her back being at the time turned to Mary Thomson's back. Some weeks before she was taken away, he took her into the kitchen and threw her down, and danced upon her with his feet—"her face being turned to the ground;" because she had happened to fall on her web and break some threads. They had certain tasks; witness's was a 30 ell cut in four days, of a 14 strip web. It was but seldom she accomplished it. To the last one she took a week and some days, for which she was beat, besides the beatings she got for bad work. She was tasked to eight long dressings in a day; four eight long dressings making a 30 ell cut. They commenced to work sometimes at four and five o'clock, and there were no meal hours; but when the meat was ready they got it, and then had to begin immediately to work, and continue so long as they could see, which was generally about eight o'clock, "and whiles longer." Besides beating them, they sometimes got no breakfast, but got the cold porridge to their supper as a punishment; and, as a punishment, she often did not get meat enough. She often saw Mary Thomson struck in the same way, and having cuts and bruises on all her body. When witness came to prisoner, she had good health. Mary Thomson had something which he said was the itch. When prisoner heard that the people were going to rescue her, he put her in a garret, and told her not to speak above her breath, or else he would beat her worse than ever. There was no stair to the garret, nor any entrance but by a hole; so that the prisoner had to stand on chairs and lift her up and put her in. She lay there from eight o'clock in the morning till two, and got nothing to eat since the night before, except a small bit of bread which pannel gave her. When the mob were searching for her, he said to them that there were no garrets, so that they were searching from eight till two before she was discovered. Witness was afraid to speak—but at last, when the people were below, she put her hand out of the hole, in order to let them know that she was there, when she was immediately taken down, and brought to Falkirk.—The evidence of Robert Hay, weaver in Lauriston, was striking. On the morning the children were taken from Kennedy's house, witness's wife brought Mary Thomson into his house before breakfast. Witness was at that time in bed. Mary Thomson was sitting at his bedside, and he clapped her on the head, telling her "no to greet, for there was none there who would hurt her;" and as he was clapping her on the head, she said, "Oh, dinna do that, for it's a sair." Witness then clapped her on the shoulder, when she said that "it was a sair too." "Wi' that," said the witness, "I just started frae my bed, and said, 'damn them, are you a' sair tgether;' and syne I told my wife to gie her my ain hairn's parridge." On examining her he found her all over marked with bruises, some of which were full of matter, and she told him she had got some of them that morning. Soon after the prisoner came into witness's house, and said, "did I strike you, my dear favourite Mary Thomson?" but he was immediately thrust out of doors by the women who had examined Mary, and who found her from the foot to the thigh, all black, blue, and yellow, as if from kicks, or something of that sort.

Sept. 18. At the Circuit Court of Justiciary in Inverness, John Adam was found guilty of murdering his wife Jean Brechin, on or about the 30th of March last, near a plantation on the lands of Killo, parish of Killearnan, and county of Ross. The prisoner was hanged at Inverness, October 16.

—25. The operations for a railway between Paisley and Renfrew were commenced.

—30. The Commission of the General Assembly met in the Old Church, St Giles's, Edinburgh, for the purpose of considering the terms of the instructions issued by government to the Church Commission, and to deliberate on the steps necessary to be taken by the church in regard to it. A copy of the instructions to the Church Inquiry Commission, and a copy of a letter addressed by Lord J. Russell to its president, the Earl of Minto, were laid before the meeting: the latter explained that the admission of some individuals hostile to the church into the commission was for the purpose of assuring the dissenters that the inquiry would be conducted with impartiality. It also explained that the commission was to make no inquiry respecting "the kind of pastoral superintendence given by the clergy," but only into its amount. Dr Chalmers then entered into a long statement respecting the proceedings of the church deputation, of which he had been a member, and which had been suspected of remissness in the performance of its duty in London. He said that, before the arrival of the deputation, the commission of church inquiry had been resolved upon. They had been able, however, to prevail on the government to extend the objects of the commission, so as to embrace the amount of pastoral superintendence and of attendance on public worship, as well as the amount of church accommodation. All their intercourse with the government had been satisfactory till the close, and they felt assured that the composition of the commission would be agreeable to the church. The ultimate admission of persons hostile to the church had greatly surprised him. Unless they had been unduly suspicious, and anticipated that the measure "might be handed over, for the settlement of its details, to some lurking low-minded underlings of office, some hackneyed practitioners in politics, unenumbered with delicacy, truth, and honour," they could not have produced a better result. Notwithstanding the provocations and perversities they had suffered, it was not only the wisdom, but the duty of the church to carry the principle of forbearance to the very uttermost. Even on the worst supposition, and though there were no confidence in the commission or the government on the part of the friends of the church, though they believed that the government would cast her interests to the winds if they could make a single ten-pounder by it (a laugh); though they felt ever so much annoyed by the hollow professions, the shifts and vacillations—the balancing and compromising between the Church and the Voluntaries, which imparted to all the government proceedings on the subject such a pibald and patchwork character, still he was anxious that no declaration should proceed from the church which could bear one character of recklessness or heedlessness; that whatever they did should be wise and well weighed; and that in all their proceedings they should not go beyond the limits of sound, temperate, and constitutional feeling. He remarked, that in certain quarters people recoiled even from the most general idea of a commission. There was, however, no ground for very violent alarm on this point. When they asked for money, government had a right to see that their allegations were correct; and when their application was granted, government had a right to see that the money was properly applied. Another objection was, that the commission were directed to inquire, not into the amount of instruction afforded by the church only, but into the instruction afforded by the dissenters also; and this had been considered as having been dictated by the alarming and dangerous principle, that wherever the Voluntaries had provided religious instruction for the people, whatever the nature of their tenets might be, there an establishment was uncalled for; and if a heretical sect should provide means of religious instruction commensurate with the wants of a whole people, then an establishment might be altogether dispensed with. The church might protest against this principle—indeed, he should be happy if they did so—but he hoped they would not resist the inquiry. The insertion of this clause would test the boasted power of the Voluntaries, and show in what way they supplied the outfields of the population. He welcomed this investigation as the only means by which it could be known how little was done by the dissenters, or, to speak more properly, how much was left by them undone.—Dr Cook made some observations of the same kind with those uttered from the speech of Dr Chalmers, but entertained a different opinion from that recently promulgated by the presbytery of Edinburgh—that the inquiry by a royal commission into the pastoral superintendence of the church was competent, and in accordance with the confession of faith. The reverend gentleman concluded by proposing a motion, which was challenged in many particulars by the more liberal members of the Assembly Commission, and eventually was passed in the following form:—"The commission having maturely deliberated on the instructions to the royal commissioners for inquiring into the means of religious instruction and pastoral superintendence afforded to the people of Scotland, express their deep regret that his Majesty's ministers have not been pleased, in consequence of the judgment of the last meeting of the Commission of the General Assembly, to make any change in the composition of the said royal commission. And whereas that commission, from its authorising the commissioners to inquire generally into the opportunities of religious worship, the means of religious instruction, and the pastoral superintendence afforded to the people of Scotland, and, as has been, interpreted as at variance with the principles and policy of the established church, and as calculated to weaken or to overthrow it, particularly inasmuch as it seems to involve in it a principle subversive of this and all other ecclesiastical establishments, viz., that whenever religious instruction and pastoral superintendence are found to a certain extent afforded by any sect or denomination whatsoever, there the services of an established church are not required, and may be dispensed with. The Commission of the General Assembly publicly and solemnly protest against whatever has such a tendency, and declare that they consider it to be the sacred duty of the legislature to support and to protect the national church, and to secure accommodation and religious instruction to the people of Scotland, so that they may attend regularly upon divine ordinances, and may profit by the pastoral exertions and superintendence of its ministers. With a view to these most important objects, and under the protestation herein contained, they approve of such members of the church, as may be required to do so by the commissioners nominated by his Majesty, furnishing accurate information as to all statistical matters; and also approve of all their courts allowing inspection of, or giving extracts from their records, of all entries relating to the same matters, it being clearly understood, that the Commission of the Assembly hold, that it is not competent to the commissioners to put to individual members any questions relating to the doctrine, worship, government, or discipline of the church."

Oct. 1. An anti-popery meeting was held in St Cuthbert's Church, Edinburgh. Dr Thomson, moderator of the General Assembly, in the chair, and which was attended by nearly all the established clergy of the city, some of the neighbourhood, and a few country gentlemen. A series of resolutions, expressing the sense entertained by the meeting, of the nature and tendency of popery, as inconsistent with the word of God, and the best interests of mankind, were moved and passed. The Rev. M. O'Sullivan then delivered a harangue against the Catholic faith, and in favour of the distressed church of Ireland.

—16. The trial of four females, and Donald Marshall, the bellman of Dunoon, charged by the procurator-fiscal of the county, with wilful and riotous mischief, by assembling in a tumultuous manner and driving down the walls in course of erection by Mr Ewing at Dunoon, in the month of August last, came on at Inverary. The defence was ably conducted by the solicitor, Mr William Westcott, Esq., advocate. After a long trial, the jury returned a verdict of guilty of the crime libelled, and, on the motion of the fiscal, they were fined in a mitigated penalty, and, failing payment, ordained to be imprisoned in Inverary jail for a period not exceeding forty days.

—19. Sir John Campbell met his constituents in Edinburgh, in the Waterloo Hotel. He alluded in the following terms to the House of Lords:—"I can tell you that their Lordships labour under a delusion. They think that they are exceedingly popular, and that they express the true voice of the nation. If you disabuse them on that subject, and let them find that they are very unpopular, and that their doctrines are exploded, you will find them extremely accommodating. (Applause.) There are various plans talked of for reforming the Lords. (Long continued cheering.) My plan is, let the people take care to return a good liberal House of Commons, and the Lords will be reformed. (Cheering.) Let them in a constitutional but bold and manly manner express their sentiments on the measures to be brought forward, and those measures will pass into a law. (Applause.) There are an auspicious forboding words in regard to another session of Parliament, and with regard to the future destinies of my country." When Sir John Campbell had concluded, thanks were voted to him.

Mr Andrew Johnston, M.P. for the Cupar burghs, and who lately refused to fulfil his pledge to resign when called upon to do so by a majority of his electors, has paid a visit to the burghs which he represents, and been treated in a manner which cannot but have been most distressing to his feelings. He made an effort to get up a meeting at Cupar, and the electors themselves immediately held a meeting, the provost in the chair, and unanimously expressed their surprise to understand that "Mr Andrew Johnston, M.P. has issued an advertisement requesting the electors to meet him here to-morrow evening;" and also unanimously resolved, "That, in considering the conduct of Mr Johnston, in refusing to resign his seat in Parliament, when called upon by nearly all his former supporters, in terms of the solemn pledge given by him, they were clearly of opinion that the Liberal electors ought not to attend the meeting called by Mr Johnston." Notwithstanding this, he made the attempt; only six of his former electors were in the room. The mortification at Cupar, however, was only the first of a series of penances to be undergone at different shrines in the course of the same pilgrimage. For instance, at St Andrews, he applied to the baird for the town-hall, and was answered—"My brother magistrates and myself have received your request of the town-hall for a public meeting on Tuesday first, and beg to intimate to you, that as we consider you no longer our representative, we therefore decline serving you in this matter.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, GEORGE LANGLANDS." Mr Johnston being thus foiled in obtaining the town-hall, advertised a meeting to be held in one of the inns. Between forty and fifty persons assembled out of curiosity, including twenty-seven electors, fourteen of whom were Tories, and thirteen Liberals, but no one would take the chair!

The northern herring season closed in the middle of September. From Cape Wrath to Peterhead, including Orkney, the lake was greater than on any former occasion during the last twenty years, every boat having obtained from 200 to 250 crans. In Shetland and the west coast, the fishing has been singularly successful.

It is with pleasure that we advert to and record the progressive improvement that has taken place throughout all Scotland for the last quarter of a century. But perhaps no part has made greater strides than the Highland and northern districts. Good roads are made, and public conveyances pass in many new directions. Having lately had occasion to visit that country, we were no less surprised than pleased, to have the convenience of an omnibus all the way from Inverness to Cromarty. We understand that the public is indebted for this benefit to the spirited exertions of Geo. Gunn Munro, Esq. of Poyntzfield, convener of the county of Cromarty, and we believe that he expects to be able to establish a similar mode of conveyance on the opposite side of the Cromarty Firth. It is just justice to add, that his Majesty's government have readily afforded every countenance and assistance in their power.

Robert Stephen Rintoul, Esq. editor of the Spectator, having lately paid a short visit to Dundee—the scene of his earlier political labours—was entertained at dinner in the Royal Hotel there, by a numerous and respectable company of friends and admirers, and presented with an elegant silver tea-service, as a mark of the high estimation in which his political principles and powerful advocacy of the Liberal cause are held by the people of Dundee.

CHAMBERS'S EDUCATIONAL COURSE,

EDITED BY

WILLIAM AND ROBERT CHAMBERS,

CONDUCTORS OF CHAMBERS'S EDINBURGH

JOURNAL, &c.

THE success which has attended the efforts of Messrs CHAMBERS in the business of Popular Instruction, has induced them to undertake the duty of supplying a series of Treatises and School Books, constructed according to the most advanced views of Education, both as a Science and an Art, and answering in its parts and ultimate general effect to the demands of the age. For this task they conceive themselves to possess considerable advantages, in the means they command for the preparation and diffusion of Popular Literature, their known independence on sects and parties of every kind, and the assurance which they hope has already been given and accepted, of the moral purity of their intentions.

Their Course will, as far as possible, embody the code and materials of a complete Elementary Education, Physical, Moral, and Intellectual, according to the following views:—

[Physical Education.] In order that man may possess a vigorous frame of body and its concomitant sound health, without which every species of moral and intellectual excellence is cramped and frustrated, he must be subjected from the moment of birth to such processes of management, and afterwards trained to such habits in food, exercise, cleanliness, and exposure to air, as have been ascertained to conduce to strength and health.

[Moral Education.] For the sake of himself and society, he must be habituated, from the dawn of consciousness and feeling, to the moderate activity and regulation of the inferior sentiments of his nature, and gradually to the due exercise of the higher sentiments—justice, kindness, and truth, towards his fellow-beings, and veneration towards the objects of his religious faith. In time, as his intellectual faculties develop themselves, he ought to be instructed in the theory, and impressed with the higher sanctions, of that morality in which he has been previously trained and exercised.

[Intellectual Education.] That he may be qualified for the ready acquisition of knowledge, and the performance of the duties and labours of life, he must be instructed in (1) Reading, at least in his own tongue, (2) Writing, (3) Arithmetic, and (4) Grammar, Etymology, and Composition. That he may enter life with a mind informed respecting that creation of which he is a part, and that society of which he is a member, and qualified as well as may be to perform the part which will fall to his lot, he must be acquainted with at least the elements of the following kinds of knowledge—(1) the Surface of the Earth (Geography); (2) the Structure of the Earth (Geology); (3) the Vegetable Productions of the Earth (Botany); (4) the Animal Creatures of the Earth (Zoology); (5) the Phenomena of the Atmosphere (Meteorology); (6) the Composition of the Substances of the Material World, and the changes which are produced by the action of these substances upon each other (Chemistry); (7) the Mechanical Powers and Relations of the Material World (Natural Philosophy); (8) the Science of Measurement (Geometry); (9) the Relation of our Globe to the other component parts of the vast System of Creation (Astronomy); (10) the Physical, Moral, and Intellectual Nature of Man, with reference to the preservation of health, and the attainment of happiness; (11) the Production and Distribution of National Wealth (Political Economy); (12) the History of Nations and Countries, ancient and Modern, especially those in which the Pupil is most interested—of their Literature, Eminent Men, Resources, &c.

The volumes necessary for the development of these views will probably be about thirty in number; of which a few will be addressed to Parents and Teachers, while the rest will assume the ordinary appearance of books for the school and lecture-room; but, externally, the whole will be uniform, and calculated to be eventually bound up in about a third part of the number of volumes stated. As it is not, in the meantime, possible for nearly the whole of the people to acquire a complete intellectual education under masters, the volumes referring to that department will be calculated as much as possible for the use of un instructed persons of all kinds, and in all circumstances. In order, likewise, that the works may be suitable for the education of youth of every sect and country—in order that there may be no obstacle within themselves to a circulation as universal as the Editors trust their principles are correct—no provision can be made in the series for religious and political education, for which, however, local and peculiar means every where exist.

The prices of books of instruction having hitherto been found a great obstacle to the extension of education, especially among the humbler orders, Messrs CHAMBERS have exerted themselves to produce those portions of their Course which will take the character of Text or School Books, at rates forming the smallest possible advance upon the cost of the materials. Each treatise being complete in itself, the Editors conceive themselves at liberty to mention, that their prosecuting the task to its conclusion will depend upon the leisure which other duties may leave to them, and the degree of encouragement which may be extended to their design by the public. As examples, almost at the extremes of the series, there will first be published,

THE WORLD YET IN ITS INFANCY.

THERE seems every reason to believe that men, as a race, and the earth itself, are but in the beginning of a career, which, in one sense of the phrase, may be termed boundless, although it is but slowly, and in recent times, that this idea has been gained, or that mankind have attained to any thing like a correct conception of their actual position amidst the immensity of the universe.

It was thus for a long period the prevailing belief of men, that this earth was the only world, and that there were no other beings over whom the Creator's care was extended, but those that people this minute province of his dominions. Nor was it till astronomy had made considerable progress, and was in a condition to explore the vast fields of space by the aid of improved instruments of observation, that the idea was forced on mankind, that the extent of the universe is absolutely boundless, and that this earth, with all its beauty, and all the hosts of its living inhabitants, is, in relation to the whole of created existence, but as a grain of sand upon the sea-shore.

One luminous or comprehensive idea, however, naturally prepares the way for another; and after mankind had thus become aware of the vastness of the field over which the living demonstrations of divine power are exhibited, and of the smallness of their globe in relation to the infinity of worlds that people the immensity of space, the transition was easy to the belief, that this globe itself may have existed under many forms previous to that in which we now find it, with arrangements of its materials suited to the purposes it was intended to serve, and with tribes of living inhabitants adapted to the circumstances in which existence had been assigned them, and to the progressive course in which the plan of the Creator's dominions was destined to be evolved. Nor was this conception long of attaining sufficient confirmation from observation of the actual appearances of the earth; for as astronomy, in its sublime progress, had unveiled the immensity of space, with all its inconceivable multitude of worlds, to the view of man, so geology, in its humbler researches, has made it evident, by its revelations respecting the structure of our globe, the remains of organised substances that are every where found embedded in its materials, and the appearances of violent disruption which these materials frequently exhibit, that the age of our world is of far greater antiquity than their first ideas had disposed men to believe; that it has existed in forms, and borne on its surface and in its encompassing fluids, modes of organised life, bearing but a partial resemblance to those with which, as living agents, we are at present familiar; and that its duration may thus have extended backwards into ages which the boldest flight of the human imagination may hesitate or find itself unable to fathom.

Having thus got quit of two of the limited forms which thought is apt to assume when, in its unenlightened condition, it begins to speculate respecting the place or history of our world; namely, that which represents it as the only world in existence, and that which, on this same supposition, regards its history as extending only to the distance of a few thousand years, or during the probable period of the continuance of the present arrangements on its surface, it was by a very natural process that the human imagination felt itself disposed, and indeed in a condition to extend the same, or a corresponding style of thought, into the ages which are yet to dawn over the fortunes of our world, and to anticipate for it a career as boundless as the utmost flight of imagination, in its most unfettered range, was capable of conceiving.

And as the human race seem thus to have run but a small part of the course over which they are destined to proceed, and the very world which they inhabit to be but a comparatively recent production of Almighty power, in so far at least as its present form and peculiar arrangement are concerned, what idea are we naturally led to entertain respecting the boundless extent of the ages that must yet revolve before the plan of Providence respecting this world shall be concluded, and respecting those changes that must occur to diversify the almost infinite lapse of the years that have been assigned it?

Even with respect to our own world, who can tell, or what mind even can conceive, the wonderful things that are yet to happen on it, after our moment of existence has passed—or what multitudes of beings, with the same nature which we bear, are destined to come forth—to see as we now see the "morning and the evening rejoicing over them"—and to pass through, in their successive generations, all that varied and ever changing and progressive course, which the principles that seem to govern the plan of Providence, and the obvious tendencies of all the things which we behold, give us reason to anticipate as the appointed career which Divine Providence has assigned to the future generations of mankind.

But, for giving some more precision to our thoughts on a subject which confessedly lies, in its full bearings, far beyond the distinct apprehension of our minds, the following explanations seem to be important:—

In the first place, when we speak of the course which has been marked out for the future fortunes of this world and of the human race, as interminable or boundless, we must be understood as expressing ourselves rather with a reference to the conceptive powers of our imaginations, than to the actual results which are destined to take place. We do not mean, in short, by this mode of expression, that no end is determined—no great breaking up—no conclusion of the grand drama that has been going forward—or no period when the present arrangements shall have completed their purpose and course—and when, either by an immediate exertion of Divine power, or by changes resulting from established laws, "a new heaven and a new earth" will succeed to the present—and the gift of existence be communicated to other beings, who, in successive series, are to be partakers, like ourselves, of the abundant riches of Creative power—and to witness successive displays of Divine wisdom and goodness. To suppose that no such succession of beings and of arrangements is to take place, would in fact be to detract from the true grandeur of the plan which is carrying forward—as well as to reason unsuitably to many of the most obvious symptoms which the actual manifestations of that plan exhibit—and there is, indeed, far truer grandeur, as well as far more conformity to the actual plan of Providence, in the supposition that worlds, and their arrangements, and the powers and destinies of the beings that people them, have their successive variations, like the generations that compose the same rational family during the continuance of any supposed arrangement—than would be involved in the comparatively poor idea, that the same race was to proceed for ever—and to be constantly undergoing great changes and witnessing vast revolutions, without, however, being ever able to attain any essential alteration in the constitution of that nature which distinguished them as a race.

Neither do we understand by the phrase that the course of nature is interminable or boundless, simply that we have no means of fixing precisely on the period when its present arrangements are to approach their termination; for that might be said of a series of arrangements which should in other respects be but of short continuance, and to which the epithets, interminable or boundless, could with no propriety be applied.

But what we really mean by such terms, applied to this subject, is, that the range in all probability assigned to the duration of this world, and of the successive races of human beings that are to people it, far exceeds the power of our imaginations to conceive, or is not subject to the rules and measures of computation of which our intelligence or skill has yet been able to avail itself. For it has been well observed, that, whether with respect to space or duration, there is but a limited quantity which our minds can take within their grasp, and that beyond that, every thing assumes to our imaginations, or to our powers of calculation, the aspect of immensity as applied to space, and of eternity as applied to time, although the boundlessness is, in reality, only in reference to our imaginations, and not in the actual arrangements respecting whose nature or characteristics we are speculating.

The ages assigned to the duration of our world and of the human race, may thus be said to be interminable or boundless, because they exceed the power of our imaginations to conceive, and the means of calculation which we possess, to compute, although we may still admit that the plan of Providence has a purpose to be accomplished, and that future races, with arrangements suited to their nature, are to occupy the places which we have occupied, and, it may be, to tread over the face of a world which we once called our own, but which shall eventually bear no traces of having ever borne on its surface the anxious and agitated race that now cover it with their works, and, as it may be, either illustrate it by their achievements, or deform it by their vices, or render it melancholy by their endurance, or, finally, that endear and beautify it by their private, or domestic, or social engagements.

But, for further making probable the boundlessness of the course assigned to our world, in the sense in which we have thus explained the term, the following considerations must also be taken into account:—

That the universe, so far as we see or can comprehend its arrangements, is connected throughout all its departments; and that this world, therefore, is in some measure dependent for its fate on changes that are to affect invisible portions of the same system. For it is not correctly true that this world is associated with the infinity of other worlds that people immensity, merely as one individual of a vast but insulated company; it must be kept in mind that it is one member of a system having mutual relations and influences throughout all its parts, and that whether, therefore, we can now assign, or shall ever be in a condition to assign, the causes that shall be brought into operation for concluding the present history of our world, there is evident probability in the supposition that its fate will not be without some relation to the condition of higher or more distant portions of the system, or at least to the agency of causes that extend far beyond our present powers of conception. Indeed, the frame of things is apparently so constituted, that, to our first view of it, each world in the vast scheme of nature is shut out from all communication with the rest; and from this arrangement, for which it is not difficult to assign sufficient reasons, we are apt to suppose that there really exists no connection between them, except that which constitutes them members of one vast though individually independent aggregate of worlds. But wider and juster views of the powers of nature, and of the plan of its operations, cannot fail to evince the improbability of this supposition; and in all our views, therefore, respecting the duration of our world, we shall be much aided in our conceptions, by taking into account the immensity of the system to which it belongs, and the consequent likelihood that its destined fate has a relation to the permanent provisions, and durable nature of the arrangements with which, throughout the entire compass of the system, it is in connection; and whose agency must be employed in any great alteration which our peculiar sphere of occupation may be destined to undergo.

But further, it must be kept in mind that the system of universal nature is not only connected, but every where, and by mutual arrangements and influences, progressive. For it is not merely a fixed and changeless assemblage of bodies that constitutes the glorious scheme which Divine wisdom is superintending and pervading; on the contrary, all nature is life, and even those parts of the system that seem to us, on a superficial view, to be the least suitable receptacles of living and intelligent existence, are yet endowed with powers which are in incessant energy, and which are constantly bringing forth forms that alter in some degree, and by a progressive effect, their nature and capacities. We thus perceive that activity is essential to all the parts of nature, whether on earth or in the higher regions of space—that nothing is in absolute repose for any one moment; that, indeed, from the very nature of existing things, such repose can never take place, because life and existence are synonymous; and wherever, therefore, there is any form of existence, even in its apparently most inert masses, there also there is activity, or the continued operation of powers, which must continue their energies as long as such bodies or forms of existence maintain their place in nature, and the cessation of whose active and progressive properties would involve the supposition of their entire extinction from the system of things. Life and existence, we again repeat, are, in this sense of the expression, synonymous; and in forming, therefore, our conceptions of the course actually prescribed to any portion of the system, we must take into account the progressive and multiform character of the energies by which it is pervaded, and the vast storehouse of means that are at once instrumental to its maintenance, and working together to bring forth its appointed issues.

Now, it is apparent, that though, in reference to a simpler and limited assemblage of agents, our powers of anticipation as to the coming result might be justified in assigning a termination of a comparatively proximate date, yet when we think of a system which is at once boundless in its connections, and infinite in the powers of activity and of progression which it involves, our calculations as to its endurance should bear some analogy to its entire character, or should be at once commensurate with the vast extent over which the change must be effected, and with the multiplicity of the powers whose design must be accomplished, before the result in anticipation can be brought forth.

And these anticipations will be still further confirmed, if we take into account, that, extensive as the scheme of nature is, and infinite as are the powers of living existence that are employed in conducting it, these are all under the guidance of determinate laws, and pervaded by wise and never failing principles. If, indeed, the contrary were the fact, and if the entire powers of nature, however various, and exhibited on however grand a scale, were yet left to their own undirected and wayward energies, the probability would then be, either that the system might endure for any imaginable period, or be suddenly brought to confusion, according to the chances that might be fixed on for either result. But in a system where even the minutest movements are wisely directed, and in harmony with the entire plan, our confidence in the stability of that plan is augmented by the very extent of the scale on which the operations are conducted, and by the multiplicity of the powers that are employed in harmony with each other. So that the doctrine of Divine Providence not only serves to give us confidence as to the benevolence of the result, happen when it may, but actually confirms us in the assurance, that a system, over which unchangeable wisdom and goodness are presiding, will bear some proportion, in the stability and extent of its endurance, to the attributes of the Being by whom it is conducted, and to the grandeur of the scheme which he has partially revealed for the confirmation of our trust.

From the whole of the preceding considerations, we seem justified in concluding that the course appointed to our earth, and to the series of generations that are destined to people it, will correspond with the scale of the plan to which it belongs, with the progressive character of the principles that are employed in bringing forth its results, and with the stability and beneficence of the laws to which all its connected and progressive powers are subject. A short course for our world is the natural suggestion of limited ideas respecting its place in the universe, and respecting the vast scene on which the proceedings of providential wisdom are conducted; but as our ideas of the actual relations of things extend, so also do our hopes of what is to befall our world during the many ages that are yet to revolve while its present form is continued—of the boundless, and, it is to be hoped, even brightening years that are to bring forth the destined purposes of Divine wisdom, and of the glorious changes that, in ages reaching beyond the powers of calculation belonging to the human mind, are to evolve the ever progressive fates of the highly endowed, though essentially imperfect portion of this intelligent family of the Creator that now people the province of his dominions.—From “My Old House, or the Doctrine of Changes.”

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

THE affairs of the existing government continue to promise well under the popular management of M. Mendizabal, to whom there is now no opposition, except in the limited districts of which Don Carlos has possessed himself. A powerful and spontaneous effort has been made by the people in almost all parts of Spain to aid the new government with volunteer corps, and pecuniary contributions. At the head of a subscription of money, appear the names of thirty-seven of the grandes. The ministry expect, in the beginning of December, to have forty thousand men equipped and brought into the field. The Cortes were to be opened on the 16th November.

About the middle of October, the Carlist strength in Catalonia was completely destroyed. Vich, which had been their head-quarters for some time, fell into the hands of the Queen's troops. Figueras, which they blockaded, was relieved; and the Count d'Espagne, with the remains of the troops, was driven over the frontier into France. In Biscay there has been little action; and, upon the whole, Carlos seems to have had the advantage. He was victor in a slight skirmish on the 28th October, and in another on the 3d November. The British legion has been confined to the defence of Bilbao.

The family of Riego, a patriot shot by Ferdinand in 1823, have been restored to their honours by Mendizabal.

FRANCE.

WHEN the Chamber of Deputies agreed to pay the indemnity money claimed by America, it stipulated that the sum (25,000,000 francs) should not be paid until President Jackson should have apologised for his insulting message. The president having refused to do this, the French minister of finance has dishonoured the bills for the amount drawn by the American treasury, and the ambassador of the United States has accordingly demanded his passports, which have been granted, though it is not expected that he will immediately leave the country, or that any hostile demonstrations will immediately follow.

DENMARK.

THE political movements in the south of Europe have withdrawn attention from the change recently made in the government of Denmark; yet the quiet introduction of representative chambers into an absolute monarchy cannot be deemed an uninteresting event. From an early period that kingdom had states of three orders, the nobility, clergy, and commons, in the usual feudal fashion, and the crown was elective. The nobles, however, engrossed all power; and so cruel and oppressive was their sway, that the nation, by a voluntary act in 1660, abolished the legislature, changed the elective into a hereditary crown, and declared the king's power to be absolute in the most unlimited and unqualified sense. It is probable that the mass of the people gained greatly by the change. The mischievous privileges of the nobles have been much restricted; the civil broils growing out of contests for the crown have ceased; and the country has received from one of its absolute sovereigns a code of laws which has been admired for its equity and simplicity. The present king, who ascended the throne in 1808, has been a zealous promoter of education; and the Danes are now among the best instructed nations in Europe. A good foundation has thus been laid for the introduction of a liberal system of government; and it would be satisfactory to think that the increased amount of popular intelligence influenced the king in the step he has taken. It probably has done so; but it appears that the prince royal is rather of weak mind, though not incapacitated for ordinary business; and the king is supposed to have been partly governed by a prudential anxiety to guard against the evils of unlimited power placed in such hands. A third motive perhaps co-operated, namely, the pressure of the public debt, and a deficient revenue. According to a notice published some time ago, the real amount of the public income and debt has been disclosed for the first time, in a communication to the states! The debt is 130,000,000 of rix-dollars (L.14,000,000); and the annual expenditure amounts to 13,000,000 of rix-dollars (L.1,400,000), of which 5,000,000 are absorbed by the interest of the debt. The revenue is not mentioned; but its amount seems to have been pretty accurately known before, as it is put down by Balbi in 1833, at L.1,300,000. On the other hand, public rumour had greatly understated the debt, for it is estimated by the same author at no more than L.6,000,000, or less than the half of its true amount. The Danes are, however, upon the whole, a lightly taxed people, and the public debt bears a much smaller proportion to the annual revenue, in their case, than in ours. Denmark has two millions of inhabitants, who pay on an average 13s. per annum each: Scotland, under the same climate, with fewer natural advantages, and with a population only one-sixth larger, pays about 40s. for each inhabitant. We have seen no distinct account of the new Danish constitution. It is said that the constituency is extremely limited: we observe, however, from the scanty notices given by the London papers, that some men of popular principles have been returned, and are contending for the publication of the debates, and the freedom of the press.

* Edinburgh, Thomas Clark, 1835. This is a recently published work, full of fine speculation and good feeling, though many readers will be disposed to combat the inferences which it draws respecting local and temporary politics.

The French government continues its virulent persecutions against the newspaper press. Two individuals, M. Sarrans, the principal editor of a weekly journal, called the Nouvelle Minerve, and General Latapie, an officer in the service of Don Carlos, have been prosecuted in an action of slander, at the instance of the Duke de Broglie. The gravamen of the charge consisted in certain articles inserted in the said journal, detailing the progress of the war in the north of Spain as favourable to the Carlists, which articles were furnished by General Latapie, who implicated the Duke de Broglie as an accomplice in obtaining their insertion. This statement of the Nouvelle Minerve was contradicted in a government paper, in answer to which the gallant general published a letter in the Minerve, reasserting his original statement, and consequently charging the duke with being guilty of a direct and positive falsehood. The jury returned a verdict of guilty against the defendants, and the court sentenced the editor to imprisonment for fifteen days, and the payment of a fine of two thousand francs with costs. General Latapie was sentenced to a like fine, and imprisonment for two months, with the interdiction of civil rights during that period. Another journal, the Reformateur, has again been brought before the Court of Assizes, charged with an attempt to excite hatred against the government, and provoke disobedience to the laws; the editor has been found guilty and sentenced to two months' imprisonment, with a fine of two thousand francs. In consequence of these repeated prosecutions, the Reformateur has ceased to exist. Three other journals have been prosecuted for similar offences, the Charivari, the Quotidienne, and the Bons Sens. The essence of the charge against the former is its being printed in red ink, the sanguinary colour of which was construed into a symbolical incitement of violence against the government. The editor, M. Simon, who knew nothing of the article nor of the red ink, was sentenced to imprisonment and a fine of five thousand francs; but the other two were acquitted, their crime being merely copying articles from the London journals, condemnatory of the new laws against the press.

The Journal des Debats has revealed to the political world the existence of a treaty of commerce between the governments of Austria and Greece, signed at Athens on the 4th of last March, and ratified in Vienna on the 9th of September following. The communications between Greece and Austria having been firmly established on the western coast, and found highly beneficial to both countries, the object of the treaty is to fix their commercial intercourse upon a regular footing, and especially to extend it on the eastern side, by providing for its encouragement through the Danube, the Euxine, the Bosphorus, and the Dardanelles, to the Piræus. The following is the 17th article of the treaty in question, which binds the contracting parties to a future consideration of the means best calculated to promote their commercial intercourse by the Danube:—“With regard to the importation and exportation of the goods of the two states by the Danube, whether along that river or at its entrance, the two high contracting parties here record their formal intention of favouring that commerce, reserving to themselves the faculty of fixing in a special treaty the means by which it might be best promoted.”—The writer in the Journal des Debats seems to think that this stipulation was introduced by Austria into the treaty, with the express view of trying the right assumed by Russia [or to be assumed by Russia], of being the sole keeper of each of the three separate entrances of the Danube. It is most probable.

The Czar Nicholas continues to heap the most brutal insults and injuries on Poland. He has extinguished what remains of the Polish nobility, and escheated their estates to Russians. In passing through this unhappy country the other day, his agents had assembled some servile Poles to meet him with a deputation, that he might have the opportunity of further insulting their name and nation. He affected to refuse to hear their falsehoods—and thus proceeded:—“Gentlemen, we require actions and not mere words; repentance should come from the heart; I speak to you without anger, and you must perceive that I am perfectly calm; I have no rancour, and I will do you good even in spite of yourselves. The marshal who stands before you fulfils my intentions, seconds all my views, and also watches for your welfare.” [At these words the members of the deputation bowed to the marshal.] “Well, gentlemen, but what signify these salutations? The first duty is to perform one's duties, and conduct ourselves like honest men. You have, gentlemen, to choose between two alternatives; either to persist in your illusions as to an independent kingdom of Poland, or to live tranquilly as faithful subjects under my government. If you persist in your dreams of a distinct nationality, of the independence of Poland, and of all these chimeras, you will only draw down upon yourselves still greater misfortunes. I have raised this citadel; and I declare that, on the slightest insurrection, I will cause its cannon to thunder upon the city. Warsaw shall be destroyed, and certainly shall never be rebuilt in my time. It is painful to me to speak thus to you—it is always painful to a sovereign to treat his subjects thus; but I do it for your own good. It is for you, gentlemen, to deserve an oblivion of the past; it is only by your obedience to my government that you can obtain this." Nicholas said emphatically, in conclusion, "Remember well all that I have now said to you." It will all be well remembered!—Examiner.

The House of Assembly of Lower Canada was opened on the 27th of October, by the Earl of Gosport, with a long speech. Its tone is extremely conciliatory. He promises a careful consideration of all grievances, and most anxious endeavours on his part to redress them. The whole revenue of the colony is to be placed under the control of the legislature; and that revenue, he says, is triple of the expenditure, though the country pays no direct taxes. He declares his resolution to make no difference between the colonists of French and British origin, in dispensing the patronage of the government, and states that "England will foster and protect the benevolent and pious priesthood (of the Catholics), under whose care so much of order and good conduct is created and preserved." He offers ready access to the public accounts and papers of every kind; the practice of remitting bills to Britain for the king's assent, is to be confined within the narrowest limits, and the loss of time in procuring an answer prevented as far as possible: a reform of the legislative council (the Canadian "House of Lords") is promised; the unpopular constitution of which has long been considered as the master grievance of the colony. In reference probably to this point, he admits, that "to be acceptable to the great body of the people, is one of the most essential elements of fitness for public stations, in every country." The administration of law is to be improved, and the excessive fees paid to public officers reduced. The speech closes with an eloquent appeal to the people on the advantages of their situation, and a solemn assurance that the government has nothing so much at heart as their prosperity and happiness, and is ready to make all reasonable concessions. The address is conceived in the very best spirit, and augurs well for the success of the Commission.

The Earl of Gosford is said to have given offence at the very outset of his administration in Canada, by inviting to his table Messrs Viger and Papineau, the chiefs of the popular party.

There are three candidates in the field for the American presidential chair—Mr Van Buren, Mr Hugh L. White (the judge) of Irish descent, and Mr Webster. The probability is, that the democratical party will succeed in electing the first-named gentleman, who is at present vice-president of the Union, and a very intimate friend of General Jackson.

The Leeds Mercury states that letters of a most distressing nature have been received from Mr George Thompson, the zealous missionary of slave emancipation, who has gone from this country to the United States, and who writes from Boston, dated September 11. He says that the "North" (that is, New England, where slavery does not exist) "has universally sympathised with the South," in opposition to the abolitionists: that "the North has let fall the mask; merchants and mechanics, priests and politicians, have alike stood forth, the defenders of southern despots, and the furious denouncers of northern philanthropy;" that all parties in politics, especially the supporters of the two rivals for the presidential office, Van Buren and Webster, vie with each other in denouncing the abolitionists; and that even religious men shun them, except when the abolitionists can fairly gain a hearing from them. With regard to himself, he speaks as follows:—"Rewards are offered for my abduction and assassination, and in every direction I meet with those who believe they would be doing God and their country service by depriving me of life. I have recently been mobbed almost every time I have appeared in public, and some of my escapes from the hands of my foes have been truly providential. On Friday last I narrowly escaped losing my life in Concord, New Hampshire. This morning a short gallows was found standing opposite the door of my house, 23, Bry Street, in this city, now occupied by garrison. Two halts hung from the beam, with the words above them, 'By order of Judge Lynch!!'" Still Mr Thompson is undaunted, and declares his firm confidence that this storm will shake the cause of slavery to its foundation.

The pay of Lord Beresford as a field-marshal of Portugal, £220 per month, has been stopped by the new government, in consideration that he enjoys a pension of £4,000 a-year besides his pay, and that he has not been in service for the last fifteen years, and will never be so again. The real cause is probably the attachment of Lord Beresford to the cause of Don Miguel.

The colonists of Liberia have been attacked by some tribes of the native Africans, who stormed a frontier settlement called Port Cresson, and massacred a number of the inhabitants. Edina, another settlement, was expected to be the next point of attack.

All the recent accounts from Greece are favourable. A part of the population of Athens, which had been scattered in the autumn by the terrors of an epidemic, has again returned, and new buildings are rising rapidly both at the city and the Piræus, which are now joined by a well-made road. Colonel Gordon has dispersed and partly destroyed the bands of robbers who infested the northern frontier. Count Armasberg, the king's principal adviser, has introduced jury trial, which is now in successful operation. The senate is about to assemble; the convocation of a national congress is expected; and the Morning Chronicle adds, what, if true, is a very decisive mark of the stability of the government, that foreign capitalists have offered it pecuniary assistance to a large amount on favourable terms.

ENGLAND.

ORANGE LODGES.

LORD KENYON, who, in the absence of the Duke of Cumberland, the Duke of Gordon, and Lord Roden, has, as Deputy Grand Master of the Orange Lodges, assumed the chief authority, lately exercised that authority in excommunicating thirty-two deputy grand masters of Yorkshire and Derbyshire, for having convened a meeting in August last, and then passed resolutions "most unwarrantable and disgraceful to themselves as Orangemen, reflecting on the conduct of their illustrious, high principled, and inflexible Grand Master, and making declarations inconsistent with the duty of every faithful Orangeman." In the conclusion of the circular which denounces and expels the members of the thirty-two lodges, Lord Kenyon expressed his "surprise and disgust" that any members should have been found capable of acting "so ungratefully to their illustrious Grand Master, whose conduct towards the institution, and whose invariably public conduct, ought to entitle him to the unmixed and heartfelt veneration and attachment of every true Protestant in the empire." In consequence of this transaction, Mr Haywood of Sheffield, "Grand Master of the first central body, Yorkshire," addressed a letter to Lord Kenyon, in which he attributed the writing of the circular to the Colonel or Mr Fairman, who has lately become so much the object of public notice, as it reminds him, he says, "of the hired menial's mission and conduct on his late tour throughout the country, at one guinea per diem, coach hire, &c." Mr Haywood ascribes the virulence of Fairman to his having "exposed his wilful waste and extravagance" on a second similar tour, when he distributed money and wine in the streets of Airdrie. He asks, why expel us and conceal our warrants, since we [the Yorkshire lodges] had previously informed you that "we had entirely withdrawn ourselves from the Grand Lodge, on account of your exactions and tyranny, by not only compelling our principles but our money to support it?" He then says, "Did not his Royal Highness, as Grand Master, and your lordship, as Deputy Grand Master, know what your missionary, Colonel Fairman, had done on his first tour in 1832? Or rather, did he not act under his R. H.'s and your lordship's directions, and was he not under those directions instructed to sound the brethren how they would be disposed, in the event of the King, William IV., being deposed, which was not improbable, on account of his sanctioning the reform of Parliament; and if so, it would become the duty of every Orangeman to support his R.H., who would then in all probability be called to the throne?" He concludes by drawing a distinction between those Orangemen "who are for deposing his Majesty," and those who met at Wakefield, and bear true allegiance to his Majesty.

Immediately after the publication of this extraordinary letter, Mr Fairman addressed to the Morning Post a flat contradiction of all its allegations, except that respecting his services as a paid emissary. After some interchange of correspondence, Mr Haywood published a letter, dated November 9, in which he not only repeated his former statements, but in a somewhat exaggerated form:—"When I was at Barnsley," says he, "on Saturday night (being lodge night) in my official capacity, I was called to the chair, when I made known to the lodge my mission regarding what had transpired. I there found I had not disclosed half the language the royal agent made use of in 1832, for he then and there further insinuated 'that there was a young girl of fifteen, and who was heir to the throne, but it was expected that not she, but the Duke, their Grand Master, would be called to the throne,' and at the same time he directed 'that the health of the King, William IV. (a previous toast in all Orange lodges) be dispensed with in future,' which has been the case (by order of W. M.'s of lodges in that district) ever since, until I gave it on Saturday evening from the chair. He (W. B. Fairman) further directed 'that oaths in future must be dispensed with in making Orangemen, to prevent the present government from making any inroad in the institution. These are incontestable facts—known to men who, along with myself, are ready, at any time, to confront W. B. Fairman, or any of his abettors.'" Mr Haywood also, in this letter, adverted to the Duke of Cumberland having denied all knowledge of warrants for lodges in the army. His Royal Highness "might as well," says Haywood, "deny his own existence, for I hold in my possession a circular, dated Feb. 7, 1831, in the Grand Lodge; present, Field Marshal his Royal Highness Prince Ernest Duke of Cumberland, Grand Master of the Empire, wherein three honourable members of the army were admitted as part of the Grand Committee, and three distinct warrants granted to the army." A Scottish newspaper remarks—"It is hard to believe that the treasonable design of setting aside the King and the Princess Victoria was really entertained, and further evidence is certainly necessary to satisfy impartial persons of its truth; yet the veil of secrecy so studiously preserved in the Orange Lodges, the rabid violence of those who take the lead in them, the fact of Fairman absconding to avoid examination, the great act these lodges were intended to commemorate—the cashing of a king for favouring Popery—are all presumptions that bold measures might be within the contemplation of the prime movers. Even the vast organisation created, and the practice enjoined of the brethren providing themselves with arms, is calculated to excite ugly suspicions. A story is current, that a conversation on these disclosures took place lately in the palace, and a high officer of the Queen's household having spoken of the Orange proceedings as mere 'folly,' his Majesty is said to have replied, that he feared there was more of 'rascality' in them than folly."

RAILWAY SPECULATIONS.

THE success of the short railway between Manchester and Liverpool, which clears nine per cent. to its original shareholders, and the general prosperity of the country, have conspired to raise something like a mania for railways. Not only is London about to be connected with Birmingham and Bristol, but others for shorter distances in all directions are projected, while Ireland is beginning to deliberate respecting one which is to cross that island to Valentia, for the purpose of rendering that place the port to America. The Times has given the following as a list of railways at present projected in England, with their shares and capital:—

Besides all these, a list is given without mention of shares or capital. It comprehends Manchester, Bolton, and Bury; Preston and Wigan; Whitchy and Pickering; Newcastle and Carlisle; Merthyr Tydvil and Cardiff; Edinburgh and Glasgow; York and North Midland; Durham Junction; Sheffield and Rotherham; Manchester and Stockport. It is supposed that, including these, the capital now in the course of being adventured in railways cannot be less than thirty-five millions. The shares of most are at a premium, and it is dreaded that much loss and disappointment will accrue to individuals from so many rash speculations, which, however, can hardly fail to benefit the public.

Oct. 21. In Exeter, the friends and constituents of Sir W. W. Follett entertained him at a grand complimentary dinner. Covers were laid for 400, but the demand for tickets greatly exceeding the means of accommodation, a great many most respectable gentlemen were denied the gratification of being present. The entertainment passed off well. Sir William made a very long speech after dinner, in which he thus characterised the political parties of the state:—"There are but two parties in the state, and I could wish that those names of Whig and Tory were altogether forgotten, for they exist now only to mislead (cheers). There are but two parties divided on broad and intelligible principles. The principles of the one are for the maintenance of the English constitution and the Protestant religion (cheers); those of the other for their destruction (renewed cheers). And when this question shall be understood, I shall appeal with confidence, and from what has taken place in other periods of our history, I shall augur well of the result (long continued cheering). Of the House of Lords he said—"There is no argument or statement advanced against an hereditary peerage that may not tell with equal force against the hereditary monarchy (continued cheers). I am satisfied of this, no matter where you begin—destroy, if you please, the power of the Crown, destroy if you please the privileges of the House of Peers, or the privileges and liberties of the Commons—begin with which you will, the result must inevitably be the same—the establishment of arbitrary power and tyrannical despotism (loud cheers)."

—28. Five persons were killed, and three houses reduced to ruins, by an explosion of gunpowder, which occurred on the premises of a fireworks-manufacturer, named Wood, at Holbeck, one mile from Leeds. Wood employed three girls to assist himself and his wife in making fireworks; and having many orders at this season of the year, the quantity of gunpowder in his house was about a hundredweight and a half. On the evening above mentioned, he left home; his wife and a girl being employed in the room below, while two other girls, Susanah Dockeray and Mary Wildman, were at work up stairs, where the gunpowder was kept, "twitching and touching"—that is, fastening string to the bottom of the squibs, and putting pieces of paper saturated in saltpetre to the other end. Their time of working was from eight in the morning till midnight—of course many hours by candle-light. There was a pot of water in which they might deposit the snuff of the candle; but, instead of snuffers, they used their fingers and a pair of scissors. About seven o'clock, the girl Wildman left Dockeray up stairs; and soon after, Mrs Wood heard the noise of a pair of scissors jingling on the top of a barrel in which the gunpowder wanted for immediate use was kept; the rest being in a bag. She concluded that the girl had been snuffing the candle. In a few minutes, there was a cracking and hissing noise; and Dockeray ran down stairs, her clothes all on fire, and rushed out of the house. The other girls followed her; but Mrs Wood went up stairs to the gunpowder room to throw the squibs and crackers out of the window! She just reached the door of the room, when the barrel of gunpowder exploded, with a tremendous roaring noise, like the discharge of a park of artillery. The barrel, as it was thrown into the air, looked like a ball of fire. Wood's house and one adjoining were lifted up, as it were, and sunk to the earth, a mass of blazing ruins. The roof was blown off the house of a weaver who lived on the opposite side of the lane, about twelve yards distant, and the front wall was broken in. Two men were at work in this house, both of whom escaped; but Mrs Walker, the wife of one of them, was buried in the ruins. An old man who lived in Wood's house was dreadfully scorched and bruised, but not killed. Mrs Wood, of course, was killed; as were also a Mrs Stephenson and her child, who lived in the house adjoining Wood's. The shock produced by this explosion was felt like that of an earthquake, at two miles' distance. The gas lights in the factories of Messrs Marshall, and Nussey and Co. were extinguished. Several hundred squares of glass were broken in the mill of the latter, and also at Messrs Gott's, at a greater distance.

Nov. 3. A meeting of the Agricultural Association of East Suffolk was held at Framlington on Tuesday, and was very numerously attended. The object was to consider the propriety of joining the Royal Agricultural Society of Great Britain and Ireland, established in London under the auspices of Lord Kerry, Lord Sandon, Sir Charles Lemon, Sir George Cayley, Mr Halyburton, Mr J. Bennett, Mr W. B. Baring, and other gentlemen of property and distinction. Mr R. Brown, from the London Society, attended the meeting, and deputations from Cambridgeshire were also present. Mr John Moseley was chairman; and among the Suffolk gentlemen were Sir C. B. Vere, Mr Shawe, Sir E. Kerrison, and several clergymen. Resolutions declaring the necessity of Parliamentary interposition for the relief of the farmer, and approving of a Central Association, were agreed to without opposition. It was then proposed that a deputation should be sent up to London to the Central Society. On this Mr Shawe expressed his fears, that the main, if not the sole object of the gentlemen who had formed the Central Society, was the depreciation of the currency; and he entered into an argument to prove that agricultural distress was not owing to the alteration in the value of the circulating medium. At the conclusion of Mr Shawe's speech, the resolution was carried. Another resolution, "That the change in the currency had been the primary cause of agricultural distress, and that a return to a sound paper currency afforded the only prospect of an effectual remedy; and that no government which would not entertain that question deserved the confidence of the farmers," was carried by a considerable majority.

—9. The new Lord Mayor (Copeland) of London was sworn in, with the usual ceremonies.

—10. The reformers of Bristol gave a public dinner to Lord John Russell. The company, among whom were Lord Ebrington, Lord Seagrave, the Earl of Kerry, Lord Andover, and Mr Thomas Moore, the poet, amounted to 400, being the utmost the room could hold; Mr J. G. Smith in the chair. A large silver epergne, raised by a subscription of sixpences, was presented to Lord John. In his speech, Lord John made no allusion to the proposed reform of the House of Lords. In reference, however, to some allegations made by Sir W. Follett at a late dinner in Exeter, his lordship made the following statement:—"In November last, when nothing could be more hostile than the language of Mr O'Connell towards Lord Melbourne's administration, we were told, by their accredited organs and literary reviews, that I had prepared a plan for razing the church and dismissing the ministers of the Protestant establishment in Ireland; and that that plan had caused the dissolution of the government about six months afterwards. That charge having been answered and contradicted, we find them propagating a fresh one, to the effect that I have no opinion at all with respect to any change in the Protestant church, and solely adopt one at the suggestion of others. Now, one of those charges at least must be false; and it does unfortunately happen, they being very different and dissimilar, that they are both utterly false; for, while in November I had not prepared the plan which I had proposed or the cabinet agreed to, so, on the other hand, this opinion of mine with respect to the Protestant church of Ireland is no new opinion, adopted at the suggestion of any one, but, as I will shortly show you, adopted on my own reflection and consideration, maintained at great pain, and after no inconsiderable experience. It so happens, in the first place, that in the year 1824 I supported a motion of Mr Hume's, the purport of which was to declare that the Protestant church in Ireland ought to be maintained with a smaller number of persons, and at a less cost. That question slept for some time, until Lord Grey's administration had been formed. During the discussions on the tithe question in 1832, those who had referred to the former debates, and observed my previous votes on the question, fairly enough asked me whether I still maintained that opinion; it being well known that Lord Stanley would be opposed to it. I then stated, that I thought the church of Ireland had not fulfilled the great purposes of religious and moral instruction, and that it was necessary it should be reduced, not only because it was not adequate for its own purposes, but likewise for the sake of its own stability. At that time nothing could be more hostile than Mr O'Connell was to the government. In 1833 came the question of the temporalities of the church of Ireland. I had already stated in the House of Commons that my first impression on hearing that plan was, that as it did not contain what is now called an appropriation clause, it would become me to retire from office—a determination which I was only induced to rescind, by finding that on the main point Lord Althorp and others entertained as strong an opinion as myself; but we all thought it would be inexpedient at that time to dissolve Lord Grey's government. What I stated in the House of Commons in the course of the present year, cannot have escaped the notice of the learned member for Exeter. In that same year, 1833, I stated—I think in the discussion on the 147th clause—that in my opinion the state had a full right to dispose of the revenues of the church (loud cheering), and that I should be prepared to assert that opinion when the proper time arrived. (Cheers.) In the year 1834, I—prematurely as many persons thought, but certainly impelled by a strong feeling upon the subject, when the tithe question was under debate—stated that I still entertained the opinion I held in 1832, that the Irish church ought to be reduced, and that some part of its revenues should be applied to the general instruction of the people. I added that, if I were obliged to maintain that opinion by separating from my dearest friends with whom I was associated in office, I would not hesitate to make that sacrifice, and to do what I conceived was justice to Ireland. (Enthusiastic cheering, prolonged for several minutes, accompanied by waving of handkerchiefs.) Gentlemen, that declaration of mine may have been premature—it may have been injudicious; but with that opinion on record, creating, as it did, a considerable sensation both in the House of Commons and in the country, I do wonder that any learned gentleman of known talent and ability should rise before an audience, in whose ignorance he must have had a most contemptuous confidence, and tell them that I had adopted this opinion in 1835, in order to conciliate and meet the views of Mr O'Connell." (Prolonged cheering.) Lord John afterwards glanced at the ministry of the Duke of Wellington and its conduct to Mr O'Connell, contrasting it with the present "coalition." "I think I am entitled to say," he observed, "that the Duke of Wellington, and Sir Robert Peel at the head of the government, opposed reason, defied and resisted argument, and yielded and succumbed to force, while we, on the other hand, have opposed ourselves most successfully to force, and yielded and succumbed to reason." (Great cheering.) His lordship subsequently resumed his seat, amidst tremendous cheering. Several toasts were subsequently given, among them the healths of Lords Seagrave and Ebrington. Lord Seagrave, in acknowledging this, said he "held it to be the greatest absurdity that could be uttered, to say that the House of Lords should assume to itself an irresponsibility not claimed by the first man in the realm;" and his lordship dwelt on the advantage of peers meeting the people, and laying their public conduct before them. His lordship described the two parties in the House of Lords, and expressed a belief that in the next Parliament the peers would see the necessity of acting more in conformity with the general opinion of the country.

—11. A public dinner was given at Bath to the two representatives of the city, General Palmer and Mr Roebuck. Among the company were Mr Hume and Colonel Napier, author of the History of the Peninsular War. The latter gentleman delivered a speech remarkable for the boldness of its tone. After vindicating the right of the soldiery to have political opinions, he said—"They would have no Orange domination. (Loud cheers, and cries of 'Never'.) They would not have William IV. deposed because he had passed the Reform Bill. They would not have the succession to the Crown changed—no, not even for a Grand Master. (Loud cheers). They would have equal laws for poor and rich. They would not have the Dorsetshire labourers sent to Botany Bay, while Princes of the Blood Royal only went to Kalisch. (Tremendous cheering). And that they might have all this constitutionally, they would have a shortening of the duration of parliaments, an extension of the suffrage, and vote by ballot. (Loud and prolonged cheering). But the ballot was un-English. Was it? Its object was to protect the poor and humble man, in the exercise of his right, against the rich and proud. Was that un-English? If it were, it followed, as a matter of course, that to be a proud oppressor, to be wicked as well as wealthy, to trample on all the just rights of your country and your neighbour, and to make a man dishonest because he was poor, was perfectly English." Colonel Napier then alluded, in the most affectionate terms, to the Duke of Wellington, whose military character he panegyrised, while he condemned his politics.

Her Majesty was, we are told, greatly pleased with the good humour and honesty of the mayor on her late visit to Oxford. On the Queen's arrival, the mayor was observed driving at a quick rate in his little open carriage to the inn where her Majesty stopped, to offer his congratulations without loss of time. Some experienced friend luckily made him pause, and got him into a shop, where he was properly rigged out for the occasion. One of the city functionaries brought him the mace, another was seen carrying the robes of office. At length he was properly rigged out, and waited on the Queen in due style. After the usual introduction, the mayor energetically asked, "How is the King?" On receiving her Majesty's answer, "In perfect health," he replied, "Glad to hear it—God bless him. The King and I are six weeks, off and on." Finding himself not at once understood, he explained, that the days of the birth of his Majesty and himself were within six weeks of each other; and that the King had the advantage of him, being six weeks older. The mayor would have continued the conversation, had he not been warned by some officious friend that it might be reckoned indecorous; but he declared that her Majesty was so condescending that he could talk to her as easily as to persons in any other rank of life; and her Majesty was heard to praise the blunt but the sincere manners and greeting of the mayor of Oxford.—Courier.

The Duchess of Kent lately gave two dinner parties at Ramsgate, which included most of the resident gentry of the town and its vicinity. The Princess Victoria dined at table on both occasions, but was obliged to be carried down stairs and up again in her chair, on account of the weakness left in her ankles since her illness. Her Royal Highness, however, looked well, and delighted her guests by the affability of her manners and her graceful deportment to all around her.

A considerable number of accidents have lately been occasioned by steam-vessels in the Thames. Oct. 16, the City of Aberdeen steamer swamped a boat in her wake at Rotherhithe, and occasioned the death of a mason named William Brown. On the same day, and at the same place, the Rotterdam steam-ship, John Bull, broke against a barge, and caused its masts to fall with a dreadful crash, killing William Hibbert, the son of the owner. Oct. 29, the Royal Adelaide, belonging to Leith, William Allan commander, ran down an oyster-smack at Woolwich, and caused the death of Richard Baker, owner of the smack, and a passenger whose name has not been ascertained. Mr Allan, and Richard Clark, his pilot, were committed to Newgate, Nov. 9; but after a few days, allowed to go out on bail. Nov. 9, the Monarch, a steam-towing-vessel, ran down a boat belonging to the Jane of Newcastle, and caused the death of a boy.

The newspapers of the various political parties have lately been publishing extracts from parliamentary evidence, bearing upon the interferences of clergymen in elections. The Irish Catholic clergy appear to use their influence in the most open manner, and it is equally clear that the established English clergy do not scruple, in many instances, to exert themselves for Conservative candidates. Each party will, of course, consider itself justified by the conduct of the other.

Gentlemen who have recently visited various parts of England and Scotland, are unanimous in describing the general state of the country as prosperous beyond anything known in the course of their experience. All our staple manufactures in cotton, wool, and iron, are in full activity; new workshops, mills, and other buildings, are rising up on every side: the working people are universally employed; and as wages, when compared with the expense of necessities, are higher than at any former period, the general condition of those classes, who compose five-sixths of the whole community, is more comfortable now than it has ever been. Our statement does not merely hold true of such places as Glasgow and Manchester; for we learn that the little towns of Galashiels and Hawick are not able to execute the orders they receive for goods. It is a satisfactory circumstance, that this tide of prosperity is not traceable to any unexpected event or sudden change in the state of the world, but seems evidently to spring from the development of industry, and the growth of population and wealth, in our own and every civilised land, under the fostering influence of peace. As it depends on stable causes, and has come on gradually, we have the best reason to rely on its permanence and future increase.

The churchwardens of Blackburn have withdrawn a motion for a church-rate in that town, in deference to the opinion of the inhabitants; and the expenses of the church are to be defrayed by voluntary contributions, as in several other towns in Yorkshire and Lancashire.

The Tradesmen's Conservative Society, recently formed in Liverpool, is increasing its members with a rapidity far beyond the most sanguine anticipations. The talent already displayed by some of its leaders is beyond all praise, and promises to render many auxiliary advantages to the cause of loyalty, order, and our institutions in church and state.—Liverpool Standard.

There has lately been discovered, on the property of Lord Dinorben, in the parish of Llanwenllwfo, Anglesea, and in the immediate neighbourhood of the Parys and Mona mines, a very rich vein of copper. It is in many parts almost in a pure state, and much purer than even the copper coinage of 1799; consequently, a question will arise for the consideration of geologists and others who feel pleasure in investigating these matters, whether the secondary stratum in which it is found must not at some remote period have been acted upon by great and powerful heat, so as to have dislodged the ore from the stone, and run it in a state of fusion into the form in which it is now found.—Mining Journal.

One of the most providential escapes from imminent danger that has occurred recently, is the return of the vessel commanded by the Hon. Capt. Henry Rous, from Canada, after a succession of accidents almost from the time of her departure. The governor of Canada, Lord Aylmer, having embarked on his return to England, with Lady Aylmer, and his suite, they reached the coast of Labrador on the night of the 23d of September, when a thick mist prevailing, the officers on duty were unable to observe the proximity of the land, and about ten o'clock a harsh grating sensation, felt throughout the ship, told too plainly that she had struck upon one of the rocks so numerous along that dangerous shore. Captain Rous was instantly on deck, giving the requisite orders, which were promptly and noiselessly obeyed; but all efforts were vain, as the vessel lay heaving about during eleven hours on the rocks, during which time all on board considered each minute might prove their last! At length the wind changing with the rising of the tide, they were carried off their perilous position, and managed to float to a bay at some little distance, where the vessel being examined, it was found that she had received considerable damage, and twenty-four guns, out of thirty-six, were thrown overboard, in order to save her from sinking, in which case the best hope of the survivors would be to save themselves on the barren and desert coast of Labrador, far removed from succour or resource. On trial, it was found that one of the pumps refused to act, but by the constant working of the other, the water from the leak was kept under to a certain point, and Captain Rous determined, at all hazards, to put to sea, which he did accordingly. After they had proceeded thus for some time, the climax arrived, on the rudder of the ship breaking away without a power of replacing it, and they sailed twelve hundred miles, merely judging their course by the management of the different sails—and, to add to this difficulty, it was discovered that the coast on which they struck abounded so much with iron ore, that the needle no longer acted truly, so the task of keeping in the right course was increased to a great degree. At length, after most painful privations and sufferings, Lord and Lady Aylmer landed, October 20, at Portsmouth, and, after resting for a few days, proceeded for London, where his lordship immediately reported to Lord Glenelg the circumstances connected with his mission and return. A letter from Portsmouth describes the present state of the vessel. "Extreme interest has been created amongst the navy, visitors, and others, at this port, by the appearance of his Majesty's ship Pique, Captain the Hon. H. I. Rous, which has this day been placed in dock for the purpose of undergoing the necessary repairs. Her whole bottom, from stem to stern, is a vast mass of jagged splinters; the keel is entirely gone, and in some parts no less than three feet in depth of solid timber has been pounded away by the force with which she struck upon the rock, leaving not more than an inch and a half of woodwork between the water and her hold. Her safety has been entirely owing to the strength of her construction. No greater merit is due to Captain Symonds, on whose plan she was built, than to Sir Robert Seppings, since both agree in the principle which has proved her safety, namely, the entire solidity of the hull from the keel several feet upwards. Had she been built on the old plan, her wreck must have been inevitable."

IRELAND.

MR O'CONNELL AND MR RAPHAEL.

On the 31st October, Mr Alexander Raphael published a long address to the electors of Carlow, with extracts from private letters of Mr O'Connell's. The object of this was stated by the writer to be the justification of the abandonment of his seat in the House of Commons, after the case had been only partially gone into before the election committee appointed on the petition of Messrs Bruen and Kavanagh. Mr Raphael, it appears, had long been desirous of obtaining a seat in the House of Commons, and, in May last, applied to Mr O'Connell for his aid in procuring one. The representation of Carlow county soon became vacant, in consequence of the sitting members being unseated on petition; and Mr O'Connell advised Mr Raphael to start for Carlow—as it might be long before he would again meet with so safe a "speculation." After some demur, Mr Raphael agreed to become a candidate; and Mr O'Connell undertook to pay all his expenses for a certain sum. The terms of this contract will appear from the following letter of Mr O'Connell:—

"9, Clarges Street, June 1.

"MY DEAR SIR—You having acceded to the terms proposed to you for the election of the county of Carlow, namely, you are to pay before nomination L.1000 (say L.1000), and a like sum after being returned—the first to be paid absolutely and entirely for being nominated, the second to be paid only in the event of your having been returned. I hereby undertake to guarantee and save you harmless from any and every other expense whatsoever, whether of agents, carriages, counsel, petition against the return, or of any other description; and I make this guarantee in the fullest sense of the honourable engagement that you should not possibly be required to pay one shilling more in any event, or upon any contingency whatsoever.—I am, my dear sir, your very faithful

"A. Raphael, Esq. DAN. O'CONNELL."

A difference in the construction of this agreement between the parties to it, subsequently led to a misunderstanding. At the election, Messrs Raphael and Vigors were returned. A petition was presented against them, and a Tory committee appointed to try its merits. It then became necessary to prepare for a defence, and Mr Raphael was required to pay the second L.1000. This he refused, alleging that he was only bound to furnish the additional sum after his seat was safe. Mr O'Connell insisted that the agreement stipulated its payment on Mr Raphael having been returned only; and after an angry note from Mr O'Connell, this sum was also paid. It soon became evident that the sitting members had not the least chance before the Tory committee, and Mr Raphael throws out certain bitter reflections on what he calls Mr O'Connell's abrupt desertion of him and the cause of the Carlow electors. This he says was meditated from a very early period, though he argues that Mr O'Connell should, by his agreement, have continued to the very last to contest the seat. Mr Raphael says, he soon suspected, after the striking of the committee, what Mr O'Connell's course would be; and then, in the following passage, describes the purport of a letter which he cannot quote, as he says it was marked "strictly confidential:—" "In this I was confirmed by the receipt, on the following morning, of a letter from that gentleman, containing something in the shape of an offer or proposition so extraordinary and unexpected, that I really knew not what to make of it, except, indeed, to prepare for, and reconcile me to, his then intended breach of engagement, and to induce me to believe that it was not only his desire to make some atonement for the consequences of such an act, but that it was in his power to compensate me in some other way for the loss of my seat, which was now reduced to a certainty, so far at least as depended on him for his pecuniary or other support." We need only add to this summary the two passages from Mr Raphael's address, in which the money paid to Mr O'Connell is accounted for. The first thousand:—"I must observe, that, though I paid the L.1000 in cash, I have been informed that the L.800 here mentioned was remitted in a bill at a long date, drawn by Mr O'Connell upon some persons carrying on business as brewers in Dublin; a circumstance that was not very well calculated to induce the electors, or those to whom the money was remitted, to entertain a very high opinion of my pecuniary means. I have also been informed that nothing beyond the L.800 has been expended or received in the county. What became of the other L.200, or what would have become of the second L.1000, in case I had been returned without a contest, or without a petition, it is no business of mine to inquire." The second thousand:—"That I may not do him an injustice, it is but fair that I should, in conclusion, observe that the second sum of L.1000 has been accounted for by his paying in cash L.350 to Mr Baker, towards the law charges, and after repeated applications made for the balance, by giving him a bill for it at a long date, drawn by Mr O'Connell himself, on the self-same brewers as the L.800 before alluded to was drawn on."

On the 6th November, Mr O'Connell, in reference to the charge brought against him by Mr Raphael, addressed a letter to the electors of Carlow, dated at Derrynane Abbey. After entreating their pardon for recommending to them "the most incomprehensible of all vagabonds," Mr O'Connell went on to say—"I am bound to acknowledge that I had been cautioned against him—that I had been told he was a faithless creature, who never observed any contract, and with whom no person ever had a dealing without being sorry for it. Why, then, did I disregard these cautions? For two reasons. First—I am in the habit of, perhaps, undervaluing the effect of calumny—and as to calumny itself, I know, by the experience of a long life, that the best of actions and purest of motives cannot, in many cases, mitigate calumny." Mr O'Connell then says that Mr Raphael had long assailed him to get him into Parliament, and that it is at least in his (Mr O'Connell's) favour, that, before recommending Mr Raphael, he procured from him a written declaration of liberal principles. Mr O'Connell next quotes the following passage from Mr Raphael's address:—"That I should not do him an injustice, it is fair that I should, in conclusion, observe, that the second sum of L.1000 has been accounted for by his paying in cash L.350 to Mr Baker towards the law charges, and, after repeated applications made for the balance, by giving him a bill for it at a long date, drawn by Mr O'Connell himself on the self-same brewers as the L.800 before alluded to was drawn for"—and gives the direct lie to every single and separate statement it contains. Mr O'Connell then says—"After this specimen, I think it is not going too far to say, in the usual Irish phrase, that you, Alexander Raphael, are a 'mighty great liar.'" Simultaneously with this letter of Mr O'Connell's, a letter from Mr Vigors to that gentleman, dated Carlow, Nov. 3, has likewise appeared. Mr Vigors says—"The whole of the sum handed to you by Mr Raphael, to cover the expenses of the contest in which he was returned for this county, was transmitted by you to the county through me, to the uttermost fraction. The greater portion of the money being intended to defray expenses incurred in this county was necessarily remitted by bills on Dublin." Mr Vigors concludes by characterising Mr O'Connell's conduct throughout, as "most liberal, upright, and honourable."

Mr O'Connell published a further letter of explanation, dated Nov. 10. Mr Raphael has replied to his explanations, with a declaration that he feels himself incompetent to rival Mr O'Connell in abusive language, and will wait for the result of a Parliamentary inquiry.

According to accounts furnished by their friends, a number of the Irish established clergy are reduced, by the long-continued resistance to the payment of tithes, to a state of penury bordering on destitution. At a Conservative dinner in Canterbury, Nov. 10, Mr Lushington, M.P. for the city, informed the company that "it was impossible for any man who had not been in that country to conceive the state of that suffering church. Four days ago, he had received a letter from the Archbishop of Tuam; that prelate stated that the children of the Protestant clergy in his diocese were totally deprived of animal food; that they subsisted upon potatoes dug up by themselves; and that they had not clothing sufficient to cover them. He would put it to them whether government, having before it all this misery, were not seriously responsible for the manner in which it had been induced?"

There need no special instances to prove that the aversion to tithes in the minds of the Irish people continues unabated. But one has recently occurred so very striking and almost preternatural, that it ought to be mentioned. The seizure and sale of a farmer's cows for tithe by Mr Croker, the rector of Croom, has been noticed in all the papers. The Tory journals treat it as a kind of triumphant exploit; and record, with many compliments to the disinterested generosity of Mr Croker, that he was himself the purchaser of the cattle, which he presented as a free gift to the House of Industry in Limerick, to be distributed among the inmates of that institution. Not any of them, however, have mentioned the fact, which is, nevertheless, true beyond all contradiction, that the paupers of Limerick refused to taste a morsel of the meat. A more extraordinary instance of self-denial is scarcely on record. Those poor creatures, faint and hungry, yearning for a more generous diet than they had been accustomed to, and with feelings wounded, perhaps, by the neglect of their own friends, resisted the strong temptation of a table groaning under the prime joints of grass-fed beef from the Limerick pastures—beef, such as might create an appetite under the ribs of a London alderman—and turned aside to their miserable and scanty mess of pottage. They would not defile themselves with the touch of the tithe-beef. A sage of the olden time has said that "hunger makes all things sweet except itself;" he knew nothing about the nausea which the fumes of a tithe sirloin create in the stomach of an Irish pauper. Hunger itself is a luxury compared to that. How rapidly insignificant does the heroic brag of the "potatoes and salt" pluralist look beside this splendid abstinence!—Morning Chronicle.

Sunday, the 15th November, was the day on which the O'Connell tribute was paid. According to the Dublin Evening Post, "the collection in Dublin approached to nearly L.2000, and subscriptions are still coming in. The amount in Dublin last year was little more than L.1100. The treasurer of the Cork district thus writes to Mr Fitzpatrick:—"For this city and liberties you may calculate upon L.1000." The letters received by Mr Fitzpatrick show that the contributions of the provincial towns and parishes will exceed in amount those had for the last year, to the same extent as the metropolis exhibits. We subjoin the amount in various places:—Newry, L.100; Carrickmacross, L.50—last year it was L.38; Clonmel, L.175—last year L.128; Belfast, L.197, nearly double the amount last year; Enniscorthy, L.140; Tullamore, L.60; Waterford, L.470—last year L.244; Limerick, L.275. It is said that the tribute this year will certainly exceed L.20,000, and probably reach L.25,000.

Mr Thomas Reynolds was tried for riotous conduct at the meeting in the Coburg Gardens, held to consider the conduct of Mr Recorder Shaw. The evidence against him was not to the point, with the exception of that given by a man of bad character, who swore that Mr Reynolds struck at him with his sword. For the defence, Alderman Fleming, Mr Gabbett, a police magistrate, and several other gentlemen of the highest respectability, swore distinctly that Mr Reynolds, so far from inciting the people to riot, exerted himself to the utmost for the prevention of disorder, and that his manner was most conciliatory. It was proved that the riot was occasioned by the breaking in of a party of Orangemen, armed with sticks, into the garden. The object of the meeting was lawful, and every precaution was taken by Mr Reynolds to preserve the peace. The jury, consisting entirely of Protestants, found Reynolds guilty; and Chief Justice Doherty and Baron Smith, the judges, sentenced him to nine months' imprisonment. This trial and the sentence which followed it have occasioned much sensation throughout the liberal party.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ANALYSIS OF PUBLIC REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE. A BRIEF but comprehensive paper on the subject of the revenue was issued a few months ago, on the motion of Mr Gillon. It presents the most luminous and distinct view of the finances of any paper we have seen, and is instructive, as showing the sum which each article of importances yields.

THE EX-ROYAL FAMILY OF FRANCE.

ABOUT fourteen English miles from Prague stands an old chateau, removed far from the high road, buried in perfect solitude, and of the most sombre aspect that can be imagined. The country about is cultivated, at least the stubble and furrows show that the hand of man is busy there; but the absence of timber, of hedgerows, or land boundaries, particularly at this season of the year, makes one imagine that it was a place selected by some rich misanthrope, who busied himself on his fortune in a solitude sufficiently near a large city that he might command the luxuries of life when he desired. This chateau was the inheritance, in right, of Maria Louisa, of the young Napoleon, and at his death devolved to the Duke of Tuscany. "I defy any person to approach the place now, and to witness the want of living things which marks its environs, without feeling most sensibly the misfortunes of the royal family who now are its inmates, and bowing one's head with respect at the noble fortitude with which they have thus withdrawn from the world, to bear in silence their grief, or to await with patience for better days. It is now too late to argue the subject of the French revolution of 1830; and no Englishman will maintain that a great people has not a right to choose its own government, and to meet, by resistance, acts which are beyond the law; but still it increases the feeling of pity towards this royal family, to know that what they had so badly attempted to prepare has been successfully realised by their successor, and that the republican spirit in France, against which it fought, was not a shadow, but a substance, which, if it cost Charles X. his throne, had all but deprived Louis Philippe of his existence. I need scarcely say after this that Charles X., the Duke and Duchess of Angoulême, and the Duke of Bordeaux, are the present occupants of Butcher's."

The health of the old king is good, and he maintains it by a most active life, being out every morning at day-break with his gun and dog. He had been unwell, and went to Toplitz, where the baths, as they commonly do at first, appeared not to suit his constitution, and brought on an acute rheumatism, but the physician made him persevere, and the result has been that he is perfectly cured, and enabled to continue the violent exercise which is his sole enjoyment. The Duchess of Angoulême looks well, but deeply marked with care, and the natural vivacity of her manner is strongly contrasted with the sadness of countenance consequent upon such a continued train of misfortunes. As her actions have proved, she is a personage of decided character, religious, but not imbued by the over-strict devotion which marks some other members of the house, and it is under her direction that the education of the Duke of Bordeaux has been formed, as, since the affair of Blaye, the Duchess of Berri has not the good fortune to be on friendly terms with her family. I have heard it constantly said, and seen it as often stated in the journals, that Henry V., as he claims to be, was a meagre and delicate boy, kept closely under restraint, and brought up more as a Jesuit than a prince. Now, the fact is, that I do not suppose there can be a more hearty, high-spirited, active lad of his age of fourteen, than he is; and as to his health, if being full and ruddy, and wild, and running and galloping about the country all day, is a proof of a consumption, he is in a very bad way.

A year ago he was one of the wildest boys, and with such a flow of animal spirits that it was found impossible to check him, and every one feared that he would by some prank break a limb or lose his life; but within some months he has become more steady, and his countenance begins to exhibit that reserve and dignity befitting a prince, and more especially one who has witnessed the downfall of his house, and indulges hopes—however visionary they may be—of re-entering it. He is very handsome, light eyes, a regular nose and mouth, full of expression, but he is not tall, and it is feared he will not be so, as his limbs begin to settle and to form for a middle-sized man, and he becomes robust and hard set, indicating more of strength than gracefulness in his outline.

Since the emperors and kings came to Toplitz, the family of France have not appeared in Prague, and no one can suspect that they have been pressing their claims. They have properly withdrawn from the circle, and it is one of the touching things of this day to witness, during a re-union of the crowned heads of Europe, the exiles of France buried in a solitude, and as much apart as if their existence was unknown. It forms an awful contrast, and he who thinks on the mutability of fortune, and of the past and the present, may here indulge his vein, and turn from the glitter and favour of fifty princes, to the cold chill mansion, where dwells in silence the last king of the eldest branch of the Bourbons, and the young prince who has an empire before his eyes, however deceitful the prospect may be.—Prague Correspondence of the Morning Herald.

INSTINCT OF A TURTLE.—A ship which touched at the Island of Ascension on her way back to England, took in several large turtle, and amongst them one which from some accident had only three fins. It was in consequence called and known on board the ship by the name of the "Lord Nelson." It was marked in the usual way by having certain initials and numbers burnt on its under shell with a hot iron, and which marks are never known to be obliterated. Owing to various causes the ship was a long time on her passage homewards, a circumstance which occasioned many of the turtle to die, and most of the rest were very sickly. This was the case with the "Lord Nelson," and it was so nearly dead when the ship arrived in the Channel, that the sailors, with whom it was a favourite, threw it overboard, in order, as they said, to give it a "chance." Its native element, however, appears to have revived it, for two years afterwards, the very same turtle was taken up at the Island of Ascension. The proofs brought of the accuracy of the statement place its authenticity beyond a doubt; and it affords a most extraordinary instance of that wonderful instinct possessed by animals. When we consider the vast tract of waters this turtle had to pass through, and that the Island of Ascension is only a speck in the mighty ocean, it is impossible not to reflect with wonder upon the unexplained instinct which enabled so unwieldy and apparently so stupid an animal to find its way back to its former haunts.

ANECDOTES OF WILBERFORCE.—The Christian Keepsake for 1836 relates two delightful and most instructive anecdotes of Wilberforce. First, in reference to his truly Christian spirit of forbearance:—"His extreme benevolence contributed largely to this success. I have heard him say that it was one of his constant rules, on this question especially, never to provoke an adversary—to allow him full sincerity and purity of motive—to abstain from irritating expressions—to avoid even such political attacks as would indispose his opponents for his great cause. In fact, the benignity, the gentleness, the kind-heartedness of the man, disarmed the bitterest foes. Not only on this question did he restrain himself, but generally. Once he had been called during a whole debate, by a considerable speaker of the Opposition, 'the religious member,' in a kind of scorn. The impropriety had been checked by the interference of the house. Mr Wilberforce told me afterwards that he was much inclined to have retorted by calling his opponent 'the irreligious member,' but that he refrained, as it would have been a returning of evil for evil." Second, in reference to his love of his own children:—"A friend told me that he found him once in the greatest agitation looking for a dispatch which he had mislaid—one of the royal family was waiting for it: he had delayed the search to the last moment; he seemed at last quite vexed and flurried. At this unlucky instant, a disturbance in the nursery overhead occurred. My friend who was with him, said to himself, now for once Wilberforce's temper will give way. He had hardly thought thus, when Mr Wilberforce turned to him and said, 'What a blessing it is to have these dear children!—only think what a relief, amidst other hurries, to hear their voices, and know they are well!'"

SCRIPTURE IMPRESSIONS.—At the Cupar Presbytery, in the course of Mr Cathcart Drysdale's trial, Mr C.'s counsel addressed a witness—"Well, Thomas, do you think the blow with the coat-tail was a heavy one?" "Deed, sir, that would mainly depend whether or no there was any thing in the pouch o't. (Great laughter.) May be ye dinna ken that there was a man in Largo that thrashed his wife severe enouch wi' a stocking and a Bible in the fit o't." (Renewed laughter.)

THE POOR.—Mr Ostler, "a person of great experience in the matter," says the Westminster Review, gives the following testimony respecting the good feelings of the humbler classes of the community:—"The poor deserve all the attention we can give them; they are grateful and respectful to their superiors, and most kind to one another. If treated with harshness, contempt, or neglect, they will resent it, and they have a right to do so; but let any one manifest an interest in their concerns, address them kindly, assist them with discrimination, refuse, when necessary, with mildness, and reprove with temper, and he will never find reason to complain. As the almoner of public charities, I have been brought into contact with thousands of them of all grades, from the respectable artisan down to the imprisoned felon, or the wretched inmates of the lowest abodes of vice. I have never been treated with disrespect, and have far more frequently had reason to blush at the excess of their gratitude, than to reproach them for unthankfulness; their kindness to one another in their distresses, is most exemplary and affecting. When pleading for a neighbour, they will indeed represent the absence of every claim upon themselves, and their inability to afford any assistance; but when the aid they have been soliciting has either been obtained or denied, they will cheerfully divide their morsel, and perform voluntarily and gratuitously every service. Their faults are on the surface, and are often nothing more than that coarseness of manner which belongs to their station; but whoever will study them thoroughly, will be compelled to admire their general character, and will feel it an enviable privilege to be enabled to relieve distresses in which it is impossible not to sympathise."

FEMALE COURAGE.—When the George the Third convict ship was lost last April, near Van Diemen's Land, the wife of a soldier displayed feelings of the most courageous and amiable description. This poor woman had recently been confined; and when the vessel was wrecked, she saved her babe, and also the infant of another woman, who was unfortunately drowned. She contrived to secure herself in the fore-chains; and although the sea ran mountains high, with frost and rain, this poor creature was exposed for forty-eight hours to the weather, with two babes suckling at her breast, and a child of two years old held between her knees; and after all her troubles, they were providentially saved. Dr Wyse, the superintendent, states that it was a most affecting sight; and Governor Arthur, immediately he was informed of it, visited the poor woman, provided her with food and raiment, besides a present of a L.10 note for the great courage she had manifested.

SCOTLAND.

Oct. 13. At a meeting of the Synod of Aberdeen, a declaration of the views of the body respecting the Irish church was adopted. The synod represents that one branch of the legislature has "sanctioned measures calculated but too evidently to sap the foundations of our Protestant institutions." They add—"That they can contemplate in the dismemberment of the Protestant establishment of Ireland—in the suppression, in that unhappy country, of nine hundred and fifty Protestant parishes—no other result, whatever attempts may be made to disguise the real nature of the measure, or however the promoters of it may have imposed upon themselves, than the restoration and re-establishment of Romish supremacy. That, as regards the pretence set up by some, of providing, from the surplus funds of the church, means for the moral education of the people, they submit that they know of no moral education apart from the teaching of the law and the testimony, of no other foundation of human virtue that can be laid, than the Stone which, though rejected by the builders, has become nevertheless the chief stone of the corner—of nothing that can cleanse and make holy the heart of man but the sanctifying streams of the gospel of truth." While they allow that much might be done to increase the efficiency of the church in Ireland, they assert that "the main cause of the depressed state under which it now labours, is to be found, not in evils inherent in itself, but in the insidious and revolting persecutions to which, for a great length of time, it has been systematically subjected." These they charge upon the priests of the Romish church, which they describe "as at this day, in her root as in her branches, an anti-Christian and persecuting church, the reproach and the scourge of that unhappy country." In an overture to the General Assembly, the synod say that, whereas, "from the rapid strides which the Romish Church is now making, and particularly in Ireland, to the recovery of her former pestilential domination, our invaluable Protestant institutions and privileges may come to be exposed to the most imminent hazard, it is humbly overtured by the Very Reverend the Synod of Aberdeen, to the Venerable Assembly of the Church of Scotland, indicted to meet in Edinburgh in May next, that they would take such measures as to them may seem best adapted to keep alive the Protestant feelings of the country, and to confirm our people in their attachment to their Protestant faith." In conclusion, the synod addressed a letter to the Archbishop of Armagh, expressing "our most cordial sympathy with our suffering Protestant brethren in Ireland, our high admiration of the Christian heroism with which they have been enabled to support themselves, under circumstances, founded on the promises of the everlasting Gospel, that, on a night of affliction thus improved and sanctified, the joys of a blessed morning must at no distant period arise." The proceedings of the synod on this occasion called forth a long congratulatory letter from the Earl of Winchester, which concludes thus:—"I beg to offer to you my warmest and most heartfelt thanks for the decided and truly religious course which you have taken at this momentous crisis. If we are true to the sacred cause which we now stand forward to advocate—if, above all, we are true to that God and Saviour whose merciful providence has so often been extended to save this country when she stood on the very brink of destruction, casting ourselves entirely upon his mercies, and looking upon our strength and power as very weakness—I feel confident that we shall triumph over the united powers of Popery, Socialism, Scepticism, and Infidelity, which are now arrayed against us."

—26. This morning, a severe storm swept over nearly the whole of Scotland, producing more or less damage at every part of the coast. At eight o'clock A.M., the Hero steamer, on her way from Millport, being unable, on account of the high swell, to approach the pier of Largs, the individuals who intended to go aboard of her there, went into a small boat, which had no sooner passed the end of the pier, than it was struck by a couple of heavy waves which completely filled it with water, when, at the same instant, twelve individuals were suddenly immersed in the sea. The alarm on shore was indescribably great, but boats were put off with as much dispatch as possible to the assistance of the drowning men; and after very great exertions, four persons were eventually saved. The names of the drowned are—Mr Douglas, merchant, from Copenhagen; Hugh Crawford, junior, in Flat; David Crawford, farmer, Kilbride; the servant of Mr Crawford; John Armour, mason, Hayley; —Mr Allister, farmer, Hayley; David McLennan, painter, Largs; and William Jamieson, junior, fletcher, Largs.

—29. This evening, about half past nine o'clock, a watchman, in patrolling the street called the Gallowgate, in Glasgow, observed a light in the closed shop of Mr John Arthur, druggist. The shop, as soon as possible, was opened, when a most extraordinary spectacle presented itself. The shop was what is called a double one, and had a counter on each side of the door. From the step of the door, a train of powder, six or seven inches in breadth, was laid along the front and rear of each counter, and at the end of the train on the right side was a heap, containing eight and a half pounds. Another heap was placed in the back room, to which another train was laid. In all, twenty-five pounds of powder were lifted by the police superintendent, being enough to have occasioned the destruction of the whole house and its numerous inmates, besides those who were passing on the street. The light which gave the alarm is supposed to have been occasioned by a chemical match, to which fire had been set, but which had burnt out. The stock and shop furniture were insured for L.150, being greatly above their value. Mr Arthur, his wife, to whom he had been less than a month married, the porter, and shop-boy, were apprehended, on suspicion of having been concerned in the attempt; but all, except Mr Arthur, were soon after dismissed. Arthur had that afternoon attended a dinner party, and was remarked to be very fidgety, frequently leaving the room for a considerable time. He is said to have been seen, at the moment when his shop was shutting, on the opposite side of the street, as if watching till his wife and the shop-boys should have gone away. At a later period of the evening, he is said to have been seen running rapidly along to the tavern where he had been dining. He has been committed to close custody in Bridewell.

Nov. 3. At a meeting of the presbytery of Dukeith, a dissent and complaint from a minority of the kirk-session of Cranston was brought forward, in reference to certain presbyterial proceedings against Mr Horsman, advocate, one of the royal commissioners lately appointed for investigating the statistics of the church of Scotland. A fama clamosa had reached the presbytery, to the effect that Mr Horsman had desecrated the fast-day of July 23, and they had consequently appointed the kirk-session of Cranston to investigate the case. When the minister of Cranston attempted to carry their request into execution, he was defeated for some time by his session, none of whom would attend. They had consequently appointed two of the ministers of the presbytery to be his assessors, and they had proceeded accordingly to the inquiry. At the second meeting, they had been interrupted by the members of the session declaring and voting their proceedings irregular, and they now, as a minority, appealed to the presbytery. Mr Horsman (who is a nephew of Sir John Dalrymple, late Whig representative of Mid-Lothian) stated the circumstances out of which the case had arisen. "On the afternoon of the fast-day, as late as six o'clock, passing accidentally the door of the schoolmaster at Chrichton, he stopped for one moment and asked if he was in. Being answered in the negative, he passed on without another word; had he found the schoolmaster at home, all he meant to do was to appoint a meeting with him for the next day, in order to transact business; and as he did afterwards so transact business, the schoolmaster appeared to have drawn his own wise inference, that it was only his being from home on the former day that prevented its being entered on then. He would state, moreover, that he was not at church on that day; but unless his absence could be presumed to have been wilful, and intended as contemptuous to the fast, surely the presbytery did not pretend that they ought to inquire about it. This proceeding was a public one, his statement would go forth to the public, and by its opinion he was contented to abide. The days were gone by when the character of individuals could be affected by ecclesiastical censures, no matter how unjust. Time was when the church ruled by being feared, it must now rule by being respected. Let it retain that respect, and it might stand like the rock of ages; let it lose it, and it must inevitably crumble into a thousand atoms." By a vote of seven to five, the presbytery agreed to proceed no farther in the matter.

—3. Seventy gentlemen of Glasgow, friends to the diffusion of education among the people, gave a dinner to Mr James Simpson, advocate, whose efforts in the cause of education are well known and highly appreciated. Mr A. Fullarton was chairman, and Mr W. Weir croupier. The chairman delivered an excellent speech, enforcing the necessity of an improved system of education. "It would not be difficult (he said) to assign some of the reasons why the process of improving the human mind among us has in no reasonable degree kept pace with those improvements we have made in physical science. This is a subject upon which I shall not enlarge; but two of these reasons are so prominent and outstanding, that I cannot forbear adverting to them. The first is, that most unreasonable love of pecuniary gain which has taken such fast hold on us as to threaten the extinction of the highest principles of our nature; and the second is that national vanity and self-conceit with regard to literary, scientific, moral, and religious attainments, which is the most deadly enemy to all improvement. Blinded by avarice and self-conceit, we could see nothing defective in our educational institutions. To remove the stigma thus implanted on our brow, and to introduce a system of education worthy of a great and enlightened nation, and commensurate in some degree to the wants of her population, is the high and noble enterprise to which my honourable and learned friend, Mr Simpson, who now honours us with his company, has directed all the energies of his naturally able and highly-cultivated mind. With what effect he has already laboured and written in this best of causes, it is not necessary for me to say, as it must be well known to you all." Mr Simpson described the kind of information which he was desirous of communicating as far as possible to all classes of the people. He was the advocate of "education, that shall render all not only wiser, but better and happier—all intelligent, honest, and merciful. Education, that shall impart a knowledge of man's constitution in body and mind, and the important relations of that constitution to external creation, that shall render the youngest familiar with the laws, physical, organic, and moral, which demand obedience as the price of happiness and the safeguard from misery; that shall exercise all in generosity, justice, and brotherly love, and tell the young that the feelings are not bestowed to control their mere selfishness, but as a fountain of never-failing delight—a fine taste of that perfected character, that high exercise of the intellect, and of the moral powers, which truly constitute 'the kingdom of heaven which is within us.' Education, moreover, that shall make no distinction of ranks, that shall be as good for the peasant as for the peer—for there is no aristocratic right to wisdom and virtue; which shall make no distinction of sex, for both sexes ought alike to know the natural laws under which they are designed to live; that shall elevate the teacher to the grade in society which his improved qualifications warrant, and thereby increase his usefulness. Education, in fine, that shall open both the book of Nature and the book of Revelation, that the one may shed its light on the other, remove the multifarious evils of ignorance, and bestow universally that knowledge, which, in the only true and rational sense, will give peace, unite all classes of mankind in the yet little understood bonds of Christian love, and render all men wise, benevolent, just, contented, and happy." The health of Mr George Combe, Lord Brougham, and other distinguished persons, were drunk.

—4. At a meeting of the Presbytery of Paisley, it was ruled, on the motion of Dr Burns, that the following questions should be put to Mr Brewster, namely—Whether he had attended a dinner given in Glasgow to Daniel O'Connell, M.P., and afterwards accompanied Mr O'Connell in his coach to Paisley, and taken his seat in the front of the gallery at a meeting held in the Old Low Church in compliment to Mr O'Connell, and whether Mr Brewster published a letter in the newspapers, on some occurrences at the Synod. Mr Brewster at once admitted that he attended the O'Connell dinner, and said he exulted in making the acknowledgment, but from the course pursued by Dr Burns, he declined to answer the other questions, unless such refusal would bring upon him a charge of contumacy, and appealed to the Synod. After a long and warm discussion as to the further mode of proceeding, Dr Burns made a motion to the following purport:—"That the Presbytery disapprove of the conduct of Mr Brewster, one of their members, in his attending a public dinner given to Dan. O'Connell, M.P., because such conduct was unseemly, disrespectful, and calculated to injure the church of Scotland; and the Presbytery defer giving judgment for the present on the other questions which he has declined to answer. The motion being put, it was supported by all the members present, with the exception of Mr Brewster, Mr M'Fee, and Mr Young. Mr Brewster intimated that he adhered to his protests, but as he was informed by one of the members that all which was meant by the motion, was a simple disapproval of his conduct in the opinion of the members who had voted, it would be a subject of consideration with him whether he carried the matter further or not.

—5. Dr John Abercrombie was installed in his office as Lord Rector of Marischal College, in Aberdeen, in presence of the Professors, the Dean of Faculty, and the Assessors. In the afternoon, the Scottish municipal elections which took place last month, few considerable changes in the strength of parties took place. The most remarkable was in Cupar-Fife, where, of fourteen vacancies, eleven were supplied by the Conservative party to a council formerly noted for liberalism in one of its extreme forms. In Edinburgh the Conservative party gained three new votes, making six in all.

Heretofore the assessed taxes were collected in Scotland by persons appointed by the Commissioners of Supply—local boards of country gentlemen. During the last session of Parliament, an act was passed, under the title of the stamp assessed tax act, by which the duty of collecting was transferred to the government officers for distributing stamps. The country gentlemen of Scotland have generally expressed great resentment respecting this alienation of patronage, which was accomplished before they were aware.

The munificent gift of two thousand pounds has been sent anonymously to an Edinburgh clergyman of the establishment, for the purpose of aiding in the endowment of a chapel in St George's parish.

The will of the late Alexander Boswell, Esq. of York Place, has just been proved, and contains amongst others the following benevolent and liberal donations:—"To the London and Middlesex Hospital, L.2000; to the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, L.4500; to the Asylum for Industrious Blind, Edinburgh, L.2000; to the Blind Asylum, St George's Fields, London, L.500. Residuary legacies—Caledonian Asylum, Copenhagen-fields, and Girls' Charity School, High Street, St Mary-le-bone.

An association, formed three or four years ago in Edinburgh to procure cheap lectures on science, has commenced operations this winter with increased spirit and success. Lectures are given once a-week, on moral philosophy, by Mr George Combe, and on astronomy and geology, by the Rev. J. P. Nichol, and twice a-week, on chemistry, by Dr Fyfe: the whole charge to subscribers being a guinea. The audience usually musters nearly a thousand. The past month has further been remarkable for the commencement of a system of lecturing parallel in character to what are called the cheap publications. Under the auspices of the benevolent society, Mr Simpson, elsewhere mentioned in this paper as the enlightened advocate of national education, has delivered to a large audience of the industrious classes, in the Cowgate Chapel, the three first of a course of lectures on moral and economical knowledge, for each of which only one penny is charged as the price of admission. The lectures are a happy mixture of good sense, good feeling, and facetious illustration, harmonising with the principles of a correct moral philosophy; and their success has been testified by the most cordial demonstrations on the part of a large and progressively increasing audience.

It is anticipated by the liberal party, that in consequence of the late registrations, they will gain sixty additional votes. In Scotland, the counties of Selkirk, Edinburgh, Stirling, Orkney, Banff, and Roxburgh, and the Inverness district of burghs, are said to be certain or nearly certain, in the same event, to exchange Conservative for liberal representatives, while the county of Haddington would probably fall to the Tory party.

On the morning of the 8th October, part of the roof of the coal-works belonging to the Duke de Coigny, at Kilgrammie, near the village of Dailly, Ayrshire, set down, and before the men could get clear of the workings, John Brown, about sixty years of age, was interposed in his way, and confined in this subterranean abode until the 31st, at four in the morning, when he was restored again to light and liberty, being thus twenty-three days without one morsel of food! When entombed, he had with him a small portion of tobacco, sufficient for one day's consumption, and two small flasks of lamp-oil. Some of the latter he attempted to swallow, but was unable to do so, and the only substance he took besides the tobacco, during the whole period of his confinement, was a strong chalybeate water within the range of his prison, and which he declared was very bad. His mind remained quite composed; he never despaired of ultimately escaping, and his greatest anxiety was for the fate of Thomas Wason, the person with whom he had for more than two years resided, and who he supposed had perished when the accident occurred, leaving a wife and helpless family. He calculated time by the noise made by the men at their stated periods of work. For the first and second week he moved about his gloomy cell, an area of thirty yards, seeking every avenue of hope; but latterly he became so weak as to be unable to reach his only but disagreeable beverage—the water. The feeling of hunger left him about the second day, which may be attributed, in some measure, to the stringent quality of the water. When found, he was extended on the ground, and lying on his breast, nearly dead, his extremities cold, his voice reduced almost to a whisper, or childish treble, and his emaciation so great, as to make him a complete personification of the Anatomie Vivante. His dark unshaven beard, sunken features, and glistering eyes, had given him an unearthly appearance. His brother labourers cautiously first lubricated his parched mouth with butter, then gave him milk, arrow-root, and sherry in small spoonfuls, at regular intervals, milk being the first thing he asked for when he was discovered. For some time his pulse continued regular, and hopes were entertained of his restoration to health. But on the 3d November, he sank into death, his latter moments being apparently unaccompanied by the least pain.

POLITICAL FALLACIES.

In the year 1824, Mr Bentham published a work entitled The Book of Fallacies, in which he catalogued and illustrated a great number of false political arguments and maxims. Mr Bentham, it is well known, wrote in a style so uncouth and unintelligible, that few could be at the pains to read any of his books: it was only when a translation or digest was given by a friend—in the words of the Edinburgh Review, it was only "after this eminent philosopher had been washed, trimmed, shaved, and forced into clean linen"—that the world was made any the wiser by his speculations. Of the book in question, the Edinburgh Review gave a remarkably witty and amusing report, which we propose here to abridge—not with the intention of aiding or depressing any set of political partizans now existing in the state, for such would be inconsistent with the design of the present work, but, by an exhibition of false maxims, to improve the power of thinking correctly in reference to all kinds of political questions. It is, indeed, very remarkable that, though little more than ten years has elapsed since the publication of Mr Bentham's book, nearly all the fallacies pointed out in it have already been generally acknowledged; so that no party can now be justly charged with any of them:

Irrevocable Laws.—A law, says Mr Bentham, no matter to what effect, is proposed to a legislative assembly, who are called upon to reject it, upon the single ground, that by those who in some former period exercised the same power, a regulation was made, having for its object to preclude for ever, or to the end of an unexpired period, all succeeding legislators from enacting a law to any such effect as that now proposed. By this means the men of an earlier, less experienced, and consequently less wise age, whose bones we are now tossing about with our spades, bind up us, the true venerable sages, from exercising our infinitely superior wisdom, and even from acting with a view to our own exigencies. This is a kind of despotism of the dead, much worse than any despotism of the living, in as far as, while a living despot may be accessible to reason, the dead are deaf to all appeal whatsoever. A kindred fallacy to this is the maintenance of any law or regulation merely through a historical recollection of the value put upon it at the time of its enactment. It is very likely, we should suppose, that, in the United States of America, many of the laws connected with the establishment of the republic might be found in the course of time highly injurious, without the sense of grievance being sufficient to overcome the veneration in which every thing associated with that great event must needs be held. The people of Great Britain have many prejudices of the same kind; and it is to the account of history that they must be charged. There can be no doubt that the chronicling of events, while it is indispensable for supplying us with experience, also sets up many false idols and many ridiculous bugbears.

Continuity of a Law by Oath.—The oath taken by the King at his coronation has been alleged to be an insurmountable barrier against various proposed measures which by others were deemed desirable. "Here, then," says the Review, "is an irrevocable law—a piece of absurd tyranny exercised by the rulers of Queen Anne's time upon the government of 1825; a certain art of potting and preserving a kingdom, in one shape, attitude, and flavour—and in this way it is that an institution appears like old Ladies' Sweetmeats and Made Wines—Apricot Jam 1822—Currant Wine 1819—Court of Chancery 1427—Penal Laws against Catholics 1676. The difference is, that the ancient woman is a better judge of mouldy commodities than the illiberal part of his Majesty's ministers. The potting lady goes sniffing about and admitting light and air to prevent the progress of decay; while to him of the woollack all seems doubly dear in proportion as it is antiquated, worthless, and unusable. It ought not to be in the power of the sovereign to tie up his own hands and those of his successors."

Self-Trumpeter's Fallacy.—This is an expedient of men in office for barring all inquiry and improvement. When any such thing is mentioned, they set up a cry as if their honour were called in question—as if, in challenging the virtue of the institution, you were throwing imputations upon their own virtue. If there be any one maxim in politics more certain than another, it is, that no probable degree of virtue in the governor can render it expedient for the governed to dispense with good laws and good institutions.

Fallacies of Pretended Danger.—Imputation of bad design—of bad character—of bad motives—of inconsistency—of suspicious connections. The object of this class of fallacies is to draw aside attention from the measure to the man, and this in such a manner, that, for some real or supposed defect in the author of the measure, a corresponding defect shall be imputed to the measure itself. Thus the author of the measure entertains a bad design; therefore the measure is bad. His character is bad; therefore the measure is bad, his motive is bad, I will vote against the measure. On former occasions, this same person who proposed the measure was its enemy; therefore the measure is bad. He is on a footing of intimacy with this or that dangerous man, or has been seen in his company, or is suspected of entertaining some of his opinions; therefore the measure is bad. He bears a name that at a former period was borne by a set of men now no more, by whom bad principles were entertained; therefore the measure is bad!

Now, if the measure be really inexpedient, why not at once show it to be so? If the measure is good, is it bad because a bad man is its author? If bad, is it good because a good man has produced it? What are these arguments, but to say to the assembly who are to be the judges of any measure, that their imbecility is too great to allow them to judge of the measure, by its own merits, and that they must have recourse to distant and feebler probabilities for that purpose.

Fallacy of Distrust, What's at the Bottom?—This fallacy begins with a virtual admission of the propriety of the measure considered in itself, and thus demonstrates its own futility, and cuts up from under itself the ground which it endeavours to make. A measure is to be rejected for something that, by bare possibility, may be found amiss in some other measure! This is vicarious reprobation; upon this principle Herod instituted his massacre. It is the argument of a driveller to other drivellers, who says, We are not able to decide upon the evil when it arises—our only safe way is to act upon the general apprehension of evil.

Official Malefactor's Screen—Attack us, you attack Government.—If this notion is acceded to, every one who derives at present any advantage from misrule, has it in fee simple; and all abuses, present and future, are without remedy. So long as there is any thing amiss in conducting the business of government, so long as it can be made better, there can be no other mode of bringing it nearer to perfection, than the indication of such imperfections as at the time being exist.

Accusation-scarer's Device—Infamy must attach somewhere.—This fallacy consists in representing the character of a calumniator as necessarily and justly attaching upon him who, having made a charge of misconduct against any persons possessed of political power or influence, fails of producing evidence sufficient for their conviction.

Fallacy of False Consolation.—"What is the matter with you? What would you have? Look at the people there, and there; think how much better off you are than they are. Your prosperity and liberty are objects of their envy; your institutions models of their imitation."—It is not the desire to look to the bright side that is blamed: but when a particular suffering, produced by an assigned cause, has been pointed out, the object of many apologists is to turn the eyes of inquirers and judges into any other quarter in preference. If a man's tenants were to come with a general encomium on the prosperity of the country, instead of a specified sum, would it be accepted? In a court of justice, in an action for damages, did ever any such device occur as that of pleading assets in the hands of a third person? There is in fact no country so poor and so wretched in every element of prosperity, in which matter for this argument might not be found. Were the prosperity of the country tenfold as great as at present, the absurdity of the argument would not in the least degree be lessened. Why should the smallest evil be endured, which can be cured; because others suffer patiently under greater evils? Should the smallest improvement attainable be neglected, because others remain contented in a state of still greater inferiority?

Procrastinator's Argument.—"Wait a little, this is not the time."—This is the common argument of men, who, being in reality hostile to a measure, are ashamed or afraid of appearing to be so. To-day is the plea—eternal exclusion commonly the object.

Vague Generalities.—Vague generalities comprehend a numerous class of fallacies resorted to by those who, in preference to the determinate expressions which they might use, adopt others more vague and indeterminate. Take, for instance, the terms Government, Laws, Morals, Religion. Every body will admit that there are in the world bad governments, bad laws, bad morals, and bad religions. The bare circumstance, therefore, of being engaged in exposing the defects of government, law, morals, and religion, does not of itself afford the slightest presumption that a writer is engaged in any thing blameable. If his attack is only directed against that which is bad in each, his efforts may be productive of good to any extent. This essential distinction, however, the defender of abuses uniformly takes care to keep out of sight; and boldly imputes to his antagonists an intention to subvert all government, law, morals, and religion. Propose any thing with a view to the improvement of the existing practice, in relation to law, government, and religion, he will treat you with an oration upon the necessity and utility of law, government, and religion.

Anti-rational Fallacies.—When reason is in opposition to a man's interests, his study will naturally be to render the faculty itself, and whatever issues from it, an object of hatred and contempt. The sarcasm and other figures of speech employed on the occasion are directed not merely against reason, but against thought, as if there were something in the faculty of thought that rendered the exercise of it incompatible with useful and successful practice. Sometimes a plan, which would not suit the official person's interest, is without more ado pronounced a speculative one; and, by this observation, all need of rational and deliberate discussion is considered to be superseded. The first effort of the corruptionist is to fix the epithet Speculative upon any scheme which he thinks may cherish the spirit of reform. The expression is hailed with the greatest delight by bad and feeble men, and repeated with the most unwearied energy; and, to the word Speculative, by way of reinforcement, are added, theoretical, visionary, chimerical, romantic, Utopian.

"The whole of these fallacies," says the Edinburgh Review, "may be gathered together in a little oration, which we will denominate the Noodle's Oration. 'What would our ancestors say to this, sir? How does this measure tally with their institutions? How does it agree with their experience? Are we to put the wisdom of yesterday in competition with the wisdom of centuries? (Hear, hear!) Is beardless youth to show no respect for the decisions of mature age? (Loud cries of hear! hear!) If this measure is right, would it have escaped the wisdom of those Saxon progenitors to whom we are indebted for so many of our best political institutions? Would the Dane have passed it over? Would the Norman have rejected it? Would such a notable discovery have been reserved for these modern and degenerate times? Besides, sir, if the measure itself is good, I ask the honourable gentleman if this is the time for carrying it into execution—whether, in fact, a more unfortunate period could have been selected than that which he has chosen? If this were an ordinary measure, I should not oppose it with so much vehemence; but, sir, it calls in question the wisdom of an irrevocable law—a law passed at the memorable period of the Revolution. What right have we, sir, to break down this firm column, on which the great men of that day stamped a character of eternity? Are not all authorities against this measure, Pitt, Fox, Cicero, and the Attorney and Solicitor-General? The proposition is new, sir; it is the first time it was ever heard in this house. I am not prepared, sir—this house is not prepared, to receive it. The measure implies a distrust of his Majesty's government; their disapproval is sufficient to warrant opposition. Precaution only is requisite where danger is apprehended. Here the high character of the individuals in question is a sufficient guarantee against any ground of alarm. Give not then your sanction to this measure; for, whatever be its character, if you do give your sanction to it, the same man by whom this is proposed, will propose to you others to which it will be impossible to give your consent. I care very little, sir, for the ostensible measure; but what is there behind? What are the honourable gentleman's future schemes? If we pass this bill, what fresh concessions may he not require? What further degradation is he planning for his country? Talk of evil and inconvenience, sir! look to other countries—study other aggregations and societies of men, and then see whether the laws of this country demand a remedy, or deserve a panegyric. Was the honourable gentleman (let me ask him) always of this way of thinking? Do I not remember when he was the advocate in this house of very opposite opinions? I not only quarrel with his present sentiments, sir, but I declare very frankly I do not like the party with which he acts. If his own motives were as pure as possible, they cannot but suffer contamination from those with whom he is politically associated. This measure may be a boon to the constitution, but I will accept no favour to the constitution from such hands (Loud cries of hear! hear!) I profess myself, sir, an honest and upright member of the British Parliament, and I am not afraid to profess myself an enemy to all change, and all innovation. I am satisfied with things as they are; and it will be my pride and pleasure to hand down this country to my children as I received it from those who preceded me. The honourable gentleman pretends to justify the severity with which he has attacked the noble lord who presides in the Court of Chancery. But I say such attacks are pregnant with mischief to government itself. Oppose ministers, you oppose government: disgrace ministers, you disgrace government: bring ministers into contempt, you bring government into contempt; and anarchy and civil war are the consequences. Besides, sir, the measure is unnecessary. Nobody complains of disorder in that shape in which it is the aim of your measure to propose a remedy to it. The business is one of the greatest importance; there is need of the greatest caution and circumspection. Do not let us be precipitate, sir; it is impossible to foresee all consequences. Every thing should be gradual; the example of a neighbouring nation should fill us with alarm! The honourable gentleman has taxed me with illiberality, sir. I deny the charge. I hate innovation, but I love improvement. I am an enemy to the corruption of government, but I defend its influence. I dread reform, but I dread it only when it is intemperate. I consider the liberty of the press as the great palladium of the constitution; but, at the same time, I hold the licentiousness of the press in the greatest abhorrence. Nobody is more conscious than I am of the splendid abilities of the honourable mover, but I tell him at once, his scheme is too good to be practicable. It savours of Utopia. It looks well in theory, but it won't do in practice. It will not do, I repeat, sir, in practice; and so the advocates of the measure will find, if, unfortunately, it should find its way through Parliament. (Cheers.) The source of that corruption to which the honourable member alludes, is in the minds of the people; so rank and extensive is that corruption, that no political reform can have any effect in removing it. Instead of reforming others—instead of reforming the state, the constitution, and every thing that is most excellent, let each man reform himself!—let him look at home, he will find there enough to do, without looking abroad, and aiming at what is out of his power. (Loud cheers.) And now, sir, as it is frequently the custom in this house to end with a quotation, and as the gentleman who preceded me in the debate has anticipated me in my favourite quotation of the 'Strong pull and the long pull,' I shall end with the memorable words of the assembled barons—Nolumus legis Angliæ mutari."

Foreign History.

SPAIN.

A PRELIMINARY meeting of the Spanish Cortes was held on the 12th November, when Isturitz, the government candidate, was chosen, provisionally, President of the Deputies, by 63 to 47. The Queen Regent formally opened the session on the 16th. In the opening speech her majesty expressed a hope, that without new loans or taxes, resources would be found sufficient to put an end to the present disturbances, ameliorate the lot of the public creditors, and place public credit on a solid basis. Her majesty acknowledged the co-operation which she continues to receive from the governments of Britain, France, and Portugal. She stated that three important laws would without delay be remitted to the consideration of the Cortes: "That of elections, the basis of a representative government; that of the liberty of the press, which is the soul thereof; and that of the responsibility of ministers, which is the fulfilment thereof." Various other measures were promised. Order and uniformity have already, her majesty says, been established in the courts of law; new codes are in the course of being prepared; a commission is labouring to effect a proper regulation of the clergy, and no sum will seem to her excessive for the perfection of a system of national education. Corporate property is to be sold, but without doing any injury to the inhabitants of the towns, and the produce applied to the formation of roads and canals; and property in the hands of the government is to be immediately offered for sale, in the belief that it will be more productive in the hands of private individuals.

At a subsequent sitting of the Cortes, Isturitz was chosen permanent president, by 134 to 88. On the 21st November, Mendizabal read his project of a new electoral law, whereby it is proposed to give one representative to every 50,000 inhabitants; the electors in each district to consist, first, of the hundred individuals who pay the highest amount of taxes; secondly, of another hundred added to them on a principle which we do not clearly understand, but also depending on the rate of taxation; thirdly, of all persons bred to the learned professions, such as professors, doctors, lawyers, officers of the National Guards, retired officers of the army, pensioners, &c. The Chronicle estimates that the two first classes will amount to 50,000, and the second to 100,000, giving a constituency of 150,000 for the whole monarchy. The election is to be by ballot: the qualification for a deputy is an income of L.60 a-year, or L.2400 of capital, or L.100 from the exercise of a profession, or a salary or pension of L.140 a-year from the state. Assuming the population to be twelve millions, the number of deputies will be 240.

On the 2d December, the ministerial addresses in reply to the Queen Regent's speech were voted without opposition.

The Spanish government have issued two decrees in favour of commercial operations—one dated 29th November contains some regulations respecting the importation of goods into Spain, with a view to the prevention of smuggling without restricting the facilities enjoyed by commerce—the other, dated 30th November, refers to the free circulation of English newspapers in that country. General Alava, the war minister, has been dispatched as ambassador to Paris, and his duties are undertaken in the meantime by Mendizabal.

The late military movements in the north of Spain have been of an important character. The British legion marched by Briviesca to Vittoria, where it arrived on the 3d November, without having encountered the least annoyance from the enemy. A junction has thus been effected between the native constitutional troops and their auxiliaries, which, as soon as the season will allow, cannot fail to turn to account against Carlos, now shut up among the mountains, where two years ago he first raised the standard of insurrection. The officers of the British legion have spontaneously agreed to show their good will towards the new ministry, by giving credit for two-thirds of their pay.

PORTUGAL.

On the 11th November, in consequence of the refusal of the Queen to allow the march of the troops destined for Spain, the Saldanha ministry resigned. Her majesty attempted, by the aid of the Marquises of Loulé and Fronteira, to form a new cabinet, but completely failed, and was obliged to recal Saldanha and his colleagues. On the 13th, a letter from her majesty, stating these humiliating circumstances, was published in the government newspaper, at the instance of the re-appointed ministers, who thus caused a reaction of public feeling in favour of the Queen. About the same time, the dismissal by the ministers of four popular officers for interfering in elections, caused the whole of the officers of the garrison of Lisbon to proceed in a body to the Queen to tender their resignations. On the Queen insisting upon the reappointment of the four officers, the ministry once more resigned, and a new one was then obtained, consisting of the Marquis de Loulé as president; Bernard de Sa as minister for foreign affairs; Loureira, war; Campos, finance; and Caldeira, justice; while Albuquerque is sent for from Madeira, to take the office of minister of the interior. It is not believed that this change can possess sufficient countenance from the popular principle to be permanent. The treaty for the marriage of Prince Ferdinand Augustus of Saxe Coburg, nephew of the Duchess of Kent and King Leopold, to the Queen of Portugal, was definitively signed at Coburg on the 7th December, by plenipotentiaries of the contracting parties.

The report of a treaty being on foot to establish a commercial league between this country and Spain has created much alarm at Lisbon, Portugal having hitherto formed the principal entrepôt for the commerce of the two nations.

FRANCE.

RUMOURS of a war between France and the United States, arising from the dispute respecting the indemnity money, were prevalent throughout the whole of December, and some preparations were actually made for the worst by the French ministry, which had an effect upon the funds. At the time when this paper is about to be printed, pacific news are daily expected from America.

The report read to the French Chamber of Peers on the case of Fieschi has been printed. It is of great length, and presents little that is new, and still less that is interesting. No proofs appear that the assassin was in the pay, or acted from the instigation, of any party. The plot, so far as yet known, seems to have been the work of two or three obscure individuals, of strong passions and small intellect, in whose minds the prevailing feeling of discontent soured into a deadly spirit of revenge. Additional facts may be elicited during the trial, or from the confession of the parties afterwards, but nothing has occurred to implicate either Republicans or Royalists in the odious crime. Fieschi's trial does not take place for some weeks. Nine of the rioters at Luneville and another town have been sentenced to transportation, or various periods of imprisonment.

LOWER CANADA.

On the 27th October, the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada was opened by the Earl of Gosford, the governor-general, and who at the same time exercises the office of chief commissioner for settling the dissensions of the province. His lordship delivered a speech, couched in the most conciliatory terms, and in which he expressed the utmost anxiety to satisfy the complaints which had reached his Majesty's throne. After alluding to a number of the alleged grievances of the province, his lordship summed them up in the following terms:—"In a declaration put forth by many among you, who inhabit this city, I have seen the following objects enumerated—1st, to obtain for persons of British and Irish origin and others, his Majesty's subjects, labouring under the same privations of common rights, a fair and reasonable proportion of the representation in the Provincial Assembly; 2dly, to obtain such a reform in the system of judicature, and the administration of justice, as may adapt them to the present state of the province; 3dly, to obtain such a composition of the executive council as may impart to it the efficiency and weight which it ought to possess; 4thly, to resist any appointment of members of the Legislative Council otherwise than by the crown; but subject to such regulation as may ensure the appointment of fit persons; 5thly, to use every effort to maintain the connection of this colony with the parent state, and a just subordination to its authority; and, 6thly, to assist in preserving and maintaining peace and good order throughout the province, and insuring the equal rights of his Majesty's subjects of all classes. If these objects are indeed all that are desired by the whole commercial interest, I trust it will be satisfactory to those who aim at them to know, that there is not one of them which is not strictly within the line of duty of the King's commissioners to take into consideration, to receive respecting them the fullest evidence and information which may be offered, and finally to submit to our gracious sovereign and his ministers their impartial and well-weighed conclusions."

[The Spectator remarks, that, in his excellency's speech, the main subject is, after all, shirked. The grand question which agitates the province is, it seems, the corrupt composition of the Legislative Council or Upper House, a reform of which is loudly demanded. It is appointed by and partly composed of a set of jobbing state officers, and in the last nine sessions has thrown out 122 bills. The people desire to have the appointment of it to themselves.]

The House of Representatives replied to Lord Gosford's speech in a long address, in which he was treated very courteously, while the general tone was uncompromising. They demand the extension of the elective principle to the Upper House, and add, that "no arrangement of a merely administrative and temporary nature could produce that harmony which they have so much at heart, with a view to a full and effective representation in the legislature of the country, of the rights, interests, desires, and wants of the people thereof." The address of the Legislative Council is shorter, and contains no point worthy of notice but a reprobatory allusion to the stoppage of the supplies by the representatives. The governor evinced his desire of conciliating the angry representatives, by sanctioning the payment of the contingencies of the assembly, including the agencies of Messrs Viger and Roebuck; but the bill for these last payments has been thrown out by the Legislative Council, on account of Mr Roebuck having characterised them as a "nuisance."

MEXICO.

THE intelligence from Mexico, Dec. 6, confirms the impression which has been for some time entertained, that the constitution of that republic was about to be subverted by its own chief magistrate, General Santa Anna. It appears that the Federal Congress has made itself the instrument of thus subverting the constitution which it was elected to maintain, and has assumed the authority of dissolving the legislative bodies of the different states of the Union, ordering each of these legislative bodies to nominate a departmental junta, consisting of five individuals, to act as a council for the governor of each state, and in case of a vacancy in the office of governor, to propose to the general government three persons, one of whom shall be selected to be the future governor, while, in the interval, the duties of governor shall be exercised by the first in order of the five councillors. It is also ordered that the subordinate authorities of the different states and their offices, with all the revenues and duties of which they have the administration, shall be under the control of the national government, through the medium of the governors of the respective states. It is stated that several of the Mexican states have declared against Santa Anna.

In the midst of proceedings which must to a certain extent paralyse the resources of the country, the American settlers in the province of Texas have revolted against Mexican authority. The cause of the movement is not very clear; but the warlike settlers, who are under the command of a British gentleman named Houston, are using every effort to obtain the sympathy and assistance of the neighbouring states of the American Union.

Dec. 12. The bookbinding establishment of M. Perrotet, 14, Rue de Pot de Fer, was burnt down, by which disaster property to the amount of about a million and a half of francs, including a fine edition of the works of Sir Walter Scott, Lacenaire's Memoirs, &c. was destroyed. The conflagration originated in the drying-room, where it is thought that some sheets might have been hung too near the flues.

Public feeling has been unusually agitated in America during the last few months, by the dread entertained for the effect of the speeches of Mr George Thomson and others, in favour of the emancipation of the slaves. That gentleman has just finished a tour in which he could scarcely any where announce himself, by taking refuge for his life in New Brunswick, where he will speedily embark for Britain. The fury into which he has thrown the inhabitants of the southern and slave-holding states is beyond all that can be imagined in our own peaceful country. The northern states, also, dreading to alienate the south, have taken part against the abolitionists, so that even in the refined and old-established cities of New England, Mr Thomson was treated with extreme personal violence. "With very few exceptions," says Mr Thomson himself, "the recent felonies, treasonable and bloody acts of South Carolina, Mississippi, and Virginia, have been sanctioned and indorsed by the North. Abolitionists have been outlawed. The laws grant them no protection, and even the professors of religion have joined with the ungodly in giving over the advocates of the slave to the tender mercies of an infuriated and blood-thirsty rabble." The federalists and democrats, it seems, impute abolitionism to each other as a foul stigma; the law disowns it; the church denounces it; and the mob are ready to commit any outrage upon its abettors. The fact is, that extreme terror for life and property, whether well or ill founded, is, and only could be, the cause of the outrages lately committed in America in reference to this subject.

Lord Durham arrived at St Petersburg on the 7th November, and was received by the emperor with the utmost cordiality.

It has transpired that all the sovereigns of Europe, not excepting the Pope, sent congratulations to Louis Philip, upon his escape from Fieschi's plot, except the Emperor Nicholas.

No European event for a considerable time has excited so much sensation as the speech delivered by the Emperor of Russia to the Warsaw deputation. This speech, communicated to a Parisian newspaper by the French resident at Warsaw, and thence spread all over Europe, has raised an undivided feeling of loathing and indignation against its author—a man popular in his own country on account of some domestic virtues which may or may not co-exist with moral excellence, but who is now every where else perhaps the most hated man that breathes. The Russian court is said to feel aggrieved by the publication of the speech, and has authorised a briefer but equally horrible version, which is as follows:—"Scarcely had the spokesman motioned to begin his speech, and uttered the word 'Sire'—'Stop,' said the emperor; 'I know what you mean to say; rather listen to me.' The deputy began to bow. 'Do not bow—you bowed just so in 1829, and in a shameless manner betrayed and rejected the benefits of Alexander, who, for your sakes, did not spare the riches of his own country. A precious page in history you have left! You yourselves, for yourselves, built this citadel. Now, only dare. On the slightest commotion, in twenty-four hours Warsaw ceases to exist, and it is not I who will build it a second time. Do not place your hopes on Germans or Frenchmen—hope only from my mercy. Honour the laws—love your monarch. I assure you that only thus can you hope for prosperity, and strive to give to your children a different education from what you have yourselves received.'"

The Morning Chronicle tells a story of a Russian lady of rank, married to the son of an English peer, who has been ordered to leave St Petersburg, on pain of the forfeiture of her estates, although her condition of health is such, that her physician declared she could not live to reach Berlin. "His Scythian Majesty," as the Chronicle happily styles the Czar, has adopted this method of showing his anger to the lady's husband, who is well known for his liberal opinions, and who has been employed in a line of policy displeasing to him.

A new instrument has lately been presented to the Academie des Sciences of Paris, by M. Isoard. It resembles the common violin, with the strings extended between two wooden or metal blades. It is made to vibrate at one end by a current of air, while at the other the player shortens the strings by the pressure of the finger.

We observe from the New York papers that a trial is about to be made in that city of the plan of paving with wood followed in St Petersburg, and repeatedly recommended by us for adoption in the more retired parts of our own metropolis. A part of the Broadway has been selected for the purpose. "Each of the small blocks of wood is of hexagonal shape; the whole are fitted together and driven up tightly, by a long strip of timber near the gutter at the sides; and the interstices between the blocks to be well paid with tar or pitch."—Mechanics' Magazine.

The act of Parliament for founding the colony of South Australia will now come into full operation; the commissioners having complied with the conditions precedent, by the sale of L35,000 worth of land, and by raising the required loan for the government of the colony. We may therefore expect shortly to see the names of the various officers gazetted (some of them have been long ago nominated); and we understand that active preparations are making with a view to the immediate departure of the officers and a small body of emigrants. This first expedition will be placed under the command of Captain Hindmarsh, R.N., the governor, who, with the assistance of the surveyors and other qualified persons, will carefully examine the various harbours in the colony, the quality of the neighbouring soil, the supply of water, &c.; and will select that site which, all things considered, is most desirable for the first town. It is the intention of the commissioners not to send out the main body of emigrants until the next spring, so as to allow ample time for the necessary preparations for their reception.

A great deal of attention has been excited by the appearance of the prospectus of a company to cut a canal which will unite the Danube and the Maine, and complete a water communication traversing the whole of Europe from the German Ocean through the Rhine, the Maine, and the Danube, to the Black Sea, and by means of the Karlowitz canal, now forming in the Austrian States, from the Danube in Hungary to the Adriatic. This great, yet practicable undertaking, will commence on the Danube near Kelheim, and pass through Nuremberg to the Maine at Bamberg.

Malibran, who is in the course of an engagement at Naples, has been suffering from a complaint in her feet, which gives her so much pain in walking that she is often forced to break off in her part. The opera of Il Barbiere was lately commanded by the king, and the syren appeared in Rosina, slipshod, and upon crutches, and thus went through her part, and evinced the splendid powers of her voice to the great satisfaction of the audience, who greeted the invalid Prima Donna with showers of bouquets, and the royal party sent her many compliments on the occasion.—Letter from Naples.

ENGLAND.

RELIEF OF THE IRISH CLERGY.

THE distress to which many of the established clergy of Ireland have been reduced by the stoppage of the payment of tithes, has, during the past month, become the subject of considerable attention throughout both England and Scotland. Thursday, Dec. 3, a meeting was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, London, for the purpose of commencing a subscription for their relief; the Archbishop of Canterbury was in the chair, and among those present were the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Jamaica, Lord Radstock, the Rev. Henry Melville, Mr M'Lean, Colonel Clithero, Dr Nicol, Colonel Wood, Sir Robert Inglis,

Mr Justice James Park, &c. The Archbishop of Canterbury opened the business, and urged a subscription and immediate relief on grounds quite apart from political belief. The Bishop of London said, "He intended strictly to confine himself within those limits which had been so properly and prudently laid down by his grace in his opening address. He should therefore abstain altogether from alluding to the state of political affairs of the country; but that should not prevent him from declaring his conviction that the heart of the British public bled at the sufferings of the Irish clergy, because it saw that Protestantism itself suffered in their persons. (Immense cheers.) They did not merely come forward to evince their Christian sympathy for the sufferings and calamities of a well-educated body of men, whose profession and the habits of society deprived of obtaining the means of subsistence otherwise than by the ministry—it was not merely because they were aware of that fact, and that they were anxious to afford the sufferers succour, but they also came forward because they felt that it was absolutely necessary for them to evince their determination, under the blessing of Providence, to uphold the church, to evince their determination to uphold the Protestant religion of these realms, and to do what in them lay, with the aid of divine Providence, to prevent Protestantism from being starved out of Ireland. (Great applause.) That was the question at issue." (Hear, hear.) In the course of the meeting eloquent appeals were delivered, and munificent donations announced; among others, L.500 from the King, L.100 from the Queen, L.2300 from the University of Oxford, L.1100 from Cambridge, and L.200 each from the Archbishops of Canterbury and Armagh and the Bishop of London. In all, between eleven and twelve thousand pounds was subscribed on the spot.

At various places throughout England there have been meetings and subscriptions for the relief of the Irish clergy. An appeal has been made to the public in Edinburgh, and a considerable sum collected. The presbyteries of Dumfries, Dingwall, and perhaps one or two others, have recommended subscriptions for the same object, to which the members have individually contributed.

Lords Lansdowne, Palmerston, Melbourne, and John Russell, have each subscribed L.100 towards the fund for relief of the Irish clergy. The Dublin Evening Mail states that the Lord Primate of Ireland has received a letter from the Bishop of Exeter, inclosing L.1000 for the benefit of the distressed Irish clergy, being the donation of a gentleman who refuses to have his name published. Lord Rolle has also sent L.1000 for the same object; and a similar sum has been forwarded to the Lord Primate from the Worcester diocesan subscription.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.

THE chief topic of domestic interest at present is the state and prospects of the agriculturists. That the farmers are labouring under a load of difficulties, which cannot long be supported, is a fact requiring no other evidence than the admission of every one who alludes to the subject. The question then is, and it demands immediate and careful attention, what must be done to remedy this state of things? In glancing over the opinions uttered by the principal speakers at the numerous agricultural meetings lately held throughout England, and the sentiments expressed by the press, friendly or hostile to the landed interest, we find the question regarded under various points of view. One class of thinkers admit the existence of agricultural distress, but doubt or deny that any thing can be done for the sufferers; another class attribute the evil to the change in the currency, and recommend a depreciation of the standard as a panacea; while a few assert that the question lies between tenant and landlord, and is altogether incapable of a satisfactory adjustment by legislative interference. We incline strongly to the latter opinion. As for any change in the currency, we regard such a measure as absurd. If the pound of gold or silver were coined into a greater number of sovereigns and shillings than at present, the tenant would pay his rent more easily, because he would, in reality, give a smaller quantity of gold and silver than he had bargained for. The change would extend through every transaction between the debtor and creditor in every branch of business, to the evident injury of the latter. Now, this change of relation between debtor and creditor being required only in the agricultural department, what can justify a measure which would bring confusion into our complicated commercial arrangements, when all the benefit to be expected from it (namely, a real, though not apparent, lowering of rents) may be as easily and more simply attained by the spontaneous act of the landlords? It appears strange that the landlords should remain unaware of the delusiveness of the idea that their rental will continue the same, provided a change in the currency shall enable the tenant to pay his rent to the nominal amount which he has hitherto rendered. Supposing that the depreciation enables him to pay his hundred pounds of rent with the same quantity of the precious metals which previously was equivalent only to eighty pounds, the landlord will find that the price of all the necessities of life has risen twenty per cent. (In the same proportion of course with the decreased value of money), and that with his hundred pounds he can provide himself with no more of the necessities or luxuries of life than he could have previously had for eighty. Is not this precisely the same as if he had lowered his rents twenty per cent.? The change in the currency, then, will not keep up the rents in reality, though it will in appearance. The landlords, who affirm the necessity of the change, admit, by so doing, that rents are too high. The remedy is in their own hands. Let them lower them. We are glad to observe that the Marquis of Chandos recommends that the two questions (of agricultural distress and the currency) shall be kept separate, in applying for a Parliamentary committee of inquiry. We shall be glad to see such a committee appointed, as their labours can scarcely fail to dissipate much of the delusion which is abroad on the question, and to show more clearly the simple fact, that rents, being too high, must come down.—Edinburgh Weekly Journal.

Nov. 23. In the Court of King's Bench, Sir W. Follett applied, in behalf of Colonel Fairman, for a rule to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against Mr Haywood (of Sheffield), for a letter written by him to Lord Kenyon (alluded to in our last). In the course of the proceedings, it was denied on the part of Colonel Fairman that the members of the Orange societies took illegal oaths, and on that of Lord Kenyon that he had ever, directly or indirectly, instructed Fairman to state to the Orangemen, that, in the event of King William IV. being deposed, it would be their duty to support the claims of the Duke of Cumberland to the throne. The rule was granted.—At a public meeting of the Catholic clergy and laity of Birmingham, resolutions to the following effect were passed:—That, although the book of Peter Dens is used in Ireland, no attempt has ever been made to cause the clergy to subscribe to his opinions, which form no part of the Catholic faith, while some of them have been publicly disclaimed by the prelates. That the Catholic clergy and laity here present, united in doctrine with the Catholics throughout the whole world, most cordially adopt the following principles, extensively circulated in the prayer books in common use throughout Ireland, and extracted from a declaration of Catholic principles, namely, "It is a fundamental truth in our religion, that no power on earth can license men to lie, to forswear or perjure themselves, to massacre their neighbours, to destroy their native country on pretence of promoting the Catholic cause or religion. Furthermore, all pardons or dispensations, granted or pretended to be granted, in order to any such ends or designs, could have no other validity or effect than to add sacrilege and blasphemy to the above-mentioned crimes. The doctrine of equivocation, or mental reservation, however wrongfully imputed to the Catholic religion, was never taught or approved by the church as any part of her belief; on the contrary, simplicity and godly sincerity are constantly inculcated by her as truly Christian virtues, necessary to the conservation of justice, truth, and common security."

—25. An inquest was held on the body of Mr John Mackerrell, a gentleman of very large fortune, and formerly in the civil service of the East India Company at Madras. It appeared from the evidence, that Mr Mackerrell destroyed himself on the preceding day, by drinking a quantity of prussic acid. Dr James Johnson, his medical attendant, stated, that for some time past he had been afflicted with mental delusions of an extraordinary nature, and extreme physical suffering, on alternate days. He did not think that he could be said to be insane, and declined saying what his delusions were, unless ordered by the court. Mr M. had ultimately destroyed himself on one of his lucid days. A verdict of insanity was returned. It has since appeared, on an examination of the body, that the unfortunate gentleman was afflicted with some extraordinary derangements of the physical system, the most remarkable of which was a hard, jagged, stony concretion, the size of a nut, impinged against, and growing upon, one of the most important nerves in the body, called the par vagum, which supplies nervous influence to the lungs, heart, stomach, and other parts. In almost all the organs to which this nerve is distributed, there was considerable organic disease. The brain was quite sound. It is supposed that the irritation of this great nerve, serving as a communication between the brain, and the more important organs of the body, was the material cause of the monomania, or delusion on a single point. Although the precise nature of the very peculiar delusions under which this gentleman laboured still continues a profound secret, yet some information has incidentally transpired as to the general character of at least a part of the delusion, which had reference to a particular number. It seems that a particular number had made an indelible impression upon his mind, that he considered his fate identified with it, and that its recurrence under a particular conjunction would be fatal to his existence. Dr Johnson states that, had he been at liberty to disclose the secret, it would supply a complete solution of the strangely eccentric conduct of the deceased on one occasion, in booking himself for Paisley, and yet turning back to Manchester; re-booking himself on reaching London to go back again in the evening, and returning again on getting to Birmingham—booking himself a third time on his return, and not starting; then booking himself a fourth time, and going the journey.

—26. The Common Council of London passed, by 99 to 35, a vote of censure on the ex-mayor Winchester, in which he was charged with violating his public duty, breaking his solemn promises to call Common Halls and Courts of Common Council when required so to do, acting with great rudeness and personal arrogance to members of the court, usurping powers which do not belong to the Lord Mayor, and manifesting generally a want of the "gentlemanly feeling becoming the high station to which he had been raised by his fellow-citizens!" A motion was made to inscribe this censure upon a plate of brass, to be affixed to some conspicuous part of the Guild Hall; but this was negatived by a large majority.

—27. In the Central Criminal Court, Mr William Allen and Richard Clark, of the steam yacht Adelaide, were tried for the manslaughter of Richard Baker, by running down a fishing smack, of which he was on board, off Woolwich. As it appeared that there was no negligence on the part of these individuals, while the fishing smack had no light, and was steering by the wind, a verdict of acquittal was returned.—A coroner's inquest was held upon the body of Thomas Ramsay, a soldier of the royal marines, who had died of lock-jaw in consequence of receiving a hundred and thirty lashes, in the Woolwich barracks, for disorderly conduct. A verdict was given accordingly.—This evening, about six o'clock, the apartments of the Dowager Marchioness of Salisbury in the west wing of Hatfield House, were discovered to be on fire. The marchioness, who was eighty-four years of age, but remarkably active for her time of life, had been left writing letters an hour before, and it is supposed that the fire was occasioned by her head-dress coming in contact with one of the candles. Her son, the marquis, made some desperate efforts to enter the apartment and rescue his mother, but in vain; nor is it likely that he could have then saved her life, as the rooms were completely filled with smoke and flame. The whole of the wing was burnt down, and it was with great difficulty that the remainder of the house was saved. The remains of the deceased lady—a few detached bones—and some valuable jewels which she wore at the time of the accident, were found some days afterwards among the ruins. Her ladyship was a leader of the gay world. Amongst the jewellery destroyed was a pearl necklace which Charles II. gave to the family of Salisbury, and which was said to have been originally a gift from Edward III. to the famous countess of that title, in whose honour he instituted the order of the garter.

Dec. 2. At a meeting of the proprietors of the London University, Lord Brougham recommended the acceptance of the charter proffered by his Majesty, which simply incorporates their body under the title of the London University College, and is accompanied by another charter, forming a distinct corporation or board under the title of the University of London, whose business it will be to grant degrees upon examination, in every department of arts, science, and literature, except divinity, in whatever school the student may have received his education. The meeting came to a resolution approving of the charter. The establishment of the University of London is a remarkable era in the annals of British education, as it will enable persons of all religious persuasions to obtain the desired attestations of their attainments without submitting to any religious test.

—15. An open public meeting was convened at Brighton, for the purpose of allowing Mr M. O'Sullivan to explain his views of the character of Popery. The Liberals attended in a considerable number, and, after some disturbance, succeeded in voting one of their own party into the chair, to the exclusion of Lord Teignmouth, who had been contemplated by the conveners of the meeting. Mr O'Sullivan spoke for three hours against the Catholic religion, and was answered by Mr Carew O'Dwyer, late member for Drogheda, who happened to be in Brighton for his health. The meeting ultimately came to the following resolution—"That it is inexpedient for this meeting to entertain any question as to the regulation of ecclesiastical affairs, and the difference between the Catholic and Protestant religions as introduced to the meeting."—At the Freemasons' Tavern, a great meeting took place for the purpose of establishing a Royal Agricultural Society, to act as the centre of the local associations for promoting the interests of agriculturists. After the business of the meeting had been transacted, Lord Stanhope moved a resolution, which was carried with only one dissentient voice, "That no measure would be efficient for the relief of agricultural distress, but a measure which should either raise the price of agricultural produce to the weight of the burdens by which it was pressed, or bring down the burdens to the price of the produce."

—17. A considerable number of merchants, officers of the navy and merchant-service, and seamen, assembled in the Mariners' Church, Wellesloe Square, for the purpose of founding an hospital for the relief of decayed masters, mates, and seamen in the merchant-service. Mr G. F. Young, M.P., presided. He stated that 182 masters and 115 mates were already pledged to give every assistance to the undertaking. Mr Robinson, M.P., Sir John Franklin, Captain Young, and Captain Barber, addressed the meeting upon the benefits of the proposed institution; and resolutions were agreed to, preliminary to the purchase of ground on which to erect an asylum, and other necessary steps. It is intended that sixpence a month shall be contributed by each seaman towards the maintenance of the establishment.

—18. Mr Maunsell, the Conservative candidate, was elected for North Northamptonshire by a majority of 597 against his Whig opponent, Mr Hanbury.

On the 23d November, Sir Francis Burdett addressed a letter, through the medium of the Times, to the members of Brookes's Club, calling on them to expel Mr O'Connell, whose sayings and doings at Manchester and Glasgow, and the language used by him in reference to the Dukes of Cumberland and Wellington, and Mr Raphael, render it, in Sir Francis's opinion, necessary to the character of the club to exonerate itself from the burden of such a member. This publication occasioned an almost universal burst of indignation from the supporters of ministers. It drew from Mr O'Connell a letter, dated Nov. 27, and addressed to the people of Ireland, in which he represented it as part of the remuneration he received for his devotion to every principle of civil and religious liberty, but particularly his zeal for the interests of Ireland. He also promised in sarcastic terms to address the Westminster electors in reference to the subject, but first to seek a commodity of good words, that he might not shake the nerves of the antiquated rouses of St James's. Among the other consequences of the letter of Sir Francis was a meeting of a portion of his electors calling upon him to resign his seat, on the score of his political conduct, and this instance in particular—a call which the honourable baronet answered by saying, that he would regard the resignation of his seat as a desertion of it.

Mr Estcourt, of Conservative principles, was elected for Devizes, having a majority of 157 to 145 against his Whig opponent, Dundas.

A pension of L.300, which Sir R. Peel designed to confer upon Mr Faraday, the distinguished chemist, has, after some delay, arising apparently from the disapprobation with which Lord Melbourne regards the custom of pensioning men of science, been ratified.

A committee of the Irish Grand Lodge of Orangemen has published a report, designed to redeem the body from the odium lately cast upon it, and to assert its loyalty and peaceable disposition. They refer to their laws and regulations in proof of the Christian spirit by which they are actuated, and allude to instances of individuals being expelled from their body, whose only offence was a violation of Christian charity. They defy their enemies to "produce a single instance to justify the very erroneous impressions which have prevailed to our prejudice, by which intolerant and persecuting sentiments were ascribed to us—sentiments directly opposed to the spirit of our order, and most abhorrent to the feelings of our members."

During the past month, festive meetings have been held in various places by the Conservative party, particularly at Sheffield and Birmingham, at which last place the dining party consisted of eight hundred.

The lieutenantancies of Gloucestershire, Monmouthshire, and Brecon, vacant by the death of the Duke of Beaufort, have been conferred respectively upon Lord Seagrave, Mr Hanbury Leigh, and Mr Williams of Penny-pont, all of whom are Liberals.

Sir Robert Peel has declined the dinner proposed for him at Derry by the Marquis of Londonderry, the Earl of Roden, and others.

Mr Sheriff Salomons has been prevented from entering upon the office of alderman for Aldgate ward, in consequence of his declining to take the required oath "on the true faith of a Christian." This gentleman, it will be recollected, is of the Hebrew nation.

Since the beginning of the late session of Parliament, a considerable number of new elections have taken place. The Conservative party has replaced eleven Liberals; the Ministerial party five Tories. The Conservative gain has thus been six, rendering their minorities liable to be improved by twelve votes, which might have given them success at the beginning of the session, though it cannot do so now, when, upon ordinary questions, the ministers are able to calculate upon a majority of about thirty. As Parliament has been summoned for the dispatch of business on the 4th of February, no new general election can be expected before that period; but that ministers will allow a whole session to elapse without the dissolution which their friends consider due to them, does not appear to be generally expected.

The Sheffield Iris publishes an answer given by the Duke of Norfolk to a memorial from certain tenants of his grace in Sheffield Park, requesting a grant of land for a new church. His grace, with his usual courtesy and liberality, at once acceded to the request, though at the same time he reminded the memorialists that the only acknowledgment made by the clergyman who preached at the opening and consecrating of a church, for which he granted the land some time ago, was a violent and unfounded attack on the religion which he professed. His grace concludes thus:—"The feelings naturally excited by conduct so illiberal, as well as so unworthy of a Christian minister, might, perhaps, justify me in meeting your request with a negative. But I will dismiss from my mind all such feelings; and, in the true spirit of the Catholic religion, which, like every other system of Christianity, enjoins the forgiveness of injuries, I will comply with the wishes of my Protestant brethren and fellow townsmen, and give directions that a suitable plot of ground shall be allotted for the purpose required."

As a satisfactory proof of the decrease of crime in the Tower of London Liberty, it may be mentioned that the last three quarter sessions have been maiden ones, there not having been a single case for trial on any of those occasions.

At a public meeting held at Tamworth, Dec. 15, to consider the projected railway from Birmingham to Derby, Sir Robert Peel avowed himself favourable to the principle of communication by railways, and on all occasions disposed to give them his cordial support, provided he was satisfied that they presented a fair prospect of affording a profitable investment for capital; and further, that it appeared to him to be indispensably necessary to the maintenance of the present superiority of this country, that such undertakings should be encouraged.

The cause of the typhus fever at Wentworth House, to which Lord Milton fell a sacrifice in his twenty-fourth year, was the covering over of an interior reservoir, which, from containing a number of lichens and much vegetable accumulation, gave forth a deleterious gas. Can we doubt of the value of physical science, and the propriety of its more general diffusion, when we find ignorance, or neglect of its truths, thus occasioning the most grievous and lamentable of calamities?

As the season has advanced, much painful sensation has been felt in reference to ten of the whale-ships, which, from their not returning home, are supposed to be bound up in the hyperborean ice. They are the Abram, Dorden, Jane, Harmony, and William Todd, of Hull; Lady Jane and Grenville Bay, of Newcastle; Norfolk, of Berwick; Viewforth, Kirkaldy; and Middleton, of Aberdeen. The men on board are said to amount to 500. By the humane zeal of Colonel Thompson, M.P. for Hull, a small expedition has been fitted out under the command of Captain James Clark Ross, for the purpose of rescuing this large number of useful men from the compound dangers of their situation.

Gas was charged by a company at Sheffield twelve shillings per thousand feet. A new company has been started, which supplies the article at five shillings. In Edinburgh, gas is charged nine shillings per thousand feet, in Glasgow a little more: it is needless to add that in those places there is but one company. The last dividends of the Edinburgh Gas Company were ten per cent. upon the original shares.

The Neva, Captain Peck, with female convicts for New South Wales, was totally lost, on King Island, in JANUARY, 1836.

Bass Straits, about the beginning of May, and of two hundred and forty-one people on board, only the captain, chief mate, seven seamen, and six convicts, were saved. The Neva sailed from the Downs on the 11th December, in company with the unfortunate George the Third, whose loss, with a great number of male convicts, was lately announced.

The Mona's Herald contains some particulars of an extraordinary event which has occurred in the Isle of Man. A man and his wife arrived, early in 1833, on the island from Scotland, accompanied by the woman's daughter by a former husband. The child, it is stated, was entitled by her father's will to L.1000; and her brother, who remained with her father's relations, to L.6000. The man was in narrow circumstances, and it is supposed had fixed his eyes on the child's portion. But how to gain his object was the puzzle. At the latter end of 1833 the little girl, who had been her mother's darling, sickened, and after a week's illness, to all appearance died. The body, it was supposed, was buried in the churchyard of Kirk Bride, the usual ceremony having been performed by the Rev. Mr. Nelson. The man, as a matter of course, communicated the tidings of the death of the child, accompanied with the clergyman's certificate of the funeral, to the guardians in Scotland, who were consequently bound to pay him, in his wife's behalf, the L.1000 settled upon the child by the will of her father. Whether he received the whole of the money or not is uncertain; it is said, however, that he received L.100, and left the island, last summer, for Ireland. Suspicion seems to have existed as to the fate of the child; and the neighbours who had assisted at the funeral requested the clergyman to give them permission to open the grave. Accordingly, the Rev. Mr. Nelson and others proceeded to the grave, had it opened, and, on removing the lid of the coffin, found a log of wood, which purported to form the body, and two pieces of sticks, intended to represent the legs! The effigy was regularly attired in grave clothes, had a cap on the head, and a fine cambric frill round the neck. What became of the little girl remains to be discovered.

IRELAND.

Nov. 26. Dr Murray, the Catholic primate, on applying for admission to the Dublin Royal Society, was black-beaned by 80 against 64. This is regarded as a political triumph by the Orange party.

From a correspondence in the Irish papers, it appears that Lord Morpeth has authorised a magistrate and some police to attend the tithe process-servers, upon satisfactory affidavits that danger is apprehended to the lives of the parties so employed.

The eastern and southern coasts of Ireland have been visited by violent storms. Many vessels were wrecked, principally between Wexford and Cork. It is not stated that any lives have been lost.

Mr O'Connell has been employing his leisure at Derrynane in urging, by letters in the Dublin Pilot, the formation of a Reform Association in Ireland, for the support of the existing ministry. He deprecates all violence in pressing extreme measures, as being likely to alarm the more timid of the liberals, with whom he wishes to avoid any cause of splitting for the present. He still holds out the repeal of the Union as a last resource, in case the government shall finally stop short of his demands. In compliance with the suggestion of Mr O'Connell, a Reform Association has been formed in Ireland, professing to have for its objects, "to re-animate and extend the principles of reform, to obtain a just and popular system of municipal government, and to forward, by all constitutional means, the election of liberal representatives to Parliament, pledged to vote for a repeal of all compulsory tithe-laws, and the abolition of all unmerited pensions and sinecures." He has been occupied with another series of letters, which appeared in the Leeds Times, advocating a change in the constitution of the House of Lords. These letters were in the shape of replies to some articles in defence of the Upper House, which were published by Mr Baines in another Leeds journal. The outline of his plan for revolutionising the House of Lords is this:—A large number of new peers must be created in the first instance to pass the bill. These new lords, together with all the peers of the three kingdoms indiscriminately, will form a body, out of which a specific number are to be elected for five years, one-fifth going out annually by rotation. The election to be by universal or household suffrage. An article in reference to Mr O'Connell, which lately appeared in the Morning Advertiser, a London ultra-liberal print, furnished matter for considerable speculation to the contemporary London journals, at present very barren of interest. The article in question scornfully rejected, on the part of the ministry, the imputation of any connection with Mr O'Connell (who was characterised as a restless and selfish demagogue), beyond the simple fact of his having, throughout the last session, supported ministerial measures which he approved of. The article was generally attributed to Lord Brougham, whom many of the liberal papers regard as a sort of a will-o'-the-wisp, or a comet destined to throw every thing into perplexity and confusion; but his lordship has denied the authorship in such pointed terms, as to force at least an appearance of conviction on the journals in question.

The amount this year of the tribute to Mr O'Connell has increased in a large degree. Last year, for instance, the total sum collected for him in Cork, including the proceeds of tribute Sunday and all subsequent subscriptions, was but L.586, 1s. 3d., the money paid at the chapels amounting to only L.493. In the present year the mere receipts at the chapels were L.820. In other places there has been nearly the same proportion of increase, and the collection will be much the largest he has yet had.

Mr Thomas Reynolds, who was lately sentenced to nine months' imprisonment for an alleged breach of the peace at a public meeting, has been liberated by the Lord Lieutenant. A subscription has been entered into to pay his fine.

The substitution of a Protestant for a Catholic population is at present in the course of being effected in several large districts of Ireland. Nine hundred individuals were, about the beginning of the past month, ejected from the estates of Lord Beresford and three other persons.

A curious specimen of the different ways in which men of various education and prejudices will view the same thing, is presented by the language applied in Tory prints to the Irish Catholic clergy, and the terms in which the same persons are spoken of by their friend O'Connell. According to the journals alluded to, the Irish priests are "a disgrace to the name of Christian ministers"—"absolute, selfish, coarse, and hateful tyrants"—"vulgar-minded, shallow, and unprincipled quacks"—"spiritual tyrants"—"brutal autocrats"—"surpliced ruffians"—"wretched impostors"—"Popish ruffians"—"pious terrorists"—"atrocious hypocrites"—"a brutal priesthood." According to Mr O'Connell, "When misery presses hard upon the Irish peasant, he has one friend, one only friend—the priest. When distress wrings his soul, he has one comforter, one only comforter—the priest. When crime covers him with disgrace and consigns him to punishment—when his heart sinks within him at the apprehension of man's vengeance, and with the terror of God's wrath, he has one consoler, one only consoler—the priest. When famine stalks abroad, and his children wail in starvation, there is one incessant in collecting the means of relief—one, only one incessant collector—the priest. When pestilence invades the land, and brings desertion of friends, and agony and death, there is still one who does not forsake him living, nor desert him dying—who stretches upon his straw, impregnated with infection, and pours the last words of Christian comfort upon that dying breath, from which, in return, he inhales disease, and perishes, the martyr of duty, of charity, and of God—the PRIEST—THE PRIEST."

Government are removing from their stations such police magistrates as gave evidence before the intimidation committee unfavourable to the habits and character of their reverences the priests.—Dublin Evening Mail.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ON THE CAUSES OF THE NUMEROUS SHIPWRECKS.—It is notorious, that if a ship-builder builds a strong and safe merchant vessel, on sale, he cannot sell it. Why? Simply because there is no demand for an article of the kind. He knows, too, that from causes which will be hereafter explained, a shipowner who intends to insure his vessel, and conduct it on the plan on which merchant vessels are ordinarily conducted, has no interest in getting a strong and safe vessel, but has a very strong interest in getting a weak and unsafe one. Hence nothing is more common than to hear ship-builders say, that if they could get old vessels to repair, they would never lift a tool in building a new one. Why? Simply, as said before, because they cannot get paid for their material and labour. As this interest will again be referred to hereafter, I pass to the next, viz. the ship-owning interest, which I shall first illustrate by an analogous case, and then make the application. It is evident, that if I can earn as much money with a cart, a post-chaise, a stage-coach, or a vehicle of conveyance of any description whatever, which costs only L.5, as I can with a similar vehicle which costs L.10; and if, further, I can get the cheap vehicle insured to the full amount which it has cost, at as low a rate per cent. as I can the strong and dear vehicle, keeping always in mind that I can earn as much money with it as with the dear one, it is evidently my interest to get it, instead of a dear one, because I save not only the interest on the additional cost of the strong vehicle, but I also save the amount of insurance on L.5, or one-half of the value. It is of no earthly consequence to me, whether the L.5 vehicle be safe or unsafe, because I have it insured to the full value, and if it be lost, I receive the full value for it. Now, when it gets old, and begins to need repairs, it becomes a tax on my pocket to keep it up, and I would be better with a newer vehicle, which would require less expense in upholding; and as I can still insure the old vehicle for L.5, the sum which it cost me when new, it becomes my interest to do so, and to withhold repairs from it, and to let it be lost. Every sixpence, therefore, which I lay out upon it in repairs, operates against my interest in two ways. It first takes a sixpence out of my pocket, and it diminishes, to the extent of the repair, my chance of getting quit of it, and purchasing a new one with the money. Now, if we apply all this to a merchant ship, instead of a cart, a post-chaise, or a stage-coach, and for L.5, read L.500, and for L.10, read L.1000, we will find the analogy most closely to apply, in all respects, to merchant shipping, and showing the principle on which nearly the whole commercial marine of Britain is conducted at this day, and which I have no hesitation in saying, is the true and real cause of the vast majority of shipwrecks which take place. There are other circumstances, too, in addition, which reward me, if I be a shipowner, for having a weak and unsafe ship, and punish me for having a strong and safe one. Thus, if I have a weak vessel which cost L.500, and a strong vessel, of the same size, which cost L.1000, and they both get ashore, side by side, the weak vessel soon goes to pieces, and I call upon the underwriter, and receive L.500, the sum insured for—but the strong vessel holds together, and is got off, with damage to the extent, let us suppose, of L.300. Of this the underwriter pays only two-thirds, on the principle of having given new materials for old, and therefore, besides the detention of the vessel, whilst she is undergoing repairs, and many other expenses, which I never can recover from the underwriter, I am punished to the extent of loss, of upwards of L.100, net cash, for having had a strong, instead of a weak, vessel. This, too, in addition to the loss (for it never can be too often repeated, till an alteration of the system is effected) of interest of capital on L.500, and insurance on L.500, additional on the strong vessel. In such circumstances, and conducted on such principles, can the dangerous condition of the commercial marine of Britain be wondered at? The principle holds out the strongest temptation which is found to influence human nature to fraud. It punishes with loss of property, the honest man who has a strong ship, and rewards with property the man who can get the weakest vessel. It forces a shipowner to get an unsafe instead of a safe vessel. Hence the competition as to who can get the cheapest vessel, without the least regard to her safety, or the consequences dependent on it.—We come next to the underwriter's interest. Age, and not the intrinsic condition of a vessel, is made the principal criterion for determining her rank and place in the register-book; and consequently, as every vessel must, if not lost, get older, every motive is taken away, from a shipowner, to get a strong vessel, because in a few years she will have passed the prescribed period, and will then be ranked, not according to her intrinsic quality and condition, as she ought to be, but in the same class with the most worthless fabric of the same age, which can be made to float. With respect to the construction of the vessel, it must be obvious to every one who hears me, that if a carpenter were putting a roof on this or any other house, and was joining only every alternate rafter or couple together, at the top, that those couples or rafters which were not joined together, would not only not contribute any thing to the strength of the roof, but would actually take away from it, by the amount of their own weight, suspended by the covering above them, and supported by the adjacent rafters. Now, if instead of the roof of a house, we apply this to the ribs or timbers of a merchant vessel's bottom, we will find the analogy to apply most closely.—From an Address, delivered at South Shields, by J. Ballingall, Esq.

POLICY OF INVESTING THE PEOPLE WITH RIGHTS.—I am persuaded that the only means which we possess, at the present time of inculcating the notion of rights, and of rendering it, as it were, palpable to the senses, is to invest all the members of the community with the peaceful exercise of certain rights; this is very clearly seen in children, who are men without the strength and the experience of manhood. When a child begins to move in the midst of the objects which surround him, he is instinctively led to turn every thing which he can lay his hands upon to his own purposes; he has no notion of the property of others; but as he gradually learns the value of things, and begins to perceive that he may in his turn be deprived of his possessions, he becomes more circumspect, and he observes those rights in others which he wishes to have respected in himself. The principle which the child derives from the possession of his toys, is taught to the man by the objects which he may call his own. In America those complaints against property in general, which are so frequent in Europe, are never heard, because in America there are no paupers; and as every one has property of his own to defend, every one recognises the principle upon which he holds it. The same thing occurs in the political world. In America the lowest classes have conceived a very high notion of political rights, because they exercise those rights; and they refrain from attacking those of other people, in order to ensure their own from attack. Whilst in Europe the same classes sometimes recalcitrate even against the supreme power, the American submits without a murmur to the authority of the pettiest magistrate. * * * The government of the democracy brings the notion of political rights to the level of the humblest citizens, just as the dissemination of wealth brings the notion of property within the reach of all the members of the community; and I confess that, to my mind, this is one of its greatest advantages. I do not assert that it is easy to teach men to exercise political rights; but I maintain that when it is possible, the effects which result from it are highly important: and I add, that if there ever was a time at which such an attempt ought to be made, that time is our own. It is clear that the influence of religious belief is shaken, and that the notion of divine rights is declining; it is evident that public morality is vitiated, and the notion of moral rights is also disappearing: these are general symptoms of the substitution of argument for faith, and of calculation for the impulses of sentiment. If, in the midst of this general disruption, you do not succeed in connecting the notion of rights with that of personal interest, which is the only immutable point in the human heart, what means will you have of governing the world except by fear? When I am told that since the laws are weak and the populace is wild, since passions are excited and the authority of virtue is paralysed, no measures must be taken to increase the rights of the democracy; I reply, that it is for these very reasons that some measures of the kind must be taken; and I am persuaded that governments are still more interested in taking them than society at large, because governments are liable to be destroyed, and society cannot perish.—De Tocqueville's Democracy in America.

CURIOUS FACTS.—Mr H. C. Carey, an American writer, in "an Essay on the Rate of Wages," recently published at Philadelphia, gives a number of curious facts, drawn from a great number of authorities, chiefly upon the respective conditions of the people of England, France, the Netherlands, the United States, China, and Hindostan. Through these we cannot follow the author, but the tabular results to which he arrives may be given. The scheme is ingenious, and is "not offered as being accurate, but simply as an approximation."

	U.S.	G.B.	Neth.	France.	China.	Hind.
Security of person and property,	100	100	45	50	20	10
Freedom of action,	100	70	65	40	—	—
Freedom of commerce,	80	50	60	30	—	—
Habits of industry,	90	80	100	55	100	50
Capital, land included,	90	100	45	50	15	15
	460	400	315	225	135	75
Deduct taxation,	20	100	50	50	6	10
	440	300	265	175	129	65

It has been estimated that eleven days' labour in the United States would be sufficient to obtain a quarter of wheat. Taking the above sum of 440, and multiplying it by that number of days, the product would be 4840; which I propose should represent a quarter, or eight bushels of wheat. Say 11 days.

The powers of the English labourer being 300, he would require, to obtain the same value of commodities, 46 days.

The labourer in the Netherlands, 18 days.

The advantages of the French labourer being only 175, he would require nearly 28 days.

The Chinese would require 38 days.

The Hindoo, whose powers of production are estimated at only 65, would require 74 days.

THE CELEBRATED SANCY DIAMOND.—It is a known fact that the Grand Veneur of the Emperor of Russia has bought the famous diamond, known by the name of "Sancy," for the sum of 500,000 roubles, and that the merchant Jean Friedlin has been the Duchess of B—'s agent in this affair. The history of this precious stone is not generally known. The diamond originally came from India, and has remained in Europe for the last four centuries. The Duke of Burgundy, Charles the Bold, was its first owner, and he wore it on his helmet at the battle of Nancy, in which he lost his life. A Swiss soldier found it, and sold it to a priest for a florin. In 1489, it came into the possession of the king of Portugal, who being in want of money, sold it to a French gentleman for 100,000 francs. Nicholas Harley Sancy, who gave it his name, had it afterwards by succession. At the time of his embassy at Soleure, Henry the Third enjoined him to send him the diamond in order to pledge it; the servant that had been entrusted with it having been attacked by robbers, swallowed it, and was murdered. Sancy ordered the corpse to be opened, and the diamond was found in the stomach. James the Second of England possessed this diamond in 1688, when he came to France; it came afterwards into the possession of Louis XIV., and Louis XV. wore it in his crown at his coronation. The diamond has the shape of a pear; it is of the most beautiful water, and weighs 53½ carats. It is surely worth more than half a million of roubles.

FREE TRADE AND THE TEA TRADE.—Large sales of Company's and free trade teas have been effected within the last few days, and at reduced prices, which approach to those of the Continent and America. The people are at length beginning to reap the full advantage of the open trade; and it is probable that the exportation of teas, a new branch of commerce which this country has never enjoyed, but for which it is so well adapted, will soon commence. In the meanwhile, and in fulfilment of our pledge to keep the public informed of the progress of the Chinese commerce, we give the following brief comparative statements of the wholesale prices of teas at the present moment, and in 1832 under the monopoly—duty paid.

	1832.	1833.	Reduction per lb.
Bohea	3s. 9d.	2s. 3d.	1s. 6d.
Congou	4s. 6d.	3s. 6d.	1s. 0d.
Hyson	6s. 9d.	5s. 7d.	1s. 2d.

The benefit which will accrue to the consumer from these reduced prices must be farther explained. It is probable that there will be consumed of bohea tea in the current year not less than ten millions of pounds weight. This will produce a saving in the expenditure of the humbler classes of society equal to L.700,000 a-year. Of congou and teas of similar price used by this last class, and by the class of tradespeople, there will be consumed certainly not less than twenty-five millions of pounds: at a shilling a pound, we have here a reduction in the expenditure of this class of consumers equal to L.1,250,000. The whole consumption of the year will probably be about forty-two millions of pounds, instead of the thirty-two millions consumed under the monopoly. There will, therefore, be seven millions of pounds for the consumption of the upper and richer classes of society: and, taking the reduction here at 1s. 2d. per pound, it will appear that a saving is effected in their expenditure which may be altogether stated in round numbers, although it be somewhat more, at L.400,000. The nation thus saves altogether, by this experiment in free trade, the sum of L.2,300,000 per annum; while it has the commodity free as imported, and not stale from a two years' detention in the warehouses of the East India Company. Any of our readers who may have filed the Spectator, will discover that we predicted this result as long ago as March 1830; and not only predicted it, but exhibited in a tabular form and in ample detail the process by which it would certainly be brought about. [Our estimate was L.2,500,000; a very tolerable guess in prediction, five years before the event.] It is evident that the classes of society more immediately interested in the tea trade have, to say the least, nothing to complain of. In the single article of tea—not to mention raw silks, camphor, cassia, and other commodities—a trade has been thrown into their hands which they never enjoyed before, of which the import value, low as are the prices, is unquestionably underrated at three and a half millions a-year, and which will eventually call for a corresponding export of British manufactures, or their equivalent to the same amount. Thus the manufacturer also will have his advantage. The shipowner will likewise be benefited; for the present import of tea already gives employment to nearly one-third more tonnage than that employed by the Company; while every ship will make her voyage within the year, instead of taking two to perform it. Seven thousand tons of shipping is the smallest addition to the tonnage engaged in the China trade which can be supposed to have already taken place—a mere trifle to what may soon be expected. One of the greatest gainers will be the Treasury. The tea revenue, the duty on the quantity being substantially the same as before, will, in the first year of a perfect trade, exceed the old one by something better than a million per annum, or be about L.4,600,000 instead of L.3,500,000. In short, the government calculates, and it calculates reasonably, that the increase of the tea-duties will be quite sufficient to pay the whole interest of the L.20,000,000 expended on the emancipation of the West India slaves. This surely is encouragement for further improvements in free trade.—Spectator.

A CONTRAST.—How superior is a poor man with a rich spirit to a rich man with a poor spirit! To borrow the expressions of St Paul, he is "as having nothing, and yet possessing all things;" while the other presents the melancholy reverse—he is as possessing all things, and yet having nothing. The first hopes every thing, and fears nothing; the last hopes nothing, and fears every thing. There is no absolute poverty without poverty of spirit. The sunshine of the mind gives only the bright side. He who lives under its influence is courted by all men, and may, if he will, enjoy their goods without their troubles. The world is, as it were, held in trust for him; and, in freedom from care, he is alone entitled to be called a gentleman. He is the most independent of all men, because fortune has the least power over him. He is the only man that is free and unfettered; he may do what he pleases, and nothing is expected from him. He escapes importunity and flattery, and feels a perpetual consciousness that he is not sought for but for himself. Suspicion of motives never chills his confidence, nor withers his enjoyment. He has an enriching power within himself, which makes his outward wants easily supplied with industry and prudence, without the necessity of anxious toil. A little is his enough, and beyond, is an encumbrance. This is the Christian doctrine, and the doctrine of reason, which ever go together.—Elgin Courier.

FISH.—It is remarkable that the liking for fish seems to be the predominant characteristic of every people as it increases in opulence, and refines in luxurious enjoyments. Poor people are generally not very fond of fish. The ancient Greeks, like our lowest Scottish country people, had rather a dislike of fish; they never ate them except when compelled by necessity. Homer, who is very minute in his enumeration of the heroic dishes, excludes them from the tables of Agamemnon and Achilles. In later times, the Greeks became so excessively fond of fish, that they had a word expressing nearly the meaning of our Scottish word kitchen, which denoted fish principally, as that meat which, above all others, was preferred for being eaten with bread. The seas and shores of Greece and the islands were ransacked for the most delicate fish, and exorbitant prices were paid for them by the city epicures. The fishmongers of Athens were, to judge of them from description, a most opulent and powerful body; they were classed with the bankers of the city, and were alike unpopular, alike unmercifully lashed by the dramatic poets of Athens. There was a strange law at Corinth, one of the wealthiest, as it was the most commercial city, of Greece, that if any stranger appearing among them seemed to live too luxuriously, and was seen too frequently at the market-place purchasing high-priced fish, he was questioned by the magistrates as to his means of being able to maintain his table so expensively; if he showed the means of doing so, he was allowed to remain; if he could not exhibit his pecuniary capabilities, and persisted to purchase dear fish, he was consigned to the city executioner. So fond were the Athenians of fish, and so nice about the best modes of pickling or preserving them, that they presented with the right of citizenship the two sons of one Chærophilus, merely because their father had invented a new sauce for scomberi, or mackerel; whence an Athenian wit, on seeing the two youths galloping about the streets in their new equestrian dignity, denominated them the two mackerels on horseback. The rage of the Roman voluptuaries for delicate fish is well known; not only did they bring them from the shores of Britain and the farthest islands, but they endeavoured to colonise the seas in the neighbourhood of Rome with breeds of new fish. Octavius, the admiral of the Roman fleet, brought from some distant sea an immense number of scari, or chærs, with which he stocked and peopled the ocean between Ostia and Campania, as a nursery of new scari. What success befel this piscatory sort of colonisation, is not recorded.—Edin. Literary Journal.

TASTE OF THE PITMEN.—Most of the old pitmen had a taste for expensive furniture, a taste still indulged by many; and it would be impossible for a stranger to pass in front of the lowly dwellings, three or four hundred in number, adjacent to Jarrow Colliery, for example, without being struck by the succession of carved mahogany bedposts and tall chests of drawers, as well as chairs of the same costly material, which are presented at almost every open door; it is affirmed, indeed, that some of these mean-looking habitations do not contain a single article in wood of any other kind. In their dress, the pitmen, singularly enough, often affect to be gaudy, or rather they did so formerly; being fond of clothes of glaring colours. Their holiday waistcoats, called by them possey jackets, were frequently of very curious patterns, displaying flowers of various dyes; their stockings mostly of blue, purple, pink, or mixed colours. A great part of them used to have their hair very long, which on work days was either tied in a queue, or rolled up in curls; but when dressed in their best attire, it was commonly spread over their shoulders. Some of them wore two or three narrow ribands round their hats, placed at equal distances, in which it was customary with them to insert one or more bunches of primroses or other flowers. Perhaps it will strike a stranger, on passing along the streets of Newcastle on a Sunday or a holiday, that the better sort of the inhabitants are partial to posies or flowers.—History of Fossil Fuel, lately published.

A DINNER PARTY IN RUSSIA.—In Heath's Pictorial Annual, just published, Mr Leitch Ritchie furnishes us with much novel and interesting information in regard to the domestic manners of the Russians. The following are extracts from the work, "Journey to St Petersburg and Moscow." He first describes a stranger's introduction at a dinner party at a merchant's house. "Being strangers, we bow profoundly; the lady of the house graciously; but one of us, who has the good fortune to be on more intimate terms, steps up to where she is sitting. He salutes her hand, and while raising his head she kisses him on the brow; and the little ceremony strikes us as being at once the most kindly and graceful we have ever seen. When the guests are seated, the two hostile lines facing each other, the master and mistress of the feast remain standing. It is their business to attend to the wants of the company themselves, and to see that the servants do their duty. Nothing can escape their observation. Your plate does not remain a moment empty, nor your glass empty or full. At length a toast is proposed: it is 'the Emperor.' At that instant a door flies open, and a burst of music sweeps in from the next room, the guests joining their acclamations to the sound. The new national hymn follows, 'God save the Emperor,' and receives additional power from the practised ears and voices of the company. Other toasts speedily follow, such as 'the Ladies,' 'the Gentlemen,' and are done honour to in flowing bumpers of champagne. Many other French wines are on the table, as also Madeira, which is much esteemed by the Russians, and a bottle of port is set down expressly for the Englishmen. Soon, however, the wine appears to grow distasteful; and one of the company, with a knowing look to his compeer, declares that he thinks it wants sweetening. At this signal the master and mistress of the feast exchange a hearty kiss, and the drink goes down as before. But in a few minutes another discontent raises his voice, and thus the complaint passes from one to another, 'This wine is not sweet enough,' the host and hostess kissing each time till they are ready to faint. The lady, however, takes her revenge. She fixes an inveterate eye upon the glasses, which must be emptied within a given time, and filled as soon as emptied. The lights at length begin to misconduct themselves; they twinkle, if they do not absolutely hop. As for you, you are no doubt deadly sober; but willing to remain so, are desirous of making your escape. You seize the opportunity of the hostess's back being turned, and vanish from the room; but, alas! you are caught in the middle of the stairs, and conducted back a prisoner. At her own time she gives the signal, and all get up from the table. The ladies must have been conquerors in the pitched battle, for in the march to the drawing-room they again take precedence of the lords of the creation. The latter, indeed, show some little symptoms of the confusion of defeat; but these are completely dissipated by the refreshment of a cup of coffee. In fine, the company take their leave with abundance of bows, kisses, and thanks."

AMERICANS AT MALTA.—In Malta I had remarked large arm-chairs, furnished with rockers, in two different drawing-rooms, and one also in a shop that I casually entered, which led me to inquire if the use of such chairs, confined to the nursery in England, was common here. To my great surprise, I was informed that the custom of using rocking chairs had been imported from America; and a lady, to whom the adventure occurred, greatly entertained me by relating the effect produced on herself and her daughters by the first sight of a family rocking scene. This lady, soon after her arrival, had occasion to return a visit to an American family, recently settled here. The party visited consisted of a father, mother, and three grown-up young people, all somewhat of a tall, spare make, with that sort of primitive mien which seems to characterise the inhabitants of some of the states. The visitors took their places on a sofa in the drawing-room, and the family arranged themselves opposite, according to their seniority, in arm-chairs. When the first civilities had passed, and conversation had begun to flag, the lady of the house, whose appearance and cap were alike somewhat starched, proceeded with much composure to rock herself in her chair. The young people—their civil speeches concluded—with an easy unconcern, one by one, followed their mother's example. At length the father, who had hitherto borne the principal burden of conversation, seemed unconsciously to fall into the same movement. Thus seated, in rather an awful semicircle, and all gently indulging in the same soothing exercise, the impression upon the strangers was quite astounding. The lady, who had hardly recovered from the effects of her voyage, began to grow dizzy, and to think with dismay of what she had suffered on board; while her young companions, highly entertained with so novel a scene, had great difficulty to restrain their mirth. They gladly made their visit as short as was consistent with the customary forms, heartily rejoiced to make their escape without disturbing the gravity of the party by an involuntary laugh.—Dr Hogg's Visit to Damascus.

HISTORY OF THE HIGHLAND BAGPIPE.—The history of the bagpipe is very curious and interesting. Although an exceedingly ancient instrument, it does not appear to have been known to the Celtic nations. It was in use among the Trojans, Greeks, and Romans; but how or in what manner it came to be introduced into the Highlands, is a question which cannot be solved. Two suppositions have been started on this point; either that it was brought in by the Romans, or by the northern nations. The latter conjecture appears to be the most probable, for we cannot possibly imagine, that if the bagpipe had been introduced so early as the Roman epoch, no notice should have been taken of that instrument by the more early annalists and poets. But if the bagpipe was an imported instrument, how does it happen that the great Highland pipe is peculiar to the Highlands, and is, perhaps, the only national instrument in Europe? If it was introduced by the Romans, or by the people of Scandinavia, how has it happened that no traces of that instrument in its present shape are to be found anywhere except in the Highlands? There is, indeed, some plausibility in these interrogatories, but they are easily answered by supposing, what is very probable, that the great bagpipe, in its present form, is the work of modern improvement, and that, originally, the instrument was much the same as is still seen in Belgium and Italy. The effects of this national instrument in arousing the feelings of those who have, from infancy, been accustomed to its wild and warlike tones, is truly astonishing. "In halls of joy, and in scenes of mourning, it has prevailed; it has animated Scotland's warriors in battle, and welcomed them back after their toils to the homes of their love and the hills of their nativity. Its strains were the first sounded on the ears of infancy, and they are the last to be forgotten in the wandering of age. Even Highlanders will allow that it is not the gentlest of instruments; but when far from the mountain homes, what sobads, however melodious, could thrill round the heart like one burst of their own wild native pipe? The feelings which other instruments awaken are general and undesigned, because they talk alike to Frenchmen, Spaniards, Germans, and Highlanders, for they are common to all; but the bagpipe is sacred to Scotland, and speaks a language which Scotchmen only feel. It talks to them of home, and all the past, and brings before them, on the burning shores of India, the wild hills and oft frequented streams of Caledonia; the friends that are thinking of them, and the sweethearts and wives that are weeping for them there; and need it be told here, to how many fields of danger and victory its proud strains have led? There is not a battle that is honourable to Britain in which its war-blast has not sounded. When every other instrument has been hushed by the confusion and carnage of the scene, it has been borne into the thick of battle, and, far in the advance, its bleeding but devoted bearer, sinking on the earth, has sounded at once encouragement to his countrymen and his own coronach."—Brown's History of the Highlands of Scotland.

COMPARATIVE COST OF CANDLES AND GAS.—The light of one candle at a time, for fifty hours, will cost 8d., whilst the cost of gas-light equal to that of one candle, will cost 2½d. and a very small fraction. Three feet of gas is equal to seven candles; three feet and a half, eleven candles; four feet, twelve; and four feet and a half, fifteen candles. From numerous experiments made, it has been discovered that the common notion of candles burning faster for being snuffed is erroneous. A ten-dip should last, on an average, 5h. 30m.; a short six-mould, 8h. 35m.; short and long four-mould, 12h. 16m.—Mechanics' Almanack.

UNCLAIMED PLATE.—The large sum to which unclaimed dividends sometimes amount, is well known; the quantity, too, of unclaimed plate in London is very great. At Coutts' banking-house there is a room filled with chests of plate deposited there by persons of whom all trace is lost. Some have been now twenty years there.

THE MOON.—Some time since, a M. Gruithausen, of Munich, stated that he had incontestible proofs that the moon is inhabited: all Europe assailed him with ridicule, but he was not to be laughed out of his opinions, and has now republished them, in concert with a learned colleague and astronomer, M. Schreter. Their common conclusions are: first, that the vegetation on the surface of the moon extends to 55° S. lat. and 65° N. lat.; secondly, that from the 50th degree of N. lat. to the 47th of S. lat., they recognise evident traces of the abode of animated beings. They repeat that which M. Gruithausen formerly asserted, that they perceive highroads in various directions, and have further discovered a colossal edifice, nearly under the equator of our satellite. At this place there is an appearance of a considerable city, near to which they are perfectly assured of the existence of a construction similar to that called in fortification a horn-work.—Athenæum.

SCOTLAND.

PROTESTANT ASSOCIATIONS.

The existing circumstances of the church in Ireland have had the effect of throwing the British religious world into new relations. The dissenters in general have been induced, by a community of feeling on the Voluntary question, to forego the extreme hostility which they formerly professed upon purely religious grounds against the Catholics. On the other hand, the friends of establishments in Scotland and England, after disregarding the existence of Catholicism for a hundred and fifty years, have suddenly sunk differences which have prevailed between them since the Reformation, and which at one time arrayed the one party against the other in deadly warfare, in order to combine against a body of whose continued existence, till recent political events, they seemed hardly conscious. Professing an extreme dread of the advances which they allege the Catholic religion to have made of late years in England and Scotland, the friends of establishments have begun to form Protestant Associations, for the avowed purpose of withstanding the further encroachments of Popery; while their antagonists loudly assert that the real objects are to muster force against the existing government, and to protect the Irish establishment from threatened reformation.

A resolution having been formed by some friends of the church in Edinburgh to form a Protestant Association, permission was requested and obtained from the Dean of Guild to hold the necessary public meeting in St Andrew's Church. About a twelvemonth ago, a public meeting respecting the annuity tax or assessment for ministers' stipend having been held in that place of worship with the consent of the magistracy, the kirk-session applied for and obtained, from the Court of Session, an interdict forbidding public meetings to be held there in future, without the consent of the ministers. Remembering this insult, the Town Council, Dec. 15, called the Dean of Guild to account for granting the use of the church for the formation of what one of the members described as "an Orange Lodge, designed to set men together by the ears, and drag religion through the mire of politics." Twenty-five members condemned, some of them in very warm language, the object of the meeting, while only five seemed favourable to it; though, as permission had already been given, a few more were inclined to let the meeting take place. On a vote, it was determined by 16 to 13 to withdraw the permission.

The meeting took place in the Assembly Rooms, Dec. 23, and was numerously and respectfully attended, the Marquis of Tweeddale being in the chair, while the platform was occupied by a great number of clergymen and others. The chairman and speakers very emphatically denied that a double object was entertained; and the spirit of the proceedings may be gathered from the following resolutions:—"1. That the Protestant inhabitants of the British empire have been comparatively indifferent about the existence and prevalence of Popery amongst them, while Roman Catholics have taken advantage of their supineness to promote their own cause, with that unwearied zeal and activity, as well as devotion to the interests of their party, which have always characterised the adherents of the Church of Rome.—2. That from a consideration at once of the essential and unchangeable features of Popery, in doctrine, discipline, government, and worship, its injurious influence both on the temporal and spiritual welfare of man, on the best interests of individuals, families, and communities, and also of its present condition as exhibited in the active exertions of its friends, the success with which these exertions have been attended, the hopes which they cherish, and the plans which they appear to be meditating—it is now the duty of all true Protestants publicly and vigorously to exert themselves in the use of all proper means for checking the progress and preventing the encroachments of Popery, and propagating the great doctrines of the Reformation." The third resolution indicated the formation of a society to be called the Edinburgh Protestant Association, the objects of which should be "to promote the cause of Protestant truth, and the great doctrines of the Reformation, and especially to diffuse information as to the character and designs of Popery."

Nov. 18. The northern coast of Scotland was visited by a dreadful storm: the previous night had been remarkable for an uncommonly brilliant display of the aurora borealis over the whole heavens. Eight fishing-boats, belonging to Peterhead, Gardinston, Johnshaven, and other places, and containing forty-eight men, were lost. Several coasting-vessels were wrecked, but their crews were saved. On the land, houses were unroofed, stacks of hay and corn blown away, and much other damage to property inflicted.

—25. At a numerous and respectable meeting in Edinburgh, the Dean of Guild in the chair, it was resolved to take steps for the formation of a railway connecting Edinburgh with the ports of Leith and Newhaven. The depot in Edinburgh is proposed to be upon the low ground at the east end of the Prince's Street Gardens, near the slaughter-house, whence there will be a tunnel under the line of St Andrew Street and Dublin Street, issuing at the bottom of Scotland Street, with a descent of 1 foot in 27. From the last point, the railway will proceed in a direct line to Newhaven, and by a diverging line to Leith, the descent on that part of the way being only 1 in 250. The cost of the undertaking is calculated at £60,000, and the annual return at £10,500. A large portion of the stock has already been subscribed for.

Dec. 2. The first general meeting of the subscribers to the proposed Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway was held in the Black-Bull Inn, Glasgow. The Lord Provost presided, and gave an excellent address from the chair, showing the great public advantages that would result from this measure, and congratulating the meeting on the prospect they enjoyed of being able soon to pass to or from the metropolis of Scotland, by a smooth railway, in eighty or eighty-five minutes. The meeting was numerously attended and highly respectable. Deputations from the shareholders in Edinburgh, Manchester, and Liverpool, attended, and added not a little to the spirit of enthusiasm and harmony that prevailed. The Company stand pledged to the public that nothing but the best line between the two cities is to be selected. The stock has been already subscribed.

—8. A grand dinner was held in Edinburgh, by gentlemen chiefly of the liberal party, for the purpose of expressing sympathy with the expatriated Poles. The Marquis of Breadalbane was called to the chair; and among the distinguished guests were Prince Czartoryski, Count Zamoyski, and other Polish exiles; the Earl of Buchan, Sir George Warrender, Mr Ferguson of Raith, Lord Dudley Stuart, Mr P. M. Stewart, Mr Gillon, Sir J. Gibson Craig, Sir T. D. Lauder, Lord Advocate Murray, &c. Lord Breadalbane, in a very energetic oration, denounced the conduct of the Czar, as scarcely to be paralleled in the annals of human infamy, and such inspired disgust and indignation in every civilised state. Prince Czartoryski expressed his gratitude for the reception he had met with in Scotland, in feeling terms; and assured the company, that though Poland would not waste her strength by a partial and untimely burst of indignation, she would be ready when the way of action came to make any sacrifice to recover independence. Among the other speakers were Lord Dudley Stuart, Mr J. A. Murray, and Count Zamoyski. The same spirit of indignation against the atrocious tyranny of Russia, and of sympathy with its victims, which was so fervently expressed by Lord Breadalbane, marked the whole of the proceedings.

—22. An important case was decided in the Jury Court, Edinburgh; Mr S. J. Hallam, tea-dealer, Waterloo Place, Edinburgh, pursuer, and Messrs Frederick Gye and Company, Fleet Street, merchants, London, defenders; damages laid at £5,000. This trial arose out of a law-suit betwixt the parties some years ago, and the present action rested on certain defamatory charges made by Messrs Gye at that period, which they have been unable to substantiate, and also for an alleged illegal arrestment of the pursuer in London, on or about the 27th March 1850, to the injury of his character and credit; several houses having in consequence made a run upon him for their settlements, and afterwards very much restricted their dealings with him. The jury, by a unanimous verdict, gave damages £2,000.

The sheriffship of Banffshire, vacant by the death of Mr Urquhart, has been conferred upon Mr Currie, whose vacant deputy-advocateship has been given to Mr Robert Handside.

Sir Charles Bell, so eminent for his discoveries respecting the nervous system, has been appointed by the Town Council of Edinburgh, to fill the chair of surgery in their university, vacant by the death of Professor Turner.

The church commissioners have sent to the different ministers of the kirk a list of queries, regarding the size of their parishes, the extent of church accommodation, the amount of their emoluments, &c., and to the dissenting clergymen a separate list of queries as to the amount of accommodation furnished by their places of worship, the number of their congregations, the proportion between the present and past amount of their flocks, and the debts, if any, by which their places of worship may be encumbered. The ministers and others have generally resolved to reply in answer to the last query, and also to one respecting the application of their door-collections, unless "the commission inquire into the cost of parish churches and manse—the disputes and litigations to which they give rise—the principles on which the expense is levied—the vexatious, expensive, frequent, long-protracted litigations which are perpetually arising from processes of augmentation, locality, &c."

A correspondent of the Edinburgh Weekly Journal, who is stated by the editor of that paper to have "the very best opportunity of ascertaining the fact," corrects the newspaper account of the age of the deceased Mr James Hogg, by stating that the parish record gives "December 9, 1770," as the date of his baptism, so that he must have been about sixty-five years old. Mr Hogg appears to have been himself ignorant of the date of his birth, or rather under a complete mistake upon the subject, for, while of opinion that he was a superior poet to Robert Burns, he seemed anxious to derive a reflected lustre from that celebrated individual, by alleging that he was born on the same day—the 25th of January—for which he said he had the authority of a family chronicle on a blank page of his father's bible.

The committee appointed by the subscribers for a monument in Edinburgh to Sir Walter Scott, have found it difficult to decide respecting the character of the building to be erected. Two designs were brought under consideration. The one is an Egyptian obelisk 200 feet high; to be built of Craigleith stone, the shaft rising from an ornamental base of 44 feet in height; to be placed at the west end of George Street, near the eastern boundary of Charlotte Square Garden. This plan is by Mr Playfair. The other is a Gothic architectural structure, 85 feet in height, or 100 feet, if desired; to be built of Craigleith stone, rising from a granite base, and comprehending a colossal statue of Sir Walter; also to be placed in Charlotte Square. Mr Rickman of Birmingham is the author of this plan. The estimated expense of the obelisk is L.5500; of the Gothic structure, L.4000, including L.500 for a statue, or L.5000 if the dimensions are increased to 100 feet, and greater enrichment of ornament introduced in the detail. The committee have ultimately resolved to procure additional plans, and not to accept any which does not include a statue.

Dr Hunter, professor of humanity, has been appointed principal of the United College, St Salvador and St Leonard at St Andrews, in place of the deceased Dr Nicol. The Rev. Mr Jackson has been appointed professor of divinity in place of the late Dr Mitchell, in the College of St Mary's.

A gentleman informs us that he has seldom been more deeply impressed by any ordinary circumstance than by the following simple occurrence. He was travelling from the North Highlands to Inverness, and on the Lochacraig road, near Craig, in one of the bleakest and most barren parts of that rugged district, he observed a small turf hut or booth near the roadside, from which smoke was issuing. His first impression was, that the hut was a smuggling depot, thrown up hastily by some band of natives, who think it no great sin or shame to levy black mail on the excise department. He alighted and entered the small domicile, in which he saw with surprise and delight—not a party of smugglers, but about a dozen children with books and slates, conning their tasks under the eye of a young man, officiating apparently as schoolmaster. It turned out, that a few of the shepherds, scattered over the hills, had clubbed together, and engaged a teacher for their children. They erected the hut on a part of the heath most central for the different families; and here, in the little low booth, amidst the circling snows, the urchins spell over the tasks that may hereafter make their fortune, when they leave their native glen to fight their way in the world. Small must be the recompense given to the teacher, yet great is the zeal of the poor shepherds, and this trait of truly Scottish feeling we record with much pleasure and satisfaction.—Inverness Courier.

The public is respectfully informed that the present is the concluding sheet of CHAMBERS'S HISTORICAL NEWSPAPER. After a trial of above three years, the Editors are satisfied that the work is not of a nature calculated to ensure success upon the cheap principle, and that, in prosecuting the undertaking any further, they would be devoting, to a task comparatively thankless, time and thought which may be expended upon much more important objects. It will appear strange that the circulation of a work of which the Editors speak in these terms is about ten thousand copies, being a much larger amount than was ever attained, perhaps, by any British newspaper. But, in a publication upon the principle above stated, a circulation of ten thousand is barely sufficient to pay the expenses. The Editors might have been less disposed to lay stress upon this point, if they were not persuaded that they can promote the public good much more effectually in another way. In the production of a cheap and complete course of Educational Works, upon which they have recently adventured, they believe that they are taking steps for operating a more extensive benefit upon the national mind, than could be expected to accrue from any other labour upon which they could bestow their time—not excepting the management of a Journal which weekly infuses the breath of moral and intellectual life into two or three hundred thousand people.

 The thirty-nine numbers of the Historical Newspaper will form a volume, for which a title-page has been prepared, and may be obtained in a few days from all the agents of Messrs Chambers.

Now publishing,

CHAMBERS'S EDUCATIONAL COURSE,

EDITED BY

WILLIAM AND ROBERT CHAMBERS,

CONDUCTORS OF CHAMBERS'S EDINBURGH

JOURNAL, &c.

The success which has attended the efforts of Messrs CHAMBERS in the business of Popular Instruction, has induced them to undertake the duty of supplying a series of Treatises and School Books, constructed according to the most advanced views of Education, both as a Science and an Art, and answering in its parts and ultimate general effect to the demands of the age. For this task they conceive themselves to possess considerable advantages, in the means they command for the preparation and diffusion of Popular Literature, their known independence on sects and parties of every kind, and the assurance which they hope has already been given and accepted, of the moral purity of their intentions.

Their Course will, as far as possible, embody the code and materials of a complete Elementary Education, Physical, Moral, and Intellectual, according to the following views:—

[Physical Education.] In order that man may possess a vigorous frame of body and its concomitant sound health, without which every species of moral and intellectual excellence is cramped and frustrated, he must be subjected from the moment of birth to such processes of management, and afterwards trained to such habits in food, exercise, cleanliness, and exposure to air, as have been ascertained to conduce to strength and health.

[Moral Education.] For the sake of himself and society, he must be habituated, from the dawn of consciousness and feeling, to the moderate activity and regulation of the inferior sentiments of his nature, and gradually to the due exercise of the higher sentiments—justice, kindness, and truth, towards his fellow-beings, and veneration towards the objects of his religious faith. In time, as his intellectual faculties develop themselves, he ought to be instructed in the theory, and impressed with the higher sanctions, of that morality in which he has been previously trained and exercised.

[Intellectual Education.] That he may be qualified for the ready acquisition of knowledge, and the performance of the duties and labours of life, he must be instructed in (1) Reading, at least in his own tongue, (2) Writing, (3) Arithmetic, and (4) Grammar, Etymology, and Composition. That he may enter life with a mind informed respecting that creation of which he is a part, and that society of which he is a member, and qualified as well as may be to perform the part which will fall to his lot, he must be acquainted with at least the elements of the following kinds of knowledge—(1) the Surface of the Earth (Geography); (2) the Structure of the Earth (Geology); (3) the Vegetable Productions of the Earth (Botany); (4) the Animal Creatures of the Earth (Zoology); (5) the Phenomena of the Atmosphere (Meteorology); (6) the Composition of the Substances of the Material World, and the changes which are produced by the action of these substances upon each other (Chemistry); (7) the Mechanical Powers and Relations of the Material World (Natural Philosophy); (8) the Science of Measurement (Geometry); (9) the Relation of our Globe to the other component parts of the vast System of Creation (Astronomy); (10) the Physical, Moral, and Intellectual Nature of Man, with reference to the preservation of health, and the attainment of happiness; (11) the Production and Distribution of National Wealth (Political Economy); (12) the History of Nations and Countries, ancient and Modern, especially those in which the Pupil is most interested—of their Literature, Eminent Men, Resources, &c.

As examples, almost at the extremes of the series, there have been published,
